The fifth jewel in the imperial crown is Faith, or Spiritual Light. It is the true prophet of the soul, and ever beholds a spiritual life, spiritual relations, labours, and joys. Its office is to teach man that he is a spiritual being, that he has an inward life enshrined in this material encasement, an immortal gem set now in an earthly casket. It assures man that he lives not for this life alone, but for another superior to this, more glorious and real. It dignifies humanity with immortality. It dwells ever upon an unseen world, announcing always that unseen realities are eternal. Virtue, knowledge, wisdom, mercy, love, righteousness, and worship, are among its immortal, unseen realities. Lofty, dignified, transcendently glorious are its teachings, and equally so are its moral influences. It is a faculty of the human soul too much neglected. The things of time and sense, earth and sin, waste its energies and dim its sight. We are too carnal, too earthly. We cultivate not enough our spiritual senses. Let us be wise, and fail not to invigorate our spiritual parts. Life will smile in gladness, and eternity rejoice in glory, if we are faithful in this duty. Youth is the time to commence its cultivation. Youth's powers are pliant and easily trained. Let life be our great school for the cultivation of all our moral powers. Upon the moral sentiments we cannot bestow too much attention. They are vastly important to our happiness and eternal good. We cannot honour them with too much attention. We cannot be too watchful of their good. It should be the end and object of our life to dignify and adorn them.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

INTRODUCTORY CHAPTER.

ROBERT WILTON was a young man in search of employment.

One morning he was seated in his own little bedroom, attentively reading a letter. Suddenly he changed countenance, and in tones of dismay he read aloud the following sentence:—

"As you do not know French, I have been obliged to take your cousin as my clerk, instead of yourself. I am sorry for this, because I consider you a steady young man, and I know that confidence can be placed in you."

Robert could read no more! The letter that distressed him so much was from his uncle, who was carrying on a large business at the west end of London. His poor nephew was aware that the clerkship thus lost to him would have brought him in £100 a year, besides offering him a pleasant home in his uncle's family. Now, through his ignorance of French, he must remain a burden on his poor mother, who was reduced (from good circumstances) to the necessity of keeping a little shop in Camberwell. True, Robert willingly shared her labours, but his help was not necessary, and he knew that he could assist her much more by getting into a situation, and adding to her small means out of his own salary. Poor Robert was almost in despair, when suddenly he heard the voice of an old schoolfellow on the staircase, and soon afterwards he was shaking hands with his dearest friend. Of course he revealed his sorrow, and George Burton was not slow in comforting him.

"I'm sure," said he to Robert, "your uncle, who has so much in his power, will offer you another situation, if you only contrive to learn French quickly."

"Alas," replied Robert, "how am I to do that?"

"Just what I am going to tell you," said George. "You know what a favourite I was with the French tutor; partly on account of my fondness for his language—partly because I was the son of the schoolmaster, and had more power to make him comfortable than the other boys. This tutor saved up a nice little sum and went back to France, but before he left he had made me as good a French scholar as he was himself. Last Christmas, I completed my twentieth year, and my father thought I knew quite enough to be his assistant. I was delighted to be promoted to the office, and I can assure you my father gives me a very handsome salary; and now for what relates more immediately to our present purpose. I not only instruct the boys in Latin and English, but French into the bargain, and the parents declare the pupils make more progress in this language now, than they did when there was a French tutor in the house. Our holidays have just begun, and, if you like, I will give you a French lesson every day of the week until our pupils come back."

"Oh, that will be kind of you," answered Robert; "but I fear there is one great obstacle in the way. I don't know grammar, for I've forgotten that of my own language."

"I own that's a pity," said George: "because, in order to make you a thoroughly good French scholar, I must teach you grammar and French too. But, keep up your spirits; I promise you that you shall learn enough to talk French, and to understand the natives, with the aid of a very few rules, and these shall be so simple, that in acquiring them you shall exclaim 'Trouble's a pleasure.' Then, if you think it advisable to acquire an elegant and classical knowledge of French, you must not object to go into a select variety of particulars."

"Oh, dear, kind George," said Robert, "give me the practical knowledge first. When shall we begin?"

"Immediately," answered George. "And, first, you must know that I am about to instruct you on a plan of my own. Where, however, I think other teachers have formed right conclusions, I do not disdain taking a hint from them; for instance, I adopt a method that has been in favour with grammarians from time immemorial—I mean that of spelling the French sounds of our English alphabet. These you will write as I dictate them to you; and when you have them on a sheet of paper under their corresponding letters you should keep them spread before your eyes to assist you in reading and pronouncing French when I am not with you. Now take pen, ink, and paper, and begin the first lesson."

THE FIRST LESSON.

The French alphabet is not sounded like ours; but, remember, it consists of the same number of letters, with this exception—the French leave out the w. Now follows the alphabet, with French sounds:—

a b c d e f g h i j k l ah bay say day eh eff thuy ashe ee zhee kah ell m n o p q r s t u v x y z em em enn o pay keu air ess tay ue vay ix e zed

(N.B. I have objected to spelling y eegrek, because it would mislead pupils, since y, sounded in words, has nothing to do with greek or grec.)

The syllables you have just put under the letters do not, in all instances, give the exact French sounds; but they give them nearly enough to be understood by a French person.

When you come to pronounce words, you must recollect this rule—Do not sound the last consonant. If your grammar has so completely slipped out of your head that you forget what a consonant is, I need only tell you that every letter in the alphabet is a consonant, with the exception of a, e, i, o, and u. These five are vowels.

I shall now dictate to you, in French, the names of a few things that would be necessary to your existence and comfort in case you were travelling in France, among people who did not understand English. You had better spell the sound of these words, and learn them all by heart.

NECESSARY WORDS.

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.	SOUND.
Money	argent	arzhawng
Bread	pain	paing
Water	eau	o
Meat	vien	ver-ahnde
Vegetables	légumes	lay-ooom
Breakfast	déjeuner	dayzhooon
Dinner	dîner	daynny
Tea	thé	ta
Bed	lit	lay
Dry sheets	draps secs	draps
Candle	chandelle	shandell
Towels	essui-main	esswee-mang
Soap	savon	sahwong
Hot water	eau chaude	oh-showd
Waiter	garçon	garssong

You will not deny that the things of which you have just acquired the names are very necessary. The sound, as you have written it, is not quite as correct as you can catch from me, or from a French person; but I cannot always be at your elbow, and the little vocabulary can be your pocket companion. It will enable you to be understood in France, and that would be a great point gained.

If you learn to put donnez-moi before anything you require, you will make a complete, though not a perfectly correct sentence; but it will serve your turn, and make a good beginning. This donnez-moi, in English, "give me," is sounded as if it were written donnay mwa; the wa sounded as in water.

If you recollect all I have told you in this first lesson, you have already a little stock of French to "draw upon." To-morrow you must learn more rules, and begin making up sentences; and I must find a nice easy book for you to translate.

THE OTHER SIDE.

A TALE OF BUTTONS.

BREAKFAST was just over at the parsonage; the table was cleared away, the chairs set back, and Mrs. Ashton, in a neat morning-dress, with a pretty little cap on her pretty little head, was standing with her arm over her tall husband's shoulder, looking at the morning paper. And as fine-looking a pair they were as you will be likely to see in a summer's day. The Reverend Clement Ashton was indeed said to be the handsomest man in the parish, and that with good reason; whether he ever had any ideas of his own on the subject, was entirely his own affair.

Mrs. Ashton, as she was styled by the parish—Christiana, as her godfathers and godmothers named her—Chrissey, as her brothers and her husband called her—was not usually regarded as remarkably handsome. Her features were not very regular, and she was not fair; but her eyes, so bright and clear, her figure, so elastic and trim, her abundant hair, and, above all, her frank, easy manners, and the expression of sunny good temper and perfect openness which lighted up her face, made most people consider her a very attractive woman. Every one in the parish liked her, from the two old people who sat in the warm corner near the stove in church, and always came round to get their dinner at the parsonage on Sundays, to Mrs. Dr. Rush, who was by far the grandest lady in the parish.

Mr. and Mrs. Ashton had been married about six months, after an engagement of almost three years, during which time they had corresponded vigorously, but had seen very little of each other, for Mr. Ashton was an assistant in an overgrown parish in one of our larger cities, and could seldom be spared; and Chrissey was a teacher in another great city, where she supported herself, and helped, by her labours, to educate one of her brothers for the ministry. It was not till this brother had finished his studies, and was placed on an independent footing, that she had consented to be married.

"George cannot support himself entirely," she said, in answer to the remonstrance of her lover; "he is not strong enough to labour as many of the young men do, and he needs my help. I know that he has talents which will make him eminently useful in the calling he has chosen; I know, too, that if he attempts any more than he is doing, his health will fail, and he will become discouraged. You must content yourself to board awhile longer with your good friend, Mrs. Bicketts, Clement."

And to this resolution she steadfastly adhered, despite Clement's persuasions, and those of George himself, who was very much distressed at the thought that his sister's marriage should be put off on his account. Under these circumstances, the lovers did not see much of each other, and they were finally married, without Chrissey's ever having suspected her husband of any infirmity of temper. She had suffered much on discovering that such was the case, and felt inclined sometimes to wish that she had never been disenchanted; but she was a wise woman; she knew her husband's intrinsic excellences and strength as well as his weakness, and, altering an old maxim to suit her own purposes, she resolved both to endure and to cure.

"What do you set about to-day?" she asked, as Mr. Ashton, having exhausted the paper, arose from the sofa corner.

"Visiting!" replied his reverence. "I must go up to old Mrs. Balcomb's, and see the Joneses, and try to prevail on Phil Taggart to let his children come to the Sunday-school once more. Then, I have to see poor Maggy Carpenter, who is much worse again, and if I have time, I shall get into the omnibus and ride out to the Mills, to see that girl Miss Flower mentioned to me yesterday."

"What a round!" exclaimed Chrissey. "You will never get home to dinner at two o'clock. I think I will put it off till six, and run the risk of being thought 'stuck up,' like poor cousin Lily."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, you know they always dine at six, to suit the Doctor's arrangements. One day Lily called about some society matter, on a lady who lives not a hundred miles from her street, about five o'clock in the afternoon. The lady herself came to the door, and Lily was about entering, when she thought she perceived a smell of roast meat in the hall, and said, very politely: 'But, perhaps it is your dinner hour?'"

"No, indeed!" replied madam, with indignation. "We don't dine at this time of day; we are not so stuck up!"

"Poor Lily!" exclaimed Mr. Ashton, laughing; "what did she say?"

"Oh! she did her errand, and retired, of course. There was nothing to be said."

Mr. Ashton turned to go into the study, and, as he did so, his foot caught in the carpet, and he was nearly thrown down. Chrissey started in alarm, but he recovered himself, and said, pettishly enough—

"I do wish you would have that carpet nailed down. I have stumbled over it twenty times in the course of a week, I do believe."

"I thought Amy had fastened it," returned his wife, with perfect mildness. "I am sure I saw her at work there. The door must pull it out of place, I think."

"Oh! of course, there is some excellent reason for its being out of order. It seems to me that, with all your ingenuity, you might find some way of making it more secure."

He turned into his study, shutting the door after him with rather unnecessary force, and Mrs. Ashton returned to the fire and arranged her work-basket for the day with something of a cloud on her fair face. She was not left long undisturbed, for Mr. Ashton's voice was soon heard calling her, in impatient tones. She sighed, but arose and entered the next room, where she found her husband standing before his bureau, partly dressed, and with shirts, cravats, and handkerchiefs scattered about him like a new kind of snow, while his face bore an expression of melancholy reproach, at once painful and slightly ludicrous.

"What is the matter?" she asked.

"Oh, the old story!" Not a button where it ought to be! not a shirt ready to wear! I do not mean to be unreasonable," he continued, in an agitated voice, as he tumbled over the things, to the manifest discomposure of the clean linen, "but really, Chrissey, I think you might see that my clothes are in order. I am sure I would do more than that for you; but, here I am delayed, and put to the greatest inconvenience, because you cannot sew on these buttons! I should really think that a little of the time you spend in writing to George and Henry might as well be bestowed on me."

This address was delivered in a tone and manner of mournful distress, which might have been justified, perhaps, if Mrs. Ashton had picked his pocket as he was going to church.

"What is the matter with this shirt?" asked Chrissey, quietly examining one of the discarded garments. "It seems to have all the buttons in their places; and this one, too, is quite perfect; and here is another. My dear husband, how many shirts do you usually wear at a time?"

"Oh! it is all very well for you to smile, my love, but, I do assure you, I found several with no means at all of fastening the wristbands. We had breakfast late, and now I shall be detained half an hour, when I ought to be away. I know you mean well, but if you had served a year's apprenticeship with my mother before you were married, it might have been all the better for your housekeeping."

"It might have prevented it altogether," thought Chrissey; but the thought was repressed in a moment. She picked up and replaced the scattered apparel, folded the snowy cravats, warmed her husband's overshoes, and saw that the beautiful little Communion service, presented by a lady of the parish, and consecrated to such sufferers as Maggy Carpenter, was in readiness. Before he left the house, Mr. Ashton had forgotten both his fretfulness and its cause. He kissed his wife, thanked her for her trouble, proposed that she should send for Lily to spend the day with her, and strode away with his usual elastic step and pleasant face.

Chrissey watched him from the door till he turned into the next street, and then went back to the fire-side, and to her own reflections. This fretfulness and tendency to be greatly disturbed at little matters was almost her husband's only fault. He was self-sacrificing to the last degree, faithful and indefatigable, as an apostle almost, in his professional labours, liberal to a fault, and in his administration of parish matters, wise and conciliating to all. He could bear injuries, real injuries, with the greatest patience, and was never known to harbour resentment.

But with all these good qualities, Mr. Ashton had one fault—a fault which threatened to disturb and finally to destroy the comfort of his married life. If his wife, by extravagance or bad management, had wasted his income and involved him in difficulties, it is probable that he would never have spoken an unkind word to her; but the fact of a button being missing, or a book removed from its place, would produce a lamentation half indignant and half pathetic, which rung in Chrissey's ears, and made her heart ache long after Clement had forgotten the circumstance altogether. Strange as it may seem, Mr. Ashton had never thought of this habit, of which, indeed, he was but imperfectly conscious, as a fault; He thought, indeed, that it was a pity he should be so sensitive, and sometimes said that he wished he had not such a love for order and symmetry, for then he should not be so often annoyed by the disorderly habits of other people. He said to himself that it was one of his peculiar trials—that even Chrissey, perfect as she was, did not come up to his ideas in this respect. But that his peculiar trials, as he was pleased to call them, ever became trials to other people, he did not imagine. He had indeed remarked, in spite of himself, that Christiana's face was not as cheerful nor her spirits as light as when they were first married; and he regretted that the cares of housekeeping should weigh so heavily upon her; but nothing was further from his thoughts than that anything in himself could have produced the change.

Mr. Ashton, exhausted with his day's work, turned towards home with his mind and heart full of all that he had seen and felt. He said very little during dinner, but when the table-cloth was removed, and he sat down in his dressing-gown and slippers before the fire, he related to his wife all the events of the day, describing, with all the enthusiasm of his earnest nature, the patience and holy resignation he had witnessed, and ended by saying—

"Certainly, religion has power to sustain and console, under all trials and under every misfortune."

"Except the loss of a button," replied Chrissey, seriously. "That is a misfortune which neither philosophy nor religion can enable one to sustain."

The Reverend Mr. Ashton started as though a pistol had been discharged at his ear.

"Why, what do you mean, Chrissey?"

"Just what I say," returned Chrissey, with the same soberness. "Yourself, for instance: you can endure with the greatest resignation the loss of friends and fortune; I never saw you ruffled by rudeness or abuse from others, or show any impatience under severe pain; but the loss of a button from your shirts, or a nail from the carpet, gives you a perfect right to be unreasonable, unkind, and—I must say it—un-Christian."

Mr. Ashton arose, and walked up and down the room in some agitation.

"I did not think, my love," he said at last, in a trembling tone, "that you would attach so much importance to a single hasty word. Perhaps I spoke too quickly; but even if it were so, did we not promise to be patient with each other's infirmities? I am sure I am very glad to bear with—"

Mr. Ashton paused: he was an eminently truthful man, and, upon consideration, he really could not remember that he had ever had anything to bear from his wife.

"If it were only once, my dear husband, I should say nothing about it; but you do not seem in the least aware how the habit has grown upon you. There has not been a day this week in which you have not made my heart ache by some such outburst of fretfulness."

Mr. Ashton was astonished; but, as he began to reflect, he was still more surprised to find that his wife's accusation was quite true. One day, it had been about the front-door mat; the next, about a mislaid review, and then about a lost pair of gloves, which after all were found in his own pocket. He felt that it was all true, and as his conscience brought forward one instance after another of unkindness—real unkindness—he sat down again, and covered his face with his hands.

"But that is not the worst," continued Chrissey, becoming agitated in her turn. "I fear—I cannot help fearing—that I shall be led to feel as I ought not towards you. I fear last I shall in time lose the power of respecting my husband; and when respect goes, Clement, love does not last long. This very moment I found myself wishing I had never known you."

Chrissey burst into tears, a very unusual demonstration for her; and Clement, springing up, once more traversed the room once or twice, and then sat down at his wife's side.

"Christiana," he said, mournfully, "is it come to this? I have deserved it—I feel that I have—but to lose your respect, your love—my punishment is greater than I can bear, Chrissey."

"It was but the thought of a moment," replied Christiana, checking her sobs; "but I am frightened that the idea should ever have entered my mind. If I should cease to love you, Clement, I should die. I would rather die this moment."

"God forbid!" ejaculated her husband, clasping her in his arms. "But why, my dearest love, have you never told me of this before?"

"It is neither a grateful nor a gracious office for a wife to reprove her husband, or a woman her pastor," replied Christiana, laying her head on his shoulder; "and if I had not been left here alone all day, I think I should hardly have got up my courage now. But, if you are not angry, I am glad that I have told you all that was in my heart; for, indeed, my dear, it has been a sad, aching heart this long time. And now I must tell you how these two unlucky shirts came to be buttonless."

"No, don't say one word about them, my love," said Clement, penitently. "I will never complain again if the sleeves are missing as well as the buttons."

"But I must tell you, because I really mean to have my housekeeping affairs in as good order as any one. I was looking over your shirts yesterday afternoon, and had put them all to rights but these two, when Mrs. Lennox came in, in great distress, to say that her sister's child was much worse, and they feared dying; so I dropped all, and went over there. You know how it was. No one had any calmness or presence of mind. The child's convulsions were indeed frightful to witness; the mother was in hysterics, and Mrs. Lennox worse than nobody at all. It was nearly midnight before I could get away, and meantime, Anny had put the room in order, and restored the shirts to their places."

Anny now put her head into the room. "If you please, missus, a young woman in the kitchen would like to see missus a minute."

"Missus" arose and went out into the kitchen, and Mr. Ashton, taking a candle from the table, entered the study, and locked himself in. Chrissey waited for him a long time, and at last went and tapped at the door. It was opened with a warm embrace and a fervent kiss, and though there were not many words spoken on either side, there was a light in the eyes of both husband and wife which showed that the understanding was perfect between them.

But I do think, nevertheless, that men's wives ought to sew on their buttons.

HOW'S MY BOY?

"Ho, sailor of the sea!

How's my boy—my boy?"

"What's your boy's name, good-wife, And in what good ship sail'd he?"

"My boy John—

He that went to sea—

What care I for the ship, sailor?

My boy's my boy to me.

"You come back from sea,

And not know my John?

I might as well have asked some landsman

Yonder down in the town.

There's not an ass in all the parish

But he knows my John

"How's my boy—my boy?

And unless you let me know,

I'll swear you are no sailor,

Blue jacket or no,

Brass buttons or no, sailor,

Anchor and crown or no!

Sure his ship was the Jolly Briton."

"Speak low, woman—speak low!"

"And why should I speak low, sailor,

About my own boy, John?

If I was loud as I am proud

I'd sing him over the town!

Why should I speak low, sailor?"

"That good ship went down."

"How's my boy—my boy?

What care I for the ship, sailor?

I was never aboard her.

Be she afloat or be she aground,

Sinking or swimming, I'll be bound

Her owners can afford her!

I say, how's my John?"

"Every man on board went down

Every man aboard her."

"How's my boy—my boy?

What care I for the men, sailor?

I'm not their mother—

How's my boy—my boy?

Tell me of him, and no other!

How's my boy—my boy?"

ROBERT STEPHENSON, ESQ., M.P., F.R.S.

ROBERT STEPHENSON is the only son of one of the most remarkable men of modern times—George Stephenson, the engineer. The life of that celebrated man furnishes a striking instance of what may be accomplished by energy and perseverance. He was, in the full sense of the phrase, a self-made man. He rose from among the ashes and slag of a poor colliery village to a position of honour and renown. He attained this position by no unexpected turn of fortune or sudden elevation, but by steady, plodding application, by faithfully discharging every duty, and by firmly maintaining his footing on the ascent from poverty, ignorance, and obscurity, to wealth, intelligence, and station. He was first employed to keep Widow Ainslie's cows from trespassing, and for this he received a shilling a week when he was eight years old. His wages were doubled when he was old enough to hoe turnips and lead horses to the plough. Turning his attention to coal-picking added another shilling to his income. Then he received four shillings as driver of the gin-horse at Black Callerton Colliery. After this he became assistant fireman at the Dewley engine, then full fireman at Midmill, then he was promoted to look after a pumping-engine near Throchley Bridge, for which he received twelve shillings per week, and, rejoicing in his good fortune, he declared himself a made man for life.

When George Stephenson was eighteen years of age he could neither read nor write. He thirsted for knowledge, but possessed no means of satisfying his desire. But when an opportunity occurred he seized it with avidity, spelled words and made pothooks at a night school, fastening on arithmetic with passionate zeal, and in a short time outdoing the "dominie" himself. But then, George Stephenson was not only in love with learning; he—having a heart as well as a head—had wood and won a sensible, good-tempered girl called Fanny Henderson; and when he had saved a trifle, he married her and took her to his home—an upper room in a small cottage at Willington Quay, near Newcastle-on-Tyne.

In this humble abode, on the sixteenth of November, 1803, Robert Stephenson, the subject of our sketch, was born. In addition to his work at the colliery, Stephenson turned his attention to mending shoes and doctoring clocks, by which he realised a few surplus shillings. He was a happy man with his young wife and child; but his happiness, in this respect, was soon brought to a close—his wife died, and poor Robert had to be intrusted to the kindly care of a neighbour. After enduring many misfortunes, George Stephenson, at the age of seven-and-twenty, joined in a small partnership for working the engines at the West Moor pit. This brought him in about a pound a week; but, limited as were his means, he determined that his son Robert should have an education, the want of which he knew too well himself. With this purpose in view he turned every moment to account; rose early, sat up late, and ate the bread of carefulness, so that his son Robert might attain the rudiments of knowledge. He kept him at a village school till he was ten years old, then sent him to the academy of Mr. John Bruce, at Newcastle, and from the education of his son increased his own stock of information. Robert was entered as a member of the Newcastle Literary and Philosophical Institution, and he and his father toiled over the same books, borrowed from the library. They became companions, not merely as father and son, but fellow-students; and, with books, and plans, and instruments, worked hard together. One of the secretaries of the institution watched their studies with lively interest, helped them with apparatus, and assisted them with his counsel.

But it was necessary that young Stephenson should acquire a practical knowledge of engineering and of colliery works, as without such practical knowledge his books, plans, and instruments would be of little avail. He was accordingly apprenticed to a coal-viewer, and served in this underground employment for three years.

During this time the prospects of the elder Stephenson had been brightening. He was pushing his fortune with success. He had saved money, and attained to some note as an engineer. The progress he had made opened out a new and easier pathway to the son than the father had travelled. He was entered at the University of Edinburgh (1821), and studied under Professors Leslie and Jamieson and Dr. Hope with steady application and remarkable success.

After spending one session at Edinburgh, Robert Stephenson returned to his father, who had established a large steam-engine factory at Newcastle, and commenced an apprenticeship to the business. He applied himself with so much zeal to the pursuit, and gave himself up so thoroughly to its acquisition, that his health suffered, and it became necessary that he should have change of air and scene. An excellent opportunity presented itself. An enterprise was projected for exploring the mines of Venezuela and New Grenada. Thither, as the leader of the expedition, young Stephenson proceeded, and spent four profitable years in South America.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

ROBERT STEPHENSON, ESQ., M.P. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

During his son's absence, the engineering business of Mr. George Stephenson was considerably extended, and when Robert returned he found the Liverpool and Manchester line nearly completed, and more work on hand than it seemed possible to accomplish. Entering at once upon the oversight of the factory, he passed three years in all its active operations.

About this time a premium of £500 was offered for the best locomotive engine for railways, "which must consume its own smoke, must not, with its complement of water in the boiler, exceed six tons in weight, and must be capable of drawing after it, on the level of a well-constructed railway, a train of carriages weighing twenty tons, at the rate of ten miles an hour; the winning engine to be sold to the company for not more than £550." Robert Stephenson competed for the prize, which was awarded to his engine, the "Rocket." This locomotive "weighed 4 tons 500 cwt., and drew 12 tons 15 cwt. at an average speed of fourteen, and a maximum of twenty miles an hour."

This was regarded as a very great triumph of engineering skill, and decided at once and for ever the advantage of the locomotive over the stationary engine.

Railways were at that time exciting great public interest. A line was projected between London and Birmingham, and Mr. Robert Stephenson was appointed to superintend its construction. This line was commenced in 1834, and opened for public traffic in 1838. The work was performed so successfully that railways sprung up in all directions, and with them Mr. Stephenson's fame and fortune.

Soon after the establishment of the independence of Belgium, Mr. Stephenson was consulted on certain proposed railway lines in the Belgian dominions. On the completion of these works he had the honour of receiving from the king the decoration of the ribbon and cross of the Legion of Honour. He subsequently was invited to Norway, to survey a line between Christiania and the Myosen Lake; and, as a recognition of his services, was invested with the Grand Cross of the Order of St. Olaf. His engineering abilities have also been exercised in Switzerland and Italy, but the construction of English railways has chiefly occupied his time and attention; and in these he has been eminently successful.

In 1847 Mr. Robert Stephenson completed a magnificent bridge over the Tyne at Newcastle. In 1850 he completed the Tweed viaduct. The most remarkable effort of his engineering skill is the Great Tubular Menai bridge, and its miniature copy over the Conway. This is certainly his most original and daring achievement.

The Chester and Holyhead railway having been projected to connect the two capitals of England and Ireland by the shortest route, it was necessary to conduct the line across the river Conway and the Menai straits. It was at first intended to carry the trains over the suspension bridge already existing at the Menai, by dividing the trains and causing the carriages to be drawn across by horse power, the bridge being considered not strong enough to bear the weight of long trains and heavy locomotives. Some difficulty is understood to have arisen on the part of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and the company were compelled to build an independent bridge for the railway. A cast-iron bridge, with two or three arches, was at first projected; but this plan was abandoned as dangerous to the navigation of the straits. Mr. Stephenson then proposed a scheme of remarkable boldness and originality. He determined to carry the trains through a wrought iron tube, at a height equal to that of the suspension-bridge. In his narrative of the history of this design, Mr. Stephenson says:—"I stood on the verge of a responsibility from which I confess I had nearly shrunk; the construction of a tubular beam of such gigantic dimensions, on a platform elevated and supported by chains at such a height, did at first present itself as a difficulty of a very formidable nature. Reflection, however, satisfied me that the principles upon which the idea was founded were nothing more than an extension of those daily in use in the profession of the engineer. The method, moreover, of calculating the strength of the structure which I had adopted, was of the simplest and most elementary character, and whatever might be the form of the tube, the principle upon which the calculations were founded was equally applicable, and could not fail to lead to equally accurate results." The result proved the justice of these observations. The tube was completed, tested with entire success in the presence of the most eminent scientific men in the kingdom, and the trains are now carried through it every day in safety.

Mr. Stephenson is the author of a work on "The Locomotive Steam Engine," and another on "The Atmospheric Railway." He has represented the borough of Whitby (Yorkshire) in Parliament since 1847. He is president of the Institution of Civil Engineers, and a Fellow of the Royal Society.

CÆSAR AND VERCINGETORIX.

PICTURES FROM HISTORY.

CÆSAR AND VERCINGETORIX.

If a student were asked the question, "When was the Roman empire at the height of its glory and power?" he would probably answer, "At the time of Augustus Cæsar, the period of our Saviour's birth;" and the answer would be sufficiently correct. At the commencement of the empire the world may almost be said to have been divided into a Roman and a non-Roman portion, and all that was not Roman the citizens of the great empire termed barbarian. The "voice of the murmuring of Rome" was heard in every part of the old world. Through every clime did the great city of the Tiber stretch her hand, and "Rome, her mark" was written in legible characters on the face of every kingdom of Europe, of Eastern Asia, and of Southern Africa. Roman oratory prevailed in every assembly, Roman legislation ruled the world; and no event of importance could happen in which the Romans were not the chief parties concerned. Even in the sacred pages of the New Testament we have evidence how the Roman character was respected, and the Roman power felt. The Pharisees, desirous of tempting the Son of God to his destruction, seek to involve him in a question of payment of tribute to the Roman emperor; and the wavering and reluctant Pilate is prevented from setting free his guiltless prisoner by the denunciation, "If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend." Saint Paul, too, was fully conscious of his privileges as a Roman citizen, and we all know the effect produced by the apostle's impressive "appeal to Cæsar." Rome, then, filled the world; and, to a superficial observer, there seemed no power sufficiently strong to damage, much less to destroy, the influence and importance of that mighty state.

Yet there existed such a power, and more than once its hand had been severely felt, almost at the very gates of Rome itself. Far to the north and to the north-west, in the depths of thick forests, amid impassable marshes, and on the banks of great rolling streams, dwelt nations whom the Romans designated by the general name of barbarians, and who presented in almost every particular a striking contrast to the Romans themselves. Five consular armies had these bold barbarians destroyed—long and not ingloriously had they contended with the great Julius Cæsar; and while Rome was in the height of its splendour, three legions, and Varus, their leader, were destroyed by these bold barbarians, who at length came to be regarded with such apprehension, that the name of "Germanicus" was given to a distinguished Roman who had overcome one of their tribes, as a title of nobility and distinction.

Under the reign of Marcus Antoninus these barbarians became more formidable than ever; for the various scattered nations, who, fighting singly, had been singly overcome, now began to unite, and long and obstinate was the contest, until they were once more subdued and driven back; and in the middle of the third century, during the reign of the Emperor Valerian, they were pressing forward again; and the Romans, fighting everywhere with them, were no longer acting, as in former days, on the offensive, but in desperate self-defence.

Here, then, we have the first great picture of modern history—civilisation and barbarism contending for the empire of the world.

What kind of people were they who thus strove with the Romans, and finally overcame them? Let us look at the two books of reference written by a distinguished Roman general and an equally celebrated historian—Caesar, namely, and Tacitus.

Julius Caesar, as most of our readers well know, wrote a commentary, or, as we may express it, kept a journal of his campaigns against the Gauls. He evidently intended this only as a chronicle of his own successes; but unconsciously he has drawn a vivid picture of the foes against whom he fought. The military character of the barbarians of central Europe appears conspicuously in every page of Caesar's book—and the reader is perforce obliged to make the reflection, as he closes the book, "What formidable enemies these barbarians would have been, had they only possessed the two great elements of military success—union, and discipline."

Of the hardy, warlike character of the barbarians, we can give one or two instances. Ariovistus, one of their generals, replies to a threatening message of Caesar in these words: "Fight us, if you please; you will learn to know us; we are a nation that have been under no roof within the last fourteen years." Further on, Caesar gives us an account of the migration of the warlike Helvetii. Their fighting men numbered ninety-two thousand—a small force where-with to undertake a perilous expedition. The reason of this migration was that they found their territory inadequate to support them, though they numbered only nine to the square mile! They must have, therefore, been unskilled in agriculture. After a conflict with Caesar, one-fourth of the whole nation survived. This sufficiently proves the sanguinary nature of the combats between Romans and barbarians; and a little further on, we find it mentioned by the Roman general, as a matter of course, not even to be dignified by a separate paragraph, that after the taking of one of their towns, fifty-three thousand of the inhabitants were sold into slavery. War was then the chief business of mankind; and in Caesar's commentaries we have a glimpse of the results such a state of things produced.

They fought with the greatest fury. The Nervii, Caesar tells us, stood on the dead bodies of their countrymen as on a mound, and from this ghastly eminence threw back at their foes the darts and javelins the Romans had hurled upon them. Out of six hundred distinguished men among these Nervii, only three survived the fight—out of sixty thousand fighting men, scarcely five hundred. Such were the wars of the Romans and barbarians.

Tacitus, the second writer from whom we glean our information on the subject of the barbarians, lived a hundred years after Caesar's time. He studied the subject deeply, and wrote a profound work—"De Moribus Germanorum"—on the manners of the Germans. Tacitus was an educated, an enlightened, and a far-seeing man. He could almost calculate the time when the storm, so long muttering in the North, would burst upon the Roman empire; and, exasperated at the licentiousness and luxury of his fellow-countrymen, he praises almost extravagantly the manly virtues and simple mode of living among the Germans. His warning voice fell unheeded: the empire rolled on in its course of injustice, cruelty, and vice, and the downfall of Rome followed in due course.

Now the great question: "How was it that the barbarians were enabled to vanquish the Romans in the fourth and fifth centuries, whereas they had in former years been themselves the conquered?" becomes clearer, and is easily answered. The courage of the barbarians, the impetuosity of their attack, seemed irresistible; but, on the other hand, the Romans had union, experience, and discipline. It will thus appear clear to every observer that the barbarians' chance of ultimate success was dependent on their advance in union, experience, and discipline; while the degeneracy of these qualities among the Romans would produce a corresponding loss of influence for the empire. That the barbarians would ultimately succeed there was no doubt; for the contest was like that of an old man against an antagonist in the prime of life—it was a fight of youth against age—of hopeful, advancing attack against retreating, hopeless defence.

Rome became at last thoroughly corrupt. For the freedom of speech, which had been the boast of every citizen, a submission of thought and action had been substituted; for the military service which each citizen had considered it an honour to perform, mercenary soldiers; for the free government of the republic, the military despotism of the later empire. There was no Augustus now on the throne, to hold in his powerful grasp the contending factions, and turn and guide them as a skilful charioteer manages his restive horses; nor could even the hand of an Augustus at last have kept the Romish factions in check. For in nations, as in individuals, a mighty change is ever at work; and every people must be either advancing or degenerating, as each individual man or woman is ever progressing towards a good or an evil end. The army itself, unchecked in the exercise of its power, and of boundless influence in the affairs of state, quickly became demoralised. The vital principle, the genius of Rome, was gone for ever; and the fall of the empire itself was certain so soon as a combination of various northern tribes should be formed; so soon as the barbarians, abandoning their old and faulty method of attacking in single tribes, should band themselves together in something like union, and substitute disciplined valour for the savage ferocity that had hitherto ruled their warlike operations. Their attack might be delayed by dissensions among themselves, or by the great qualities of any particular general or emperor among their Roman foes, but the contest for life or death was as inevitable as the bursting of a gathering thunderstorm. Nor could the issue of such a contest be doubtful.

Delayed it was—this great effort of the barbarians—delayed by a phenomenon which forms the subject of another of our "pictures from history," the invasion of the Huns. But when this great danger had passed away, the forces of the young and old world—of old effete civilisation against healthy young barbarism—were marshalled to the combat in earnest. Rome gathered together her forces as best she might, and distinct divisions of the northern nations take their positions against her. In Gaul arise the Franks, their very name indicative of freedom; in Spain are the Visigoths; the Burgundians on the Rhone; and the Austrogoths in Italy itself; stronger and stronger these young nations become, until at last one mighty effort is made, the young world has vanquished the old, the western empire falls with a thunder-crash, and the contest of Roman against barbarian and of barbarian against Roman is at an end.

The incident chosen for illustration is taken from one of the most interesting periods of this contest,—a time when the star of the Roman empire still glowed in the zenith, for Caesar led its armies. Vercingetorix, a young Gaulish chieftain, had long opposed the conqueror, and had at length shut himself up with many of his comrades in the town of Alisa, purposing to defend the place to the last extremity. But the misery of the inhabitants at last touched the noble heart of the young hero, and he resolved to give his own life as a ransom for his friends, as Eustache de St. Pierre, many centuries afterwards, devoted himself to death in the good town of Calais. Singly he rode forth from the town, straight into the circle where Caesar sat, and, without a word, he threw his helmet and his sword and javelin at the feet of his foe, in token that he was vanquished—that barbarous valour yielded once more to the power of union and discipline.

His heroism was not met in a kindred spirit. Vercingetorix was considered too dangerous an enemy to remain at large: he was sent to Rome loaded with chains; and, after languishing there a year or two, died in prison; one of the many victims whose blood cried aloud for vengeance upon the insatiate and unscrupulous people whose greedy clutch strove to grasp a world.

FACTS FOR MARRIED PEOPLE.—The last word is the most dangerous of infernal machines. Husband and wife should no more fight to get it than they would struggle for the possession of a lighted bomb-shell. Married people should study each other's weak points, as skaters look out for the weak parts of the ice, in order to keep off them. Ladies who marry for love should remember that the union of angels with women has been forbidden since the flood. The wife is the sun of the social system. Unless she attract, there is nothing to keep heavy bodies, like husbands, from flying off into space. The wife who should properly discharge her duties must never have a soul above trifles. Don't trust too much to good temper when you get into an argument. Sugar is the substance most universally diffused through all natural products. Let married people take a hint from this provision of nature.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER XXVII.

The cups that cheer but not inebriate
Wait on each.—COWPER.

True to the kindred points of heaven and home.

WORDSWORTH.

'Mid pleasures and palaces tho' we may roam,
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home.

HOWARD PAYNE.

MEANWHILE tea—or, rather, supper—had been cleared away by Apple Blossom. The Bible was open on the table, and Jem Goodman had broached the subject next his heart.

Jem had turned to numerous passages in the Old and New Testament where drunkenness is denounced, such as Proverbs xxiii. 31, 32,—“Look not thou upon the wine when it is red; when it giveth his colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright. At the last, it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder.” And again, Isaiah v. 11, 12,—“Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning that they may follow strong drink; that continue until night, till wine inflame them. Woe unto them that are mighty to drink wine, and men of strength to mingle strong drink.” Also Habakkuk ii. 15,—“Woe unto him that giveth his neighbour drink; that putteth the bottle to him, and maketh him drunken.” Then again, Ephesians v. 18,—“Be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess.” Also Romans xiii. 13,—“Walk honestly as in the day, not in rioting and drunkenness.” And, once more, 1st Corinthians vi. 10,—“Know ye not that drunkards shall not inherit the kingdom of God?”

Bob listened with a curious expression—half of gratitude to Jem for his earnest wish for his good half of obstinate determination “not to give in” and take the pledge.

Now, Bob Blossom was exactly the sort of person for whom the pledge is the only safeguard. If he drank at all he was “fuddled;” and directly he was fuddled, he was resolved to go on, and the gentle, kind man became a fierce, obstinate brute.

“It’s all very true,” said Bob, “what you, Jem, and my wife says about getting drunk; but look at me here. For a fortnight I’ve kept sober; and sober I’ll keep without no pledge. I never did like the thoughts of being pointed at as a teetotaler, and I never shan’t. I don’t like men as can’t do nothink without taking a vow, and signing. It shows such weakness, that’s what it do.”

“Come, now, Bob Blossom,” said Jem, with admirable patience, and smiling kindly as he patted Bob on his broad back. “Did you never take an oath, and sign your name to it?”

“Never,” said Bob; “not I.”

“Oh, Bob!” cried Apple Blossom, with a sweet smile that showed the whole range of her white teeth—rather large, but looking like pearls between lips as red as coral. “You would never have had me for your wife, I’d never have made my mark agin the name of Elizabeth Blossom, if you hadn’t taken a vow—and a very binding one too—in the old church at —. Don’t you mind the happy day, Bob? There stood the dear, kind old vicar, with his silver hair and his white surplice,—he as christened us both and tached us both in the Sunday school to fear God, to put our faith in his blessed Son, and to love our neighbour as ourselves.”

“Aye,” said Bob, “and I went a good bit ayont that ere, for I loved thee a hundred times better than myself; and a prettier bride never looked up from her mother’s bosom to the love in her husband’s eyes. Thee wor bonny in thy white ribbons, and thy maiden blushes—thee wor! Jack Badger said to little Fisher he’d be spliced in double quick time if there wor another Betty Blythe to be had; and little Fisher said there worn’t nothing to come a-nigh thee, far or near, for sweet looks and sweet temper.”

“Well,” said Apple Blossom, blushing, and much pleased, “Hetty Grimshaw was saucy enough to say that I had the best of the bargain. Ah, Bob, Hetty did envy me that day.”

“Did she, then? Well, all the lads envied me! and I took care to speak out. I let ‘em know I wor proud to say ‘I will’ vow: that wor something like a vow; any man might have been proud to take that vow—and to keep it, too!”

“And yet, Bob,” said Jem Goodman, “you will not keep it as you’ll one day wish you had, without you take that further vow—if ‘vow’ you like to call it—which will prevent you ever being overtaken again.

by that which destroys a wife's comfort and confidence and ruins a man's character and constitution, and a family's respectability—strong drink."

Bob scratched his head. "It's so bad for a poor fellow like me," he said, "to sign away his liberty, and bind himself not to have a drop o' beer, even when he's upon a tough job of work."

"Sign away his liberty!" exclaimed Jem Goodman. "The signing of the temperance pledge has given freedom to thousands; and it is because I long to see my friend Bob Blossom emancipated from that vile power which intralls him, that I do so urge, so entreat, so implore him to enroll himself in our army."

"I knows I does take a drop too much a-times, and then I makes a fool of myself: who doesn't under these circumstances?" said Bob, in a whining voice and penitential tone. Then suddenly rising, shaking and rousing himself as for a grand final effort, "But I will make a change. I am resolved to turn over a new leaf."

"Then you will sign, Bob?" cried Jem Goodman, taking out a dog-eared book, upon which was a square piece of paper, with letters printed thereon—

"THE SAFFRON-HILL GOOD SAMARITAN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY'S PLEDGE-BOOK."

"Tain't no use pulling that book out," said Bob, rather sulkily. "No, no, Jem, thank ye for nothing; I'm not going to be laughed at and pointed at as a teetotaler. I can keep sober," he added, drawing himself up consequentially, "without none of your pledges. You must take me, indeed, for a baby. I wonder you haven't brought leading-strings along o' that book; and oncest for all, Jem, with regard to drink, Bob Blossom, when he has a mind, can take it good, and leave it good, like a man."

Jem Goodman, for a moment, was somewhat disheartened; he sighed heavily, and said, "I heard those same words from Tippling Ben, Bob."

"Ah!" cried Apple Blossom; "d'ye hear that, Bob? Think of poor Esther, think of the poor orphans! think of the disgrace and the trial, and all coming out in the papers! And she's so respectable—born almost a lady! and he to be tried, and maybe hanged, and then to be seed in the Chamber o' errors at Madame Tussor's for a extra sixpence. Think of Tippling Ben; see what he's come to! Esther's in her grave, a murdered woman, and Ben's in Newgate, and like to be hanged; but if he gets off, he can't ever have no peace. He knows he killed her, and all through drink. Oh, Bob, take warning by Tippling Ben!"

"Tippling Ben's one thing, and Bob Blossom's another. I'll tell thee what, wife, and thee, too, Jem, I'll go on as I se-a-going on for a month at least, and then we'll have another talk about this here."

"Bob Blossom," said Jem Goodman, "Ben Darrell said much the same, and I gave in. Yes, to my eternal remorse, I gave in. Now, I will not have such another backsliding on my conscience. I will not leave thee, Bob, till thou sayest thou wilt sign."

Jem Goodman seized Bob's hand; Apple Blossom threw herself on her knees before him.

"We will not leave thee till thou sayest 'yes,' dear Bob!" said the wife.

"No, Bob, we will not leave thee," cried Jem.

"Then I'll leave thee, wife, and thee, too, Jem. Tain't fair to be so hard on a poor fellow. Get up, wife; that's no place for thee. I ain't to be coaxed or bullied into what goes agin the grain, and ain't according to my ideas of nature or reason."

"Sign! do sign, Bob!" wept Apple Blossom, still at his feet.

"Sign, man, sign, and save thy body and soul," said Jem Goodman, very pale, and tears sparkling in his dark, deep-set eyes.

"Oh, do sign, dad!" murmured the soft voice of little Hope. "Mr. Goodman knows what's best."

"Sign, father, and a-done with it," said Larky Grigg, in his bold voice; "and I'll show thee what one glass o' liquor a day costs in the year, and what thee'll save by sticking to Adam's wine."

"We won't leave thee till thou hast signed," said Apple Blossom.

"No, that we won't!" cried Jem; and "No, daddy, we won't," said Hope; and "No!" echoed bold Larky.

"Well," grumbled Bob, "it has come to a pretty pass, to be bully-ragged in this ere kind o' way. It's all a reglar concocted scheme, I do believe, to get me to put my name to a thing I don't want to do. As the old song goes, 'Britons never shall be slaves;' and you ain't a-going to make a slave o' me, Jem Goodman, I can tell ye. Get up, wife," he added, shaking Apple Blossom off; and seeing tears flowing from the large upraised eyes of little Hope, he exclaimed, while his own followed the example of hers,

"Oh! it is too bad to set that sweet little angel upon me in this manner. And all for what? To get me to sign a pledge to do that that I'm willing and determined to do without. You drives me wild, ye does, among ye!" he added, growing very red and much excited. "Hands off, wife! and you, too, Jem! If you won't leave me, I'll leave you, for a bit; leastways, till I gets cool, and you comes to your senses."

So saying, he caught his hat from its accustomed peg, broke from the grasp of his wife, pushed Jem and Larky Grigg roughly aside, and rushed out of the room and into the street. Poor little Hope tumbled over her three-legged stool; and Truelove, whose long, fluffy tail had been trodden on in the scuffle, set up a loud, protracted mew.

The window was partly open, and the startled inmates, pale and aghast, heard Bob's rapid steps as he hurried along; and caught the words, half sung, half spoken, of his favourite song, "Britons never shall be slaves!"

These were the last words he was heard to speak that night.

After Bob had made this precipitate retreat, all was consternation; not a word was spoken, save by little Hope, who forgot the very sore bump on her own forehead, in her endeavours to coax and comfort her injured and offended Truelove.

Larky Grigg stood irresolute. He had been brought up by his mother, who was the ruling spirit, to show just respect to his father, and therefore he did not at once rush out to dodge Bob; but recollecting, all at once, how anxious his poor mother would be if his father stayed out long, and came home late, he jumped up, caught up his cap, and, exclaiming "I'll go after dad," darted off like an uncartered stag.

Good son, he was determined, if possible, to follow and bring Bob Blossom back before Apple Blossom had grown seriously uneasy.

Poor Jem Goodman, burying his face in his large, brawny hands, gave way for a few moments to mingled and painful emotions.

He thought he had been indiscreet—rather over zealous, too hard upon Bob. And then came on his mind the image of Ben Darrell in Newgate; and of the lifeless corpse of poor Esther, stretched upon the table at the "Good Intent."

Poor Apple Blossom was weeping bitterly. What a change! what a downfall to all her hopes! She had felt sure Bob would give in, when Jem so begged, and she went on her knees to him. "Oh, if he do but sign," she said, "I'll be able to be as merry as Mrs. Wynn, whose measter have a-signed. How light of heart and fast I'd go about my work. If Bob do but sign and give up liquor, I'll be the happiest wife as ever swept a cottage hearth or sung a lullaby."

"Don't take on so, Apple Blossom," said Jem, at last; "we won't despair, we'll have him yet."

"Larky slipped out in the hopes of finding daddy and bringing him back," said little Hope; "and, Jem Goodman, do 'ee read mammy something that will comfort her."

So Jem opened the book of Job, and read what we all have read, with breaking hearts and gushing tears in some hour of more than wonted anguish; for these are texts that seem to echo the groans of every mourner, and then he read some passages of a similar import from the Psalms; and, finding Apple Blossom was weeping more calmly, he turned from the sinner's penitence to the Saviour's promises, and, as he earnestly said, "Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted," Apple Blossom, who sat in the corner with her white apron over her head and face, and with little Hope on a low stool at her feet, her sweet face in her mammy's lap—Apple Blossom, through the folds of her apron, said—

"Jem, I am comforted."

Then little Hope climbed up on to her mammy's lap, and, removing the apron, began, with the corner of her own tiny pinafore, to wipe away the fast-falling tears; and kissing the plump, but no longer rosy, cheeks of pretty Apple Blossom, she said, "Don't take on so, mammy, I'm sure daddy will yet be a 'never touch lad.'"

This was the name given at the ragged school to those who formed the temperance society.

"Bless you, my dear little Hope!" and a smile like sunshine seemed to dry up the tears as the loving child, once more seizing her Truelove and holding it tucked under her arm, apparently almost suspended by its neck, an attitude to which it was used, hovered about her foster-mother, with words of comfort and looks of love.

Poor Apple Blossom! before the end of the night of storm which had set in so calmly, she needed all that faith which can overcome mountains—for mountains of misery and difficulty closed her in on every side.

And she had no voice to cheer her but that of Hope;

no head to think for her, no heart to feel, no hand to guide or help her, but that of the little foster-child, who often recalled to her those words, "Some have entertained angels unawares."

Yes—after Jem Goodman had taken his leave, having told Apple Blossom that he should meet the ladies at her house the next day at one, if quite agreeable—time went rapidly on, and neither Bob nor Larky Grigg reappeared.

Hope was very pale, and Apple Blossom proposed to her to go to bed, but yielded to the child's wish to share her mammy's watch. Hour after hour passed; ten, eleven, twelve, one, struck. How swiftly the hours succeeded each other. They always do when we dread their rapid flight.

Apple Blossom and little Hope stole out into the blind alley. It was a lovely night—the sky was of the deepest, clearest azure, the eternal stars shone on the great city. Yes, the firmament was literally bespangled

"—with those isles of light
So wildly, spiritually bright.
Who ever gazed upon them slumbering,
And turned to earth without reaping,
Nor wished for wings to flee away,
And mix with their eternal ray?"

Everything was still in the blind alley. It was Sunday night; and, as the gin-palaces were closed, no drunkards befouled the air and made humanity shudder with the spectacle of men bereft of reason, without being, like the brutes, supplied with instinct. There was nothing stirring save Truelove, who had followed her little mistress out, and was purring aloud and rubbing her soft fur against little Hope's short petticoats and pretty little, sylph-like legs.

Truelove seemed to know there was something wrong, and to wish to comfort Hope.

Just at this moment Apple Blossom saw a policeman in the distance, and resolved to go to him and ask his advice; and Hope would not let her go alone; but, as she tripped along, the child's quick ear caught a mew as of Truelove in pain; she turned round and saw some one stuffing her snowy, furry pet into a bag.

Hope rushed back and soon came up with a dreadful old bundle of rags, hobbling along, a stick in one hand, and a canvas bag in the other.

Hope recognised the terror of the neighbourhood, old "Blear-eyed Bet," the cat-skinner.

Often had Blear-eyed Bet cast a longing glance at Truelove when she saw that beautiful creature coiled up in the window-sill sunning herself, and looking a muff fit for a queen to wear.

Blear-eyed Bet was by profession a fortune-teller, but her income was derived principally from cat-skinning; and it was currently believed that the cats she stole she skinned alive, because their furs are—as it is, alas! well known—only glossy and of price in the market when that fiendish cruelty has been practised.

Now, Blear-eyed Bet was an inveterate gin-drinker. She cared for, lived for nothing but gin. For gin she would not only have skinned a cat, but a child, or even her haggard, horrible old self!

She generally prowled about low, populous neighbourhoods, that abound in cats. When people are too poor to keep themselves, they generally burden themselves with feline dependents (so unthrifty are the very poor!);—and was to any poor feline Philander who fell into Blear-eyed Bet's power! She had savoury bits of fish and cat's-meat, besides other dainties, to tempt the poor victims; and Truelove had been so attracted by the odour they emitted, that she had followed her until the old hag made a grab at her.

Hope, light as air, and fleet as a roe, soon overtook the hobbling old miscreant.

"Stop, stop!" she cried, clutching with her little rosy hands the filthy rags of the old gin-drinker.

"What do you want with me, pretty maid?" said Blear-eyed Bet, emitting a pungent odour of blue ruin as she spoke. "Why ain't you in bed, and asleep? Have you got e'er a copper to give a poor, old, shivering soul?"

"Yes," said Hope, "here's twopence for thee, only give me my cat; thee'st got it in that bag."

The old hag clutched the pence, and then said—

"I've got no cat, child! What would I do with a cat? I can't keep a cat—I can't keep myself."

"You sha'n't keep my cat, you wicked, cruel, old woman," said Hope, fairly roused by a faint mew from within the bag. With a sudden wrench (old Bet being quite off her guard) Hope seized the bag, and sped with it like lightning back to her home.

Apple Blossom was there weeping bitterly. The policeman knew nothing of Bob or Larky, and had answered her very unkindly, as she was stopping him on his way to a cook who awaited him at the area rails with a steak fried in onions and batter, and whom he loved with that ardent, insatiable passion, called "cupboard love."

Great was Apple Blossom's surprise to see little Hope, after cutting the string tied round the neck of the bag, let out a large black Tom and a tabby kitten; while at the bottom, almost smothered, and partly insensible, was that beloved pet, so dear for Larky's sake, and its own, snowy, furry, Truelove.

The black Tom and the tabby kitten darted through the open door, and were soon far away.

But Truelove was of Persian origin, and had been very daintily nursed, and it was some time before he recovered sufficiently to lap a little milk, and curl himself up asleep before the fire.

This matter settled, Hope and Apple Blossom, shutting the door after them, again stole out into the blind alley.

Still the stars looked brightly, coldly down into eyes that gazed on them through tears of passionate distress.

The clock struck two, and Apple Blossom wrung her hands and sobbed aloud, and little Hope grew pale and cold with terror.

"Hope," she said, "something dreadful must have happened. Dad must have fallen into some hole or cellar, or well, or sommut."

"Perhaps, mammy," said Hope, very shily, and almost afraid of what might be treason to "dad;" "perhaps he've been overtaken again."

"Overtaken, Hope; by whom, child?"

"By temptation, mammy. Some one may have tempted dad with a glass of liquor; and thee knows, mammy, if dad takes one glass, he's sure to take more. Thee've often said so, and I've heerd dad himself say it, too."

"Child, he'd never be so cruel, and so weak, and so false. Why, if he did, he would never look me or Jem in the face again."

Just at that moment Bob Blossom staggered home between two of his pals, drunk, almost dead drunk, but spasmodically hiccupping forth as they led him in, and laid him on his bed, "Britons never shall be slaves."

Yes, on that neat bed, which poor Apple Blossom's labour at the wash-tub kept so white and nice, even in that blind alley, one of the smokiest, foulest of London's low neighbourhoods, they laid the drunkard! His boots were muddy, his clothes soiled. He was very sick. Truly, a hog wallowing in the mire was a nobler spectacle. The children slept in another bed hidden by a screen made up of a clothes-horse and a blanket. They slept too soundly to be disturbed even by his ravings, groans, and hiccoughs. Larky's bed was in the sitting-room.

"Oh, shame! shame!" cried Apple Blossom; "there is no hope left."

"Yes, there is, mammy; dad will take the pledge now, I know he will, when once he's sober again—to-morrow perhaps, mammy. But who is here? Lame Luke, I declare!"

"Lame Luke!" cried Apple Blossom, "at two in the morning, child; he comes from Larky. Oh, something dreadful must have happened. Oh, my dear, good, loving, clever, beautiful boy! my Larky! he's dead! he's dead! If he wasn't dead, he'd never stay out to terrify his poor mother."

"Don't ee take on so, missus," said Lame Luke. "Larky ain't dead nor dying; he's alive and kicking, he is. But, splice my timbers, what a white figure-head your'n is, missus! Come, don't hang out signals of distress. All's well with Larky, though he've been and got into a bit of a scrape, which it ain't no fault of his'n. It seems he wor scudding afore the wind, looking out for his dad, when up sails Prigging Peter, Stunning Steenie, and the 'Fox,' as they calls Joe, besides that 'ere bold young baggage as is called Potato Heels, and is more mischievous nor a dozen lads. Well, them chaps and that wench had a spite agin the feller as keeps the slop-shop, cause he wouldn't give 'em no trust, and they'd hatched a plot to break his winders. I don't know how it come to pass, but they broke 'em sure enough, and though Larky had nothink to do with it, yet, as he wor with them, he wor nabbed by the peelers, and the others got off. He've sent me this here bit of writin', to beg me to call and tell you, missus, he ain't guilty of nothink, and beg you and Hope to cheer up. I wor in bed and asleep, I wor, but I soon got up. I'd go through fire and water to sarve Larky, and so here I be; and if Chete of the slop-shop appears agin Larky Grigg before the magistrate to-morrow, I'll be there to stand by him and speak up for him, and no mistake."

"A peeler brought me this bit o' writin' from Larky Grigg, and says he'll be out to-morrow as sure as a gun. So don't fret, missus, and don't pipe your eye, little one. I'm going to turn in again, I be."

Lame Luke was gone.

Apple Blossom and Hope went on weeping bitterly. Bob Blossom was lying dead drunk on poor Apple Blossom's bed, and Larky Grigg had been taken up, and was spending the night in the station-house.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

There's something every day we live
To pity, and, perhaps, forgive.—BARBAULD.

WHEN Bob Blossom rushed out, as he thought, to escape temptation, he had no idea that he was rushing into it.

He had resolved not to take the pledge; but then he had also resolved to keep as sober as if he had bound himself to do so by vow.

"I never did hold with teetotallers and such like," he said to himself. "Jem's a trump, to be sure; but I should like him all the better if so be he could take a glass, in moderation. Most of 'em—them totle habstinence chaps—seems to me poor milk-and-water sort of fellers, which I don't loike their principle, and never sha'n't. But Jem shall see, and so shall Apple Blossom, for all that, I'll keep sober without the pledge. I don't knock under to Jem Goodman—no, nor any other chaps as can't keep sober without the pledge."

When Bob arrived at this conclusion, he had also arrived at Blackfriars-bridge; and he stood, clean, nice, and respectable in his Sunday's best, watching the fair moon rising, while twilight seemed to "Melt beneath that moon away."

As Bob Blossom watched the queen of night, and the stars, that seemed forming themselves into a court attending their fair sovereign's levee, his thoughts wandered back to the days when he "went courting" Betty Blythe.

Distinctly on the horizon of his memory rose a little picturesque cottage, with one superb geranium filling the window-sill, in a neat flower-pot and saucer, scarlet with red ochre. The beautiful and fragrant leaves and blossoms of that sweet geranium formed a screen through which peeped the Hebe face of that fair Betty Blythe, whom he had converted into Mrs. Blossom, now commonly called Apple Blossom. How well he remembered the laughing, hazel eyes and cherry lips, and the thick, wavy, black hair which both Larky Grigg and Merry had inherited from their mother.

He saw her again in her maiden beauty, her coy, yet deep, true love.

She was in service—good service, too—and only at home now and then. Her father was a gardener near Preston; her mother was the tidiest old lady in the village; and Betty was their pride. Betty had many wooers, but though she liked to make Bob a little jealous now and then, she never gave a serious thought to any but him.

"Favours to none, to all she smiles extends;
Oft she rejects, but never once offends."

He was in farm service. Her parents objected, but love prevailed, and they were married.

He loved her then, but he almost thought—and tears filled his eyes as he thought so—that he loved her better now.

She had been, though, somewhat hard to please, coquettish, uncertain, and exacting before marriage; yet, ever since they had exchanged vows before the altar, so good, so meek, so loving, so hard-working. Often had he tried her temper. Sometimes—and he loathed himself, as he remembered it—he had raised his voice, alas, even his hand against that loving, patient, noble-hearted wife. But that was when he had been drinking. What a blot on all his reminiscences was an obstinate black eye his brutal fist had once inflicted, extending from the jetty silken arch of her beautiful eye-brow to that soft, round, peach-like cheek, on which he had printed love's first kiss when she was Betty Blythe; and to which he had brought not merely that foul stain, but such frequent tears since she had been Betty Blossom.

That black eye, not the only one he had given his wife when in his cups, haunted him still. He saw it on the darkening waters, he saw it on the deepening azure of the sky; and when he pressed his rough fists to his eyes, to shut it out, he saw it with his mind's eye on that blackened but precise record which conscience keeps—too often out of sight and mind—till we are prostrated by sickness, sorrow, or some other power we cannot resist; and then conscience holds that minute, dark record to our horror-distended eyes; hisses its accusations in our startled ears; and wakens with it as with a trumpet-blast our slumbering souls, gross hearts, and tampering spirits.

"Well, tain't no use a-bothering about that 'ere," thought Bob. "She've forgived and forgot that, and many others, likewise a bad kick when she wor near her time, which I ought, drunk or sober, never to have forgot her delicate situation. She used to complain of a pain for some time arter in her side, but she don't now; and I've thankful 'twarn't with me as 'twor with Tippling Ben; and I'll never raise not even my voice, much more my hand or foot against her no more. I won't take no cowardly pledges—'tain't loikely; but I'll be a better, koinder partner to my pretty Apple Blossom than ere a total abstinence chap among 'em is to their wives. A glass or two in moderation never hurted no man—no, nor woman either, though Apple Blossom won't touch nothink but—"

As Bob thus argued with himself, he was leaning idly over the bridge, apparently watching the sailing and the rowing boats that made the river so gay, when a sound slap on his back made him turn round.

"Yes, it be—I knowed it wor Bob Blossom! Gi'e us thy hond, mon. I've right glad to see thee."

"What, Jack, old meate—Jack Badger! Where'er do thee come from? This be a surprise, and a werry pleasant one. But who be them chaps with thee?"

"Why, sure thee haven't forgot Tom Sykes and little Fisher—Harry Fisher, brother to he as beat Misfortune in that 'ere foot-race. He as went by the name of the 'Preston Pet.'"

"Oh!" cried Bob; "I remember that foot-race, and the sight of money I lost a-betting on that same Misfortune; and as for Tom Sykes and Harry Fisher, I knowed 'em a'most as well as I knowed thee, Jack."

Upon this there was a general shaking of hands; and Bob, having unluckily asked what brought his friends to London, Jack Badger proposed that they should all adjourn to the "True Briton," and talk over old times, and what had happened to all of them since they lost sight of Bob, over a glass of good ale, "which," added Jack, "'tain't every house can boast as good a one as we are sure of at the 'True Briton.' This here Lunnun smoke makes me so dry, I've tossed off a good many glasses of old ale to-day, and all the better and none the worse for it. The 'True Briton' has downright good, honest liquor; and if ye doubt my word, come and try. Come, Bob, old meate. Thee didn't used to be the chap to hang back when an old chum proposed a glass."

Bob was puzzled, and he looked so. After what had just occurred he could not ask his friends home. They were all hard drinkers; he knows it, and all who look at them must see it.

They are dressed well enough, to be sure, thought he, in their Sunday best—very smart and tidy, according to a working man's idea of the matter—clean white shirts, blue coats and brass buttons, and dark corduroy trousers, black hats, coloured cravats, and good strong, new highlows; but all their clothes smelt of tobacco-smoke. Jack Badger, since Bob saw him last, has acquired a bottle-nose. Tom Sykes has a blotched face, never seen in a sober man; and as for Harry Fisher, who, to the beer he drinks in company, adds the habit of private tipping at a whisky-bottle, his manner is nervous, listless, excited; his eyelids red; the tip of his nose scarlet; his face pale; and that unmistakable stamp upon the whole man which betrays that most miserable of all created beings—the spirit-drinker.

No, this was not a trio to introduce to Jem Goodman and Apple Blossom; and what pleasure would they, these lovers of strong drink, find in his quiet home, presided over by his total abstinence wife?

Rapidly these thoughts passed through Bob's mind, and then he said, "I'm uncommon vexed, friends, that I can't ax ye to my home, but my wife ain't no-ways well just now."

"Ah," cried Jack, "thy wife, Betty Blythe as wor; how ever is Betty—the beautiful girl she wor, and the neat-handed, smart, tidy lass, too—fresh as a rose, singing like a lark, and with a koind word and koind smile for everybody? Thee did get a prize, Bob!"

Bob's eyes moistened. "Betty, or, as she be called here, Apple Blossom ('cos of an apple-stall she keeps, and my name and hers being so pretty) be just the same, except now and then she get a whim into her head about me."

"About thee? what jealous, eh, Bob? for they be all the same! But come, Bob, me and my mates be quite done up a-trapesing about Lunnun ever since eight this morning. Our time's short. We comed up with excursion tickets, and we've only got three days to see all the grand sights. We wants to see the Queen and Prince Halbert, and the royal babbies, and we must see the wax-work, and the Tower, and the wild beasts; and Sunday ain't no day for sights, but we've seed Westminster Abbey, and St. Paul's, and the outside o' Newgate."

"Mind ye never sees the inside," said Bob, with a broad grin.

"In course," said Jack, after laughing at the joke,

THE PET LAMB.

"we wants to see all the soights, so let us go and have a glass of ale together."

Bob winced. He knew his men, and he knew his own weakness: he had never yet been able to stop at one glass: and yet if he exceeded, what a fool, what a wretched, poor, boasting creature he would seem should he be indeed overtaken, after all he had declared to Jem and Apple Blossom, and so he "hemmed," and said—

"I'd rather not take any liquor to-day, Jack."

"Why, whatever have come to you, Bob?" said Jack. "Lunnon surely has not huffed thee up so that thee's above taking a glass of ale with thy old friends, and them old friends in a strange city, and downright tired out?"

"But, Jack," said Bob, "I unluckily came out with only sixpence in my pocket."

"Bless thee, Bob! does thee think we care about thee standing treat. Now, do oblige us, and come and take a glass with us. We want to know the best sights to see; and surely thee wants to hear sommut about thy own native place. Come! Bob Blossom can't be turned stingy, surely. Thee wor ever a free chap."

"None freer," said Tom.

"No, none," echoes Fisher.

Jack upon this took hold of Bob's arm, and led him off towards the "True Briton," followed by Tom and Harry.

Bob gave in, thinking to himself, "Well, nothing shall make me exceed two glasses; there can be no harm in that. I won't have Jack go down home and tell 'em that Bob's turned too proud or too mean to take a glass with an old friend in a strange city, and that after not seeing him for ten years or more." No; he had one sixpence in his pocket, and that would pay for a quart.

Once reconciled to this idea, Bob recovered his spirits, and they all talked cheerfully of old times, and joked, and laughed, and told anecdotes of former days, and conversed very lovingly together at the "True Briton," near the Borough market.

(To be continued.)

THE PET LAMB.

To fix the attention of the observer, to awaken his interest and to excite his sympathy, is the triumph of an artist's genius. It does not invariably happen that the most pleasing picture is the best; or that when tested by the rules of art, as applied by inflexible critics and connoisseurs, it could be pronounced perfect. On the contrary, it frequently occurs that pictures which give most satisfaction to the public are wanting in those artistic qualities which academical accuracy demands. This, however, was not the case with the late Mr. Collins, from one of whose best productions our engraving is taken. He pleased everybody—critical and uncritical: connoisseurs and people who knew nothing and cared nothing for rules of art were alike gratified by his paintings. When they hung on the walls of the academy crowds gathered round to admire the careful detail, the tender pathos, or genial humour; when they were engraved, they sold largely, because they were just the sort of pictures which people like—home scenes, sturdy men, buxom women, healthful children, thatched cottages, waving cornfields, flocks and herds—things which are seen every day, that require no scholastic sympathy, no historic lore, no travelled experience, to appreciate.

Such a picture is the "Pet Lamb."

The "Pet Lamb" was the joy and pride of its little playmates—Tom, Jack, Martha, Mabel, and the rest—all had a vested interest in the lamb, and the lamb was petted and caressed, and coaxed and cared for, exciting a pleasant rivalry among the children as to which of them should be most kind and gentle to their favourite. Their wise little heads found out for the poor lamb the most delicious herbage; and their good-humoured little hearts watched its every manœuvre with amazing interest, enticing it into the sunshine for a frolic, or into the barn when the rain came down. It knew them all, and they attached all sorts of meanings to its bleat—now it wanted milk, now grass, now water, now a run on the grass, now a sleep in the shade. They thought there never was so wonderful a lamb as their pet.

But they are poor. Their mother has much ado to find her little fold in food and raiment; and when the lamb—their pet and favourite—is ready for market, it must be sold. It makes her sad at heart to deprive her children of their playmate—but it must be done. If they, poor little ones, were like the little lords and ladies at the park, who live in the old family mansion, and have servants, and horses, and everything at their command—they could afford to keep their pet; but they are poor, and the hard lessons of poverty have to be early learned. Of course the mother keeps the matter secret: childish sorrow is soon over; and anticipation of their loss would only increase it;—why need they know aught of sorrow till the evil day comes? That day has come. The purchaser of the lamb has arrived. His blue-frocked boy—a monster of atrocity in the children's eyes—has come along with him, and that stout cord is to lead away their little pet to captivity and death. While the bargain is being settled, Jowler, the butcher's dog—at any other time an object of interest—stands unnoticed. One of the children goes up to petition for the pet lamb:—"Oh! let it stop! Don't send it away!" Another resents the boy's aggression; and, pushing him from the side of the lamb, bids him go away for a naughty, cruel boy as he is. Another leans on his little favourite, shedding tears over it; while another offers it a last love-token in a saucer of milk. The eldest boy, cut to the heart himself, but hiding his own sorrow to appease that of the other, tries hard to call their attention to something else—the wild bee burying itself in a bell flower, the gay-winged butterfly sporting among the buds. All the while the pet lamb, unconscious of the grief of its little friends, or of its coming doom, stands unconcerned amongst them. What though the sun shines, and the flowers are bright, and the birds are singing?—to the children there is a shadow over all, for they are learning their first lesson in sorrow.

In after years they may look back on this scene with far different feelings. Other and deeper troubles will have arisen. But the first grief is not to be obliterated from their memory; this love, this loss will be remembered when other loves and losses are forgotten.

The Matron.

NO. XVIII.

I HAVE devoted many chapters to the treatment of children. I have endeavoured to advise mothers for the best in nursing them in illness, and providing them with nutritious, digestible food when they are well. But I feel I have left a great deal unsaid, and I should not be satisfied with myself were I not able to promise my readers I would return to the subject. In the meantime I must remind all those who have the care of children, that one of the things that most conduces to their health, and to the prevention of disease, is attention to cleanliness. Frequent changes of under-garments are far more important to children than handsome new frocks, hats, or bonnets; and a child's skin can hardly be kept in a healthy state unless the whole person (the head included) is washed all over in warm soap and water once a week at least. Never be afraid of the soap's injuring your child's hair. On the contrary, it will greatly improve it. Of this you may be certain; and also that the washing of his head (supposing that you are careful to dry it thoroughly) will promote his general health. Careful mothers should constantly examine the state of their children's hair, for, should little boys and girls chance to come in contact with dirty people, or poor neglected children afflicted with vermin, they will be so themselves.

In this case the small-tooth comb must be used, and the head should be washed in a lather of soft-soap. When the evil is completely removed, the mother must be more than ever careful as to the people her child comes in contact with.

I now turn to a very different question—the preparation for a journey.

In the last century these were all-important. For a journey from London to Bath, a traveller had to be armed as if he were going to the wars. In our quiet times, highwaymen, and all the stirring adventures and hair-breadth escapes connected with their lawless trade are done away with. Barring railway accidents (fearful things, too), the chief dangers that threaten travellers are these—having their pockets picked; sitting in wet clothes; and being put in damp beds. To disappoint the pickpocket, ladies should so manage that their pocket-hole should have no communication with the pocket that holds the purse.

Goloshes of india-rubber should be worn on a journey because they are waterproof; but ladies should take them off when they stop at inns or hotels for above an hour. They are apt to draw the feet, and make them tender.

Mind your cloak or wrapper is well dried wherever you stop for the night. If you have been exposed to rain and wet, then merely hang it up on a peg, it is more likely to give you cold than to protect you from it.

But a damp bed is more dangerous than anything else. Persons placed in damp beds may contract fatal diseases. The following is an excellent method of detecting dampness in a bed:—Let it be well warmed, and, on withdrawing the pan, put between the sheets a clean glass tumbler. It must be in an inverted position. It should remain in the bed a few minutes, and if, on examining it, you find it quite untarnished with steam, you may conclude the bed is dry. Should the glass be moist and clouded, the safest thing you can do is to sleep between the blankets, unless you can have the bed well warmed a second time, so well that it will stand the test of the glass.

I forgot to mention one great danger connected with travelling, viz., that of being too late; but, as this may put off the journey altogether, it can hardly be called one of its perils. Being too late is a domestic disaster, against which we should guard. The general order and method which I have so strongly recommended is the best preventive, because things kept in order are easy to pack, and, if easy, the packing is quickly done, and we are more likely to be ready too soon than too late. It is often a great advantage to be a few minutes before hand. What cautions the traveller is thus enabled to give or to receive. What a good choice of a place in the coach or railway carriage can be made.

The poor creature who arrives at the starting-point breathless with hurry and anxiety, must take any place he can find, and in his confusion he often leaves his luggage behind. As to the dilatory person who proved actually too late, he may lose a chance of furthering his fortunes—a chance, too, that may never present itself again.

What I advise is this:—Do your packing over-night. Put every article of your dress, and your travelling costume, ready for the next morning. Even have the fire laid, and the kettle half full of water on the hob. Put the breakfast things in readiness, and send for some milk, for you will not be able to get any before the traveller starts, early in the morning. When all this is done, you may go to bed with a light heart, and feel pretty sure you will not be too late.

ROBERT BURNS.

(Concluded from page 351.)

Just as Robert Burns was about to embark for Jamaica, a letter of kindness and sympathy reached him, which caused him to alter his plans, and to look with greater hopefulness upon his future prospects. The poems he had already published had begun to excite some interest, and there were those who determined, notwithstanding his errors, that such a man of genius should not be lost to the world. His fortune suddenly changed for the better, and instead of sailing for a distant land, he accepted an invitation to visit Edinburgh. We enter now upon the second period of his life, when the peasant-boy became for a short time what is called a liver in the world of fashion.

To Edinburgh he went, and talked with learned professors, and dined with lords, dukes, and duchesses. He was received everywhere with rapture, received with acclamation as the bard of Caledonia; by the eloquence of his conversation he completely carried duchesses off their feet; he sat down at rich men's banquets, and found himself courted by the wealthy and aristocratic. It was all a dream! After taking two or three delightful tours, he found himself back again in the stern, real world he had for a few moments left, with his farm, which he had neglected, going to ruin. He who had talked with lords and ladies in Edinburgh, found that the only post which society offered him, was that of exciseman. The government of the day cared very little for poetry. When a gentleman, who was dining with Pitt, called his attention to the merits of the poet, that statesman coldly answered, pushing the port, "Lord Melville, the bottle stands with you." And it being found that poor Burns was exercising his mind rather too freely upon political matters, instead of fitting himself for the art of gauging, and practical dry gauging casks and utensils, a message was sent to him to this effect, "It is your duty to gauge casks, not to think!" This was the poet's death-warrant. After this he appeared an altered man; sorrow and care pressed heavily on him, and he walked about with the stamp of death upon his countenance. The commissioners of excise would not even pay him the paltry pittance which was his due, and on this account he was nearly perishing with hunger. Those who met him in the streets took farewell of him, never expecting to see him again, and at last, with a broken heart, he sunk into the grave when only thirty-seven years old.

In giving an estimate of the character of Burns, it is but fair, seeing that so much reproach has been cast upon his name, that we should attempt to separate the wheat from the chaff, and set down wherein he was worthy and deserving of imitation. It is a great mistake to suppose that the poet led a rollicking, thoughtless life, or that he took more pleasure in drunken squabbles than in the joys attached to mental culture. Those who knew him best—who lived with him and saw him every day, have testified (and they are men in every way worthy of credence) that he was by no means the character we might expect him to be from some of his own songs. A great deal has been said and written in respect to the drinking habits of Burns, and it is certainly true that occasionally he was guilty of gross intemperance; but it would be doing him a great injustice to be unmindful of the contempt he experienced for himself when he thus sunk the man and exalted the brute, or to count as nothing his aspirations after what was pure and ennobling in character. Notwithstanding his drinking songs, it was his highest delight to escape from the noisy mirth of bacchanalians, and to go out into the dark night to listen to the rushing winds, and to watch the lightnings flashing across the heavens. Solitude was most precious to him. Nothing so enraptured him as to walk alone in the sheltered side of a wood, or a high plantation, on a lovely winter day, and hear the stormy wind howling among the trees and raving o'er the plain. He says it was his best season for devotion; his mind was wrapt in a kind of enthusiasm to Him who, in the grand language of the Hebrew bard, "walked upon the wings of the wind."

The knowledge of his own powers and capabilities added strength to his native independence of spirit. He never cowered in the presence of the right honourables of the world, but knew what was due to himself. He met in Edinburgh the most aristocratic personages without blushing or dismay. The Duchess of Gordon was quite surprised that he was not frightened in her presence, and that he maintained his quiet self-possession. Burns, ever on the look-out for souls, could not be brought to believe that fine clothes and a dignified demeanour constituted nobility of character. Beautiful is that little incident in his life in Edinburgh: a young aristocrat was walking with him down one of the fashionable streets, when a west country farmer clad in hoddin gray, happened to cross their path. Burns shook the farmer cordially by the hand, much to the annoyance of the young Edinburgh blood, who took him soundly to task for this defect of taste. "It was not," said Robert, "the gray coat I spoke to, but the man that was under it; and the man, sir, for true worth, would weigh you and me and ten more such down any day!" In the height of his popularity he was never ashamed of his origin. His language in the highest circles was always in this wise, "I was bred at the plough, and am independent; the poetic genius of my country found me as the prophetic bard Elijah did Elisha, at the plough, and threw her inspiring mantle over me. I was bred to the plough, and am independent." This was his brave speech at all times. He was a stiff-necked man in the presence of mammon, but never in the presence of mind. This native resoluteness and independence of spirit never forsook him. When, at last, worn out by illness and anxiety, and waiting the approach of death, he looked over his past life and deeply repented of many things in it; but one thing he did not repent of—that he had been an independent man right through life. Among the last words he wrote were these: "I have often in anticipation listened to some future hackneyed scribbler, with the heavy malice of savage stupidity, saying, 'Burns, notwithstanding the fanfare of independence to be found in his words, dwindled into a paltry exciseman, and slunk out the rest of his insignificant existence in the meanest of pursuits, and among the vilest of mankind;' but (writing to a friend) 'in your hands permit me to lodge my disavowal and defiance of these slanderous falsehoods. Burns was a poor man by birth, and an exciseman by necessity; but I will say it, the sterling coin of his honest worth no poverty could debase, and his independent British mind oppression might bend but could not subdue.' These words Burns wrote from the brink of the grave; and in common charity and honesty they must be accepted as sincere and true.

In taking a candid survey of the life of the poet, we are compelled to believe that his virtues were more numerous than his vices. Still, even love for the hero of this sketch must not blind us to the enormity of his errors. We see a man with a nature full of beautiful sensibility, noble understanding, majestic powers, but devoid of that true self-government which, had he been a religious man, would have produced one of the noblest characters that ever adorned the world. He died at thirty-seven—that fatal age for the imprudent,—who, in our human judgment, might have lived to an advanced period of life, had he possessed within himself the power of self-restraint. His history is full of instruction and warning to the youthful portion of the industrial classes; for while we have in his biography abundant testimony that poverty and hard work are no barrier to the soul's growth, that the powers of the mind may be cultivated amidst the hardest outward privations, we are also reminded that the noblest powers may be wrongly applied, and that the most splendid talents cannot prevent a man from becoming a moral wreck, unless they are all in subjection to the will of God. Still, remembering the penitence of the last days of his life, we are fain to write over his grave these lines:—

"Peace to the dead! in Scotia's choir
Of minstrels, great and small,
He sprang from his spontaneous fire
The Phoenix of them all!"

Small Change.

INDIGNANT FEMALE (with energy): "Yes, Mr. Robinson, men are tyrants! Poor wives can't even make their will before they die!"—HUSBAND (re-sighing): "Well, my dear, they generally manage to have their will all their life!"

"It is very difficult to live," said a widow with seven girls, all in genteel poverty. "You must husband your time," said a sage friend. "I'd rather husband some of my daughters," answered the poor lady.

A SPECIMEN of anything is called a sample, but a specimen of needlework is something more—it is a sampler.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR A GOOD SURGEON.—He should have an eagle's eye, a lion's heart, and a lady's hand.

WHEN Barney told Bill
He was looking quite ill,
Bill stuck to his habit of impudent joking;
"That's the difference," quoth he,
"Betwixt you and me—
That I'm looking ill, and that you are ill-looking."

"GOOD NEWS, Belhoul," said a wag at Balsora: "the caliph has appointed you governor of all the apes and hogs in the kingdom." "Prepare, then," replied Belhoul, "to obey my commands."

AN advertisement in a country paper begins, "To be let immediately, or sooner, if required," &c.

AN EASY PLACE WITH LITTLE TO DO.—Wanted, at the Crystal Palace, a boy to clean the windows!

HOOD, speaking of a dirty locality, said, "He got the steam-bag going through it."

A MR. HARDY, accused of keeping a gambling-house at San Francisco, California, indignantly rebutted the accusation, by asserting, "He was in gaol for robbery at the time."

"BEN, you bad boy, I am busy now; but when I've time, I'll give you such a flogging." "Pray don't hurry, father; I can wait."

"DEAR me," said a shrewish mamma, "where can that boy have got his temper from? Not from me, I'm sure." "No, indeed, my dear," replied her patient husband; "I can't perceive that you've lost any of yours."

A MAN wrote a note requesting a loan of a noose paper "to read about his friend's marriage."

"WERE you ever in Cork?" said the gay Mrs. Jones, in the blandest of manners and sweetest of tones. "No, madam," said I; "though in Dublin I've been, yet of Cork it is only the drawings I've seen!"

SOME people allow their affairs to become so deranged, that their liabilities quite go out of their mind.

REMARK MADE BY A SAVAGE BACHELOR.—Young ladies who faint when you make them an offer, can be brought to immediately, if you whisper that you are only in joke!

"WELL, Robert, how much did your pig weigh?" "It didn't weigh so much as I expected, and I always thought it wouldn't."

A BRAVE MAN.—One who isn't afraid to wear old clothes till he is able to pay for new.

"WELL, crusty John, how are you this morning?" "Umph! not all myself." "Then I congratulate you, for you must be a gainer by the exchange."

THE most curious thing in the world is a woman that is not curious.

YOUNG GENTLEMAN TO LODGING-HOUSE KEEPER.

"I assure you, ma'am, I never left a lodging but my landlady wept at my departure." Experienced lodging-house keeper.—"I hope, sir, it was not because you went away without paying."

"JAMES, how does the thermometer stand to-day?" "On the mantel-piece, mem, leaning against master's picture."

WHY is necessity like a great many barristers?—Because it knows no law.

WHY is silk a good name for a soldier?—Because silk can never be worsted.

No man has a right to do as he pleases, except when he pleases to do right.

LADIES are like violets. The more modest and retiring they are, the more you love them.

"SAMBO, why is a chimney sweep de happiest man alive?"—"Cos he knows the joys of de fireside."

"No; try again, Sambo."—"Cos none ob de ladies, rich or poor, can do widout him." "No; try again."

"—Gib it up." "Well, because he's always well sooted (suited)."

ADVERTISEMENT IN PROVINCIAL PAPER.—A reward of five pounds is offered for the apprehension of Mr. Patrick O'Maherty, who last week stole the jackass, which same had on a pair of corduroy breeches, with blue eyes, and smokes a short pipe, much given to squinting, and likewise his shoes are down at heel.

"HAVE you anything like cheese here?" shouted a waggoner, as he halted his team in front of Joe Baird's store. "Yes, sir—ee!" shouted Joe, in reply.

"We have some tallow, very much like it." HOW TO CATCH THE FRENCH ACCENT.—Liston went to Paris in 1829, and was one day walking in front of the Hotel Maurice, with his tongue hanging out of his mouth. "What are you doing that for?" asked his intimate friend, Potier. "Why," replied the eccentric man, "I'm learning your language, and I want to catch the accent."

JOHN'S wife and John were tête-à-tête—
She witty was, industrious he;
Says John "I've earned the bread we've ate;"
"And I," says she, "have turned the tea."

"MR. BROWN, the man at No. 190, has shut up shop. What an unlucky house that is. Whom did he succeed?"—"I don't know, but it seems he didn't succeed himself."

"Do make yourselves at home, ladies," said Mrs. Smith to her visitors. "I am at home myself, and I wish you all were."

"SIR," said a burly fellow, of no enviable character, "I have the largest neck of any man in the city." "Very likely," said his neighbour; "and I saw yesterday the largest rope in the city—put that and that together."

A MERRYANDREW, on being asked why he played the fool, replied, "For the same reason that you do—out of want: you do it for want of wit, and I do it for want of money."

TIT FOR TAT.—"John," said a cockney solicitor to his son, "I see you'll never do for an attorney—you have no hevergy." "Skuse me, father," said John, "what I want is some of your chickenary."

A POOR poet, just as he finished a favourite production at midnight, suddenly exclaimed in ecstasy, that he felt his head surrounded by a blaze of glory. He was not long in realising that his hair had caught fire.

"It is extremely disagreeable to me, madam," said an ill-natured old fellow, "to tell you unpleasant truths." "I have no doubt, sir, that it is extremely disagreeable for you to tell truths of any sort."

Puzzles for the Ingenious.

ANSWERS TO THE ARITHMETICAL QUESTION IN NO. 19.

It was stated that a man was sent to market with 100 pence for the purpose of buying a certain number of snipes at 10d., plovers at 8d., larks at 1d., and sparrows at $\frac{1}{4}$ d. each; and the question was how many of each kind must he buy, so as to have 100 birds for 100 pence. This sum has been variously divided, and some of our correspondents have sent several modes. Two specimens may suffice:—

1 Snipe	10	2 Snipes at 10d. ...	20
4 Plovers at 8d. ...	32	4 Plovers at 8d. ...	32
21 Larks at 1d. ...	21	2 Larks at 1d. ...	2
74 Sparrows at $\frac{1}{4}$ d. ...	37	92 Sparrows at $\frac{1}{4}$ d. ...	46
100	100	100	100

D. DOVE.

H. S. R.—B.

Other answers have been received, correct in the totals, but varying in the details, from J. H. G. Wright, John Baird, Larky Grigg, Z. M. R. Carr, T. J., Maude Blanche, G. A. Hills, A. G. M., Alpha, J. Lugsdin, W. D. Overell, In a hurry, Inquisitive Tom, W. M., A. Jordan, J. T., P. Mangles, J. B. F., J. Keane, Young'un, A. Constant Reader, A. Young Wife, T. Williams, C. W. B., W. Munro, W. P. B., La B., J. W. B., William of Wykeham, W. Marshall, Boss, T. G. Croft, H. Jackplane, J. T. Y., H. Hoskins, R. W. Jamson, Orsini, W. E. H. W., F. C. D., J. S. (Halifax), R. Lambert, W. M., H. S.—n, J. F. Ashford, W. C. N. B. Taylor, J. B. F., G. B. Jay, G. London, F. Tucker, A. S. Wink, Teb, Whitaker, J. H. H., Harry, J. B. Vincent, T. M. Stonehouse, Fitz, Penn, G. C. Cox, W. Grant (Newport), J. McCallum, J. March, J. Mottram, Jacobus, D. S. Williamson, J. R. C. (Lisburn), M. Mooney, Hamlet, T. C. Half-whistle, H. R. Symons, G. H. Robinson, J. T. Last, R. W., A. Youth of 16, D. F. G., R. J. Watson, Margaret, H. P., J. P. C., J. C. D., J. Kinsey, C. B., P. S. A. Kennedy, G. Wilson, A. H. G. M., R. Scott, C. B. Beaudesert, J. W. Dixon, R. Reid, W. Davey, A. Regular Subscriber, W. G. Painter, M. Simpson, R. Burns, D. J. Blyth, W. Stewart, Aron, Romulus, Roscommon, Jack, H. H. (Horsham), Marco, A. S. Nilson, R. B., D. R. P., W. A. (Keighley), Peterkin, Anthony S., W. Mathieson, D. Macarthy, J. Fraser, A., H. F. McKenzie, W. A. B. B., E. G. Douglas, E. J. L., D. Deobolia, J. W., M. Wagnell, E. F. B., R. Marriott, J. Batchelor, G. Joek, W. Henry, A. G. Smith, J. Hyland, J. R. (Birkacre), J. Hellings, Faddy, W. Gooding, E. J. Davies, W. Hughes, Snipe, Young Gadshead. Henry Hill has sent eleven different statements, each fulfilling the conditions required.

CAVERALLO is correct. If he be, as he states, only 14 years of age, his solution, and the letter accompanying it, do him great credit. We think it might be worth his while to furnish us with his real name and address.

Chess.

Problem No. 36. By Mr. J. STONEHOUSE.
BLACK.

White to move, and checkmate in four moves.

Problem No. 37. By R. B. WORMALD, Esq.
BLACK.

White to move, and checkmate in three moves.

VITE.—Problem No. 22, although exhibiting promise of future excellence, is below our standard of merit.

WORKHOUSE.—The Problem would be defective unless mate could be given against the best defence, in the stipulated number of moves. In Problem No. 26, Black should play K to Q B 3, in reply to your second move.

W. J. (Dartford).—The Problems submitted by you, although correct, are too simple even for our juvenile subscribers.

STATU QUO.—Your Problem can be solved in two moves, e.g., 1. P to K 4 (dis ch) 2. Q to Kt 7 (mates) K to Kt 3.

J. W.—The alteration which you propose to make in Problem No. 29, would render the position defective. Black's reply to White's first move would be K to Q Kt 3, when mate could not be given under eight or ten moves.

DOUGLAS.—1. Problem No. 29 is quite sound; try again. 2. We do not see how the player to whom you refer can, under present circumstances, accept the challenge.

ALFRED HOLLOWAY.—The second Problem submitted by you can also be solved in two moves.

T. SIMPSON.—We shall be glad to know for what purpose Black Pawns are placed on Q Kt 2 and 6 in Problem No. 5.

GRAPES.—In Problem No. 27 you overlook Black's move of R to K R 2 (mating) in reply to White's play of P takes Q.

Q. R.—Your solutions of Problems Nos. 26 and 27 are correct. We shall always be glad to receive your solutions.

CADMUS.—Problem No. 23 is correctly given. Your solution of Problem No. 22 is correct.

VELVET.—If you desire it you can claim a Queen for every Pawn which has been advanced to its eighth square, and may thus have two or more Queens on the board at the same time.

JAMES JONES.—Your inquiry has been replied to through the post.

Solutions of Problems by Geo. Farrow, Nos. 26 and 28; Wm. McKenzie, Nos. 26, 27, and 28; Grapes, Nos. 26, 29, and 30; Crook, No. 26; Cadmus, No. 22; Q. R., No. 26 and 27; F. G. Rainger, No. 28; E. Grant, Nos. 28 and 29; Oxon, No. 29; C. Austin, Nos. 27, 28, and 29; M. A. R., Nos. 27, 28, and 29; G. Bailey, Nos. 26, 27, and 28; Delta, Nos. 27 and 28; R. Hunter, Nos. 26 and 27; Douglas, Nos. 24, 25, and 26; Gaius Amicus, Nos. 27, 28, and 29; Dartford, Nos. 27 and 28; B. T., Nos. 26 and 27; G. T. A., Nos. 27, 28, and 29; and A. Novice, Nos. 24 and 26, correct.

Our Editorial Table.

ETIQUETTE.—Correspondence and interchange of portraits should only take place between ladies and gentlemen when an engagement has been formed. By common consent, the letters placed on the breakfast-table are opened and read by those to whom they are addressed.

HAMLET.—Extravagance in dress is one of the prevailing vices of the age. The young lady who indulges in it, and whom you are thinking of making your wife, is more likely to be confirmed in her weakness by the example of others, than cured by good counsel. Independently of the ruin entailed by lavish expenditure in clothes, an inordinate love of dress has a very bad influence on the mind and heart. We do not wish to deprive the young lady in question of a good husband, but unless you have reason to believe that she means to conquer her foible, it is our duty to advise you to give her up and to seek in another a more reasonable chance of happiness.

INGOMAR.—The initials about which you question us have a very sacred signification. They stand for the Latin words Jesus Hominum Salvator: in English, "Jesus the Saviour of Men."

LILLY, NINA, and ELEANOR.—If you have an opportunity of learning music or drawing, give the preference to that for which you have the most talent.

RAMBLER.—Very excellent copying ink may be prepared by adding a teaspoonful of moist sugar to a quarter of a pint of the best black ink. If you have not a proper copying press, lay your damp copying paper upon the writing, and pass over it a warm flat-iron.

FRANK ROARK.—We fear we cannot be of much assistance to you. You might call at our office.

Odices, W. R., E. J. H., Samuel W., Mary, A Soldier, A School Boy, S. Millward, A Swell, Jane A., Stupid Person, W. Coop, Peter Mangles, B. An Invalid, A Macpherson, Billy F., T. Tagrag, Josephus, A Subscriber.—These are all cases of disease or of personal defect, which should be addressed to skilful medical or surgical advisers.

Eastwood, Carus Kearn, S. K., D. H. S., Adolescents, D. T. Carey, An Anxious Inquirer, Gascoigne, A Weary One, R. Inquirer, A. L. J., Coriolanus, Constant Reader, W. M., Cylinder, An Irish Policeman, G. C.—d, Expectans, A. C. Y., Longfellow, Grumpus, L. W. T. H., Intention, Count de Monte Christo, C. Adamson, Hope Evermore.—These are applications as to situations. We regret that it is not in our power to render the writers the assistance they require. Most of the inquiries should have been addressed to the principals or secretaries of the offices into which they wish to enter.

LOO and TRILIA.—To give you as nearly as possible the proper pronunciation of Persia, we advise you to sound it as though it were written Pursha. In reply to your second question, we can only say that nothing improves the manners of young gentlemen so much as the society of amiable young ladies. As to the game you mention, never having played at it, we cannot furnish you with its rules.

HELEN.—Your ignorance of music is not a bar to your procuring a situation as governess. A master is almost always taken for this accomplishment.

LEX, ADIS, RUSTICUS.—When "Lex" is dining at a house where any ceremony is observed, the servant takes away his plate and brings him a second helping on a clean one. When quite "en famille," and when his plate is handed (to the lady who is carving) for a second supply of the same dish, he should leave his knife and fork on the plate to avoid soiling the table-cloth. "ADIE."—The eldest unmarried daughter should preside at the tea-table, unless her mamma prefers retaining her old office. The offering refreshments depends on the distance from which your guests come. If they live in the same town with yourself, it would be superfluous to offer any refreshment; but if your friends have taken a drive or a long walk in order to pay you a visit, you would do well to offer any refreshments that can be quickly brought in. At dinner or supper a lady should remove her gloves. "RUSTICUS." should offer his arm if he has to traverse a room in leading a lady to the piano, but he may hand her to the instrument, supposing she is in its immediate vicinity. In addressing ladies with whose names we are unacquainted, the term Madam is more in accordance with modern usage than that of Miss.

S. L. S.—We feel very much for your painful situation, but we think we cannot give you more profitable advice than that addressed to another of our recent correspondents named "Lillian." To her we refer you.

M. S. M.—Your letter is so good, and evinces so much education, that we regret you can procure no better remuneration than 17s. 6d. a week. Your marriage on such a salary would be very absurd and very wrong. You must persevere in the exercise of your talents, and in all probability you will soon obtain a good situation, and with this the consent of the young person's mother.

LYDIA, M. M. S., A. C., LADOGA, ADA, and KITTY GREEN.—The important subjects on which you severally consult us are these:—Clearing and improving the complexion, thickening the hair, and curing chaps on hands and lips. To begin with the complexion. In this redness, spots, and blotches may arise from some constitutional illness, from a determination of blood to the head, or from acidity in the stomach; for the latter cause, a tea-spoonful of magnesia mixed with milk, and taken once a week, may prove of service. For the former, abstemious diet and keeping the feet constantly warm is the advisable treatment; but a redness that sometimes affects the nose and face may be removed by a weak solution of borax in rose-water. We do not think that cleanliness can be practised without the use of soap, nor do we consider that curl soap can injure the finest skin. For chapped hands, melt in a jar one ounce and a half of spermaceti, half an ounce of white wax, six drachms of powdered camphor, and four tablespoonfuls of olive oil. Chapped lips require a different preparation. Take of beef marrow and white wax an ounce each, three ounces of white pomatum and melt them together (with a small bit of alkanet root in a muslin bag to colour the salve). Melt a l this and strain it while hot.

Apply this as well as the ointment for the hands, if required, on going to bed. We have recently given a very good receipt for thickening the hair, viz., a mixture of nine parts of olive oil and one part of liquid hartshorn. Another receipt, of which we think highly, is the following:—Damp the hair frequently with the following wash thus prepared. In a quart of boiling water melt half an ounce of camphor and one ounce of borax. This wash is said to beautify the hair and even to prevent baldness. "Lydia" must pronounce the French word belle as though it were written bell.

ALL FOOLS' DAY.—A school-boy and several other correspondents ask the origin of All Fools' Day:—

"The first of April, some do say,
Is set apart for All Fools' Day;
But why the people call it so,
Nor I, nor they themselves do know."

The origin of the Fools' festival is ascribed to an incident which happened in the Isle of Chickosk, on the seventh of the moon Ni-ada, which, in the European calendar, makes the first of April. This story is made up of beings natural and supernatural. An evil-disposed demon is always on the watch for an opportunity of doing damage to a worthy prince, who at last saves his country, but loses his own life. It became the fashion to visit a certain place in his honour, ostensibly to look for him, who, of course, was never to be found.

"So did these customs to his memory rise,
From babes that lisp to sages who are wise,
From Chickosk's Isle, told by some sacred man,
The story got abroad and reached Japan;
From thence, by story-tellers it was hurled
Into these islands of the Western world;
Till in its progress through the modern school,
The hallowed forms were turned to ridicule:
And thus the legend of two thousand years
The cause of April All Fools' Day appears."

ALPHA and ROSA.—"Alpha" and "Rosa" are much to blame, but "Alpha's," as the most serious case, must have our first attention. "Alpha" should blush for his weakness. What is the use of a man's physical and moral strength if they are not to be brought into service in the hour of suffering. Suicide, indeed! And that for a disappointment that may be made a blessing in disguise. You, "Alpha," are quite mistaken about the nature of your own feelings. The flame in your heart will soon be extinguished unless you feed it. Read our advice to a desponding lover, in a preceding number of the "New Series" of our Paper. It is addressed to a lady, viz., to "Laura Lenora," but it is applicable to your case; and talk no more of suicide—the most dreadful of crimes, because it leaves no room for repentance. As to "Rosa," she has hardly acted like a rational being. Already engaged to an old man, she goes and promises her hand to a young one. As matters stand she can marry neither, not even the authority of parents can justify her in swearing to love the old gentleman while her affections are another's, nor must she bestow her hand on him who possesses her heart, without obtaining parental consent. "Rosa" is in a painful situation, but she must not despair; many equally tried have performed their duty and regained their peace of mind. Let "Rosa" peruse our answers to correspondents in a recent number, and she will find directions to a fellow sufferer.

MARIA.—You must take everything likely to strengthen your constitution. Even tonics might be of service under medical supervision; but a visit to the sea-side is what we particularly recommend.

E. M. H., who "is called a blue," shows much more sense than those who presume to ridicule her.

ALMA.—According to strict etiquette, you should not have taken the violets; but the anger of your companions appears to us rather the result of envy than of superior discretion.

NILLIE B.—The "Bridge of Sighs" is by Hood. The complete works of this poet would be expensive.

DICK TARTLETON.—The young ladies should be ceremonious with you if they wish you to be so with them; but if you wish to set them an example of proper behaviour, abstain from any degree of familiarity that is not well received.

MR. GOLIGHTLY.—Tea and coffee are always served up at a wedding-breakfast, which, in other respects, should consist of every delicacy of the season.

SERONS.—"Serons" must take for his models of etiquette those of his fellow-servants, who have retained their places for some considerable time. Their having remained stationary shows them to be good models.

A TEMPERANCE MAN.—When tea was first introduced into England, it was sixty shillings a pound. We read of its use as far back as the year 1660.

AN INJURED ONE.—You might sue your false lover for a breach of promise of marriage, but we advise you not to do so. We consider you have escaped from a bad man.

CECILIA.—The expense of a complete divorce used to be at least £400, and an act of parliament was necessary.

LITTLE SORROW.—If we thought the gentleman who has been so long paying his addresses to you was convinced of your attachment, we could hardly find terms strong enough to express our disapprobation of his conduct; but if you induced your lover to believe you indifferent to him, he is not to blame for leaving you.

ERSOM RACER.—The greatest price ever given for a race horse was 6,500 guineas for the two-year-old Hobbie Noble, in 1851.

VIOLET OF THE VALLEY.—We are not surprised at the gentleman's absenting himself. Violence of temper is even more revolting in a woman than in a man. You must endeavour to take your punishment quietly, and so show by constant gentleness that you have acquired command over your feelings.

ANNIE S.—The less you think about admirers the more likely you are to procure one who will be constant for life.

MORDAUNT.—Sovereigns were first coined in the reign of Henry the First, but they were of the value of twenty-two shillings; the modern sovereign was issued in 1816.

PETER HARLE.—Your suggestions have been received, and will be duly considered.

A STUDENT.—We recommend a student to go to his lecture room by a different route, and carefully avoid the shop window at which the pretty girl is to be seen. A student alludes to our receipts for winding up love affairs, but his love affairs had better be given up than wound up. A marriage between a young student and a shop girl would be imprudent, and equally injurious to both parties.

ANTIQUARIAN.—Maldon is supposed to have been the first Roman colony in England.

ORNALDO.—Mary, daughter of Henry the Eighth, was the only English Princess of Wales in her own right.

CYMRO.—In the common course of events, the Princess Frederick William of Prussia can only return to England as a visitor.

ROSE MAYLE, BEATRICE ROLFE, SYDENHAM, LAST THOUGH NOT LEAST.—All these ladies wish to exert their talents profitably, and we do not doubt that there is a good situation somewhere for each and all of them. The difficulty is for the families wanting governesses, and the governesses wanting engagements to come into proper contact; for both parties publicly is the only remedy. Our fair correspondents should make a point of reading every morning the advertising sheet of the most influential papers, and a few shillings will be well spent by each in advertising her various qualifications. We also recommend each to lose no opportunity of mentioning among private friends the object in view. If this advice is followed, we trust success may be the result.

ADONIS, A DOVE, A WELSHMAN, S. J.—If "Adonis" can afford to marry, we advise him to propose to the lady immediately. "A Welshman" should write again and know his fate. Be it what it may, he should bear it like a true Briton.

"A Dove" is not likely to find any happiness with her present suitor; we advise her to discard him. "S. J." may be assured that if "J. B." told us confidentially his name and address, we should reveal them neither to her nor any one else.

BARNY.—Petersburg was commenced by Peter the Great in a little hovel of wood. In 1710 Count Golovkin built the first house of brick, and in the next year the emperor laid the foundation of a house of the same material.

MARIA CHISLETT.—If reserve does not suffice to discourage the advances of which you complain, you must be stern and dignified.

Z. Z.—Water from the artesian well is not prejudicial in watering plants of any kind, unless it is proved to be charged with lime.

ROB ROY.—All you can do is to ask the young lady, M., supposing you were able at a future period to achieve success, you might indulge in the hope of her sharing it with you.

DUMFRIES.—The redness and roughness of complexion, which cause you so much discomfort, may proceed from a scorbutic tendency. In this case you should eat vegetables freely; but if this redness proceeds from indigestion, a very different diet would be advisable. We do not recommend constant applications to doctors, but in your case we think the opinion of a respectable medical man is necessary.

F. ALLEN.—Oil of Rhodium is a yellow fragrant oil, prepared from the wood of Convolvulus scoparius. It is often used to adulterate otto of roses. It has been said to be one of the articles used by Mr. Rarey, the American horse-tamer, but this is contradicted.

J. DICKENSON.—"Pairing off" in Parliamentary language, means that practice by which two members of the House of Commons, of opposite political opinions, agree to omit voting in order that one or other, or both, may be absent from the House for a specified time. We cannot undertake to recommend books on particular subjects, as there are so many rival claims.

J. NEVILLE.—An index will be published with the last number of the volume. "Cassell's Illustrated History of England" is published in penny numbers weekly. Two volumes are already completed.

OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Any letter in old books will let you know the value, and probably purchase, the Bible in your possession.

HOPE EVERMORE.—In reply to numerous correspondents we beg to state that the authoress of "Hope Evermore" is a popular writer, who in this tale makes her débüt before the public in this style of literature.

POOR DOG TRAY may remove the oil-stains from his coat by rubbing them with turpentine.

J. J. S.—The fact in the life of Archimedes to which you refer, is an illustration of the doctrine of specific gravities. King Hiero, of Syracuse, had reason to believe that a goldsmith whom he had employed to make his crown had cheated him by purloining a portion of the gold intrusted to him, and he requested his kinsman, Archimedes, to endeavour to detect the fraud. The philosopher was puzzled for some time but while one day in a bath, he observed that he displaced a bulk of water equal to his own body. Perceiving a train of consequences which would lead to the detection of the goldsmith's fraud, he ran naked out of the bath into the street exclaiming "Eureka, Eureka! I have found it, I have found it!" He subsequently proved the fraud by comparing the quantity of water displaced by equal weights of gold and silver. Archimedes was killed by a brutal Roman soldier during the storming of Syracuse, while he was in the act of drawing a geometrical figure on the sand. This event occurred B.C. 212, when he was 75 years old.

G. ROBBARD.—Answers to your question have been repeated in several numbers. You can obtain all the back numbers of Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage Yard. We know of no law forbidding non-conformists to attach a tower and bells to their places of worship.

RODERIC RANDOM.—The numbers of the "Model Copy Books," published by Ward and Lock, will be issued in succession. You must settle your other question yourself.

* * * We cannot guarantee the return of rejected manuscripts.

All Letters and Communications for the Editor to be addressed to JOHN CASSELL, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

London: Printed and published for JOHN CASSELL by PETTER and GALPIN, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

[THE RIGHT OF TRANSLATION AND REPUBLICATION IS RESERVED.]

NEW SERIES. VOL. I.—No. 24.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 15, 1858.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER XLVII.

The wounds that pain and grief have made,
Are seldom cured by laughter;
Who has not felt the dreadful blade
As deep the moment after?

But pity from the lips we love
Is friendship's best endeavour;
And, like the rain-drop from above,
Makes all look fresh as ever.—J. BURBIDGE.

It would be difficult to paint the astonishment of our hero on hearing the name of his old companion and playfellow, Jack, pronounced in that distant land, and under such peculiar circumstances. He had never forgotten the lad—the natural goodness of his disposition, his generosity and lightheartedness; and had long since forgiven the attempt to lure him into the path of crime, in consideration of the motive.

The position in which he was placed compelled him to be careful. It was of the utmost consequence that the name of his father should not transpire; but for that he would at once have demanded news of Jack.

"Now, my man," he said, regarding the old sailor, "it strikes me you have something to impart to me."

"You may well say that, your honour," replied the sea-lawyer, giving his trowers that peculiar hitch which seems to be an indispensable preliminary to every seaman in arranging his ideas. "In the first place, does your honour know Jack Manders?"

"I have certainly heard the name," said Richard, with a smile.

"That's what I call a judicial answer," observed Bunce—probably he meant a judicious one; "but no doubt your honour knows best. I ain't no great judge of landmen, whatever I may be of those of my own craft."

"Well, then, I do know him."

"That's hearty!" exclaimed the old man, giving himself another hitch—to express satisfaction, we suppose. "What I call plain sailing. I can understand that. Maybe," he continued, at the same time peering curiously into his face, "you wouldn't mind, if you saw him on a lee shore, stretching out a hand or a rope's end to sarve him."

"On any shore," replied our hero, warmly; "but, where is he?"

"In that devil's craft," whispered the old man, pointing over his shoulder down the river, in the direction of the Caradoc.

"The one I have just visited?"

"Exactly."

Like most sailors when conversing with landmen, Bunce was very fond of making use of hard words; and we doubt not but our readers will agree with us, that "exactly" is an exceedingly hard one.

RICHARD AND BUNCE PLANNING THE RESCUE OF JACK.

"Why do you call it the devil's craft; and why did he not speak to me?" demanded Richard. "He must have recognised me."

"He 'cognised you, fast enuf," replied Bunce, delighted to display his knowledge of the meaning of the word; "but perhaps the poor lad didn't know whether your honour care to 'cognise him. Besides, if the skipper had seen him speaking to you, it would only have put him on his guard."

His voyage to India had given his hearer sufficient insight into sea phraseology to explain what "skipper" meant.

"And why should he object?" he demanded.

"For fear Jack should find a friend."

"Does he require one?" demanded Richard, earnestly; "if so, I shall feel doubly thankful for my visit to the ship."

"Does he require one?" repeated Bunce. "Does a poor fellow when he has fallen overboard and his vessel is under sail, require a hen-coop to be thrown out to him, to give him a last chance of battling with the waters that are yawning to engulf him? If ever a lad required a friend, Jack Manders does."

"I cannot comprehend you," observed the young man, more puzzled than ever by the peculiarity of the speaker; "what has he done?"

"Done, nothing: he is as honest a lad as ever broke biscuit."

It was a relief to our hero to hear such a character of his former companion.

"He has been trapped on board the Caradoc," continued the sea-lawyer, "and treated worse nor a dog by the captain."

"Poor fellow!" exclaimed our hero; "but can he obtain no redress?"

"He tried it in China, but the consul wouldn't listen to him. Twice he cut from the ship at the Cape, but the magistrates gave him up."

"He is an apprentice, then?"

"No, he ain't. Jack has never signed the 'dentures. I put him up to that trick. They have lashed him like a hound, till the crew cried shame, and threatened mutiny; but ain't broke his spirit."

"If Captain Gall has no legal power to detain him, rest assured that he shall not do so," exclaimed his hearer, indignantly. "I shall return at once on board and demand him."

"It would be of no use."

"Then I must apply to the authorities."

"Jack would be murdered before you could get back."

"What am I to do? How can I serve him?"

"I'll tell you," said the old man, who had arranged it all in his own mind. "The skipper is sure to dine on shore."

"He dines with Mr. Chutnee this evening," interrupted Richard.

"Very good, that makes it plain sailing," continued the seaman, turning his quid, and giving a third hitch. "You have a dingie alongside towards dusk."

"But there are so many always rowing round the craft. How will he know which one?"

"Not bad that, for a landsman," thought the old man, for the first time perceiving the difficulty; "pity he ain't a sailor."

"I have it," he exclaimed, speaking aloud; "at night the dingiewallahs—the name for the native boatmen—all carry a light at the bow of their craft. Let yours carry one at the stern; there will be no mistake then. I shall be on the first watch, Jack will only have to descend by one of the haw-sers."

"I see—I comprehend."

"And will you do it?"

"Undoubtedly."

"Why, then heaven bless you, young gentleman, whoever you may be!" exclaimed the old seaman, emphatically. "For you will perform a good action, and it will be registered in the great log-book in your favour. Poor fellow, how his heart will be lightened, when I tell him that Providence has raised him up a friend."

"You may add also that it is a true one," said Richard, who felt both interested and indignant at the tale of his former companion and playfellow's sufferings; "one who is both able and willing to protect him. If your captain should by any means suspect your plan, and interfere with its accomplishment, do not despair: I shall at once solicit the interference of the Governor-General."

Mr. Bunce gave a low whistle.

"One of the land nobs," he thought.

"And now it is time," continued Richard, "that we part. Your comrades in the boat are doubtless wondering at your stay. Give them this money to drink my health with. That will prevent all troublesome surmise."

"Lord love you, how well your honour knows us sailors."

"And these," added our hero, offering him two or three pieces of gold, "for yourself."

"No, you don't know us," added the sea-lawyer. "Money for grog, for rowing your honour on shore, or spinning a yarn or two to make a landsman stare, is all right enough; but for having served a comrade—no, no. Bad as the blue-jackets are, they don't sell their services."

"You are an honest fellow," exclaimed Richard Tyrrell, replacing the money in his purse, for he saw that the speaker really meant it. "Give me your hand."

Mr. Bunce, whose ideas of propriety were extremely delicate, extended his hand, but not till he had rubbed the palm several times on his trowsers. The request gratified him more than gold could have done.

"I think you do know us, arter all," said the old man, smilingly. "Remember to-night, and the lamp—"

"At the stern," replied our hero, finishing the sentence for him. "You see I have not forgotten your instructions."

"That youngster deserves to command a seventy-four, and to have me for his coxswain," exclaimed the sea-lawyer, as the object of his admiration disappeared. "Poor Jack! how his heart will be lightened. All for the best, all for the best."

And the speaker descended the steps of the ghaut, singing a verse of Dibdin's well-known popular song—

"There's a sweet little cherub that sits up aloft,
And keeps watch for the life of poor Jack."

And he was right. Each man has a cherub to watch over him, to guide him in danger, and preserve him from the shoals and wrecks of passion—if he would only listen to its voice.

"What have you been after?" demanded Martin, a sailor who was in the pay of Captain Gall.

Bunce smiled.

"Why, we have waited nearly an hour!" added the fellow, sullenly.

"I've been spinning him a yarn."

The rest of the crew laughed: they knew and appreciated the speaker's talent in that peculiar line. Martin, on the contrary, repeated the words in a doubtful tone.

"Yes," continued the old man, showing the money, "and this is what he has given me for the crew."

There was a general cheer.

The spy had nothing more to say. Of course, after such a proof even his suspicions were silenced. All he did was to mentally blame himself that he had not gone up the ghaut with the young landsman himself; and he resolved, if ever he came on board the Caradoc again, to show him particular attention.

In high glee with the success of his mission, Mr. Bunce returned on board the Caradoc: the captain was on deck.

"You have been a plaguy long time," observed the tyrant.

"Can't help it, your honour," replied the old man, touching his cap; "the young gentleman was so curious. No end to his questions about the sea, England, and furrin parts; and so liberal."

The commander turned upon his heel, and walked towards the fore.

"All right," whispered the speaker to Jack, as he passed him; "you have a true friend. Not a word till the skipper is on shore."

The poor fellow felt his eyes fill with tears at the thought that a being was still to be found in the world who felt interested in his fate. He repressed his impatience, however, and began to busy himself with mending one of the sails.

Richard felt that it was a serious task he had undertaken; but it was also a duty, and from that he never shrunk. Jack had shown both him and his sister kindness and sympathy; and he resolved to serve him,—to give him an opportunity of redeeming himself if possible. When he recollected the many good qualities of the poor friendless lad, he trusted the principles of evil were not so deeply ingrafted in him that neither advice nor example could eradicate them.

"I will do my best," he thought; "Providence must decide the rest."

Amongst the servants whom Sanford had engaged for him, was a powerful, active man, who filled the office of head groom. His master had frequently been struck by his intelligence, and the willingness with which he undertook any little commission or office unconnected with his place; a conduct so different from the generality of oriental servants, that he could not fail to notice it.

The name of the man was Zeneb.

To him, therefore, he communicated his instructions that a dingie with the signal agreed upon should towards nightfall approach the Caradoc, and receive any sailor who might descend from the vessel.

The fellow nodded with intelligence.

"The instant he is on board," he added, "row for the ghaut."

"It shall be as the sahib commands," was the reply.

"Should you be pursued?"

"They must row fast to overtake us," said the man. "The English are a wonderful nation, but they cannot compete with the dingiewallahs of the Hooghly."

"Or attacked?"

Zeneb drew from his girdle the long knife which he invariably wore, and felt its point with a significant gesture.

"No bloodshed," said our hero.

"Not if it can be avoided; but I am to bring the sailor to the sahib's dwelling?"

"Yes."

"He shall be there at every risk; but your servant will be prudent."

As a further precaution, a carriage was directed to be in waiting at the landing-place, and not to quit the spot till the evasion should be accomplished.

Willingly would Richard have seen to the escape of Jack Manders himself, but prudence forbade him. It was of the utmost importance for the success of the project which had led him to India that his real name should not transpire; and to divert all suspicion of his having taken any share in the transaction, he felt that it would be best to be absent during the attempt. Could he have seen Jack first, and put him on his guard, the affair would have worn a very different aspect.

With an anxious feeling, which he could not entirely shake off, he dressed for the dinner at Mr. Chutnee's.

Being only a gentleman's party, Zamora was not present.

Never since the day he had been trepanned on board the Caradoc had time lagged so heavily with Jack Manders. He thought the sun would never set; conjured up and imagined a thousand circumstances that might interfere with his tyrant's going on shore, or prevent his own escape from his floating prison. His manner grew so excited as the day advanced, that Caleb and Bunce frequently whispered to him to be upon his guard.

It was not the anticipation of freedom alone—of being once more treated like a human being—but of meeting with one for whom he had always felt a partiality—one who had treated him with kindness. The world had not wasted much upon him.

At last, just as the last rays of the setting luminary were gilding the spires of Calcutta, Captain Gall made his appearance upon deck.

"All right," said the sea-lawyer; "he has mounted royals, sky-scrapers and all."

In other words, the skipper was full dressed.

Cruelty is naturally suspicious. The commander of the Caradoc had observed the flushed countenance of his victim—the air of abstraction with which he stood regarding first the shore and then the sun. As he was about to get into his boat, he called his spy, Martin, to him.

"Have you noticed Jack?" he inquired.

The man nodded.

"Keep an eye upon him."

"Aye, aye, your honour."

"And upon the boats," added the captain.

"Not one shall be lowered without the mate's order."

"I won't quit the deck till you return."

"And should he attempt to swim?"

"He can't swim," replied the man; "so don't make yourself uneasy; and even if he did, a bullet or the sharks would soon reach him."

The captain nodded approvingly, and the boat rowed off, conveying the well-dressed ruffian to mingle in society, sit at an honourable man's board, exchange the courtesies of life with those who, had they suspected a tithe of the cruelty of his nature—the acts of wanton outrage he had perpetrated—would have shrunk from contact with him as from pollution.

Whatever the defects and immoralities of European society may be in Calcutta, brutality to inferiors certainly is not one of them.

Bunce and Caleb had both noticed the whispered conversation between Martin and the skipper, and guessed the purport of it.

"The sneak has received his cue," observed the old man.

Jack looked at him hopelessly.

"Don't despond," said Caleb; "we will balk him yet. You have only to keep up your nerve for another hour, and then you will be free. Would I had such a prospect," added the poor fellow, with a sigh; "but I have no friends to assist me."

The caution, or rather advice, to keep up his courage was a necessary one; for years of systematic ill-usage had so broken the once daring spirit of the young man, that few could have recognised in him the gallant boy who so bravely rescued Rachel on the bridge from the coarse violence of her cousin, Carus Kearn.

Night at last drew on, and one by one the boats of the native fishermen began to appear upon the river. All seamen in the Hooghly are so accustomed to the sight, that it excites but little attention; sometimes, indeed, when disappointed of a run on shore, the crews will vent their ill-humour by pelting them with the remains of fruit or melon-rinds that encumber the deck.

Martin, not dreaming that any assistance could be expected from any one of the native craft, saw them approach without the slightest suspicion. Jack, he well knew, possessed no means of bribing them, and without a bribe the oriental crosses his arms, and remains inactive. It was the ship's boats, and they were on the lee side, that the spy kept his eye upon.

"There she is," observed Bunce, as a light dingie, with a couple of rowers, and Zeneb holding a lamp at the stern, came directly under the bows of the vessel.

How the heart of Jack beat; and he mentally blessed the chance which had raised him up a friend.

"God bless you," whispered Caleb, wringing his hand; "I shall often think of you."

"And I of you," replied the persecuted lad; "and of dear, kind Bunce. But for your goodness, I should long ere this have found a resting-place beneath the waves. I can't thank you, but my heart is grateful, very grateful."

"Of course it is," replied the old seaman. "I allays said it was in the right place. I shall live to see you a man yet."

"And if ever you meet the skipper," added Jack's fellow apprentice.

The momentary bright flash of the victim's dark eye indicated that all spirit had not deserted him—a leaven of his old courage remained.

"What are you three whispering about there?" demanded Martin, from the lee side of the vessel.

Jack began to descend, his companions shielding him by standing before him.

"What do you mean by you three?" replied Bunce.

"You and the two 'prentices."

"There's only one 'prentice."

"I say there are two."

"And if there are a dozen," observed the sea-lawyer, "what is it to you? How long, I should like to know, have you been in command of the Caradoc?"

The spy, who was a powerful fellow, advanced to meet him; and Bunce, conscious that every moment was of consequence for the fugitive's escape, encountered him half way. Big words were exchanged, in which process Martin got so excited by the reproaches of the old seaman and the jeers of the crew, that he forgot for a while the charge that had been given him.

The quarrel would have terminated in a fight but for the interference of the first mate, who interposed his authority.

"I don't want to fight here," exclaimed the old man, satisfied of having carried his point, and that, by this time, Jack was safe on board the dingie; "but I won't be bullied by him: he ain't no ship's officer yet."

"No more he ain't!" shouted the crew, who generally disliked Martin.

"Where is Jack?" roared the latter.

The name was called again, but no one answered.

"Cut and run," exclaimed the spy; "you'll hear what the captain says."

"More likely murdered and thrown overboard," observed the sea-lawyer, bitterly. "We all know how the skipper has treated him."

"And who aided him," added several.

Martin rushed to the part of the deck where the three conspirators, as he termed them, had been standing. There was no appearance of Jack; but he discovered in the distance a boat rowing rapidly towards the ghaut, and he pointed it out to the first mate.

The canny Scot, conscious that he would have to bear the brunt of the captain's wrath, at once gave orders for the pursuit, and, to insure the carrying out of his intentions, got into the barge himself.

The boast of Zeneb proved to be anything but an idle one. Clever as the Europeans were, they were no match for the dingie-wallahs of the Hooghly, who contrived to maintain the distance between them and their pursuers.

"It is no use, sir," observed Bunce.

"I am the judge of that," replied the officer, in an angry tone; "give way, men!"

The sailors exerted themselves with increased vigour, but only neared the ghaut in time to see Jack and the natives rush up the steps of the landing-place; and, when they reached the top, enter a vehicle, which drove rapidly off.

"The rascals," muttered the mate, in a tone of vexation.

"We know, at least, who aided him to cut and run," observed Martin.

A low chuckle from the old sailor was the only reply he condescended to make to the insinuation. They were in port, and he well knew that Captain Gall would think twice before he ventured to perpetrate any fresh act of brutality whilst within reach of the civil authorities.

The boat rowed slowly back.

Caleb, who had remained on board, saw them mount the side of the vessel with anxious looks; and his relief was great when he perceived that Jack was not of the number. There was no touch of jealousy in his disposition; and yet he could not help secretly regretting that Providence had not raised him up a friend.

Henceforth he would have to bear the brunt of the tyrant's ill-treatment alone,—hitherto he had shared it with his companion in misfortune.

He made a confidant of his feelings to the old seaman.

"Raise you up a friend," repeated the sea-lawyer; "it will. Jack won't forget his old messmate, take my word for it."

"But he is powerless."

"His protector is not," was the reply.

"I wonder who he is?" observed the boy.

"Can't tell, but he deserves to be an admiral!" exclaimed Bunce; "for his heart is in the right place. He understands a sailor."

"Do you know his name?"

"Never asked it."

"And did Jack never tell it to you?"

"Never; and what is more, I didn't ask him. Won't there be a hurricane when the skipper comes on board?"

The boy shuddered.

"Cheer up."

"I can't—I foresee all that I shall have to endure."

"Fear not, but trust in Providence,

Wherever you may be."

said the old man, repeating the words of one of his favourite songs: "it is sure to send a favourable wind in time. If you were not a 'prentice, something might be done. It might be done now," he added, with a look of peculiar meaning, "if we could only lay our hands on your 'dentures. You understand me—where are they kept?"

"In the captain's cabin," replied the young man.

"Get them," whispered his adviser, "and snap your fingers at him."

For the first time the idea of possessing himself of the fatal deed which bound him to his slavery entered the heart of the apprentice.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

As letters some hand has invisibly traced
When held to the flame will steal out to the sight,
So many a feeling that long seemed effaced
The warmth of a meeting like this brings to light.

MOORE.

It required all the powers of self-command which our hero possessed over himself—and they were naturally great—to enable him to control not only his feelings of impatience, but the disgust he felt at coming in contact with Captain Gall, whom he looked upon as one of those brutes who take a keen delight in human sufferings. But for the peculiarity of his own position, he would have told him what he thought of his conduct, and reproached him with it.

"You don't take your wine," observed Mr. Chutnee. Our hero filled his glass and passed the decanter; observing, as he did so, that he had but a poor head for drinking.

"Heart, you mean," replied Sanford, maliciously; for he rejoiced in the opportunity of exciting the jealousy of his employer. "That, I fear, is absent."

The merchant began to look uneasy.

"And very natural, too, at his age," added the captain. "When I was a youngster I fell in love with every fresh face. Happy to take wine with you, Mr. Tyrrell."

Richard forced himself to comply with the invitation.

"You make no reply to the accusation," observed the host, with a sickly smile.

"What reply can I make?" replied the young man. "It is the mere badinage of society, and the submitting to it the penalty which youth pays upon its entrée. If I am dull and dispirited, you may thank your guest."

"Thank me!" repeated Captain Gall, in a tone of surprise.

"My visit to the ship this morning."

"Why, you scarcely drank anything; did he, Sanford?"

"Certainly not," said the clerk.

"Not of wine. I trust I shall never have that excuse to make," observed our hero. "But the sight of the Caradoc reminded me of dear old England, and those I left behind me."

"Home-sick," exclaimed the commander.

"Love-sick, more likely," added the confidential clerk.

"Perhaps neither—perhaps both," replied Richard. "At any rate, I'll not feel myself called upon to take you into my confidence or listen to my confession; I am not so young as that."

"I can appeal to Mr. Chutnee," said the clerk, "if you have not lost much of your animal spirits since you came to India."

The merchant confirmed the speaker in his assertion. He was anxious, if possible, to lead him into something like an avowal of his opinions and feelings; and his guest, who saw the ruse, determined to gratify and punish him at the same time.

"Perhaps I was not in love then," he observed.

The jealous husband winced.

"You are now?" he observed.

His guest shrugged his shoulders.

"Mr. Tyrrell is a great admirer of beauty," observed Sanford.

"Have I ever made you my confidant upon the subject?" demanded our hero, somewhat haughtily.

"I really think the conversation has gone quite far enough,—not that I am naturally of a captious disposition, but there is such a thing as self-respect."

"And self-conceit," mentally ejaculated the mortified clerk.

At this part of the conversation a servant entered the drawing-room to invite the gentlemen to take coffee with the lady of the mansion. Mr. Chutnee felt annoyed, but was naturally too wellbred to offer any objection.

"You must offer my excuses," said Richard, rising to depart, for he had recognised Zeneb, the sycee, as he rode past the verandah, leading his horse, and knew by the sign of intelligence he gave him that the project had succeeded. "I have an engagement."

"A rendezvous," exclaimed Captain Gall, laughingly.

"Well," replied the young man, smiling, "for once I do not mind confessing that it is a rendezvous; and that has been the cause of my abstraction and impatience. Are you satisfied with the admission?"

"Perfectly," cried the gentlemen; and Sanford quoted the well known lines of the poet and fabulist Gay—

"And when a lady's in the case,
You know, all other things give place."

In perfect good-humour at the storm of badinage, the young man took his leave, and the merchant, with a much lighter heart, invited the remaining guests to follow him to the salon, to take coffee with his wife.

"Where is Mr. Tyrrell?" demanded the lady, in a tone of disappointment.

"He has left."

"How stupid."

"I pressed him to remain," observed her husband, fixing his eyes upon her, to mark the effect of his words, "but he pleaded one of those engagements which youth looks forward to with impatience."

Zamora did not appear to understand him.

"Where the heart is occupied," added the speaker.

"Ah! yes! I know!" she exclaimed, with a cheerful smile; "he was quite right to go under such circumstances. I should have insisted upon his leaving."

In the purity and innocence of her nature, she naturally concluded that our hero had gone to a party at Sir Charles Fourreau's, or where he would meet Lillian.

Her husband felt both puzzled and gratified. Puzzled at the readiness with which she had comprehended his not over-delicate insinuation, and gratified at the indifference with which she listened to it.

"Is it coldness," thought Sanford, "or is it art?"

As for the captain, his was one of those coarse natures that seldom feel surprised at any self-development of passion or frailty on the part of his fellow creatures.

As Richard was not present, Mrs. Chutnee cared very little about her husband's remaining guests, and with that tact peculiar to women, permitted the conversation gradually to drop. The consequence was, they speedily took their leave.

"Zamora," observed her husband, as soon as they were alone, "you have vexed me by the levity of your words to-night."

The lady looked in his face with an air of innocent surprise.

"I do not comprehend you."

"When I told you of the cause of Tyrrell's absence—that he had gone to a rendezvous with—but I will not enter into particulars—you absolutely smiled."

"And why should I not smile?" demanded his wife. "Do you imagine that it is any secret from me?"

It was the gentleman's turn to be mystified.

"What can be more natural?" she added; "they are both young."

"Of whom are you speaking?"

"Why, of Tyrrell and Lillian. Of whom else should I speak?"

"I made no allusion to Lillian," observed the merchant, gravely, "but to a rendezvous of a very different character."

The lady, hitherto cold and impassible as usual, started to her feet, her dark eyes flashing with scorn and incredulity.

"And is it to me," she exclaimed, "that you degraded yourself by uttering such a falsehood? Oh, shame, man, shame! Respect your wife if you wish the world to respect her. Richard Tyrrell is all but the declared lover of Lillian; and, what is more, is worthy of her love. Oh, what a tainted imagination some men have!"

"It is possible," faltered Mr. Chutnee, dreadfully confused, "that I misunderstood—"

"It is certain you misunderstood him!" interrupted Zamora. "His heart is pure as the first flowers of spring—pure with its early love, its dreams of innocence and sensibility, its gushing music which makes harmony in all things."

"And what know you of such love?" demanded her husband, uneasily.

"I have dreamt of it," replied Zamora, with a low, musical laugh, "dreamt of it. And whilst I find happiness in dreams it is neither kind nor prudent to awaken me. I fear," she added, "we shall never understand each other till it is too late."

There was a tone of sadness in the last words of the speaker which fell reproachfully on the ear of the merchant; who began, for the first time, to suspect that he had not done justice to the purity of his wife or the honour of Richard Tyrrell. But jealousy is always unjust. Like the lull of the tempest, its intervals only serve to augment the force of the succeeding wave.

When our hero arrived at his home, he hastened to the little pavilion at the bottom of the garden, which he had directed to be got ready for the reception of his expected guest.

The youth felt dreadfully humiliated as he stood, half-starved and ragged, in the presence of his former companion.

"Jack!" exclaimed his protector, holding out a hand to him.

The poor fellow raised his eyes to his face hesitatingly. There were the old familiar features—the smile—the look of kindness—he grasped it warmly, and burst into a passionate flood of tears.

Richard wisely permitted them to flow on, for they relieved his heart. He knew that the feelings which prompted them were better indulged in than restrained.

"Sit down," he said, after a pause, "and let me know from your own lips all that has occurred. But first tell me one thing, and set my mind at rest."

"What is that, sir?"

"Have you mentioned my name,—I mean the name of my father?"

"No; I only spoke of you as one whom I had formerly known."

This assurance relieved the mind of our hero from a heavy load. Satisfied that his secret was safe, he thought only of serving his former companion.

"Why do you call me 'sir'?" he asked.

Jack looked first at the speaker and then glanced at his own wretched, and all but ragged, appearance.

"We will soon remedy that," exclaimed our hero, joyously; "and, what is more, redeem you from the tyrant you have escaped from. The old seaman who first spoke to me about you, told me that you had not signed your indentures."

"Never."

"That is fortunate,—not but means might have been found to break them, if you had. Have you supped?"

Jack informed him that he had.

"Let me learn how you became a sailor,—in short, all that has occurred since we parted on that fatal New Year's eve, when—"

"I tempted you to sin," added the fugitive, with a blush of shame; "but I meant no harm, thought no harm, for I had never been taught the difference between right and wrong. I saw that you were in want, your mother and sister starving, and offered the only help in my power,—but I know better now."

"And who taught you better?" asked his hearer.

"An angel."

Richard smiled.

"It must have been," continued the youth, "for the words of the prayer we used to say together, the only one I ever heard, have never been forgotten. Frequently, when, mad with the ill-usage of the captain, hopeless, desponding, wretched, I have felt tempted to end my misery by dropping from the yardarm into the hissing waters, they returned to me, and I made up my mind to struggle on."

"And what were those words?" inquired Richard.

"Lead us not into temptation," replied Jack, solemnly. "I often repeated them to myself at night, when the companions of my watch were drinking, or telling tales of home that made my heart sad; for I had no home, no one to care for me; and they chased bad thoughts. Sometimes I wondered what had become of you; and, when the brute to whom my precious uncles had disposed of me treated me with cruelty till life became a burden, owned that it was only a fitting punishment for having sought to make you as dishonest as myself."

"I am glad to hear you speak thus," observed his friend, gravely; "for it conveys an assurance that you regret your past mode of life, and are anxious to redeem the future; but proceed. I have given orders against all interruption."

Jack began his narrative from the time of his quitting the speaker in the park; and when he described his mother and her assailant on the bridge, and his own share in rescuing her, the grateful son grasped his hand warmly.

"Poor mother!" he sighed.

"Have you not seen her?"

"No."

Jack regarded him with surprise.

"But I know that she is well and happy," added our hero—"happy as far as being placed above want can make her. Proceed with your own adventures; mine you shall be made acquainted with afterwards."

The young man listened attentively to the visit of Mr. Silex to the house of Mike in the Belvidere-road, and the arrangement respecting the child; but nothing could exceed his astonishment when the narrator informed him that the name of the girl was Lillian.

"Lillian?" he repeated.

"That was the name they gave her."

"Describe her."

Jack did so, and, although years had elapsed, the portrait he drew was still so faithful that not a doubt remained upon the mind of his hearer. He had heard various rumours respecting her birth; that she owed her present position to the caprice, as the world called it, but as he understood it, to the benevolence of Sir Charles and Lady Bell.

"And you know the lady who brought her to Mike?"

"Yes."

"She is called—"

"Lady Boothroyd," answered the youth. "I have not forgotten that; or that my uncle Andrew lives at the Home Farm. If ever I live," he added, with a flush of resentment, "I shall know where to find him."

He next proceeded to describe the manner in which he had been trepanned on board the Caradoc; and entered into details which we will not harrow the feelings of our readers by repeating.

"But for the kindness of Caleb, who was almost as great a sufferer as myself," he added, "and the old seaman who spoke to you in my behalf, life would have been insupportable; it was a heavy burden even with their sympathy."

"No doubt," ejaculated Richard.

"My uncles must have paid the captain well to take me."

"Guilt is seldom chary of its coin when safety is the price. But did you never, in any of the ports you put in at, attempt to escape?"

"Twice," replied the sufferer; "both in China and at the Cape; but neither consul nor magistrate would listen to me."

"Why not?"

"The captain told them I had been a thief."

"But you were also a human being!" exclaimed his former companion, indignantly, "and that ought to have been sufficient; but look up, better days have dawned. I have not forgotten your past kindness to my sister Mary or myself."

"To you, sir?"

"Call me Richard."

Jack Manders looked in his face, and faintly smiled.

"I must now tell you of my adventures," continued our hero, "which have been nearly as strange as your own. The gentleman whom we saw in the park listened to my tale of distress and temptation with a pitying ear; and, finding it a true one, took an interest in me, sent me to school, and educated me."

"Oh, thank heaven!" exclaimed his hearer, clasping his hands, "I have not your ruin to answer for. When I saw how well you were dressed, that you had servants, a home of your own, I suspected—"

"That your lesson had taken root?"

"Yes."

"Fortunately it did not, nor ever will, I trust. My benefactor gave me his family name."

This was perfectly true, Tyrrell had been the name of Mr. Bently's mother.

"And sent me out to India for a purpose which I will one day explain to you, enough at present that it is an honourable one; but you must promise me, Jack, to forget that I ever bore any other appellation than the one I am at present known by."

"And what is that?"

"Richard Tyrrell."

Jack repeated it several times to himself, and faithfully promised never to address him or speak of him by any other.

"As long as you observe that promise," said our hero, "you are safe, even if Captain Gall should discover you are beneath my roof, for I have both the power and will to protect you—perhaps, also, to assist your friend Caleb."

His hearer could only look his thanks.

"He, too, is an apprentice to this monster. you say?"

"Yes."

"And has signed his indentures?"

"Yes."

"He must be a subject for after consideration. My present plan is that you should remain here quietly till the Caradoc has sailed. Leave Caleb to my care. You will require some time to recover your health and good looks. When the ship is gone, and the accusation of your having been a pickpocket no longer hangs over you, you can appear freely in Calcutta. Are you satisfied?"

"Oh, yes! not only satisfied, but grateful."

"It is settled, then."

"I will be your servant."

"No, Jack," replied our hero, giving him his hand, "my friend. Prosperity has not destroyed my memory. I know the temptations, the arts which led your youth astray, and am resolved on giving you an opportunity of redeeming yourself."

The poor fellow could only look his thanks.

"Man judges the crime, God the temptation," added Richard, seriously. "I have felt the last, though, happily, I escaped the former."

"Happily indeed!"

"And now tell me, have you never thought of the girl you described to me—of the pretty Lillian?"

"Thought of her!" exclaimed her former protector; "aye, a thousand times. And it has added to my sufferings. Left to the mercy of Mike; and I know what that means," he added, with a shudder.

"What if she has escaped him?"

His hearer shook his head incredulously.

"And were in India?"

"Impossible."

"All things are possible," observed our hero. "Providence is wiser than we know or can imagine. I have not the slightest doubt that what I tell you is correct; but I will ascertain to-morrow."

"Oh, let me see her!" exclaimed Jack, with deep earnestness; "let me see her. It will take a weight from my heart."

Richard regarded him earnestly. The idea that the poor fellow loved her struck him, but was instantly dismissed: both were so young when they were separated by the clever contrivance of the twin brothers.

"All in good time," he said.

"You cannot tell what I owe her."

"Owe her!"

"Yes. She taught me the prayer I told you of."

"It was, indeed, a lesson to be grateful for; and one we all have need of," observed our hero. "Good night," he added; "in the morning, I will see you again."

The two young men, who had known each other as boys, and in poverty, shook hands and separated; but not to sleep, for neither of them could forget the adventures of the day. Poor Jack, how his heart bounded with gratitude at the conviction that he had found, at last, some being to care for him—that existence was not all a blank. Had his protector demanded his life at that moment, in the fulness of his feelings he would have sacrificed it freely in his service.

Lillian had given the uncared-for outcast his first idea of a God; his friend had now reconciled him to humanity by the golden links of sympathy and kindness.

Although greatly surprised at what his protégé had told him respecting the orphan, our hero felt that the fair girl was dearer to him for her misfortunes. Her birth might be obscure; but what cared he for its adventitious advantages? He would not barter one grace or virtue in the being he loved for the noblest name the herald's page e'er blazoned.

As he was to start in two days for his visit to Mrs. Chutnee's country-house, it was necessary to consider how he should dispose of Jack. To take him with him without first relating his history, and consulting Sir Charles, was out of the question; to leave him in his own house alone appeared still more objectionable. Captain Gall might discover his retreat, and force him, in the absence of his protector, to return on board the Caradoc. In this dilemma he determined to apply to Wharton.

He would have consulted his friend Marsh, but, strange to say, the lieutenant had quitted Calcutta two days after the ball at the government house, and given his ward no other explanation of his departure than a hastily written note, in which he stated his intention of returning in the course of a week or two.

"Bring him here," said the young officer, the instant Richard had explained the difficulty: "he will be safe enough till you come back. I will take charge of him."

"The thing I most wish," replied his visitor, "and yet hesitate to accept."

"Why hesitate?"

"He is only a common sailor."

"What has that to do with his remaining with me, if you desire it?"

"A runaway from his ship."

At this piece of information his friend looked a little serious.

"One of the Queen's ships?" he demanded.

"No."

"Hang the merchant service!" exclaimed Wharton, with a laugh.

"He was trepanned on board," added Richard.

"Poor fellow."

"And been most brutally used."

"Bring him at once," repeated the officer. "His captain will never think of asking for him here; and, if he does, I shall know how to answer him. Why do you hesitate?"

"Simply because your generous offer, should I accept it, entails on me the necessity of explaining."

"Not a word—a syllable," interrupted Fred. "You wrong my friendship when you suppose it necessary. We know, and, I believe, understand each other. My servant is an excellent fellow, he has lived with me from boyhood. I can rely on his discretion."

"You are a generous fellow, Wharton," exclaimed his friend; "and I feel that, in justice to myself, I ought to tell you all."

"You shall do yourself justice on your return from the hills," replied the young officer. "I have no time to listen to you now; bring your protégé, and make yourself easy as to his safety. It is enough for me to know," he added, "that you feel interested in his welfare."

An hour afterwards, Jack Manders was transferred to the quarters of the speaker.

(To be continued.)

Wrr.—There is no more interesting spectacle than to see the effects of wit upon the different characters of men—than to observe it expanding caution, relaxing dignity, unfreezing coldness, teaching age, and pain, and care to smile—extorting reluctant gleams of pleasure from melancholy, and charming even the pangs of grief. It is pleasant to observe how it penetrates through the coldness and awkwardness of society, gradually bringing men near together, and, like the combined force of wine and oil, giving every man a glad heart and a shining countenance. Genuine and innocent wit like this is surely the flavour of the mind! Man could direct his ways by plain reason, and support his life by tasteless food; but God has given us wit, and flavour, and brightness, and laughter, and perfumes, to enliven the days of man's pilgrimage, and to "charm his pained steps over the burning marl."

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

PRIDE.

PRIDE and Vanity are twins. Vanity is sometimes regarded as a feminine foible, and pride one which is more essentially masculine. The fact is, however, pride and vanity are common to both sexes. We propose to offer a few observations on pride.

Pride pervades all hearts to a certain extent—or, rather, to an uncertain extent: the same in its nature, it is only diversified in its degree. Some are proud of their learning; some are proud of their virtue, and some of their piety. There is a pride of generosity, a pride of genius, of originality, of money, of rank, of birth—nay, some people are proud that they are not proud: it is a paradoxical Proteus, always changing, but perpetually the same.

Pride glories in what it possesses; it acts as a stimulant in many instances, for it is ambitious to be something—while vanity is content only to appear to be something.

Pride is sometimes an inspiration to useful deeds. One may be habitually actuated by high self-respect, and not be criminally self-complaisant; since a just consciousness of self is nobleness of spirit—that firm panoply of him who is neither frigid nor fractious, but social and sincere. A man without self-respect is akin to a brute. While pride makes some persons ridiculous, it probably prevents many from becoming so. It often imparts unwonted strength to those who would otherwise perpetually recline under the ignominious languor of sated wishes and effeminate desires. Sublime results are sometimes produced by the worst passions of mankind.

But, while thus much may be said for pride, how poor and insignificant it becomes when judged by the standard of purity and truth. It may open the niggard's purse, plant cities, found empires, store libraries, build churches—but for what a mean purpose—what a poor, wretched, detestable leverage wherewith to lift the world.

Pride, if it has done some good, has done more harm. We may take it as a general rule, that they who are the least acquainted with others and with their own real character, will possess the most exalted motives with respect to themselves.

"Ask for what end the heavenly bodies shine:
Earth, for whose use? Pride answers, 'Tis for mine."

But this proud appropriation is as absurd as it is arrogant.

Pride also prompts men to misinterpret the very disgraces they encounter, and then to overate them. This is the chief source of party spirit. "Only by pride cometh contention." Polemical antagonists are generally bigots. They are no less enslaved to their own notions than they are contemptuous towards those of others.

Nothing is so contemptible as contempt. It is impossible to remain long under its power without being dwarfed by its influence.

"He who feels contempt
For any living thing hath faculties
Which he has never used; and thought with him
Is in his infancy."

The stern and heroic qualities of man demand for their support that profound lowliness which, to some people, appears opposed to the grandest development.

The self-complacent eye often turns to the multitude in search of commendation, and is never long and steadfastly fixed on elevated pursuits. Arrogance thus carries in itself a most enervating spell, which all who would hope to live a virtuous and beneficent life must studiously avoid.

When pride obtains the mastery, the mind is fairly on the road to ruin. It has the same ruinous effect, whatever particular direction it may take. It may flaunt in all the gewgaws of ostentation; may assert itself in empire and conquest; and, forgetting that hero dust is as vile as other clay, may rest in imaginary security till defeat or death overtake it. Or it may be so well satisfied of its own excellence as to imagine that no virtue is wanting, and that none of its virtues would bear a higher polish. Or it may lead an individual to suppose that he has attained all the learning of the schools; that he has accomplished the circle of the sciences; that, having enjoyed the shade of academic bowers, he has nothing left to learn. Or it may take a lower form, and become complacent with itself because it comes of a good old family—the sapless branch of a decaying tree. Or it may be content with its social position, and, because admitted to an insignificant clique, which it denominates "society," look with contempt on those who breathe another atmosphere. Or it may even grow proud of its personal appearance, and, on the score of a good figure or handsome face, feel itself something above the common herd. And this feeling, in one form or other, is met with in all classes. Titled and untitled, educated and illiterate, rude and more refined, are all alike in this, and all equally to be regarded with pity by the good and wise.

There is no fit place for pride in the human heart. The only thing of which a man might be thought to be honestly proud is the very thing that exorcises that evil spirit—namely, good sense and virtuous principle. These are brighter jewels than ever shone in a monarch's diadem, and these are obtainable by all.

"What though on homely fare we dine;
Wear hoddens gray, and a' that?

Gie fools their silks, and knaves their wine;
A man's a man for a' that."

And that man is ever so much more of a man who cultivates his heart and his intellect to the best of his ability; who faithfully discharges every duty; who maintains an honest independence—neither fawning to the wealthy nor arrogant to the poor; but keeping a clear conscience, and the happy conviction that he is sustaining an upright and honourable position. Better, far better, is he than are those scornors who shall themselves be scorned; for "Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall."

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF ACQUIRING THE FRENCH LANGUAGE.

CHAPTER II.

ROBERT sat down to the second lesson with a beaming countenance. He said he saw his way before him, and that he felt sure he should not starve in France, even if he knew nothing more than his dear friend George had taught him in the first lesson.

"I am delighted to find you are pleased with the progress you have already made," observed George. "Courage, and a proper degree of confidence in one's powers, and satisfaction with one's own progress, are feelings necessary to success; and many fail entirely through discouraging these feelings. To be pleased at every little new acquirement, and always to bear in mind the Scotch proverb that 'Many a little makes a mickle,' is particularly advantageous in learning a foreign language. In this undertaking you should avoid shyness almost as carefully as if it were a sin. And now I am going to examine you."

Robert proved to his friend that he recollected all the words and rules in the first chapter, and George proceeded to state his plan for the second lesson.

"Of course," said he, "you recollect the names of the five vowels?"

"I do," said Robert, repeating them correctly, even without referring to the syllabic alphabet.

"The vowel-sounds," proceeded George, "particularly require the attention of Englishmen. It is for want of acquiring these that people are in a manner obliged to give you that silly but familiar answer, 'I understand French, but I can't speak it.' I repeat it—the vowel-sounds in French require your chief attention, for the sounds of the consonants (always remembering the omission of the final consonant) are much the same as our own. The vowels in French are only five in number, and just now you repeated them singly with perfect correctness. It is when they are placed in couples and triples, forming what the learned call diphthongs or triphthongs, that they want explanation; but when that has been given and listened to with attention, the difficulty vanishes. And take courage from this remark, that the sounds of these diphthongs and triphthongs, as introduced in two or three words, is, when acquired, acquired for the same vowel or vocal syllable recurring in a hundred, or, perhaps, a thousand words.

"We will now consider the vowels a and e. First let us see all the changes a can undergo.

"Standing alone, the French sound our a, ah. If it has an i after it, thus, ai, then it is sounded a. If it has an u after it, thus, au, it is sounded o.

"I will give you examples of these sounds in little useful sentences that you must learn by heart.

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.	SOUND.
Give me the purse.	Donnez-moi la bourse.	Donnay mwah lah boorse.
I am hungry.	J'ai faim.	Sha fang.
Tell the boy.	Dites au garçon.	Deetes o garson.

"Now, Robert," said George, "when in reading you meet with any of these vowel sounds, viz., a, ai, or au, you ought immediately to know how to pronounce them.

"Next come the changes that take place in the vowel e. The French in their alphabet give it the sound of our e; yet, in reality, it has only that sound when it receives little accents over it, or is placed with certain other letters. Excepting under the circumstances mentioned, e has in French the sound of our e in the word er; but mind this, you are not to add on to the e any of the sound of the r. E with i and n acquires the sound of ang. E with u or ux has much the same sound as u standing alone—and this is not a very easy sound to describe. You can soon catch it from me; but when you are practising it alone, you had better make it a kind of half-way house between our oo and our u. It is neither so full as the one, nor so sharp as the other. One of our grammarians has described the French u, eu, and eux (for they are one) to be like the sound made by a person just preparing to whistle. Now recollect all these hints, and pronounce e with its variations in the following examples. But I must first tell you that, with a short stroke over it from right to left, or left to right, e is always sounded like our a; as also when made into a syllable with the following consonants—t, s, z, or st.

"On account of its importance, I must repeat this rule: that the e, unaccented and without the addition just mentioned, is not sounded a, but like our e in er. The r being carefully omitted.

EXAMPLES.
ENGLISH.	FRENCH.	SOUND.
I am here.	Je suis ici.	Je swees eesee.
There is the mark.	Voilà l'impreinte.	Vvalah laum-prangte.
And thou art all kindness, dear little Mary. He is there.	Et tu es toute bonté, chère Marie. Il est là.	A tu a toote bon-tay, sharepeteete Mabree. Ill a lah.

"Thus you see, Robert, of the five vowels, we have this morning fairly considered two, with their diphthongs and their sounds, according to the company they are placed in. If you recollect all that you have written down in this, the second lesson, you will have made important steps towards good pronunciation; and though acquiring sounds is nothing like so amusing as learning sentences perceiving clear illustrations of short rules, or translating lively, useful French sayings, still, as pronunciation must be acquired, the sooner it is done the better. And now for a few sentences to show our neighbours over the water how polite we can be.

"I shall make you spell the sounds of the French, but by recollecting my rules, you will soon be able to pronounce without this assistance.

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.	SOUND.
I am delighted to see you.	Je suis charmé de vous voir.	She swee sharmay de voo vwar.
I hope you are well.	J'espère que vous portez bien.	Shesspare ke voo voo portay bee-ang.
A thousand thanks.	Mille remerciements.	Meel remarece-maung.
I look forward to the pleasure of seeing you again.	Au revoir.	O revwar.

LESSONS IN NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.

In compliance with the repeated request of many youthful readers, the editor has determined on giving in our "Hopes and Helps" a series of instructive and entertaining lessons on the Elements of Natural Science.

The plan adopted will be similar to that of a highly successful work issued some time since by Mr. Cassell, and forming the first volume of his Educational Course.

Especially pains will be taken that everything shall be placed before the reader in the clearest light. Young students are more often puzzled by words than by things; they can understand the idea, but are confounded by the language in which the idea is conveyed. To state scientific facts without employing the technicalities of science, will be one of the principal features of the following lessons. Where technical words are the only proper words that can be used, they will be fully explained.

In order that the groundwork of each science may be distinctly understood, the method pursued will be that of ascending from particulars to generals—from effects to causes. The lessons will also be copiously illustrated with diagrams.

The lessons will be confined to facts of universal interest, and to the elucidation of leading principles. While they are especially intended for the young, it is hoped that they may be found to contain something of practical value to more advanced students.

LESSON I.—MECHANICAL PROPERTIES OF BODIES.

1. Is a piece of wood, or a pebble, or an iron bar, all solid matter?—It is part matter and part empty space.

2. Is there as much matter in a piece of wood as in an iron bar of the same size?—There is less matter and more empty space in the wood than in the iron.

3. How is this fact generally expressed?—It is said that the iron is denser, or more compact, than wood.

4. What are the empty spaces in the interior of bodies called?—Pores. The pores are visible in many substances; for example, in sponge, cork, and some kinds of wood.

5. Are the pores in the interior of bodies entirely devoid of matter of any kind?—The pores contain air in even the densest substances.

6. Can a body of matter be divided into smaller and smaller parts without any apparent limit?—It can.

7. What are the two ways in which matter can be divided and subdivided?—Mechanically, that is, by pounding, grinding, &c.; and by solution.

8. Give an example of the minute subdivision of matter by solution.—A grain of blue vitriol, smaller than the smallest pea, will give a blue tinge to half a gallon of water containing 20 drops of spirits of hartshorn. In this half gallon there are 250,000 drops.

9. Are there any last particles that cannot be divided any further?—Chemistry informs us that there are.

10. What are these indivisible particles called?—Atoms. Every body of matter is made up of indivisible atoms.

11. Are these atoms so close together as to be in actual contact?—They are not; they always stand apart from each other.

12. What holds them together?—Each particle pulls the others toward it, or attracts them, just as a magnet attracts a piece of iron that is brought near it.

13. What is this attraction between atoms called?—The attraction of cohesion, or simply cohesion.

14. Why do not the atoms rush together, and all bodies become perfectly solid?—Because the heat collected between or around the atoms exerts a repulsion, and keeps them a certain distance apart.

15. How do we know that heat has this effect?—If the heat be increased the particles are forced farther apart, and if it be diminished they draw nearer together.

16. What is said of the forces of attraction and repulsion exerted between the atoms of bodies?—That their energy is enormously great.

17. Illustrate the astonishing energy of the attraction between atoms.—The strongest iron wire of one quarter of an inch in thickness, could not be broken by the united strength of five horses.

18. Illustrate the repulsion exerted between atoms from the effect of heat.—The explosive force of gunpowder projects heavy cannon balls to great distances, and rends the hardest rocks into fragments.

19. Have substances different mechanical properties?—They have; for example, iron is hard, and chalk is soft; glass is brittle, and gold is malleable.

20. Are there any other metals that are malleable, or that can be hammered out into leaves, or rolled into sheets, besides gold?—Silver, lead, aluminum, tin, copper, zinc, platinum, and iron are all malleable.

21. What is meant when it is said that a certain metal, or other substance, is ductile?—That it can be drawn out into a wire or thread.

22. What metals are ductile?—Platinum, silver, copper, and gold. Zinc, tin, and lead are also ductile in an inferior degree.

23. What may be said of melted glass?—That it is very ductile. It can be drawn out or spun into fine threads.

THE TWO MAY-DAYS.

CHAPTER I.

Order is Heaven's first law.

SLAM! bang! went the doors of an elegant house in one of the finest streets in the city of Boston, as two handsome boys passed from the dining-room to the library, and from thence to the parlour, in search of something. In his rude haste, one of them knocked over a little sister, who was coming through the entry, and when she cried with fright, only said, very harshly, "Well, then, keep out of the way."

At length they found what they were after, which was a riding-whip, in the hand of a little fellow, who, astride a chair, was enjoying a fine morning ride, with his little eyes and cheeks sparkling with delight. Quickly was this joy dispelled, however, by the boy, who, twitching it out of his hand, gave him a cut with it, saying: "There, take that, and learn not to meddle with my things again."

Running to his mother, little Johnny told her, through his sobs and tears, that nurse gave him the whip, and said he might play with it till George wanted it. She pacified him, and they went to the window to see the boys mount their horses, which stood at the door, and ride off.

It was a pleasant morning. An early breakfast had been hastily dispatched by the lads, in order that they might join a party of boys who were going on a May-day excursion.

As they passed out of sight, Mrs. Miner, who had been looking with a mother's delight at the fine appearance they made, turned from the window and took her place again at the breakfast-table with her husband and younger children. Then, on examination, one might see that her countenance was not all expressive of delight; it looked somewhat anxious, and Mr. Miner looked quite serious; at length he said—

"Mary, I think you did wrong to let George go to ride after what he did yesterday. You said he not only disobeyed you, but told a direct falsehood; if so, you should not have indulged him to-day. But I must go to business; good morning."

"Well," said Mrs. Miner, when he had left, "that is very kind, truly, of a May-day, not to ask me if I wanted to ride, or anything! And he wants me to teach the boys more, forsooth! But there is no need of it, and I won't make a slave of myself so."

Yet Mrs. Miner did not feel happy or comfortable. She knew her husband did not feel satisfied with her, and she did not with herself, and altogether she passed a gloomy day.

CHAPTER II.

Upon thy heart is laid a spell
Holy and precious—oh, guard it well.

JAMES and George returned from their ride in as good order as could be expected, the horses alone having appeared to suffer from their recklessness. They gave their mother an account of their day's adventures, whom they had seen, &c., but, from sundry whisperings and winkings between the two, it appeared very probable that some part of the day's performance had been kept back; indeed, on James refusing to lend George his knife, George was heard to say, "If you don't, I'll tell all about it," and the knife was handed over quickly. If there was any secret, it remained in their own bosoms. Yet from that May-day there seemed to be a change come over the spirit of these two lads.

Having never been properly controlled, they were always restless and rude, but now they took no notice of anything pertaining to the family, but appeared as if something of an absorbing nature was continually in their thoughts.

Mr. Miner often inquired of his wife if she knew what the boys were about when they were out of school. "About their play," she supposed; "they were not at home much."

Soon after May-day Mrs. Miner had remarked a couple of ill-looking fellows several times inquiring after James and George, and on asking who they were, and what they wanted with the boys, they told her they kept a refreshment saloon, to which the lads went on May-day, and had a small sum owing them which they wanted to get.

Although their father had forbidden them to run in debt for anything, yet Mrs. Miner thought, rather than have a "fuss," she would say nothing about it. Little thought she that by so doing she would have a more serious "fuss," one that would make her heart ache through her life long.

It was a warm day in August. Mrs. Miner sat in her room feeling not well, and just then thinking of the change she had observed in the boys, when she heard the front door open and voices and feet as of many persons below. Alarmed, she stepped into the hall, and, looking down, beheld a number of men, among whom were two police officers and James and George. The officers inquired for Mr. Miner, in his absence for her, and told her, as gently as they could, that they had just surprised a company of counterfeiters whom they had been watching some time, and as her sons had been seen several times in company with them at a certain refreshment saloon, they felt obliged to search their rooms.

Horror-stricken, yet knowing it must be done, and hoping, yet not without fear, that her boys had not fallen so low in dishonesty, she permitted them to ascend to the rooms—they had bedrooms adjoining. In George's was found nothing; but, shocking to relate! in James's were found not only counterfeit money in abundance, and a large amount of good money which had been obtained in exchange for bad, but also materials of various kinds for counterfeiting! These were so secretly placed under the carpet, and even under the floor itself, that no one would have thought it could have been discovered; but police officers are accustomed to find things; and James was taken off before his mother's eyes, to be locked up as a criminal!

Although nothing was found in George's room, yet she knew well they had been together in it, and that George, being the older, was most to blame.

That fatal May-day! The keeper of the refreshment saloon, on the watch for weak subjects to draw into his net of iniquity, had fathomed the character and lax principles of the boys, and by cajoling and feasting and, alas! by drinking with them too, had won them over to be his tools. Once in his fangs, although they wished to get back, threats of exposing them if they did kept them until the accidental exposure took place.

The trial came on. James was of course found guilty, but, in consideration of his youth, and it being his first offence, his sentence was commuted on condition of his being sent a long voyage to sea. But the judge made some remarks to parents which it would be well for the youth of our land were they hung before every parent's eye in letters of gold.

James appeared very penitent, reflected upon no one but himself, yet he said he thought boys could not be brought up too strictly; that George and himself had been out nights and absent days engaged in almost everything bad, which, had they been more strictly managed, they could not have done; that he had often felt ashamed and wished to stop, but George had prevented him.

Mrs. Miner and her husband were now plunged into the depths of woe. James went immediately to sea; and though George had not been tried, yet they knew he was as false in his principles and more confirmed in vice than James, and a much worse character, inasmuch as he evinced no penitence, but a sullen, dogged determination to do as he pleased still, and not be controlled.

At length Mr. Miner concluded the only thing he could do with him was to send him with a very pious, excellent captain of a ship—an uncle of his—on a voyage. Thus the two beautiful boys, on whom Mrs. Miner had looked with a mother's delight on May-day, thinking they would "get through the world by their shrewdness as well as by good principles," were banished from her in disgrace, and one of them for ever; for, tenderly brought up as he had been at home, and not submitting to his fate very cheerfully, George soon sank under a change of condition, and was cut down in the spring-time of his life.

Often at night, when the winds howled, would Mrs. Miner shudder, and, as she thought of the two sweet babes she had once nestled to her bosom, who were now far away, buffeting the waves and the winds, scalding tears would bedew her pillow—tears not unmingled with self-accusings that she had not looked more to their real good than to appearance.

CHAPTER III.

We were not born for lives of ease,
Ourselves alone to aid and please;
To each a daily task is given—
A labour which shall fit for heaven.
When duty calls let love grow warm—
Amid the sunshine and the storm;
With faith life's trials boldly breast,
And come a conqueror to thy rest.
Bear on, bear bravely on!

Time takes us rapidly on; the boy soon becomes a man, the child a father.

James Miner had returned home. With a fortitude and determination worthy of commendation, he had borne his punishment, reformed, been a successful merchant some years, settled, not in his own country, for there a stigma attached to his name, and always would, but having married a lovely girl, he had been established many years on the banks of the Hudson, where we now find him living with a sweet family of children of his own.

To give a fair insight into the character of his wife, and her management with the family, we have chosen another May-day, and the more readily, that the disagreeable and sad reminiscences of the other may be obliterated by the cheerful ones of this in a well-regulated family.

The 30th of April closed pleasantly, and gave the many little heads looking forward to the next day bright waking visions of going a-Maying, and rainbow dreams of roses and posies gathered on May-day.

"Mother," said Albert, the second son, "I want to be awaked at four o'clock; the girls from the town are coming up this way, and I want to be out early to meet them. Will you please have me awaked?"

"Well, that depends very much on who the girls are," said his mother. On being informed, and approving the companionship, she readily acquiesced.

"May I have the pony, mother, and will you lend me your riding-whip?" said James, the eldest son. "Charley Horton is coming to ride with me on horseback. Will you please get it out to-night, as I am afraid you will not be up as early as I wish to start?" After inquiring where and how long they were going, she agreed.

"I doin Maying, too; pease wate me up four o'tot, mamma," lisped Winny, three years old, a request in which Julia and two other little fellows joined.

Mrs. James Miner gave orders to the nurse to waken the two eldest boys, as they desired; but was not surprised, on rising at six o'clock, to have it to do again—a chilly morning not having tempted one from their beds.

"Now let me see which will be down the quickest and look the neatest. Papa is in the library already for prayers, and the bell will ring in two minutes," said the mother.

After this exercise, as might be expected, a pleasant breakfast followed. Then Albert went to meet the little girls, while James made himself ready for his ride, having received his mother's whip, with a request not to lose it, as, being a birthday present from himself, she valued it highly.

A sudden shower brought them both back very soon, however, with James's friend, and they were obliged, by the rain, to remain housed all the forenoon. Mrs. Miner, though in delicate health, with some ingenuity invented satisfactory amusements for them all, and an early dinner, to which she invited the young friend, finished, very pleasantly, one half of the day.

Notwithstanding the disappointment of all in not "going a-Maying," and of Mrs. Miner, too, whose husband had remained from his business to take her a drive, they were all cheerful and happy. Well-regulated tempers prevented grumbling at what they knew was not to be altered, and, when "a story from mother" was called for by all, she felt that she was repaid as she sat with her little flock around her in their innocent admiration and love, for all the hours she had spent in their service, and, giving them the "good-night kiss," the younger ones retired, the two eldest, alone, remaining up.

CHAPTER IV.

By the gathering round the winter hearth,
When twilight called unto household mirth,
By the pleasant tale, or the legend old,
In that ring of happy faces told,
By the quiet hour when hearts unite
In the parting prayer and the kind 'good-night,'
By the smiling eye and the loving tone,
Over thy life has the spell been thrown.
Bless thou that gift; it hath gentle might—
A guardian power, and a guiding light.

"WELL," said Mr. Miner to them, "how have you spent the day, boys? Rather dull, I suppose."

"Oh, no, very pleasant! Mamma told us some of her stories, and we had some nuts to pick, and somehow the day has flown very quickly and happily."

"Why don't you ask me to tell you a story, sometimes?" inquired he.

At this both boys laughed, and said, "We did not think you knew any."

"Well, I do; I know one at least," looking significantly at his wife, and colouring a little. "I know one which your mother and myself have often talked of telling you: it is a story of folly, guilt, and its punishment; and when I tell you it is of myself I must speak, you will see it is not very pleasant. Your mother has wished to save me the pain, but I knew she could not enter into my feelings of guilt and repentance, and I wish it to be a lesson to you."

Although Mr. Miner was much respected in the town, and had many friends, yet he was aware there were those in town who knew his unfortunate early history, and he feared his sons would hear it garbled and incorrect, so he chose to tell them himself; though, as he told his wife, it was a sore punishment for his errors to tell them to his own sons. With deep feeling on all sides, he told them of his childhood and youth; of his disobedience to, and his disrespect of, his mother—of his first step in error—then the first untruth—then his first debt at the refreshment saloon, which ended in involving him in deep crime, though he had no intention it should. Then he portrayed the misery he endured in the separation from all he loved, as an outcast from home and its comforts; the hardships of the voyage; when sick, no mother to nurse him, no word of kindness to soothe him; and, when he saw the hearts of his sons were touched, and sobs and tears told their sympathy, he said, "Remember, my sons, to avoid the beginning of sin—the first step is a dangerous course. You sometimes think your mother and I are very strict with you. Would that my parents had been more strict with me! I should never have had the humiliating disclosure to make you have just heard. Parents cannot be too strict on the score of principles; and those parents do not realise the duties involved in the parental relation who do not mark every deviation from rectitude with some token of displeasure."

After praying with them, Mr. Miner dismissed them to bed, feeling glad his task was performed, for he saw it would have a salutary influence in the years of temptation now before them.

As they left the room, Mrs. Miner's heart thrilled with joy to think they were such good boys, so docile, so obedient, so truthful; and, as one of them had of late shown decided religious inclinations, she felt very hopeful and happy. As soon as the door closed, Mr. Miner exclaimed, "What can I say to convey to you, my dear wife, my feelings in regard to the manner in which you have brought up these boys? My heart is full when I see them; and think it is all your management, by the goodness of God, that has made them what they are. I am so little at home, so fitful, know so little how to talk to children, they would never have been what they are without you. But God will repay you in raising up these children to surround you in your old age, and 'call you blessed.'" Precious indeed were these words to Mrs. Miner; for no true woman's heart but loves the praise of her husband; and she thought this was the happiest day of her life, and had been a pleasant, profitable MAY-DAY to them all.

"Life's duties, well performed,
Will render sweet results."

THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE, M.P.

THE Right Hon. William Ewart Gladstone, son of the late Sir John Gladstone (an eminent Liverpool merchant), and third brother to the present baronet, was born in Liverpool, in December, 1809. His educational studies were commenced at Eton, and completed at Christchurch, Oxford.

On leaving college he devoted a short time to travel on the Continent, and soon after his return was elected to parliament in the conservative interest for the borough of Newark. This was in the year 1832, when the struggle of parties was drawing to a conclusion, so that a new member had but little chance of gaining distinction. Mr. Gladstone's mercantile origin, the success of his university career, and his habits of business, attracted the attention of the late Sir Robert Peel, who appointed him one of the Lords of the Treasury in the cabinet of 1834-5. A few months afterwards, and Mr. Gladstone was transferred to the Colonial Office as Under-Secretary. He did not, however, remain long in that position, as Sir Robert Peel and the whole of his party sustained a severe defeat, and were compelled to resign. The ministry of Lord Melbourne succeeded, and during its continuance Mr. Gladstone occupied a seat on the opposition benches. The general election of 1841 restored the conservatives to power; they were again under the leadership of Sir Robert Peel. Mr. Gladstone was sworn a member of the privy council, appointed Vice-President of the Board of Trade, and Master of the Mint. In consequence of the chief of the former department being in the House of Peers, it became Mr. Gladstone's duty to explain and defend, in the House of Commons, the commercial policy of the government—a duty for which he was especially fitted. Sir Robert Peel understood this, and intrusted to him the revision of the tariff of 1842. Although Sir Robert's was the guiding spirit in that important work, it is only justice to Mr. Gladstone to record that the modelling of the new tariff, and the execution of its details, were almost entirely his work. It is scarcely necessary to add that the measure received the approbation of the country, and passed both houses with scarcely any alteration.

Mr. Gladstone now became a marked man. In his actions, as well as in his speeches, he showed himself a sincere admirer of his great chief. The leading principles of that statesman were evidently engrafted on his mind; and, to a certain extent, have remained so ever since. In May, 1843, Mr. Gladstone quitted the post of Vice-President of the Board of Trade, and succeeded Lord Ripon at the head of the same department. He held the appointment until 1845, when he resigned on the question of the Maynooth Grant, being one on which he entertained a different opinion from that of his colleagues. Shortly before the memorable declaration of Sir Robert Peel on the Corn Laws, Mr. Gladstone had resumed office as Secretary for the Colonies. The new secretary expressed his readiness to support the changed policy of his chief, but was unable to do so in consequence of losing his seat in the House of Commons.

The general election of 1847 amply compensated

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

THE RIGHT HON. WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE, M.P., D.C.L. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

Mr. Gladstone for the loss of his Newark seat. He was then chosen as the representative in parliament of the University of Oxford. In the meantime the government of Sir Robert Peel had succumbed to the attacks of Mr. Disraeli and his party. Lord John Russell took the helm, and Mr. Gladstone once more went over to the opposition side. During this state of affairs, he had frequent opportunities of exhibiting his debating powers. The questions of university reform and the last remaining Jewish disabilities were more than once agitated. On these and other points Mr. Gladstone was charged with inconsistency, which ultimately cost him the friendship of the conservative party. He frequently opposed them; and finally, when the Earl of Derby formed his short-lived ministry, in February, 1852, he refused the offer of a leading position in the cabinet. On the production of Mr. Disraeli's financial statement towards the end of the same year, Mr. Gladstone took a prominent part in opposing it. He delivered an exceedingly able speech against the budget; he took the various propositions into hand, one by one, and condemned them with a force and eloquence which had great influence in a house numbering nearly six hundred members. Moreover, Mr. Gladstone animadverted, with strong emphasis, on the licence of language which Mr. Disraeli had used, and the phrases he had applied to the characters of public men. This spirited and dignified rebuke created a marked sensation in the house. Finally the budget was rejected by a majority of nineteen, a result mainly due to the opposition speech alluded to. A resignation of the cabinet followed, and on the accession of Lord Aberdeen to power, Mr. Gladstone was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer. This was a position to try the skill of the right hon. gentleman, more especially on the question of finance. His budget was looked for with interest; and, when it arrived, it was acknowledged to be bold, statesman-like, and original. In some features, the new financial scheme resembled that introduced by the Derby party. For instance, the tea duties were dealt with in the way suggested by them. In like manner, the world is indebted to each party respectively for suggesting and applying the income-tax to earnings as low as two pounds per week. Instead, however, of reducing the tax upon beer, Mr. Gladstone grappled with the evils of the soap-duty. This he removed, as well as the tax upon advertisements, and the compulsory stamp upon newspapers. These, and some other propositions, were so favourably received, that Mr. Gladstone was enabled to carry his income-tax bill, although the commons were somewhat startled by the hon. member's boldness in demanding it for so long a period as seven years. Among the permanent results of the chancellor's budget, we may mention a comparatively free and unshackled press, cheap daily and weekly papers all over the kingdom, and an arrangement of receipt-stamp duties at once simple, satisfactory, and productive to the revenue.

The breaking up of the Aberdeen ministry, and the reconstruction of the cabinet under the leadership of Lord Palmerston, is fresh in the public memory. Mr. Gladstone was connected with it for a short time only.

Out of parliament, Mr. Gladstone has always been esteemed a valuable member of society. As an author, he has gained considerable distinction, although his works have been confined to theology and fiscal questions. Lord Macaulay, in reviewing some of his pamphlets in the Edinburgh, spoke of the author as "a young man whose abilities and demeanour had obtained for him the respect and goodwill of all parties."

In 1851, Mr. Gladstone was at Naples, for a short stay, and was astonished to find that from 20,000 to 30,000 Neapolitan subjects of eminent station, and undoubted loyalty, were imprisoned and suffering the greatest cruelty, on account of political disaffection. Among them were cabinet ministers, ambassadors, and the best known representatives of the people. Mr. Gladstone exerted himself with great energy to ameliorate their condition; but failing to make any impression upon King Ferdinand of Naples, returned to England, and wrote to Lord Aberdeen a letter of indignant expostulation, urging the English government to use its influence in the matter. The publication of this letter excited considerable interest, both in this country and on the Continent. It was translated into every European language. Lord Palmerston officially sent it to the court of every European state, and at length some relaxation was conceded in favour of the unhappy prisoners.

THE COURAGE OF ATILA SECURES HIS RETREAT.

By this noble effort in the cause of humanity, Mr. Gladstone gained more fame and respect than any amount of parliamentary success could confer.

Mr. Gladstone is a remarkably good speaker. His command of language is perfect, and his expression ready and fluent. He is one of the few debaters who are listened to with close attention from the moment he rises to the close of his speech. Whenever he speaks upon a question he is sure to clothe it in a new language, no matter how threadbare it may have been worn. By the dignity of his style and the graceful flow of his periods, he invests a subject with interest when the fluent talk of "unadorned eloquence" has exhausted the patience of the house. He is a D.C.L. of Oxford.

PICTURES FROM HISTORY.

ATILA, THE SCOURGE OF GOD.

IN the early part of the fifth century, when the northern or Gothic nations were hotly contending with the tottering empire of Rome for the dominion of Europe; when new communities were settling in Spain and Germany, and the Franks were beginning in Gaul to assert, first their own freedom, and then their sway over their weak neighbours; when Christianity was beginning to assert its influence over the wild barbarians in the Helvetian morasses and in the German woods, and the dawn of a better day seemed to glimmer over the world through the dark shades of barbarism, superstition, and cruelty, there crept a storm over Europe, that had well-nigh crushed and blighted in its fury the tender blossom of new civilisation. From the steppes of central Asia, the desolate region lying between the frozen tracts of Siberia and the lofty Himalaya range, there arose a race of men, who, pouring over Europe like a swarm of locusts, devoured every green thing, and left behind them ruin, misery, and desolation. Innumerable as the sands on the sea-shore, pitiless as the blast that swept their native plains, they were in themselves sufficiently calculated to inspire fear in the minds of the half-civilised tribes against whom they turned their arms; but the terror caused by the first arrival reached its culminating point, when they were marshalled at last, not by a rude, unthinking savage, but by a leader who united to consummate cunning and dauntless valour, the most unbounded and un pitying ferocity; a king who, by vast successes in the field, and the pitiless rancour with which he hunted down his foes, acquired a name pronounced by his enemies with fear and trembling, and came to be known throughout the length and breadth of Europe as the "Scourge of God," the red with which an outraged Providence was supposed to smite the nations of the earth.

The Huns, for so these formidable strangers were called, were wandering tribes of the Tartar plains. Possessing no fixed abode, they wandered from place to place, as dwellers in tents and keepers of cattle. Their aspect was hideous to behold. They had flat noses, huge heads, broad shoulders, and huge muscular arms. They were short of stature, and their thin legs, weak and crooked, seemed unable to support the huge square bodies and enormous heads which appeared rather to belong to evil demons than to mortal men. Thus they seldom appeared on foot, all their warlike evolutions, all their manœuvres of advance and retreat, of attack and defence being executed on horseback. When once mounted, horse and man seemed to form but one creature, and almost to realise the ancient superstition concerning the centaurs. Their skill in archery struck a chill to the hearts even of the brave Goths; and with "their tough lances thrusting sure," and their harsh voices yelling like the howls of savage beasts above the din of battle, they swarmed like wolves through the affrighted fields of southern and central Europe. One horrible custom they had, that completed the disgust and abhorrence with which these ferocious strangers were regarded—they ate their meat raw. Each warrior placed upon his horse's back, beneath the saddle, a great piece of beef or horseflesh; and when the action of riding had rendered the fragment somewhat tender, the savage would devour it with the voracity of a famished tiger, washing down his savage repast with huge draughts of sour milk. Such were the Huns. Ferocious beyond the imaginings of the dark times in which they lived, barbarous beyond the conception of the inhabitants of benighted Europe, they proved fit agents to execute the decrees of the wild, cruel despot, who deluged the West with blood, while he called himself an instrument—a scourge in the hand of the Almighty.

Attila was one of those mighty spirits which arise from time to time, endowed to all appearance with the power and will to crush a world. He was worshipped as a god by his followers, whom he led from victory to victory, while he ruled them with a rod of iron. "Where his horses' hoofs had trod," said superstition, "the grass could grow no more." Smiling fields and populous cities stood before him; but a howling wilderness marked the track his savage hordes had taken. From the borders of the Black Sea to the banks of the Rhine he led the Huns, laying waste the country as he went. The affrighted populace fled everywhere before him; and there were not a few who asserted, in the extremity of their fear, that the end of the world had come, and that the final judgments foretold in the Scriptures were about to fall on the earth, by the hand of the "Scourge of God."

The Eastern Empire was the first to suffer from the invader's fury. Greece was laid waste from end to end, and Constantinople only escaped destruction by the payment of a tremendous ransom. Onward through central Europe, towards Gaul, swept the mighty torrent; and among the country people there still survive tales of the horrors that accompanied the march of those ruthless men; still are to be found in various parts of Germany great mounds and fortifications of earth, erected in the vain hope of checking the foe in his onward course, and distinguished by the names of Hun's Mountains and Hun's Ditches. Isolated attempts were, however, far too feeble against such an invasion, and right onward, past the Rhine, came the hordes of Attila. Nothing stopped their progress, and the fate of Europe trembled in the balance.

Then at last there seems to have flashed upon the minds of the scathed nations of the West the great idea that in union alone could a sure defence be found. Franks and Visigoths, Gauls and Romans forgot for a moment their mutual animosities, and resolved to stand side by side to repel the common enemy. Near Chalons, on the broad plains of the river Marne, the nations of the West stood arrayed to make one desperate stand against their terrible antagonist. There stood Theodoric, the brave monarch of the Visigoths, with Merovig, the great warrior, the founder of the first race of Frankish kings, and the Romish Gauls, under their last brave consul, Etius. On the other side came Attila, with his innumerable legions of horsemen, and a crowd of barbarians whom he had pressed into his service as auxiliaries. The monarch of the Huns fully understood the importance of the crisis; and in his harangue to his troops before the battle promised great rewards to the brave who should insure him victory, and menaced with death the cowards who should flee.

The battle was obstinate and bloody. So long as the arrow and the javelin were the weapons of attack, the Huns had the advantage; but when darts and spears had been hurled, and the combatants came to closer quarters, Roman discipline and stubborn Gothic valour began to tell. Foaming with rage, Attila saw his promised victory escaping from him; and when evening came, and two hundred thousand of his followers lay dead upon the field, he sullenly gave the signal for retreat; and the deepening night put an end to the carnage.

Then followed a night of suspense, in which neither side knew what the enemy were doing. When morning dawned, it shone upon a scene calculated in those rude times to excite the admiration even of an exasperated foe. During the hours of darkness the Huns had formed a complete fortification, after their fashion, with the wagons which always followed in their train. Within the inclosure formed by these carriages stood the warriors in a deep circle, rank upon rank, many of them holding torches in their hands. In the centre they had raised an immense pile formed of the wooden saddles of their horses, the yokes of the oxen, and all the timber they could collect; and on the summit of the giant mound towered, torch in hand, the form of Attila. Driven to desperation by the unlooked-for reverses of the previous day, the savage king had determined to fire the pile and perish in the flames rather than fall a captive into the hands of his foes.

Courage, even if it were the courage of despair, was the quality most respected in those days of warfare. Etius and Merovig declined attacking an enemy so humbled, yet so proud in his abasement. They remained at some distance; and slowly and silently Attila drew off the remains of his army, and retired beyond the Rhine. The "Scourge of God" was broken, and Europe breathed more freely.

Yet another year, and the savage king succumbed to a monarch more powerful and pitiless than himself—even to the grim King of Terrors. He had menaced Rome with the remains of his army—a horde still formidable, even after the losses they had sustained, by their numbers and ferocity. But a dark presentiment seemed suddenly to fall upon him; he drew off his men, and retired to Upper Italy, where he died.

His followers mourned deeply for their great chief. They interred him in a golden coffin, inclosed in an outer shell of silver; and the slaves who had dug his grave were all slain, that none might be tempted, by the wealth deposited there, to disturb the monarch's resting-place. Then, with mourning and lamentation, the Huns fled back toward the east; and to this day no man knows where the "Scourge of God" lies buried.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Obsta principiis.—HORACE.

Beware of the first step.

THE "True Briton" depended for its support upon the frequenters of the market. On Sunday evening, of course, there were but few customers.

The landlord, who was at once very brisk and very corpulent—as so many of his race are—stood at the entrance, leaning his portly frame against the doorpost. He was very neat and nice, for he had a tidy wife—a little bit of a vixen, and he dreaded her spirit even more than he loved that in the bottles that adorned his shelves. He very seldom got tipsy; but in his jolly red face and bloated form you can see that, somehow or other, he takes more than is good for him. A white apron, very clean and fine, adorned his "corporation," and bespoke his calling. He was lazily "blowing a cloud"—quietly enjoying his clay pipe, a yard long, and white as snow, his sleepy eye following with a dreamy pleasure the curling wreaths that issued from the bowl.

As the four friends approached mine host of the "True Briton," his small eyes twinkled with satisfaction. He gave them a hearty welcome.

"How do ye do, gentlemen? Glad to see ye. It has turned out very fine arter the rain. This way, if ye please."

He led the way to an inner room, smart with a gay paper, coloured sporting prints glazed and framed, a sanded floor, benches, tables, a strong smell of spirits, beer, and tobacco-smoke, and a fire which only wanted a judicious poke or stir to blaze up cheerfully. That poke the busy, joyous landlord gave it. Nor was his tongue silent as he rattled the fire-irons. His talk was lively but disconnected—something of everything. "Shocking accident, gentlemen, the running down that small craft by the great steamer, The Lord of the Isles. By-the-bye, what's the opinion of the country? Will the government be able to stand? Did ye hear of the terrible fire in Holborn last night, and no lives lost? There'll be some splendid running for the Derby. How's the latest odds?" (pulling out a small card from his waistcoat pocket.) "What'll ye take, gentlemen?"

"Bring us a quart," said Jack.

"Stout or half-and-half, gentlemen?—only tapped a barrel of porter yesterday."

"Noa, noa, landlord; we knows nothing of half-and-half in our part o' the country. Bring us a quart of ale, good strong ale—that's the stuff, ain't it, lads?"

"Nothing beats a glass of ale, after all," replied Bob.

"Yes," said Fisher, "there are many ways things than that (and some better," he muttered to himself, as he thought of his own favourite tippie, "old Tom.")

A foaming tankard was soon on the table; but the cockney fashion of all drinking out of the same pewter pot was not relished by our Lancashire lads.

"Landlord, bring glasses," cried Jack.

"Yes, sir, here they are."

"And, landlord, a paper of baccy and four pipes."

No sooner said than done—they are there.

Poor Bob! at any other time he would have enjoyed these jovial preparations. Now he feels anything but comfortable. He sees his friends are preparing for a regular booze. "I won't take more than a glass or two of ale," he said to himself; "no, that I won't. If I had not met with these 'ere chaps, not a drop should have passed my lips this 'ere blessed day. Not for the wealth of the Injees, after all that they have said, and all I said, would I let my dear Apple Blossom see me the least bit the worse for liquor?"

"Drink, Bob, drink!" cried Jack, cutting Bob's soliloquy short. "Thee ain't half the jolly, friendly chap thee wor!"

"Ain't I, though? that's all thee knows about it, is it?" said Bob, putting the fatal glass to his lips with "Here's luck!" and he drank off the liquor.

Luck! Ah, it was bad luck for Bob Blossom! He smacked his lips, wiped them (in rustic fashion) with the back of his hand, and, with considerable gusto, said, "Well, that there's a glass of downright, fust-rate, reg'lar good ale, and no mistake!"

And this opinion was re-echoed by the whole party.

"Come, Bob, I know you're fond of a pipe," said Jack. "Lay to, and charge. Let us be comfortable: it's long since we wor so together."

Bob hesitates, but of course he is overpersuaded: outward influence and inward inclination—what are his resolves against such united powers? Seated so comfortably among his mates of the long ago; the bright fire blazing; the clear amber ale smiling and sparkling before him; the soothing influence of the weed stealing over his senses; Jack telling him he's himself again—the dear, merry Bob of former days; a sense of popularity and excitement, the result of the moderate stimulus of the first glass,—poor Bob! he no longer shrinks from Tom and Harry as sots; he looks upon them now as hearty, cheerful fellows; and every glass he takes drowns some good resolve, and freshens some latent seed of evil.

Three quarts were finished, and Bob said to himself, "I'd go now, that I would, only it would look so mean like. With the only sixpence in my pocket I must and will pay for the next quart. We shall be quits then, and I'm off. Moderation: that's the doctrine I'll preach up to Jen Goodman, and show him that, say what he may, I can and will practice it, too. Here, landlord; won't you drink with us?"

"Certainly, gentlemen. Here's all your good healths."

"Thank you," replied all the guests. Bob seized the pewter pot, which was again empty, gave it a loud "ran-tan-tan" on the table (Bob was getting excited), and cried, "Fill it again, landlord. I'll stand treat this time." And with an effort—judicious when the result was considered—Bob hunted out of the depths of his pocket his solitary sixpence, and produced it just as the fourth quart foamed on the table.

"Drink, Fisher, drink!" said Bob, who was growing merry. "It's somehut to drink like a fish, but thee be a Fisher—that's somehut more."

Fisher complied; and, after awhile, his tongue, which had been silent—for he was a quiet boozier—was unloosed, and he began to sing a song:—

"Three jolly post-boys
Met at the 'Dragon';
And they determined,
And they determined,
And they determined
To have another flagon."

He had got so far when he was stopped short. "Begging pardon, gentlemen," said the landlord, "it's Sunday evening. There ain't no singing allowed."

"Then I'll give you a toast," said Fisher—"Here's the health of all old friends down in Lancashire."

The quart Bob had paid for was finished. Bob got on his legs, intending to be off.

Jack Badger stopped him with a pull and a jerk, and a "Sit you down, do, Bob."

"Why," says Bob, "my wife's not well, and she'll be fidgeting about me."

"Not she," said Jack. "And if she wor, all 'ud be right when you tells her you've been having a glass along of your old friend and meate, Jack Badger. I s'pose Betty ain't the gal to grudge her measter a comfortable glass with a friend or so, is she?"

"Why," said Bob, "my wife's been set agen liquor by one Jem Goodman. I've nothing to say agin Jem; he's a good, kind fellow—a deal too sober and too pious to be of the same kidney with me; but he's a teetotaler, and my wife's one, too."

"I've heerd o' that 'ere chap, Bob," said Jack Badger. "Ye moinds Grimshaw—Phil Grimshaw, as wor up in Lunnun here two year ago. He told me that 'ere Jem Goodman was all'ys hanging about your house; and he hates total abstinence chaps. He says all that 'ere cold water makes 'em cold-blooded. Phil said he wor sure that Jem Goodman wor a Mormonite; and he said, too—but maning no offence, meate—thee wor blind to let that 'ere canting fellow come pretending to be looking arter your soul, when all he wor arter wor your wife's pretty face."

"No, 'tain't; and Phil Grimshaw's a liar and a beast, to go for to think, for to speak of my wife, coupling her name w' that of any man; and, if ever I catches 'im I'll give 'im a downright good licking, for making free with her name. And 'tain't fair by Jem, neither; Jem's a cut above me, in the way of being so good and so pious; but Jem's a true friend, and he's proved it."

"Well, Bob, I meant no harm, and I don't think Phil meant none. He cracked thee up sky high, and thy wife, too."

"Did he, though," said Bob, relenting, and getting a little maudlin; "then here's his health."

"Besides," said Jack Badger, "them teetotalers ain't much unlike other men: Mormonites many of 'em is at heart. Some of 'em, when they've got round the women (and all pretty women loikes soft sawdur), turns out to be elders, and gets off to the Promised Land with a sight of wives. I'm thy friend, Bob, thy oldest meate. I wouldn't loike to see thee broken-hearted, and thy pretty Apple Blossom, as thee calls her, spirited away to be used worse than a dog, out there."

"No fear of that," said Bob. "My wife's as fond o' me as on the day we married; ay, fonder for the matter o' that. Jem Goodman I respects; and, thanking you all the same, I won't have another word on the subject."

But the seed of jealousy was sown, and, again and again, Bob, in his half-clouded mind, reverted to the subject he had forbidden Jack to touch upon.

By this time—as each man had contributed his quota, and paid for his share, so each had imbibed a quart of the strong, "knock 'em down" ale—Bob has passed the Rubicon; after a quart of such a brew, he was not master of his will; and as he could not control himself, of course he could not control his mates.

They were much better seasoned toppers than Bob, who for a fortnight had not drunk at all, and never could stand much.

His feeble resistance was soon overcome. Lancashire men are very free with their money. Jack Badger ordered "More liquor, more baccy," and plied Bob, not merely with the strong ale, but with stories of his native village, bits of rustic scandal, births, deaths, marriages, ups and downs, imprisonments, transportations, and a long ghostly story of how Jerry Jackson came to be hanged for killing his sweetheart, when she swore she'd never marry a drunkard—meaning him. Bob tried to contribute his share to the conversation, but a slight impediment in his speech made what he had to say quite unintelligible; and after taking another glass to clear his throat, his head got so confused, he lost the thread of his discourse. But the others were all talking together by this time, one telling how old Jeremiah Entwistle had bolted to Mericay (the old sinner!) and left his wife charged to the parish. Another, how Tim Ramsbottom, when out poaching, had the barrel of his gun "busted," and the contents lodged in his right arm; and how he had to have it cut off at the infirmary, and how Harriet Boothman married him all the same, saying, if he'd lost his arm, he should not lose his wife too, and she'd be his right arm—and she wor, too! How Gomesal and Kenshaw had listed as soldiers, and Openshaw gone to sea to get away from his scolding wife. How the squire stormed when the railway cut through his park; how the old rector had got a young curate, and how the rector's daughter made such a fuss with him, and how they both played the new organ in the old church.

With such topics, all of great interest to one who loved his native village, the time and the liquor came and went almost unnoticed. It was getting very late: they were all downright fuddled, and Bob was very nearly drunk.

He began to boast of the beauty of his pretty Apple Blossom, and to defy Saffron-hill to show her match.

In his pot-valour, he swore he'd not leave "Phil" a whole bone in his skin; and then, with sudden and ebrious jealousy, he began to brood over the idea of Jem Goodman's being too dear to Apple Blossom, and admiring her too much.

Then Fisher begins to boast of the brother who beat Misfortune in the foot-race; Tom, that he himself is the pet of the petticoats; and Jack, that there's not a man in London so good a judge of a fine woman as himself.

Bob promises them they shall see his wife; and being by this time three sheets in the wind, tells them they're the jolliest fellows he ever met.

Jack assures Bob he had always had a profound respect for him, since he was a young 'un.

A maudlin fondness now seizes on them all—they begin to whine, to embrace; staggering, they seize each other's hands and sing, or rather, shout in chorus, "Should auld acquaintance be forgot."

The landlord here steps in to remind them again that it's Sunday evening, and no singing allowed.

Bob then hiccoughs out an account of the attempt of Jem Goodman and Apple Blossom to make him sign the pledge.

"What!" stammered Jack, "be thee crowed over by that teetotal chap? If I wor thee, lad, I'd not stand it; I'd be measter in my own house, I'd kick that fellow out. One of 'em said to me, 'Ye drinks like a baste.' 'No, I don't,' says I; 'ye does.' 'How so?' says he. 'Why, bastes drink water, don't 'em?' said I; 'and so do thee, and so don't I.' I had un there; he hadn't a word to say; he never tackled me again."

"Moderation's my motter!" hiccoughed Bob, as he sat down and laid his head on the table; adding, "Britons never—shall—be slaves!" and with these words, he fell fast asleep.

At this moment the clock struck two (at that time there was no act for closing on Sunday night).

In came the landlord, who, shaking Bob, said, "Come, my man, it's time you went home to your wife and family. Here, lend a hand, will you?" The others were too much fuddled to be of any real use. So the landlord roused the pot-boy, and he, with the aid of two good-natured policemen (who, knowing and respecting Apple Blossom, decided on conveying Bob home, instead of to the station-house), lugged, dragged, and half carried him to his own door. With a sort of half consciousness that he had reached his home, Bob, as they laid him on the bed, hiccoughed out, "Moderation's my motter. Britons never shall be slaves!" When they were gone, and Apple Blossom was alone with him, hearing a gurgling noise in his throat, she brought a light, and, seeing he was black in the face, she loosened his cravat, and unbuttoned his waistcoat. As she did so he opened a blear, bloodshot, swimming eye, in which there was no speculation, and hiccoughed again, "Moderation's my motter. Britons never shall be slaves!"

CHAPTER XXX.

A noble boy,
A brave, free-hearted, careless one;
Full of unchecked, unbidden joy,
Of dread of books, of love of fun;
And with a clear and ready smile,
Unshadowed by a thought of guile.—WILLIS.

THE night poor Apple Blossom spent in tears of shame, watching the man who, from a loving Christian husband, was sunk by inebriety into a loathsome, sottish brute, for the time being far below "the brute that perisheth," Larky Grigg passed in the Station-house.

Larky Grigg was very much distressed at this mishap, but principally on account of his dear mother and his sweet, loving little foster-sister, Hope Evermore.

It was very distressing and very unpleasant, certainly, to be shivering on a stone bench, instead of lying warm and snug in his sofa bed, watching the red embers of the parlour fire; his mother sleeping close by, and little Hope—whom, in fun, he used to call his "guardian angel"—calling out to him from the inner room not to forget his prayers and his hymn,—nay, sometimes slipping out in her little white nightgown, and unbound hair, like some cherub from on high, to kneel by his side, and join her sweet voice to his in praise and prayer.

It was not that any one was unkind to him. Indeed, one policeman, whose beat was partly through Larky's own neighbourhood, and whom he knew a little, having once mended a mangle for his wife, offered to take a message to his friends, and as Larky (though a genius in his way) could not write fluently, the policeman wrote for him on a flyleaf of a little hymn-book in Larky's pocket, that note to Lame Luke, which had in some degree allayed the terror and distress of poor Apple Blossom and little Hope Evermore.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Touch not pitch, lest ye be defiled.

For Satan finds some mischief still

For idle hands to do.—WATTS.

POOR Larky himself scarcely understood how he came to be in his present unfortunate position.

He had rushed out to endeavour to overtake and bring back his father, and he had sped swiftly along the lanes, alleys, and streets, in which, densely populated as they were, there was yet a sort of Sabbath stillness—not the sweet fragrant repose of Sunday evening in the country, but a kind of dreary, torpid gloom.

Bells, distant and near, were ringing, as people of various parishes came out of church. Men, unable, for want of money, to get drunk at the gin palaces, went to bed sober and sulky. They missed the accustomed stimulant, and abused the poor wives, who had not even wherewith to buy bread, because they could not enable them to get fuddled at home with gin or beer.

It was a cold, clear night, and people who had homes, and beds, and firesides, enjoyed them, and felt no wish to encounter the keen east wind, which seemed to love to cut through the thin, tattered garb, and search out the bones and marrow of those who felt its icy sharpness as the lean and hungry only can.

Larky, perceiving that there was no chance of finding his father, and contrasting his warm, snug little home, with sweet Hope by his side, Truelove purring in her lap, and his Bible open before him, to the cold, dark streets and cutting wind, resolved to get home as fast as he could.

He had retraced his steps, and was again approaching Little Back Thomas-street, close to Duck-lane, where the Blossoms lived, when he heard his own name pronounced by several familiar voices.

The place was a low, poor street, very dimly lighted, and two or three unfinished houses formed a favourite hiding-place for very bad and dangerous characters.

These houses were exactly opposite a shop, the sort of shop common in such neighbourhoods—the shop of Messrs. Chete and Grudge; men who were growing enormously rich by grinding down the poor, selling them the worst goods (if goods the very bad articles supplied could be called), yes, the worst goods at the best prices—highest charge and lowest quality being the motto of Messrs. Chete and Grudge.

Unfortunately, most of their customers, being at once of the working and drinking classes, could not pay ready money, and were in the shopkeeper's debt, alias, in his power.

Among the very poor, the debtor's choice is always Hobson's choice—that or none; and "none" were starvation for the children, with the addition to the wife from a brutal, drunken husband of what he would call a precious good hiding, and the poor white slave, "a dreadful bad one."

However, the enormous price charged by these licensed sharks was not detected by the poor in the very small quantities they purchased—the half-ounces and quarters of ounces; for no one in those parts, save Larky Grigg, had the head or the inclination to calculate that when his mother paid one penny three farthings for half-an-ounce of tea of the worst description (full of little stems and black dust), she was paying the price of a first-rate article: namely, four-and-eightpence per pound. And so on with sugar, butter, cheese, candles, and all common necessities.

Now, Chete and Grudge were always approached with smiles and cringes, and meek remarks about the weather, and humble inquiries after their own precious healths, and that of their good ladies and blessed little miss or master; but behind their broad, pompous backs, where the brazen hearts (meet emblem of their own) fastened the white shop apron, they were run down by those whom they were running up long bills.

Among the many whom they had mortally offended, were Stunning Steenie, Frigging Peter, and Potato-heels, alias Carrot Meg. Not only had they repeatedly refused them any trust, but on their loitering in the shop, muttering and grumbling, Chete had sprung over his counter, seized a broom handle, and expelled them all three with blows that left bruises, and words that left stings. There was yet one other boy who would have rejoiced to do Chete and Grudge any evil turn; this was a little fellow of the name of Fox, whose face strangely resembled that of his namesake of the fields. He had a deeper cause of revenge and wrath. One night (he had fasted four-and-twenty hours, for both his parents were gin-drinkers), he had filched a bit of mouldy cheese and a rasher of rusty bacon, exhibited on a sort of wooden stand outside the shop of Chete and Grudge. He had been seen, detected, arrested, tried, convicted, and sent to prison. Yes, he went to prison (where, by-the-by, he was twice privately whipped) a comparatively innocent boy, but without principle, untaught, and scarcely aware that he had a soul. He came out, after three months' close contact with old offenders, an adept at thieves' slang, burning with revenge, his wits sharpened, and resolved to live by them; his character irretrievably lost, a proof of the result of prison discipline on the very young. He was ready for any "spree" in which the object was to annoy or injure those who had persecuted him. Boy as he was, he felt a sense of degradation, and a consciousness that he had lost not only such an amount of respectability as every boy has who has never been convicted of any offence, and never been within the walls of a prison; but he felt, too, that he had lost a certain inward sense of comfort and security which can never co-exist with a plotting head, a deceitful heart, and a guilty conscience. His parents had disappeared during his stay in prison, and when he came out, but for the intimacies he had formed in gaol, he must have perished of want.

It was by this respectable quartet that Larky was called, and, perceiving Carrot Meg's shaggy and fiery head peering out of the dark doorway of one of the unfinished houses, Larky stopped, and, with a leap, he was among them.

Rapidly they told him they were about to smash the large shop-windows of Chete and Grudge, who, as they sold tobacco and snuff, were open on Sunday. And, before Larky could express the disapprobation he felt, they had hurled several stones at the windows, partially unshrouded even on the Sabbath; and, calling to Larky to follow, they had started off through the unglazed back windows, and let themselves down into a bit of waste ground beyond. Larky, who had not made himself acquainted with the geography of the place as they had done, was at a loss how to act, and had decided on regaining the street and returning home, when he found himself suddenly confronted by a policeman and Mr. Chete: the former with a red face, fair, bushy whiskers, and a broad grin; the latter, bold, smooth-faced, livid with rage and revenge, not unmixed with fear, and keeping wisely behind K of the B division.

"Caught in the act, you young scoundrel," said Chete, as the bull's-eye lantern of K of the B division flashed full on the bold, handsome face of Larky Grigg, which was flushed with surprise, but yet lighted by a smile he could not quite repress, as he saw Chete in his night-cap, dressing gown, and slippers, trembling behind the policeman, the white tassel of his cap quivering with the coward beating of his bad heart. "And that mischievous young serpent wor a sort of pet of Mrs. Chete's. I'll pet her for this 'ere. I give 'im in charge, police."

Vainly Larky protested his innocence, and appealed to the past; the long years his mother had dealt at Chete's, and his own orderly behaviour. He was dragged off, as we know; and this retrospect is merely to account for subsequent events, when he appeared before the — magistrate.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Unhappy woman, still thy lot must be
A dream of love or a reality
Of unshared sorrow!—BRIDE OF SIENNA.

POOR Apple Blossom had a terrible night of it. Little Hope cried herself to sleep as she thought of Larky Grigg at the station-house, and no one shared that wretched, but, alas! too common watch of the wife of a drunkard.

After hours of sickness, disgusting and unutterable, and fits of mad rage in which he had struck poor Apple Blossom in the face as she bent over him to hold a cup of water to his dry, swollen lips, and which blow had blackened one of her bright eyes, and made her pretty nose bleed profusely; and after a savage kick in her bosom, when she had vainly tried to get off his muddy boots, he had subsided from rage into stupor, and at last had fallen fast asleep.

Apple Blossom could not make up her mind to lie down by so degraded and disgusting a creature—groaning, snoring, grunting, and hiccupping, in a sleep compared to which, that of an overgorged hog was a soft, sweet slumber.

Cold, miserable, her heart burning with shame, anger, and disgust for him she had sworn to love, honour, and obey, and her mind tortured with anxiety about poor Larky, and suffering from bodily pain, she could not rest,—she was glad when she saw morning beginning to dawn on the black, low, squalid houses opposite her window; and leaving the room, she closed the door, to shut out the hideous image of man converted into a brute, and began to light a fire, boil the water, and get the children's breakfast ready.

How she missed her dear Larky! His were indeed helping hands.

Apple Blossom resolved to trust her stall that day to little Hope, and to go herself to the station to see after her darling boy.

Merry, who could not be trusted with the stall (at least till she had redeemed her character for honesty), should take little Nessy to the ragged school, and baby Ben to the infant refuge.

It was with great pain Apple Blossom remembered that she had promised Jem Goodman to be at home about eleven to receive a visit from "the ladies" (Ellen, Ada, and Mrs. Golightly).

It never occurred to her not to see them; to say "Not at home," as some less conscientious, and of a lower standard, though higher sphere, would have done.

All she troubled herself about was, how she should conceal from these ladies (Mrs. Golightly especially) that Bob had got drunk, and had struck her.

Her nose was swollen, her eye was black; and, worse still, a sickening pain in her bosom caused her every now and then a feeling of faintness she had never before experienced.

Ere long she heard the children stirring; and, as Bob still slept, and she knew he would wake to a maddening headache and the sharpest stings of remorse, she made Merry and Nessy dress as quickly and quietly as they could, and step gently out of the room. Of baby Ben she quieted the hungry uproar at that fair bosom on which he thrived so wonderfully. Hope alone still slept on.

Sleep is such a necessity in childhood; and the little angel girl, for the first time in her life, had not closed her eyes till long after midnight.

Apple Blossom gave one hurried glance at the snoring, snorting, dirty, tumbled, muddy, discoloured, shaggy Bob, as he lay still in his muddy boots and his soiled clothes, with his face heated and swollen, and mouth agape.

She gazed and shuddered as the dawn looked in upon and lighted up so revolting a being; and then she gazed long and fondly on little Hope, who lay in the deep, trance-like sleep of an over-tired child, her beloved and rescued Truelove curled up on her little pillow, and as fast asleep as herself.

The morning light seemed enamoured of those thick waves of golden hair, that round, soft face, paler than its wont, and bearing traces of recent tears; those full, snowy lids, with the long, dark lashes still wet and divided; and those small, rosy hands crossed on the little bosom, suggesting thoughts of that symbol under which that little one was so early enrolled; for Hope was already a faithful little soldier of Christ, enlisted "manfully to fight under his banner against the world, the flesh, and the devil."

"And perhaps," thought poor Apple Blossom, "Bob, in his infancy, looked like that sweet child—a cherub in his sleep. I have seen him very fair and pleasant to look on by my side, even lately. O sin, sin! what hast thou done!"

Just at this moment Bob woke, parched with the burning thirst of the drunkard.

"Water! water!" he cried; "do ye hear? water!"

And Apple Blossom filled a jug with fresh water; and as his trembling hands could not hold it to his dry lips, she raised his hot, throbbing head, which sank on that faithful and fair bosom his vile foot had kicked so savagely; and with her help the cooling stream went down a throat that seemed lined with fire.

It was a quart jug, but Bob Blossom emptied it!

He uttered no thanks; he was ashamed, surely, and did not look Apple Blossom in the face. But after that long, cooling draught, he uttered a deep sigh of intense gratification.

Apple Blossom shook up and smoothed his hot and tumbled pillow, removed his boots (he no longer kicked, plunged, and resisted) from his swollen, blistered feet, covered him over with a warm blanket and quilt, pinned up a dark shawl to exclude the now bright light, and left him to the sleep which again closed his aching, burning lids.

Did he deserve all this? Not he. But Apple Blossom was, in her own humble way, a model wife.

"He may break his vow, and break my heart," said Apple Blossom; "he may despise his duty, and degrade himself; but his backslidings would not excuse mine. I am his wife, I took him for better for worse. The worse he is, the weaker he is, the more he wants a helpmeet. He'll be sorry and ashamed, too, I know he will, when he comes to himself, and sees what he's done. I hope he haven't done me a mischief that can't be cured. But my bosom aches cruel; I feel very sick, and very queer. I'll give the children their breakfasts, and have a cup o' tea, and then I'll go and see if Jem can't take me to see poor Larky. It would be a lonesome thing for him as feels for every one in trouble—and helps every one, if he can, out of it too—if nobody wor to be there to comfort him or speak up for him before the judge."

"It's ten to one if he gets a bite or a sup. What-ever possessed him to run out arter his dad? I won't speak unkind of Bob, and I'll try not to think unkind of him, nuther, 'cause he be my husband, and I be his lawful woife; but if my boy gits into trouble through trying to find he, I know I shall tell him, plump, he warn't wuth it. He's a lost man, as Jem says, if he don't give up drink and take the pledge; and if he's lost, Grigg's to be lost, too, it seem, for trying to find him."

"If I sets off at onst, I dare say I'll be back before the ladies calls, and before Bob's stirring, or Hope either. The dear little wench never closed her eyes till past two! I declare, if she and her Truelove ain't pratty enough to be put in a show! I zeed nothink to come anigh them, as they lies there, at Madame Tussor's, when I wor fust married. Nothink short of wax-work ever could come up to Hope. I remember our squire's little lady had a doll sent her a present—such a pictur', with its flaxen curls, and pink cheeks, and blue eyes, and red lips—'twor something like Hope; but even that didn't beat Hope—leastways, when Hope's dressed a little nice and neat."

Wax-work and dolls are always the beau-idéal of beauty with the uneducated.

It was a poor compliment to that sleeping Psyche, to compare her to any wax ever moulded!

(To be continued.)

QUARREL OF THE THUNDER AND THE SEA.

The kindly Thunder call'd
At midnight to the Sea,
Which, rising up in wrath, exclaim'd,
"What is thy will with me?"

"Yield up the noble forms
That in thy caverns hide—
The beautiful, the brave of earth—
Her glory and her pride."

"She ventured on my breast
Those jewels," said the Sea;
"If she hath not skill her own to keep,
Say—what is that to me?"

Then loud the Thunder spoke,
Beckoning the Tempest nigh—
"Thou wert a robber from thy birth,
We'll search thee till we die."

Out laughed the mocking Sea—
"On!—do your worst with speed;
There's none, save the Strong Angel's Eyes,
My secret cells shall read."

"But when, at his command,
These depths restore the dead,
Where wilt thou be, thou Windy Voice,
When clouds and skies have fled?"

SPEAKING WELL OF OTHERS.—If the disposition to speak well of others were universally prevalent, the world would become a comparative paradise. The opposite disposition is the Pandora-box, which, when opened, fills every house and every neighbourhood with pain and sorrow. How many enmities and heart-burnings flow from this source! How much happiness is interrupted and destroyed! Envy, jealousy, and the malignant spirit of evil, when they find vent by the lips, go forth on their mission like foul fiends, to blast the reputation and peace of others. Every one has his imperfections, and in the conduct of the best there will be occasional faults which might seem to justify animadversion. It is a good rule, however, when there is occasion for fault-finding, to do it privately to the erring one. This may prove salutary. It is a proof of interest in the individual, which will generally be taken kindly, if the manner of doing it is not offensive. The common and unchristian rule, on the contrary, is to proclaim the failings of others to all but themselves. This is unchristian, and shows a despicable heart.

HEIDELBERG CASTLE.

HEIDELBERG.

Who has not heard of the great tun of Heidelberg?—that large wine-butt which held an ocean of liquor, and was supposed to indicate by its goodly proportions the hospitality of its owners, the old Palatine Electors. It was devised in feudal times, and was then capable of containing twenty-one pipes. A new tun was constructed in 1664, which held six hundred hogsheads. Surely the most bibulous must have cried content at so magnificent a supply. Mynheer Van Dunk must have been satisfied: but it was soon emptied. French soldiers, thirsty with fighting, and convivial on account of victory, drank it dry in 1668. Not long afterwards a third tun was constructed, which held eight hundred hogsheads, and was kept full of the best Rhenish wine. Was kept full—it has been emptied long ago. The liquor it once contained has fuddled the brains, dimmed the sight, cracked the voice, shaken the limbs, blurred the honour, marred the fortune of old German toppers for the last time; and, as a dry and withered shell from which the kernel has long been removed, the empty old tun—empty as the heads of the good fellows for whose pleasure it was made—lies buried in the vaults at Heidelberg. There it is still to be seen—but it is not much of a sight; and if it were, this one attraction, if attraction it be, would scarcely repay the trouble of a descent into the subterranean region of the castle.

But Heidelberg has other attractions. For centuries it was the capital of the German Electorate, and is consequently associated with all that is most interesting in the history of Germany. The aspect of the castle itself is imposing. It is a solid square building, comprehending all the varieties of architecture which prevailed from the thirteenth to the seventeenth century. Partially destroyed, and partially rebuilt; altered, amended, increased, diminished, by successive Electors, it is one of the most curious structures in Germany. Count Rodolph I. commenced, or is reported to have commenced, the old schloss or palace, which subsequently became the Castle of Heidelberg. The Gothic portions of the building are ascribed to him. Robert the Red, under the influence of religious zeal, built a chapel; Robert III., with a taste for architectural splendour, erected a new frontage; Frederick the Victorious, under the pressure of belligerent neighbours, strengthened all its fortifications; but to Otto Henry belongs the credit of the grace and beauty of Heidelberg, which make it one of the finest monuments of the revival of art.

Taken and retaken many times during the thirty years' war, it was given up on the peace of Westphalia to Prince Charles Louis, who thoroughly repaired the building; but it suffered still more in the war undertaken by Louis XIV. to support the cause of Philip of Orleans. These repeated calamities, together with the removal of the electoral residence to Mannheim, ultimately brought desolation upon Heidelberg; but as a ruin it continues to awaken curiosity and excites admiration.

Once in three years it has been the custom to hold a sacred concert in the ruined hall of the castle. These musical entertainments are invariably well attended, and the effect is singularly impressive.

It has often been regretted that a building so magnificent as that of Heidelberg—a building which possesses so many varied attractions, and is so intimately associated with all the stirring events which mark the history of Germany—should be suffered to fall into decay. It has been worn and mutilated by time and fortune. The lapse of centuries, the devastations of war have dealt hardly with it; like an old soldier, it is scarred as well as wrinkled. But it is beautiful in its decay; and the man of taste would shrink from any effort at restoration, lest it should suffer by any ill-directed repairs. Seen as it is, the graces of art and nature are charmingly combined. The foliage is its arabesque, and its arabesque is foliage. One stands in doubt which most to admire, the green leaves of nature, or the stone leaves of art. The eye wanders with delight over the long range of windows, the elaborate carving, the tall gables, the curious pinnacles, the whole structure replete with ornament, remarkable for variety and grandeur. As a ruin, Heidelberg is full of interest; but neatly repaired, newly fitted and decorated, with a refreshment room up stairs, it would sink into insignificance, and excite contempt.

MASCULINE INDEPENDENCE.—Masculine independence of mind is the first requisite for the formation of a character of real manly worth. The man who suffers himself to be deceived and carried away by his own weakness may be a very amiable person in other respects, but cannot be called a good man. Such beings should not find favour in the eyes of a woman; for a truly beautiful and purely feminine nature should be attracted only by what is highest and noblest in the character of man.

The Matron.

NO. XIX.

THE dangers of travelling formed the subject of the last number; but there are dangers everywhere—in stopping at home, and in starting for a journey; dangers by rail, by river, and by road; dangers on the great deep; dangers in England; dangers abroad. Of dangers at home I shall speak before I conclude this chapter, but I commence by reverting to the subject last treated. I mean those dangers in travelling that may be averted. I spoke of the danger of having pockets so placed that the light-fingered gentry find them out too easily; of catching cold by resuming wrappers that have been hung up, instead of being dried; and I touched on the bad consequences of being too late. But now, supposing you were in time, and have fairly started, I warn you against too easily making acquaintance with strangers.

I will suppose that you belong to the respectable working classes, that almost for the first time you are quitting your native village, to visit some distant relation, or to go for the first time into a situation.

Let youths and maidens both recollect that the world is but too well stocked with those whose object it is to lure the unwary into some trap or other, to turn them to their own profit, and then, and ultimately, to leave them to ruin and misery.

Always keep in view the object of your journey, and let nothing divert you from it. Keep your affairs to yourselves, and do not fall back into the silly chattering ways of children, by telling everybody everything about yourself. But if you should happen to have revealed the object of your journey, distrust any one who tries to make you alter your plan by promise of a better place, or of greater gain. You have no right (at the instigation of strangers) to alter arrangements that have had the sanction of your parents and guardians, and you would expose yourselves to numberless dangers and evils by so doing.

If you are going on a whole day's journey be provided with your own refreshments; for instance, with a little basket filled with sandwiches, cakes, and a few oranges. Should you feel to want more, take at the inn or station a cup of tea or coffee. As a general rule, do not accept of refreshments offered by travelling companions; and never be induced to play at any game of chance with people you meet in steam-boats, railway-carriages, or coaches. It is not an uncommon practice with sharpers (and sharpers may look very respectable) to lure thoughtless travellers into games, and then to cheat them out of all their money. Just fancy what your feelings would be, were you, through your own imprudence, to find yourself suddenly without a shilling in your pocket, far, far away from your home, your family, and your friends.

Supposing you have been travelling by rail, and stop at some important terminus—such as London, Manchester, or Liverpool—you must prepare for an unpleasant task in selecting your luggage from the piles of trunks and boxes belonging to other people. Never omit (in your preparations for a journey) to fix a direction on the various packages belonging to yourself; and if you paste a square of bright-coloured paper, or tie a piece of scarlet ribbon or red tape on each of your boxes, you will assist yourself in distinguishing them from other people's things, and be better able to point them out to the railway porter as your own. In fact, anything that lessens the trouble of clearing and securing one's luggage is desirable; for old travellers will tell you that looking after luggage is the most unpleasant part of a journey.

Young people, on arriving in a strange town, should be careful whose directions they follow in reaching their destination.

Families expecting servants from the country should make a point of sending some one to meet them. But if a youth or a young girl find no one to meet him or her at the station, the best way is to seek directions of the railway officials rather than to ask them of strangers; and, if our young travellers can possibly afford it, the sooner they place themselves and their luggage in any carriage standing near the station the better. That money is well spent which prevents their losing their way in a strange place, and falling into the snares of wicked, ill-disposed people.

I hope my readers may derive some benefit from the preceding remarks. I have addressed them principally to the working classes, but, to a certain extent, they may be useful to inexperienced travellers in all ranks of life.

In the next chapter I intend treating a very different subject, and offering a few rules for averting a danger that constantly threatens our homes. I mean fire. The frightful destruction of life and property occasioned by the ravages of this devouring element, may generally be traced to a single act of domestic carelessness. To warn people against such acts, and to endeavour to prevent one of our greatest blessings being turned into our direst curse, certainly comes within the province of "The Matron."

PROVIDENCE

"From seeming evil, still educing good."

THE stone upon the wayside seed that fell,
And kept the spring rain from it, kept it too
From the bird's mouth; and in that silent cell

It quickened, after many days, and grew,
Till, by-and-by, a rose, a single one,
Lifted its little face unto the sun.

It chanced, a wicked man approached one day,
And saw the tender, piteous look it wore:
Perhaps one like it, somewhere far away,

Grew in a garden-bed, or by the door
That he in childish days had played around,
For his knees, trembling, sank upon the ground.

Then, o'er this piece of bleeding earth, the tears

Of penitence were wrung, until at last

The golden key of love—that sin for years

In his unquiet soul had rusted fast—

Was loosened, and his heart, that very hour,

Opened to God's good sunshine, like a flower.

Chemical Experiments.

Hotness and Coldness.—If you ask me the difference between hotness and coldness, candidly let me say I do not know. Absolute difference there is certainly none; all being a matter of degree. The metal quicksilver may be frozen, and when frozen it is so intensely cold that if in its icy condition it be dipped into water as cold as water can be cooled, without freezing outright, it melts, and the water is immediately converted into ice. A lump of this frozen quicksilver is scarcely less dangerous to handle than a lump of red hot iron; for curiously here, as in other cases where extreme cold is involved, the effects are very similar to those of extreme heat. Travellers in the arctic and antarctic regions describe the peculiar burning sensation experienced on touching in those latitudes pieces of metal which have been exposed to external influences. When, during our war with America, a regiment of West Indian blacks was sent to Canada to guard the frontier, those children of the warmer south were sadly puzzled as well as punished by the occurrence of frequent frost-bites. They would have it to be that their toes were on fire—an opinion almost confirmed in their estimation by the phenomenon of their breath being visible. In point of fact, not only is there no specific difference between heat and cold, but many of the sensations and effects of both are similar.

Even the word "boiling," which we so constantly use in the sense of indicating the existence of an extremely hot fluid, may be sometimes occasioned by the application of cold. Of this I shall now mention an example:—Procure a Florence flask, and also a cork, cut tapering so that it may just fit the mouth of the flask without pressure. About quarter fill the flask with water, and, supporting the flask over a fire or a spirit-lamp flame, cause the water to boil violently. The next step of the operation requires some address. The object is to cork the flask and remove the source of heat at one and the same instant. This will be two persons' work. It may be well to remark that if the cork has been accurately fitted at the first, not the slightest pressure will be necessary in order to induce its fitting.

Supposing the operation to have been well performed, dipping the flask in cold water (the cooler the better) will cause it to boil. Here, then, is an example of boiling produced by reduction of temperature. The explanation is simply this. Boiling occurs whenever the force of heat, acting within a liquid, is sufficient to drive it into vapour, with a force sufficient to overcome the atmospheric pressure. The less the atmospheric pressure, the more readily does boiling occur, in certain liquids—ether, for example—without the application of any heat whatever. Water cannot be caused to boil without the aid of some extraneous heat. Very little heat, however, will suffice if atmospheric pressure be taken away. Now, in the experiment just described, the application of cold water externally condenses the steam within, and thus removes atmospheric pressure.

As a general rule, it may be observed that, whenever steam or vapour is evolved, so, in like manner, is heat; steam and vapour being, in point of fact, the representatives of heat dissipated. A remembrance of the fact just stated will explain the mode of action of porous unglazed water jars and butter coolers. Water being poured within, portions of it exude and, of course, evaporate; by evaporation they necessarily produce cold, and the cold thus developed taking effect through the materials of the vessel, the contents are also cooled.

Liquids which evaporate or pass into vapour more readily than water produce still more cold, and in direct proportion to their volatility. Ether is a remarkable example of this. The cold produced by the evaporation of ether may be readily experienced by pouring a little upon the surface of the skin, and leaving it uncovered. If, however, the part be covered with the hand, or a piece of oilskin, or almost any impervious material, then instead of cold a sensation of heat will be experienced.

Though the preceding experiment demonstrates the production of cold, it does not inform us concerning the precise degree of cold, nor does it show us any positive effects of cold. The latter demonstration, however, can easily be made. If a small bulb, blown at the extremity of a glass tube, and very thin, be filled with water, and wrapped round with cotton wool; if now the cotton wool be imbued with ether, and allowed to fall on it drop by drop, cold will be generated so rapidly, owing to the removal of heat by evaporation, that the water contained in the glass bulb will freeze.

It is possible (but the prosecution of the experiment requires an air-pump) to so arrange matters that one fluid shall boil and another freeze at one and the same time, and by one and the same cause. If the reader of this possess an air-pump, he will experience no difficulty in performing it; at any rate, he will experience no difficulty in understanding my description.

Having poured some ether into a wineglass, plunge into the latter a thin tube holding a very little water. This being done, exhaust the air-pump receiver, when necessarily the ether will be converted into vapour; the latter robbing the water of heat until complete freezing takes place.

By way of conclusion to my remarks at present, let me call your attention to the curious fact that if oil of vitriol be added to water, the result is elevated temperature; if, however, oil of vitriol be added to ice, then the temperature of the latter is still further diminished.

Not merely does the formation of vapours from liquids involve the consumption of heat, but also the formation of liquids out of solids. When ice accumulates before our doors we throw salt upon it, and the ice melts. During that melting, however, the temperature, far from being elevated, is reduced many degrees. All the cases just noticed will help to show how few are the positive ideas we are justified in attaching to heat and cold.

THE GOOD SERVANT.

THE rich landed proprietor, Mr. Forman, had a good servant. A little circumstance made his good-heartedness known in the first instance, and a great number of others afterwards proved the fact.

The servant had not the remotest idea that any human eye saw him at the time when his master first became aware of his good qualities; and all actions so performed are the most to be admired: they are very seldom outwardly rewarded, nevertheless they have a good paymaster, who has always ready money at hand—and that is the privy councillor in the heart. He who knows himself to be on good terms with him need not mind either what he or other people are called in this world.

One hot summer noon, the farm-servant, Konrad, came in from the fields with his team. Both horses were in the first place fed, and the harness taken off; for every one knows, who knows anything on the subject, that a horse can never take its proper rest so long as it has any part of its harness or gears upon its body. Yet there are many who will not know this because they like to save themselves trouble. But Forman's Konrad was not one of these; and it is very probable that his own dinner afterwards tasted all the better because he had done all in his power to put his animals in the best condition to enjoy theirs.

There is among smokers a yet undecided question—namely, which pipe is the most delicious—that after breakfast, that after dinner, or that after supper. Our Konrad enjoyed them all equally. He was not a cigar smoker. He took a great deal of pains to clean out his pipe and keep it in good order, so that he might have thorough enjoyment of it; whilst the cigar-smoker just lights it, smokes it a while, then throws the rest away.

It was a peculiar pleasure to Konrad to seat himself after dinner on a stone horse-block outside the stable door, and clean the stem of his pipe with a straw; during which he very frequently laid the bowl of his pipe upon the sill of the little stable window. As he was thus sitting one day, having finished cleaning his pipe, he lifted his hand to reach the bowl, which unfortunately rolled inward and fell into the stall upon a bundle of straw. On this, down came Konrad, and went into the stable to look for his pipe-head, but scarcely was he within the doorway when he suddenly stopped. He saw that the horse had laid itself down, and he knew that the moment he went into the stall it would start from its refreshing and necessary rest. Therefore, he came out again, re-seated himself quietly on the horseblock, and put the pipe end into his mouth, without being able to smoke a whiff.

His master, who had observed this action from his window, now walked out, and coming up to him, inquired—

"Why are you not smoking, Konrad: have you broken your pipe?"

"No, it has only rolled down into the stable; but I will not disturb the horse; I would rather wait till I am in the field than do that."

"You are a good fellow," said Mr. Forman, and handed to him his own silver-mounted pipe, which he was himself then smoking. "There, take that," he said, "as my thanks for your kindness to those animals which cannot themselves thank you. You will do well; for he who is merciful towards an animal will be just towards his fellow-man. I hope we shall remain together as long as we live."

And so it happened.

Small Change.

A STEWARD wrote to a bookseller in London for some books to fit up his master's library, in the following terms:—"In the first place I want six feet of theology, the same quantity of metaphysics, and near a yard of old civil law in folio."

A GENTLEMAN having written a letter, concluded it as follows:—"Give Everybody's love to Everybody, so that Nobody may be aggrieved by Anybody being forgotten by Somebody."

Wood is the thing, after all, as the man with a deal leg said when the mad dog bit it.

Joe hates a hypocrite, which plainly shows Self-love is not a fault of Joe's.

SOME men use their friends as others do their clothes—throw them off whenever they are well worn. GOLD is an idol worshipped in all climates, without a single temple, and by all classes, without a single hypocrite.

"HAVE you been much at sea?" "Why, no, not exactly; but my brother married an admiral's daughter." "Were you ever abroad?" "No, not exactly; but my mother's maiden name was French."

The law of the road is a paradox quite,

For in orderly riding along,

If you go to the left you are sure to go right,

But if you go right you go wrong.

UPON the 19th of May, 1790, the memorable dark day, a lady wrote to Dr. Byles of Boston, U.S., as follows:—"Dear Doctor, how do you account for this darkness?" He replied, "Dear Madam, I am as much in the dark as you are."

"PRAY, sir, do you sell pies?" said a gentleman, as he strolled into a pastrycook's shop. "Oh yes, sir," replied the pastrycook, "pies of all sorts." "Why, then," said the gentleman, "let me have a mag-pie."

A GERMAN gentleman, in the course of a strict cross-examination on a trial during the Oxford Circuit, was asked to state the exact age of the defendant. "Dirty" (thirty), was the reply. "And pray, sir, are you his senior, and by how many years?" "Why, sir, I am dirty-two."

CHARITY obliges not to mistrust a man; prudence not to trust him before we know him.

GOLD is so ductile, learned chemists say,

That half an ounce will stretch a wondrous way;

The metal's base, or else the chemists are,

For, now-a-days, our sovereigns won't go far!

"THE fire is going out, Miss Filkins." "I know it, Mr. Green; and if you would act wisely, you would follow its example."

AUNT BETSY has said many good things—among the rest, that a newspaper is like a wife, because every man ought to have one of his own.

MISSING from Killarney, Lane O'Fogerty; she had in her arms two babies and a Guernsey cow, all black, with red hair, and tortoiseshell combs behind her ears, and large black spots all down her back, which squints awfully.

"PLEASE, sir," said a little girl, who was sweeping crossings for a living, "you have given me a bad penny." "Never mind, little girl, you may keep it for your honesty."

EACH of us, says Plato, is not born for himself alone; but our country claims one part, our parents another, and our friends the remainder.

A CELEBRATED barrister, retired from practice, was one day asked his sincere opinion of the law. "Why the fact is," rejoined he, "if any man was to claim the coat upon my back, and threaten my refusal with a law-suit, he should certainly have it, lest, in defending my coat, I should lose my waistcoat also."

A WAG, speaking of the embarkation of troops, said: "Notwithstanding many of them leave blooming wives behind, they go away in transports."

Puzzles for the Ingenious.

Two bars of standard gold bullion, weighing 40 pounds Troy each, are purchased with notes promising to pay the bearer on demand £3,730. Three similar bars are purchased with Exchequer notes, promising to pay the Exchequer, on demand £5,607. A bar in each lot is at the same price, and four of them at an advance, one upon the other, of two-pence per ounce. What is the price per ounce of each of the bars?

NEMO.

FOR SOLUTION BY JUVENILES.

A teacher of an infant school bought 150 nuts, to be divided between the children of her class (composed of both sexes), to be given so that the girls were to receive one more each than the boys. Subsequently, two of the elder children agreed to give both their portions to be equally divided between the rest, which amounted to three each—how many boys and girls had she in her class?

F. GILDER.

ANSWER TO THE ENIGMA IN NO. 19, PAGE 303.

LYSANDER, a celebrated Spartan commander. At Egospotamos he totally destroyed the Athenian fleet, with the loss of 117 ships and 3,000 men. This action put an end to the Peloponnesian war, which had raged twenty-seven years between Athens and Sparta. Aspiring to universal power, he nominated thirty of his creatures to govern Athens, and endeavoured to make the crown of Sparta elective. He was killed in battle with the Haliartians, B.C. 394.

The first letters of the names following form the name LYSANDER:—

1. Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, was beheaded A.D. 1645.

2. York, where Severus died A.D. 211.

3. Sallust, a celebrated Roman historian, whose chief works were a history of Rome, a history of Cataline's conspiracy, and of the wars of Jugurtha. He was questor and consul; but, disgracing himself by his licentiousness and depravity, he was expelled the senate. Being appointed governor of Numidia, he had recourse to the greatest tyranny and plunder to minister to his pleasures. He died B.C. 35.

4. Actium, a promontory in Epirus, famous for the naval victory near which Augustus obtained over Antony and Cleopatra, B.C. 31.

5. Nerva, the thirteenth Roman emperor. Died A.D. 98.

6. Doria, Andréa Doria, "the father and liberator of his country," was a celebrated commander and patriot of Genoa. He lost his parents in early life, and after having served under several princes, he accepted service under Francis I.; but being dissatisfied with that prince's proceedings in regard to the affairs of Genoa, he finally served under Charles V., who created him "Prince of Meli and Yarsi," and offered to make him king of Genoa, but he refused to subvert the constitution of that republic. He died in 1560, at the age of ninety-two.

7. Epaminondas, a Theban commander, and, perhaps, the brightest example of private virtue and military accomplishments of ancient times. At Leuctra, B.C. 371, he defeated the Lacedæmonians, and delivered the Thebans from their yoke. He was slain at Mantinea, B.C. 363.

8. Raleigh, the distinguished statesman, scholar, and warrior, formed the settlement of Virginia in 1616. After being imprisoned twelve years for alleged complicity in a conspiracy to place the Lady Arabella Stuart on the throne, was employed in an unsuccessful expedition against the Spaniards, and on his return beheaded in 1618.

G. TAYLOR.

Correct answers have been received also from A. G. Smith, Alcibiades, Lapstone, J. Hyland, Theta, Arun, J. Wheeler, Wilhelmina, Maud Blanche, Saunterer, R. Clear, The Douglas, Demetrius Doboodle, A. D. (Perth), Simon Gee, E. J. A., Zetetic, T. H. Alderdice, A. D. Boyd, An Admirer of Correct Pronunciation, W. B., T. H. Alderdice.

Further replies to the question as to purchasing 100 birds for 100 pence, have been received from Joseph, Paul, and William (Grantham), W. Sutherland, Small Change, H. Getwood, H. P. S., J. J. Smedley, Master T. C., T. Wylie, G. W. Balmah, D. T., T. P. W., G. P. W., Trebor, W. J. Freestone, R. Reid, R. Stronach, H. Wynn, F. Gilder, W. Tongue, W. S. McKay, Mona, B. and J. Haslam, E. Raymond, A. Appleford, J. M. (Newlyn), G. C. Holwell, Lapstone, Saunterer, E. J. A., Montbar, R. Henderson, J. Batho, S. F. M., Book-keeping by D. E., A. Crawford, A. Gilder's Apprentice, T. H. Tinkler, Rhododendron, S. Thompson, F. J. Fox, Lucy Crane, A. L. A. H., A. Sheffield Night-schoolboy, B. J. Dean.

Chess.

Problem No. 38. By Mr. WM. GREENWOOD.
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to move, and checkmate in four moves.

Problem No. 39. By A. M. BAKER, Esq.
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to move, and checkmate in five moves.

Game played between the late Mr. E. WILLIAMS and Mr. S.

Mr. W. giving the odds of the Q R.

- | WHITE.
Mr. W. | BLACK.
Mr. S. |
|------------------------------|----------------------|
| 1. P to K 4 | 1. P to K 4 |
| 2. P to K B 4 | 2. P takes P |
| 3. K Kt to B 3 | 3. P to K Kt 4 |
| 4. B to Q B 4 | 4. P to K Kt 5 |
| 5. Castles | 5. P takes Kt |
| 6. Q takes P | 6. K Kt to B 3 (a) |
| 7. P to Q 4 (b) | 7. B to Kt 2 |
| 8. P to K 5 | 8. Castles (c) |
| 9. P takes Kt | 9. Q takes P |
| 10. P to Q B 3 | 10. P to Q 3 |
| 11. Q B takes P | 11. B to K 3 |
| 12. B to Q 3 | 12. Q B to B 4 |
| 13. B takes B | 13. Q takes B |
| 14. Q takes Q Kt P | 14. Kt to Q 2 |
| 15. B takes Q P | 15. Q R to Kt sq |
| 16. Q takes Q B P | 16. Q to Q B 7 |
| 17. Kt to R 3 (d) | 17. Q takes Q Kt P |
| 18. Q takes Kt | 18. Q takes Q B P |
| 19. B takes K R | 19. B takes Q P (ch) |
| 20. K to R sq | 20. R takes B |
| 21. Kt to Kt 5 | 21. Q to Q 6 (e) |
| 22. Q to Kt 4 (ch) | 22. B to Kt 2 |
| 23. Q to B 5 | 23. R to K sq |
| 24. Q takes P (ch) | 24. K to R sq |
| 25. Kt to B 7 (f) | 25. R to K B sq |
| 26. Q takes R (ch) | 26. B takes Q |
| 27. R takes B (ch) | 27. K to Kt 2 |
| 28. Kt to K 6 (ch) | 28. K to R 3 |
| 29. R to B 6 (ch) | 29. K to R 4 |
| 30. Kt to B 4 (ch) and wins. | |

(a) The usual move at this point is Q to K B 3, but Black being two pieces in advance ventures upon this move.

(b) P to K 5 would not have been so good, on account of Black's reply of P to Q 4, which would break up the attack.

(c) Black, desirous of saving his King from further embarrassment, sacrifices the Kt.

(d) Had White allowed Black to take Q Kt P with R, he could hardly have saved his game.

(e) These moves are well calculated.

Our Editorial Table.

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO OUR READERS AND THE GENERAL PUBLIC.

Our next number will contain a faithful Portrait, from a photograph by Mayall, of J. F. SMITH, Esq., author of "Dick Tarleton," "Minnie Grey," "Soldier of Fortune," "Phases of Life," &c. &c.

* NOTICE TO OUR READERS.—We are obliged to ask the indulgence of some of our subscribers who are waiting for back numbers of the New Series. The whole are being reprinted, and will be ready for delivery forthwith. The delay has arisen from the best of all causes, namely, the great increase in the demand, the bona fide circulation of the new series having reached 296,000—a result at which we feel sure our readers will rejoice as much as ourselves. N.B.—The back numbers of the Old Series are kept in print.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—If we should ever keep our readers anxiously waiting for answers, we must beg it may be attributed to the marvellous increase of our correspondence, and not to any neglect on our part. The appreciation our advice has received, renders us, if possible, more than ever anxious to enlighten our readers on doubtful points, to gratify laudable curiosity on scientific and general subjects, and above all, to give advice and consolation to those who apply to us in their sorrows and disappointments. Of the last mentioned class of our correspondents, lovers form the principal part. As there is often a similarity in their sufferings, we recommend one lover to read, not only the answer addressed to himself, but also that which is intended to solace any wounded heart.

Another word or two to our correspondents. It is evident that several who sign themselves "constant readers" are not very attentive readers, or they would not send us questions, answers to which have repeatedly appeared in our columns. We have to complain that so many of our correspondents are exorbitant in their demands upon our space and our time. We have on our table letters, in some of which three, four, six, and eight questions are put; in seven letters there are no fewer than thirty-one questions on as many different subjects, some of which would require reference to directories, shipping-lists, consultations with surgeons, physicians, and other professional gentlemen, to say nothing of the space which clear and definite answers would occupy.

DRAYTON.—What your cousin tells you of the Australian dog is perfectly true. Dogs in a state of nature never bark. They whine and howl. It is only among those that are domesticated that barking is habitual. It is said that even the shepherds' dogs in the wilds of Egypt have not this faculty; and Columbus found that the dogs he had previously carried to America had lost their propensity to bark. The barking of a dog seems to be an effort to speak, acquired from keeping company with man.

ROSE REED AND CAREY.—As these young ladies have very likely escaped a watery grave through the inconstancy of one of their admirers, we advise them to leave things as they are and to rest satisfied with excursions by land.

CABIN BOY.—The mariner's compass was first invented by Flavio Gioia, of Amalfi, in the kingdom of Naples, A.D. 1302. JOSEPHUS.—"Cassell's Educational Course" is re-issued in weekly numbers, three-halfpence each. The first volume, "Science Popularly Explained," is complete in twenty numbers. The first chapter of a course of very easy French lessons will be found in No. 23 of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER.

MARIA.—Straw plait may be bleached by immersing it in a weak solution of chloride of lime, and afterwards washing it well in water.

EFFEMINATUS, A LOVER OF LITERATURE.—See the advice given to "Marian Bruce" in No. 20, page 320.

I O U.—is the correct legal form.

EMMA JANE, D. N. N., AND OTHERS.—Mr. J. F. Smith's tale, "Smiles and Tears," began with the first number of the new series, bearing date December 5.

GOETHE.—Our quotation from Goethe had no reference whatever to you. We cannot encourage you to emigrate.

M.—The French Dictionary was published in 1854; but the advertisement of it is renewed from time to time.

W. CARPENTER.—A good razor paste is thus prepared:—Prepared putty powder, 1 oz.; powdered oxalic acid, $\frac{1}{4}$ oz.; powdered gum, 20 grains. Make it into a stiff paste with water, and spread it evenly and thinly over the strop. With very little friction this paste gives a fine edge; its efficiency is increased by moistening it.

W. M. G.—There have been eleven painters, more or less celebrated, of the name of Franck, but we know of no one who spelt his name Franks.

H. J. W.—You will require a license to sell tea, price 11s. 6d.

ONE IGNORANT.—Dipsomania (from two Greek words, "thirst" and "madness") is a name given to a disease which consists in an insatiable desire for alcoholic drinks. Meliora means "better things."

E. A. M. D. has not re-stated her questions, and we cannot engage to search for them.

MR. GEORGE SISSON.—This gentleman, while acknowledging the correctness of our memoir of his late brother, in reference to his exemplary industry and talents, wishes us to state that the writer is misinformed as to their mother being "very illiterate, and unable to read or write." On the contrary, he says, "She taught all her children to read and write, and was scholar enough to perform all the necessary caligraphic transactions in connection with their father's business, which was that of a farm bailiff, buying and selling stock, &c."

QUEEN MAY.—If at the time of placing the ring on the lady's finger no allusion was made to matrimony, the giving and receiving the ring could not constitute an engagement; but supposing the gentleman had no serious intentions, his conduct was very deceptive and reprehensible.

VALENTINE, FLORA, A SENSITIVE ONE, ROSA, AND ELIZABETH.—We advise "Valentine" to make the gentleman no present until he has made her one, to walk with him only in well frequented promenades, and to dispense entirely with the familiarity she mentions. "Flora" must recollect that their persons should be judged rather by their actions than their professions. This being the case, she should shun a man who could be so forgetful of propriety. "A Sensitive One" (who expresses herself remarkably well) must be on her guard lest she become too sensitive. We give her this caution without approving of the conduct of the gentleman. Etiquette as well as good feeling should have induced him to refrain from smoking when he found it was disagreeable to "A Sensitive One;" but as he is, on the main, kind-hearted and generous, we recommend his being forgiven this once. In "Rosa's" case we see no reason for John's not proposing if he really loves her, and we advise her to endeavour to drive him from her heart if he does not soon declare himself honourably. "Elizabeth" is not likely to be the chosen partner of a professional musician, unless her manners are very superior to her writing and her orthography. Our candid opinion is, that the pianist has no real regard for her, and we consider she would be much happier with a suitor of her own rank in life.

LOFTUS.—You are right; the mustard plant is not finer in Durham than in any other county, but this condiment is called Durham mustard from the following circumstance. It occurred to an old woman of the name of Clements, residing in Durham, to grind the seed in a mill and pass it through the several processes which are resorted to in making flour from wheat. Mrs. Clements kept the secret for years. She supplied the principal towns in the kingdom with her Durham mustard, and George I. approved of it and rendered it fashionable.

BEAUTY.—In reply to your question we can only state, that the "Matron" is written originally and solely for CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER. When the numbers are completed, it will probably be reproduced in a cheap form suited to the requirements of the million.

YOUTH AND AGE.—There is no reason why sleeping with a healthy though elderly lady should be injurious to the health of a little girl, excepting that the fear of disturbing this old lady might impose a restraint on the child, and this, by making her uncomfortable, would disturb her rest. To your second question the reply is, all excess in feeling is wrong, and generally produces a reaction. The passionate friendship you describe often precedes a quarrel, and final estrangement.

A COUNTRY GILL.—It was under the auspices of George III., and in the year 1768, that the Royal Academy was founded. Sir Joshua Reynolds was the first President. To him have succeeded Sir Benjamin West, Sir Thomas Lawrence, Sir Martin Arthur Shee, and Sir Charles Eastlake.

HAMLET.—The colour and appearance of your hair, and also of your nose, depend on your general health. The limpness of hair you describe, indicates weakness. If you are not very liable to catch cold, we advise you, after the weather has become warm, to commence cold bathing (having first taken a couple of warm baths). But recollect that after bathing, you should always take sufficient exercise to promote free circulation of the blood. We recommend you to leave off using pomatum and light oil, and to use red oil. Strange as the assertion may appear, it gives an auburn hue to red hair.

L. M. N.—The pretty plumage of the Robin Red Breast, and the pleasing familiarity of its habits would make it a favourite; but there is a legend current in the West of France, that must induce us to look at this little bird with peculiar interest. This legend tells us, that while our Saviour was bearing his cross, one of these birds took a thorn from his crown, which dyed its breast; and ever since that time, Robin Redbreasts have been the friends of man.

A SAILOR.—We can readily believe that your assertions respecting the influence of the moon in warm climates are received with incredulity. You are right, nevertheless. Meat exposed to the rays of the moon in Bermuda will putrefy directly; and to sleep in the rays of the moon, while inhabiting that island, exposes one to contract dangerous and virulent fevers. Temporary blindness is another dreadful effect of exposure to the rays of the moon in high latitudes.

MARCUS.—The true love you have shown must reap its reward. Be frank with the object of your affections, and write her a letter something similar to that you have addressed to us. Do not forget to tell her that until you trembled for her life you had not been fully aware of the extent of your devotion to her. Do not (out of false delicacy) fear to touch on the sad result of her accident—viz., the loss of a limb. Assure her that this loss does not in the least alter your admiration and love. On perusing your letter she will be reassured; and we are much mistaken if the chilling reserve that distresses you so much does not make way for tenderness and gratitude.

MARIA, ISABELL, and many others.—Complexions, freckles, spots, flushed faces, hair-washes, and red noses, have been treated of at large in recent numbers of Cassell's New Series of the ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER. To these numbers we refer correspondents. We are unwilling to tire our readers with repetitions.

COLO.—Your letter is that of a clever, capable man. With perseverance you will probably secure some lucrative employment. Until you have done so your overtures are not likely to be well received by the lady's father.

DECOUC.—Your case is a painful one, but stammering may be got over, supposing the organs of articulation are uninjured. Persevere for three or four months in the simple remedy of reading aloud with the teeth closed. Do this for at least two hours in the course of each day.

A BERWICKSHIRE LABOURER'S WIFE.—Your request is reasonable, and it shall meet with attention.

A CONSTANT READER, BLUETT BAWN, AN ANXIOUS ONE, N. A. C.—"A Constant Reader," who is pretty, tall, and of the prepossessing age of seventeen, has no comfort in life because she is stout—forgetting that stoutness, when accompanied with a tall stature, is very much admired. "A Constant Reader" must reflect on the many advantages she possesses, and cultivate a thankful rather than a repining spirit. With activity, attention to general health, and moderate exercise, there is little fear of our correspondent's becoming too fat: she is much more likely to become thin when fairly exposed to the trials and conflicts of life. "Bluett Bawn" complains, not because he is so fat, but because he is so dark. Owing to this he declares he has long been vainly trying to get a wife. There is some strange mystery about this. Dark men are generally admired by the ladies. Some of the gentlemen of the present day get strange notions into their heads, and seem to think that ladies should court instead of being courted. We suspect "Bluett Bawn" belongs to this class. Let him change his tactics—become very polite and attentive to the fair. Let him banish bashfulness;

— and we will bet
There'll be a Mrs. Bluett yet."

"An Anxious One" seems quite satisfied with her appearance, and (if her account of herself is correct) not without cause. But she does not seem to be appreciated at home. She asks our advice as to whether she ought to go into service, but before we have had time to make up our mind, she tells us of a gentleman she loves, and actually thinks we would assist her in introducing herself to him. This shows how little "An Anxious One" is aware of our horror of forwardness in the fair sex. As our correspondent is not happy at home, we think the wisest thing she can do is to go into service. If her love is reciprocated, the object of it will not lose sight of her. If otherwise, the less she sees of him the better. "N. A. C.'s" case is rather a puzzling one. That the young lady allowed her acquaintance to be made in a manner so contrary to the laws of etiquette, does not speak for her discretion, but if "N. A. C." has entered into an engagement he cannot honourably break it off, on account of an imprudence into which he lured the lady, and of course knew of when he proposed to her.

CHARLES MOSHEW.—We should be the last to put you in communication with fortune-tellers, for we greatly approve of the law which renders their impositions punishable.

MARGARET LAURIE.—The ring received in marriage with the first husband, must be removed before that of the second can (in the marriage ceremony) be placed on the finger. No law is laid down respecting the arm to be offered to an engaged lady. Her convenience must decide the point. In a public concert or ball-room you are only expected to show attentions to your own private friends.

M. TRURO.—There exists an act of parliament passed in the reign of George III. by which an individual, giving a false character of a servant, is exposed to an action if any ill consequences occur from such conduct.

ZETETIE.—We highly approve of your conduct. The young lady (by the behaviour you describe) has forfeited all claim either to your love or friendship.

A SCHOOLBOY.—You do not seem to have acquired even a faint idea of the amount of a billion. A correct idea of the sum is beyond the limits of the human mind. You will be of our opinion when we tell you that if Adam at the beginning of his existence had begun to count, and continued to do so, and was counting still, he would not even now, according to the usually supposed age of our globe, have counted nearly enough.

CORNELIA.—A little dry wheaten bran rubbed frequently on the hands, will prevent their perspiring so much as to soil your lace or embroidery.

M. G. E.—A good black dye is formed by boiling logwood and green copperas in water.

HENRY M.—g.—You complain of our answer to "Valentine J.," without knowing what "Valentine J.'s" circumstances really were. You will certainly admit that they might have been such as to receive no improvement from marrying a journeyman with thirty shillings a week. On the other hand, we are willing to own that a sober, active, and kind-hearted young man might comfortably maintain an industrious, economical wife on the salary mentioned above.

J. BARTHO.—If your son were twenty-one years of age, before the expiration of his apprenticeship, he is bound to serve his master for the period of his time during which he was absent, if it be within seven years next after the expiration of such term.

SOLDIER OF FORTUNE.—Unless you are in a condition to settle in life, you had better not endeavour to gain the affections, and divert the attention of a governess from her important and profitable avocations.

A FRIEND OF SOCIETY.—Kilmahnam is a town in Ireland, in a valley half a mile from Dublin. It was the seat of government before the castle at Dublin was appropriated to that purpose. Cadiz is a fortified city in Andalusia, Spain.

ISA.—Cantyre, or Kintyre (not Cantire), is in Argyleshire, in the Western Highlands of Scotland.

W. J. SAUNDERS.—Apply at the office of the City Chamberlain.

H. MONTGOMERY.—Any respectable bookseller will obtain for you the volume you desire.

CLEANLINESS.—Use a stiffish brush, and finely powdered charcoal.

ANXIOUS.—You can have the numbers you need from Messrs. Petter and Galpin, or by order from any respectable bookseller in your own town.

E. P.—Inquire of some Islington bookseller.

BOUCHON.—Consult the Parliamentary Returns of Exports and Imports published annually.

J. HAW.—The work is out of print; but you had better apply to the publisher.

 We cannot guarantee the return of rejected manuscripts.

All Letters and Communications for the Editor to be addressed to JOHN CASSELL, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

London: Printed and published for JOHN CASSELL by PETTER and GALPIN, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

[THE RIGHT OF TRANSLATION AND REPUBLICATION IS RESERVED.]

NEW SERIES. VOL. I.—No. 25.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1858.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

JOHN FREDERICK SMITH, ESQ.
AUTHOR OF "SMILES AND TEARS," "DICK TARTLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," ETC

J. F. SMITH, ESQ.

IN compliance with the express desire of a very large number of subscribers, we have great pleasure in presenting the accompanying portrait of one who has contributed so much to the entertainment and instruction of our readers.

Mr. J. F. Smith is one of the most popular novelists of our age. His works, in their original language, have met with the most unequivocal success, not only in England but the Colonies and United States of America, whilst translations from them, both in fastidious France, deep-thinking Germany, as well as in Spain, have been received most enthusiastically. Few writers possess more varied powers. While awakening the interest of every intellectual reader, faithfully describing scenes of home life, graphically sketching the various phases of English character, there is still so much insight into the human heart, and so much knowledge of human nature, that his tales are universally acceptable. These are the characteristics of all truly great writers. They are not "cribbed, cabined, and confined" by national predilections. Their books have more than local interest; they depend on no single or contemporary sympathy—but are wide in their philanthropy and deep in their significance.

The novels of Mr. J. F. Smith are familiar to our subscribers. They have followed with interest the hair-breadth "scapes of the "Soldier of Fortune;" have joined company with "Dick Tarleton" in all the varied circumstances of his chequered career; have watched the shifting scenes of the "Phases of Life;" have caught the strain of the pibroch, and gazed on the gallant march of the "Young Pretender;" while from week to week his "Smiles and Tears" has excited such universal sympathy, that it has been generally pronounced the most successful work of his prolific pen. Comment on these varied productions is unnecessary. The characters which Mr. J. F. Smith has so ably drawn are realities; they are the result of extensive experience and close observation. The scenes which he has described are no mere fancy sketches; the stories which he has constructed have a truthfulness about them which insures a lengthened vitality. The high moral tone of this gentleman's compositions is a marked and honourable feature. He never panders to vice, nor paints the brutal and abandoned in attractive colours. While he has stood forth as the unflinching advocate of the poor, the wretched, and the ignorant, he has never shunned to denounce vice, whether clothed in rags or purple.

We confidently believe that Mr. J. F. Smith has rendered essential service to the cause of human progress by his highly popular fictions. He is an undoubted favourite with the reading public, and well deserves the success he has achieved. It is with great pleasure, therefore, we once more remind our subscribers that the services of this justly popular author are secured exclusively for the FAMILY PAPER, an intimation rendered necessary from his bearing a name certainly not uncommon. Mr. J. F. Smith is a native of Norwich, whose inhabitants, we doubt not, feel justly proud of including in the number of their fellow-citizens a gentleman whose name has become a household word throughout England.

ENDURE HARDSHIP.—As a gladiator trained the body, so must we train the mind to self-sacrifice, "to endure all things," to meet and overcome difficulty and danger. We must take the rough and thorny roads as well as the smooth and pleasant; and a portion at least of our daily duty must be hard and disagreeable; for the mind cannot be kept strong and healthy in perpetual sunshine only, and the most dangerous of all states is that of constantly recurring pleasure, ease, and prosperity. Most persons will find difficulties and hardships enough without seeking them; let them not repine, but take them as a part of that educational discipline necessary to fit the mind to arrive at its highest good.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER XLIX.

Who hath not proved how feebly words essay
To fix one spark of beauty's heavenly ray?
Who doth not feel, until his failing sight
Faints into dimness with its own delight,
His changing cheek—his sinking heart confess
The might, the majesty of loveliness?

BYRON.

THE first great epoch in the dawn of manhood is when the heart finds a voice whispering the name of one loved being—when her image haunts us, and a thousand waking dreams possess the brain, painting a happy, but, alas! too often unreal, future. At this important crisis our hero had arrived; feelings, whose novelty both pleased and startled him, burst into existence—feelings graceful and tender as the earliest flowers of spring—delicious buds of opening promise.

Conscious of the importance of the motives which brought him to India, and the peculiar position in which, from the concealment of his name, he was placed, he struggled for awhile to repress the rising passion; but the task proved beyond his strength. It was in vain that he devoted himself with increased assiduity to the business of Mr. Chutnee's counting-house—even there the recollection of Lillian pursued him—or endeavoured to stifle the new-born passion by violent exercise when the affairs of the day were over. After galloping his thorough-bred Arab along the banks of the Hooghly, as desperately as if he were riding a race against time, his course invariably ended in a call at the residence of Sir Charles Fourreau, till the noble animal he bestrode became at last so well acquainted with the road which lead to it that his master had only to give him the rein, and he would proceed there of his own accord.

Neither was Lillian heart-whole. The blind god's spell had shadowed her with its musing, melancholy influence. During the day she appeared sad, lost in commune with her own thoughts, or indulging in that delicious dreaminess which renders the eye and ear inattentive to surrounding influences.

Lady Bell, who loved her with a mother's love, was not slow to perceive this change in the manner of her adopted child, and perfectly comprehended the cause. Affection is ever watchful. She had long since perceived the state of Richard's feelings with pleasure—for, of all the young men of her acquaintance, he was the only one to whom she could have consigned the innocent and lovely girl with the full and intimate conviction that, as far as manliness of heart, high principle, and devoted love, could insure the happiness of woman, he was calculated to do so.

One point alone puzzled and baffled her penetration. Although she had with infinite tact given him more than one occasion of declaring himself, he had hitherto avoided an eclaircissement.

His hesitation annoyed her, but did not shake her confidence in his honour or the purity of his intentions.

What a weak thing the resolution of man is when the heart rebels against its being carried out.

Richard had argued himself into the conviction that, with a sacred duty to perform, it would be wrong in him, very wrong, to yield to what he considered a weakness, by attempting to win the heart of Lillian under a feigned name. In the natural delicacy of his sentiments, probably he considered it something more than weakness—dishonourable.

Win the heart of Lillian! alas! it was no longer to be won, the prize was his already.

How frequently do we see resolves which those who make them vainly pronounce to be of iron, conclusions which reason has pronounced unimpeachable, give way before a word, a look, or, above all, a tear? His nature must be stern indeed when it can resist the last, especially when it falls from the eyes of those we love.

With a mind more determined than ever not to pledge the happiness of the fair girl to a future which still appeared dark and uncertain, Richard Tyrrell, at the close of his daily occupation in the counting-house, mounted his horse as usual, in the hope that action, the excitement of dashing at the whirlwind's pace along the undulating banks of the river, might cool the fever in his heart. But it was not to be cooled; exercise seemed rather to increase it. Vainly the young horseman wooed the breeze which at sunset plays along the stream; it seemed but to fan the flame. Tired out at last he relaxed the rein, and his horse cantered off in the usual direction.

"I can turn at the ghaat," thought its rider.

The landing-place was passed, but it was with the full resolution of taking the next turning, which led to his own home. Somehow, doubtless the youthful portion of our readers can explain why, the second intention proved as unstable as the first, and the foaming Arab drew up on the parade-ground in front of the residence of Sir Charles.

Several grooms hastened to take his horse; it was a contest amongst them which should succeed, for they had frequently experienced its rider's generosity.

On entering the saloon, Richard found that it was untenanted. Neither Lady Bell nor her adopted child were there. The former was engaged in giving directions to Rose for the journey on the following day to the hills. The veranda, which looked upon an extensive garden at the back of the house, invited him to walk forth in the hope of finding them.

Lillian, a prey to her secret meditations, had only preceded him a few minutes. He discovered her seated under the shade of a wide-spreading peepul tree, whose rich flowers sent forth a delicious perfume.

His approach was unnoticed till he stood before her. The fair girl, conscious upon whom her thoughts had been engaged, started to her feet and blushed deeply as she extended her hand to him.

It trembled within his.

"I thought I should find you here," he exclaimed. "The saloon is untenanted."

"Lady Bell is engaged," replied the maiden; "and the freshness of the evening tempted me to the garden. I will inform her ladyship that you are here."

"Do not let me drive you away," said our hero, still retaining her hand in his. "It is the hour for enjoying the beauty of nature."

The eyes of the speaker were riveted upon one of her masterpieces. Never had he seen her look so lovely.

The lovers—for unconsciously they were such—lingered for a few moments, watching one of those glorious sunsets which Claude might have mistaken for an Indian scene, so broad was the flood of golden light upon the slopes of the garden and the distant hills crested with the feathery palm and underwood of richly-tinted foliage.

Both were silent; they felt too happy in each other's society to break the spell by words which neither dared to make the echo of their thoughts.

The air, laden with the perfume of a thousand flowers, whose delicate leaves it scarcely ruffled in its course, was so calm and still, that the buzz of the myriad insects, and amongst others the fire-fly, which already began to put forth its phosphorescent light, could be distinctly heard.

But although the voices of the youthful pair were hushed, their hearts communicated through their mutual sympathy with the beautiful in nature. Their eyes, too, were eloquent; for, scarcely had one discovered some fresh charm in the glowing landscape, than a glance pointed it out, and communicated the pleasure it afforded to the other.

To Lillian this dream-like happiness was as unalloyed as her own innocent nature. If her feelings were deep, they were also calm as the placid lake which encircling mountains screen from the storm's rude breath. Not so her companion's—there was an alloy in his felicity; his heart longed to speak, to pour forth the eloquent passion of a love, whose burning words rose to his lips.

The thought of the future, however, still restrained him.

"This scene is indeed beautiful," observed Richard Tyrrell, at last breaking the silence. "Never till this moment did I appreciate the full loveliness of the Indian landscape—its graceful palms, brilliant vegetation, undulating hills, and cloudless skies. Its beauties, compared with those of our distant island home, are of a less tender, thoughtful character, if I may be allowed the expression, but far more magnificent."

"You have described in a few words the characteristics of both lands," she replied. "India is magnificent, and you appear so charmed with its glorious skies, its dreams, and poetry, that I presume it is your intention to remain in it."

"Perhaps!"

Lillian regarded him inquiringly.

"I am like a bark without rudder or compass at present," he continued, "at the mercy of the waves or accident; they may cast me on some desert shore, without one hope for the wrecked heart to shelter in."

"Say, rather, on some verdant isle," observed his companion, in a tone which betrayed the deep interest she felt in his welfare, "where you may find a home of happiness and sweet content. Fie, Richard, fie!" she added, for she had long since ceased to address him by the formal appellation of Mr. Tyrrell; "why doubt the goodness of Providence or the energies of your own highly gifted nature?"

"It is not energy I require," answered the young man. "I am sure not."

"Or an aim; unfortunately, I possess both. It is that I perceive as yet no termination to the task I have imposed—the difficulties appear impassable."

"Impassable!" repeated the orphan, "to perseverance and—"

She hesitated, not liking to pronounce the word.

"Wealth!" he exclaimed, finishing the sentence for her. "True, I am rich, but the heart has other feelings and aspirations than those which gold can gratify."

Lillian blushed deeply, and turned aside. "Love," he continued, "leaping with the word the barriers of prudence and reserve which he had lately pronounced impassable. "Nay, turn not from me, for my destiny, my future happiness, depend upon this moment. I love you, Lillian, not with a boyish passion that were unworthy of you; but with manhood's fervour, reason's constancy. I know that I am unworthy of the return I ask; but one word—one little word—will make me less so, for it will give me hope, fresh courage to accomplish the sacred task I have assigned myself."

Both the speakers were children of nature, perfectly unfettered by the cold and artful forms which too frequently destroy the ingenuousness of youth. The word he alluded to, the word which was to exercise such an extraordinary influence over his future destiny, was spoken, or rather whispered, for Lillian breathed it forth so gently that none but a lover's ears could have caught the sound.

In an instant he was upon his knees, covering her trembling hand with a thousand kisses, and uttering vows which, when the heart is true, are graven upon it indelibly as on the granite; when false, transient as those which passion writes on sand.

We need not paint the intoxication of the moment when first the lip of woman breathes into the ear of manhood the confession of its love. The soul expands—enters on a new existence—and all around partakes of Eden's bliss.

"Oh, Richard," exclaimed the fair girl, "I have acted selfishly, ungenerously by you. Take back the vow I never should have received."

"What mean you?"

"That I am poor—"

"Rich, Lillian," interrupted her lover. "Rich in life's best graces—beauty, gentleness, and goodness. Such were an angel's dower."

"My birth too humble. The affection of Sir Charles and Lady Bell are my only passport to the circles I move in—the consideration which surrounds me."

"Is virtue nothing?" he replied. "Do not wrong yourself or the world by supposing that all men estimate your sex by the adventitious advantages of birth and fortune. No, Lillian, no, had you been as poor and humble as you paint yourself, my heart could never know another choice."

For several moments the speakers stood absorbed in their dream of love; but, to Richard, mingling with that dream came other thoughts. The declaration of his passion, and the avowal that it was shared, rendered an explanation with Sir Charles and Lady Bell imperative. Honour demanded it; and faithful to its dictates, he resolved at once to obey them by candidly revealing to the guardians of Lillian the circumstances under which he quitted England.

Fortunately he had in his pocket-book a letter which he had received that very day from his grandfather.

Drawing the arm of the fair girl within his, he led her towards the house, where he found both the baronet and her ladyship in the saloon.

As they quitted the garden, an Indian girl, named Kehoda, who had attended upon Lillian from the time of her arrival in Calcutta, emerged from a clump of trees, where she had been a concealed witness of their interview. Like an ill-omened shadow she glided from the grounds in an opposite direction, yet turned occasionally to watch the youthful pair, on whom she cast looks of hate and passion.

"In the garden so late," observed Sir Charles, seriously; "you forget, Lillian, that the night dews are dangerous."

The gravity of the speaker's tone and manner was occasioned by a feeling that Richard Tyrrell had not yet made his intentions as clear as he considered he ought to have done. Lady Bell, with a woman's tact, perceived at once what had occurred; and, taking Lillian by the arm, she led her from the room, leaving the two gentlemen to come to an explanation.

"Sir Charles," said our hero, with manly frankness, "I am glad that I have found you: for I could not have endured the suspense of a night, scarcely of an hour. The time has arrived when I must claim your indulgence."

The soldier bowed.

"And assistance: for I have deceived you."

His hearer looked surprised.

"I love Lillian."

"That I have long perceived," replied her guardian, "and wondered at your silence."

"She has blessed me by the avowal of her love," continued the youth; "and the happiness or misery of my life must depend on your decision."

"A few minutes since," said Sir Charles, "and I should have answered that this confession had fulfilled one of the secret wishes of my heart; but now I pause. I am a soldier, Mr. Tyrrell, and have a soldier's ideas of honour and straightforwardness, that cannot understand deceit. If the confessions which I presume, you are about to make merely imply that you are poor, I reply frankly, and at once, that fortune is not a consideration."

"I am rich enough, and shall, in all probability, one day be more so," replied the lover of Lillian.

"Perhaps it may affect your birth," observed the gentleman. "I have no prejudice on that score. The parents of my ward were, I believe, of humble origin."

"My birth," said Richard, "is as respectable as your own, Sir Charles—not noble, I avow—"

"If character, Mr. Tyrrell," interrupted the baronet, "I state at once that unblemished honour is an indispensable condition. Lillian must never blush for the name of her husband."

"The name of Tyrrell is not mine."

"Indeed!"

"It was the name of my maternal grandmother."

His hearer bowed stiffly.

"I am the grandson of one of the wealthiest of our English merchants—a man whose character stands high in the mart of trade, and unsullied in the eyes of the world. It was by his consent—nay, I may add entreaty—that I visited India under an assumed name."

"And the motive?"

"To rescue my father from an unmerited accusation—to clear his honour in my grandfather's eyes and in those of the world."

With the eloquence of truth and nature, our hero proceeded to relate the circumstances of his mother's marriage, her parents' anger and disappointment, the fatal weakness of her husband, the poverty into which they had fallen, his own temptation and its consequences. When he had done he concluded by placing in the hands of Sir Charles the last letter he had received from Mr. Bently.

There was something extraordinary in the narration; but, confirmed as it was by certain passages in his grandfather's letter, Sir Charles became convinced of its truthfulness. What but a high sense of honour could have induced the speaker to avow circumstances so painful to his feelings, humiliating to his pride, when he had but to maintain silence on the subject and all would have passed unsuspected? The recommendation of Mr. Curry and the introduction of the house of Chutnee and Company would have lulled all suspicion.

"My dear fellow!" exclaimed Sir Charles, extending his hand to him, which the young man shook most cordially; "strange as your story is, I believe every word of it; and will not conceal from you that you have removed a most unpleasant suspicion from my mind. When you spoke of having deceived me, I expected something far more terrible. The concealment of your real name, under the circumstances, was not only advisable but necessary."

"And I may hope—"

"Everything," replied the guardian of Lillian. "But you are both too young to think of marriage yet. Another year, my term of service will have expired, and I shall return to England."

"Alas!" exclaimed Richard, "my task may not be accomplished."

"Pooh! like most lovers, you first create a demon, and then turn pale at the monster you have made. We will bring the affair to an end long before the time arrives. You have given me a right by your confidence to interfere."

"What is the name of the firm," he added, "through which the acceptances were cashed in India?"

"Al Moorad and Company," replied our hero.

"Of Calcutta?"

"Yes."

The baronet made a note in his pocket-book.

"The senior partner," he observed, "died about two years since enormously wealthy. By his will, he directed that all his capital should be withdrawn from the firm, and distributed to his heirs; and I have heard that his successors are embarrassed occasionally for want of funds."

"I can answer that it is so," replied the young man; "twice, within the week, has Al Moorad been at our counting-house to solicit accommodation."

Sir Charles made a second memorandum.

"Have you much paper of his?" he asked.

"About five hundred and fifty thousand rupees."

"And what said Mr. Chutnee?"

"Declined his request; but Sanford, the managing clerk, talked him over till he consented. If there has been foul play, Sanford is the man I suspect."

"What are his antecedents?"

"He was a clerk in my relative's commercial establishment."

"Who sent him out to India?"

"My grandfather, on the recommendation of his nephew, Carus Kearny, who, at one time, was destined to be the husband of my mother."

"And do you suspect this nephew?"

"I do," replied Richard, "but it is without proof."

"Good," muttered the old soldier, pleased with his candour.

"In the next place, his uncle always avoided speaking of him in my presence."

"That is strange," observed Sir Charles Fourreau, musingly; "perhaps Mr. Bently feared to excite your jealousy."

"On what subject?"

"His fortune."

"It might have been mine before I came to India," answered our hero, modestly, "for the old man loves me, and when I first stated to him my intention of quitting England, of devoting my energies to clearing my father's fame, offered to settle his vast wealth on me irrevocably by deed of gift."

"Without conditions?"

"On the contrary, he wished to impose two."

"May I ask them?"

"The first was that I should consent to bear his name."

"You might have accepted that," observed Sir Charles.

"I did."

"And the second?"

"That I renounced all intercourse with my parents."

"Which you rejected?"

"With scorn," replied the young man; "for I would not barter the love of my dear mother and sister Mary for all the coined wealth of the universe; it would have been an act of infamy and cowardice, for I should have fixed the brand of reprobation on my father."

"You acted rightly," said his hearer, deeply moved by the manly, spirited conduct of the youth, who continued—

"If I consented to the estrangement for years from my parents which my grandfather enforced, it was from the conviction that the sorrow and self-reproach occasioned by my loss were necessary to confirm an erring father in the path of reformation, and not from an ignoble desire of personal advantage, or doubt of his honesty. I could as soon," he added, "doubt the truth of heaven, the purity of Lillian, or the kind friendship of Sir Charles Fourreau."

"It was your own proposal, then, to come to India and hunt out the core of this sad mystery?"

"It was."

"And your grandfather?"

"Consented most reluctantly; for I will not conceal from you that his suspicions, amounting almost to a conviction, are unfavourable to my father. He provided me, however, with the means of maintaining the position which I one day trust to hold; used his influence to procure me letters from the prime minister to the governor-general, and an introduction to the house of Chutnee and Company."

"But why the latter?"

"I selected it."

"Because this Sanford is the managing clerk there?"

"Even so."

"And wisely, too, my dear boy. I see it all; there is not a part or fragment of your somewhat singular history but dovetails and tallies with strict truth. You may find my assistance of more value than you at first imagined: I know something of the Indian character and the key to unlock their hearts. But come," he continued, "neither my wife nor my ward must be kept in suspense as to the result of our conversation. I will myself confide as much as I deem necessary to the former."

"And Lillian?"

"I authorise—nay, advise you to conceal all this from her," replied the baronet. "It can answer no good purpose to cloud the dawn of her young happiness with doubts and fears. The heart of a girl, when love first enters it, is easily alarmed by the thought of danger to the object of its choice."

Taking his visitor by the arm, the speaker proceeded with him from the salon to the boudoir of his wife, where the ladies were anxiously expecting their arrival—the orphan all blushes and agitation, and Lady Bell not quite satisfied at what she considered a somewhat unnecessary delay.

A smile from her husband reassured her. Drawing Lillian towards him, he kissed her with the utmost tenderness; then, placing her hand in Richard's, left the room. His wife only waited to bestow a similar favour upon our hero, to follow him. "You have spoken with my guardian?" inquired Lillian, modestly.

"I have; he is the best and noblest of mankind—he understood me, believed, trusted me, where many might have doubted. I shall owe to his confidence and your love the happiness of my life."

The simple-minded girl expressed no surprise, for she felt none. How could it enter her imagination, as she gazed upon the eloquent features and listened to the penetrating accents of his voice, that any one could doubt his truth?

It appeared monstrous—impossible.

CHAPTER L.

Sisters of Acheron, go hand in hand,
Go dance around the bow'r, inclose them in,
And tell them that I sent you to salute them.
Profane the ground, and, for the ambrosial rose
And breath of jessamine, let hemlock blacken,
And deadly nightshade poison all the air;
Let serpents, twining up the trees, let fall
Their hissing necks upon them from above,
And mingle kisses, such as I would give them.

YOUNG.

At daybreak the following morning the happy party started on horseback, to pay their promised visit to Mrs. Chutnee at her country residence, situated in a sheltered nook amongst the undulating chain of hills which form the right bank of the Hooghly.

The ladies wore riding habits of the thinnest nankeen, and large straw hats to guard them from the sun, which even at that early hour darted its burning rays upon the bosom of the earth, absorbing with a bacchanal's thirsty kiss the dew of the preceding night. The baronet and our hero, like all travellers in India, were dressed in white cotton frockcoats and trousers; whilst the costumes of the native grooms, of Kehoda, Lillian's Hindoo attendant, and the military undress of Corporal Stock, who never permitted his master to go anywhere without him, added to the picturesque appearance of the group which Nelson, Richard's Newfoundland dog, preceded, bounding with joy. Despite his thick curly coat, and incessant gambols, the noble animal appeared to suffer less from the heat than either the horses or their riders. Their place of destination was one of those delicious retreats the merchant princes of India prize themselves on possessing in the immediate neighbourhood of Calcutta, to which they generally retreat with their families during the intense heat of the summer months. Architecturally speaking, the house had not a single beauty to recommend it, and resembled a huge bungalow rather than a mansion, being a low, irregular pile, one storey high, with a broad veranda running the entire length of the facade, and connecting it with the offices, which stood a little apart from the principal building.

Art could not have added to, however unsuccessfully it might have marred, the loveliness of the spot, where nature reigned in graceful luxuriance. At the back of the house rose a thick wood, enfolding it in its shade; above the trees rose the feathery crest of the regal palm, defying rivalry; whilst the flowering poplar, and magnificent magnolia, perfumed every breath of air with the fragrance of their blossoms.

In front of this retreat, which, it must be confessed, the merchant had selected with great taste, was a small lake well stocked with gold fish and water fowl; on its banks, the blue-crested crane might be seen watching with patient gravity, till its finny prey approached the shallow waters, when suddenly it would dart its long neck beneath them, and spreading its strong wings, rise with some scaly victim struggling helplessly in its beak.

"How lovely!" exclaimed Lillian, as the party simultaneously drew rein to gaze upon the scene we have attempted to describe.

"England has spots that may compare to it," quietly observed Sir Charles, after a pause.

Rose, who was in attendance upon Lady Bell, sighed at the remark. India to her was a land of exile—not of promise.

"Do you not think so?" added the speaker, addressing himself to our hero.

How could our hero agree with him? True, he had contemplated many a spot of great beauty, both in Jersey and Devonshire—but never with Lillian by his side. Her presence would have transformed even a desert into fairy-land; and the landscape must have been sterile indeed which, under such circumstances, he would not have pronounced unrivalled.

"How is it possible Mr. Tyrrell should be of your opinion?" demanded Lady Bell.

"Why not?"

"Why not?" repeated her ladyship, laughingly. "O you men, you men! what unimaginative creatures you are, with eyes only for the material. Do you remember the fish-pond at the Cedars?"

"Perfectly," answered her husband, slightly embarrassed, for he began to comprehend her.

The Cedars was the name of the seat of the two maiden aunts of his wife, and the place where Sir Charles had wooed and won his bride.

"And the boat, the tame ducks, the rustic seat under the old elm?"

"Can I ever forget them?" exclaimed the baronet, gallantly.

"You once pronounced that little pond, with its creamy, mantling face, more picturesque than the Lake of Geneva; and the fat ducks, the rustic seat, and elm—"

"The most romantic accessories!" interrupted the gentleman. "And I think so still. There, I have said my mea culpa; forgive me!"

The pardon was conveyed to him in a smile.

"Richard," said the speaker, good-humouredly, "be careful of your vows. Remember that every word will be written down against you, and that to break or forget a single one of them will be considered little short of treason and punished accordingly."

"I have no fear," replied our hero, with a glance of intense affection towards Lillian; "for mine are registered in my heart."

At this moment Nelson, who probably considered that the speakers had indulged in their contemplation of the scene long enough, bounded forwards with a joyous bark, dashed into the lake, scattering the terrified water-fowl in all directions. At the repeated call of his master the noble animal returned, shaking his dripping coat, and looking as penitent as any well-bred dog could be expected to look after such an escapade.

The visitors once more gave their horses the rein, for Zamora appeared in the veranda waving her handkerchief with child-like joy in sign of welcome, and a short canter brought the party to the house.

After the usual greetings, the mistress of the mansion, leaving the gentlemen to the care of her husband, conducted the ladies to their rooms, to change their travelling costume.

"Lillian," she said, after regarding her attentively, "how you are changed!"

The fair girl blushed deeply.

"You have lost that sad and thoughtful air, which lately cast a shadow on your features," she continued. "Were I to read your heart through your eyes, I should say it danced for joy."

"And you would judge rightly," answered Lady Bell, drawing her adopted daughter towards her. "We must have no secrets, my love," she added, "from Zamora."

"No, mamma."

With a bright and sunny smile—which could only have been reflected from a pure and virtuous heart—Mrs. Chutnee threw her arms round the orphan and kissed her; she comprehended her happiness. There was no occasion for words—the action expressed her sympathy far more eloquently.

"I believe," exclaimed the speaker, after a moment's thoughtfulness, "that I ought to feel terribly disappointed."

Her visitors repeated the word with surprise.

"And exceedingly ill-used," continued her hostess, with difficulty repressing one of her joyous laughs. "I had made up my mind that the éclaircissement should take place here—arranged such a pretty surprise—instead of which, I am the party surprised."

"You will forgive me," said Lillian: "it was not my fault."

"I believe it was your fault," replied Zamora, gravely; "you have no business to look so provokingly beautiful. How could the poor fellow help it? And I can't even be bridesmaid on the occasion. Will any one divorce me," she added; "only for a day—one little day?"

"Your husband might object to that," observed her ladyship, laughingly.

"Not unlikely," answered Mrs. Chutnee, "men are so unreasonable. Not all, Lillian," she continued, with a smile of encouragement; "Sir Charles, for instance, is one exception."

"And Richard is another," observed the fair girl, in a tone so gentle and full of confidence that it sounded like the murmuring of a happy dream.

Left to herself, our heroine fell into one of those delicious reveries which haunt the heart of youth,—occasionally visit it in age, melting the frost winter has gathered round it. There is something too sacred in that which Shakespeare has felicitously characterised as for the pen to describe. In fact, we know of no pen, save his own, qualified for the task; and even he shrank from it. How, then, can we presume to venture on the attempt? As well seek to paint the tints of the rainbow, or the ever-varying hues of the feathery-crested waves kissed by the sunset ray.

"Maiden meditation fancy free,"

Raising her eyes suddenly, Lillian beheld her attendant, Kehoda, standing with her arms folded at a short distance from her. There was something in the features of the Indian girl which, had she been a stranger, would have startled her—her large, dreamy eyes were riveted upon her face, with what seemed a menacing expression, and her lips, from which the colour had fled, were closely compressed together.

"Are you ill?" demanded her mistress, kindly.

The sound of her voice seemed to break the spell under which the Hindoo girl laboured, and in an instant her countenance resumed its ordinary calm repose.

"Not ill," was the reply; "it is the heart that suffers."

Our heroine regarded her with surprise.

"Kehoda," added the girl, "was born near this spot, and has a sister in the temple of the goddess Mariatele, a few miles distant."

"And you would visit her!" exclaimed Lillian; "renew the love of childhood—fold her in your arms—listen to the words of affection?"

The Hindoo bowed gracefully.

"Depart at once," added the speaker. "It would be cruel to detain you."

Kehoda muttered something about assisting her to dress.

"A few minutes will suffice for that," observed her happy mistress. "Twine these flowers in my hair, and—there, I can do the rest myself."

The toilette of the fair speaker was speedily completed, who, renewing the permission she had previously given, quitted the room, leaving her attendant by herself.

"I must go," muttered Kehoda, as soon as the receding footsteps of Lillian warned her that she was alone. "I am summoned, and dare not disobey the token, which can only be meant for me."

She pointed as she spoke to a superb lotus flower surrounded by blossoms of the yellow tamisk, forming the centre of a large bouquet placed conspicuously on the dressing-table.

"It means danger to one or both of them," she continued, musingly; "but why should I regret it? Richard Tyrrell has no love for the poor Indian girl; his heart is fixed upon her mistress. And hers upon him," she added, bitterly; "I can read it in the blush which mantles her pale face whenever he is named; but, oh, she does not, cannot love him with a love like mine!"

Here the speaker crossed her arms over her bosom, and seated herself upon the ground, despondingly.

"What can the Christian girls know of love?" she resumed, in a tone of sorrow. "The sun, which disdains to kiss their sickly cheeks, kindles no passion in their hearts, which are cold as the waters of oblivion. Why should she be preferred to me?" she continued. "Am I less beautiful? my form less graceful? Could he but see me as I once appeared, within the temple, before the priests, who, to further their dark policy, condemned me to quit its sacred precincts and assume the garb of servitude, to act the part of spy upon the race they fear."

Rising from her lowly seat, the speaker drew her veil around her, after the manner of her countrywomen when they wish to avoid being recognised, and quitted the house. As she glided like a shadow into the wood, her eyes fell upon our hero and Lillian standing together in the veranda, and the sight increased the bitterness of her feelings.

"Smile whilst you may," she muttered between her close-set teeth. "Soon will your joy be changed to grief, for night does not more surely follow the close of day than the hate of Kehoda and those she serves shall overtake you."

To avoid a repetition of a sight so distasteful to her jealous feelings, the unhappy girl—unhappy in her misplaced passion—plunged into the deepest recesses of the wood, every winding of which from childhood had been familiar to her, and with feverish steps pursued her way till she stood in front of the temple of Mariatele.

To such of our readers as are unacquainted with the peculiarities of the Hindoo mythology, it may be necessary to state that Mariatele is the name of a goddess who is supposed to take the pariahs, thieves, —including the respectable fraternity of Thugs, or strangers—and the outcasts of every caste, under her immediate protection. If her temples are not the most magnificent, they at least class with the richest in India. It is in their recesses that the Nautch or dancing girls are trained, rites and mysteries celebrated which good taste forbids us to describe, and the mere toleration of which is a reproach to the Christian rulers of India.

THE DECLARATION

How could the Hindoo—who, after all, is more logical in his reasoning than we give him credit for—believe that Englishmen were sincere in the faith they professed, when they saw them not only subsidising the priesthood of an obscene, idolatrous worship, but too often witnessing its horrors?

We have a fearful account to give of our conduct in India—may the future atone for the past!

The chief of the temple was an aged Brahmin, named Nadir, a man exceedingly well known to the native inhabitants of Calcutta from his reputed sanctity; and, we regret to add, to the young officers and cadets of the Indian army, many of whom were in the habit of visiting him at the shrine of the false deity he served. He was a tall, venerable-looking man, with a long, flowing beard, white as snow, and a face puckered into a thousand wrinkles, especially about the eyes, which, when not cast down (as they generally were) towards the earth, betrayed great cunning and mingled ferocity of expression.

Al Moorad and Nadir were seated upon a pile of cushions, in one of the most secret recesses of the temple—a large vaulted chamber, upon whose walls native artists had painted the incarnations of Vishnu. The countenance of the banker betrayed great irritation and impatience, whilst that of his companion appeared calm and passionless.

"Wait," said the latter, emphatically, "Time vanquishes all save faith."

"Wait!" repeated his disciple, in an angry tone: "I have waited till my heart is turned to gall. I tell you, father, that I love this Christian girl wildly—madly—hopelessly!"

"Not hopelessly," answered the priest, "since I have promised to make her yours: and when did Nadir break his word?"

"It is on the faith of that promise," observed Al Moorad, "that I have sold myself—risked life and fortune upon a project which—"

"Must succeed," added the old man; "the gods have willed it. The hour of our shame and subjugation is passing rapidly away. The rule of the infidel conquerors of India's hundred thrones will soon be broken!"

"You believe this," exclaimed his hearer, "with your experience?"

"The gods have willed it!" repeated the Brahmin, in the same cold and unimpassioned tone. "It is written in the holy Vedas!"

This was an assertion which no faithful follower would dare dispute, unanswerable from an ambitious priesthood, who pretend to an exclusive right of interpreting the sacred books.

"You know, father, that I have a rival," said the Hindoo, after a pause.

"I have not forgotten him," was the reply; and the eyes of the speaker sparkled with hate.

"A successful one?"

"So my spy informs me."

"You promised to remove him," added Al Moorad, moodily.

"And will keep my promise," answered the old priest. "To accomplish it, I have summoned Kehoda to the temple. The token hath gone forth."

"She may disobey it." The priest touched the mystical cord, the emblem of his sacerdotal rank, which hung from his right shoulder.

"You forget," he said, "that she is a sworn servant of the temple, and that the penalty of disobedience is death."

Libertine and heartless as he was, his hearer shuddered: for, being one of the initiated, he knew the peculiar kind of death the speaker alluded to.

We cannot explain ourselves more clearly on the subject, but many a retired Indian officer, when he peruses these pages, will comprehend it. The suttee and infanticide were not the only murders committed under the sanction of priesthood in India.

In order to cheer the spirits of his guest and wife away the hours till the arrival of the girl, Nadir clapped his hands thrice, a signal for the alma, or dancing girls, of the temple to appear. Probably they had expected to be summoned: for, in an instant, they came bounding in to the sound of distant music, and executed one of their religious dances.

As they concluded, Kehoda made her appearance—no longer clad in the simple costume which she wore in the house of Sir Charles Forreau, but in a light dress tissue, which floated like a silver mist around her form, half veiling its exquisite proportions. Strings of pearls were round her neck, and bangles of gold upon her ankles and arms.

At a second signal from the priest, all the females except the last came retired, and she stood with her arms folded in an attitude of profound respect before him.

"It is well," said the old man, "you have received my summons."

"On entering the house of the Frangi, the sacred lotus, emblem of duty, and the tamrisk, token of death for disobedience, met my gaze."

"And how like you this residence with the Christians in Calcutta?" demanded Nadir, eyeing her curiously.

"As the flower of the garden when transported to the desert," replied the girl. "My heart consumes there."

"For love, perhaps."

For an instant the alma girl appeared slightly agitated, then, raising her dark eyes, and fixing them reproachfully upon the speaker, she asked, in a subdued tone—

"What has the initiated and devoted to Maratelo to do with love?"

The old man nodded approvingly.

"True," he said; "the question was a needless one. Hold forth your hand."

Kehoda extended it towards him. He rubbed the palm and fingers with the leaves of some plant which he took from a small packet in his girdle.

"Have you faith?" he asked.

"I have faith," was the response.

"Draw forth the contents of yonder vessel, then."

answered the Brahmin, at the same time pointing to a vase of porcelain in one corner of the room.

Kehoda did as she was commanded, first removing the lid. The instant that she did so, the head of the cobra—the deadliest of the serpent tribe—rose above the opening, its hood distended in sign of anger, and hissing fearfully; but, without a moment's hesitation, the girl grasped it gently in her hand—when, strange to say, the rage of the reptile seemed gradually to subside; and, although she held it gently, it made no effort either to bite or to escape.

"What am I to do with it?" she demanded, without moving a muscle of her features, or betraying the least symptom of fear. Probably she was aware that the precaution taken was an efficient antidote.

"Return to the house of the merchant Chutnee," replied Nadir.

"The will of the priest is law to Kehoda," answered the girl.

"And place the cobra in the bed of the young Englishman, Tyrell."

For an instant the girl appeared to hesitate; but the knowledge of the dreadful fate that awaited her should she betray her feelings, nerved her with desperate courage, and she once more exclaimed aloud—

"The will of the priest is law to Kehoda."

(To be continued.)

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

SINCERITY.

HONESTY belongs as much to language and life as to the pocket. A man who is insincere in his expressions, and who regulates his outer life by principles for which he has no reverence in his heart, is dishonest—even though he pays every account with scrupulous punctuality. There are thousands of dishonest talkers and dishonest lives in the world, and against joining their ranks youth cannot be too strongly warned. We would say to our young readers, forget not that important element in every upright character—sincerity. Remember that sincerity will adorn your intellect and ennoble your heart; that it will make you respected and esteemed in the sight of all true men; that it will make your life attractive, your language forcible, your influence benign.

In the first place, the companionship of the sincere is most attractive to all men of merit. "Of all the divinities that nature has discovered to the mind of man, the most beautiful is truth." So said one of the heathen writers. Christianity teaches us the same lesson, and the word of inspiration tells us "the lips of truth shall be established for ever."

The sincere man verifies to himself and all the world that "he is a freeman whom the truth makes free, and all are slaves beside." His latent virtues render him fascinating, and his purity of purpose is a constant source of solace and defence. His honesty may offend the flippant, or exasperate the vicious, but it wins the favour of all those whose favour is of solid worth. It insures also an inward satisfaction which amply repays any loss it may occasion. Morally, we are not to be like oarsmen pulling one way and looking another. We are not to be outwardly what we are not inwardly. We have not to play a part, but to live a life. A little sterling gold—though obscured—is far better than a great deal of burnished and ostentatious brass. And just so a little plain sincerity is more really valuable than the most complete and elaborate counterfeit.

We remark, in the second place, that the language of sincerity is always the more forcible. The way to speak with power, or to write burning words, is to speak and write honestly. He who draws from his own sincere convictions, will touch and thrill kindred sentiments in every other breast. Hence the wisdom of Sidney's maxim, "Look into thy heart and write."

Superficial minds usually lack sincerity—strong ones never; for those who are honest in their opposition, right or wrong, found their reason and their conduct on what they feel to be true. "Let him," says Thomas Carlyle, "who would move and convince others, be first moved and convinced himself."

No man can be first-rate who is not thoroughly sincere. An experienced barrister once remarked, that he never feared the effect upon a jury of a lawyer who did not believe in his heart that his client ought to have a verdict.

In the third place, we notice that the influence of the sincere man is in every way benign. Men by force elevate empires, which under force are again speedily reduced to ruin. Sooner or later force overcomes force. But sincerity is invincible. The man who utters a great truth, or makes an important discovery in the physical or intellectual world, has accomplished something which no force can destroy, and which is left for the use and profit of all succeeding ages.

In every period of the world's history men have arisen who, in the benign influence of their lives, have proved that sincerity is the element of the greatest power. By these men the world has been advanced. They have not marched triumphant over the globe—terror heralding their approach, and desolation following in their train—but they have accomplished great and active victories, beside which those of Cyrus, Alexander, and Caesar sink into insignificance. They have dwelt in some obscure quarter, they have been poor, persecuted, and despised, but they have worked on bravely; and have left the world better than they found it. Sincerity is a homely virtue that finds its proper place in daily conduct, and in the commonest affairs of life; and which, wherever it exists, imparts dignity and nobility to the character. We cannot, therefore, urge too strongly on the reader the necessity and advantage of sincerity in all the affairs of life. Be true—be honest—an honest man is the noblest work of God.

FRENCH LESSONS.

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF ACQUIRING THE FRENCH LANGUAGE.

CHAPTER III.

ON the following morning, instead of receiving the usual salutation, George was greeted with a correct repetition of all the French sentences dictated to Robert during the preceding lesson.

"I do so long to have acquired the pronunciation, dear George," said the pupil, when his French was exhausted, "and to be able to read anything placed before me without putting your patience and ingenuity to so severe a test, by making you spell every sound for me."

"I am glad to see you are ambitious, Robert," replied his friend. "You may be sure the sooner you can run alone, the better pleased I shall be; and by acquiring the vowel sounds we left unconsidered during the last lesson, you will be taking a very important step."

"A and e you are now quite familiar with, and you know how in French these letters are sounded, in all their modifications. I and o will form the chief subject of to-day's study. As to u, it was included in the remarks about e; and if you were really as attentive as you seemed to be, you must have conquered the sound of that very peculiar vowel."

"On referring to your alphabet with sounds, you will perceive that in French the general sound of i is that of our e. We will now go on to consider its sound when formed into a syllable with other letters."

"I with e, t, s, or l, is sounded the same as when alone, but if the consonant placed after the i should itself be followed by a vowel, then that consonant is sounded."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.	SOUND.
It is terrible.	C'est terrible.	Say terreeble.
You are little.	Vous êtes petit.	Voozate pee-tee.
The child is pleasing.	L'enfant est gentil.	Longfaung ashong-tee.
She is pretty.	Elle est jolie.	Ella shoole.
No, said he.	Non, dit il.	Nong, dectee.
A last resource.	Un pis-aller.	Ung pee-zallay.
He is there.	Il est là.	Ill a lah.

"In French the vowel o has much the same sound as with us, and when made into a syllable with t, s, or p, it sounds just the same as if it were alone; but if, when these consonants are placed after o, a vowel should follow them, then the said consonants must be sounded."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.	SOUND.
A modern thing.	Une chose moderne.	Une shoze modairn.
What! so soon?	Comment! si tôt?	Kommaung! see toe?
Here are the backs.	Voici les dos.	Vwacie lay doe.
It is too much.	C'est trop.	Say tro.
The first people in the town.	Les notables de la ville.	Lay notahble de lah veel.
Do you dare?	Osez-vous?	Ozay voo.
Too ardent.	Trop ardente.	Trop ardente.

"I have not yet quite done with o. When i, is, or it are placed after it, it has the sound of wa in the word water."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.	SOUND.
For myself, I like	Moi je l'aime.	Mwa she laime.
I see you.	Je vous vois.	She voo vwa.
He owes me six pence.	Il me doit six sous.	Ill me dwa see soos.
	Anglais.	Aunglay.

"But the s or t placed after the oi must be sounded if followed by a vowel."

EXAMPLES.

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.	SOUND.
He must be good.	Il doit être sage.	Ill dwat altre sahshé.
Be attentive.	Sois attentif.	Swas ahtaungtiff.

"So much for the vowel sounds; and, to tell you the truth, I am glad we have reached the last one. They test the patience both of teacher and learner."

"The consonants are so much like our own in their influence on syllables, that I do not think we need enter into any great detail about them, particularly as I take it for granted you always have the sounded alphabet open before you. Our th (in pronouncing which foreigners find so much difficulty) the French pronounce as though it were a simple t, but they hardly use it except in words they borrow from other languages."

"As I am tired now of giving explanations about sounds, I feel certain, Robert, you must be so too; and we will quickly turn to something else. I would not on any account that in learning French you should become acquainted with the disgust that follows weariness."

"In the next lesson we will finish up the sounds of letters, and then have some fresh, useful sentences and indispensable words, and in due time will follow rules, to enable you to make up these words into correct sentences yourself."

"Let me now dictate to you a little anecdote. Don't look so frightened. If I spell the words aloud, surely you can write them down, and when I have translated them, you can understand them. Now, Robert, take your pen and begin."

ANECDOTE (IN FRENCH).

"On observait à M. de Montal que les ennemis paraissaient être supérieurs en nombre. 'Soyons courageux,' dit-il, 'nous les compterons quand nous les aurons défaits.'"

ANECDOTE (AS SOUNDED).

"Ong obzervait ah M. de Mongtah! ke lays enne-mee pahraysait aitre supayreure ong nombre. 'Soyoyong koorahshu,' dectee, 'noo lay konterong kaung noo lays orong dayfay.'"

ANECDOTE (IN ENGLISH).

"It was observed to Mr. Montal that the enemy appeared superior in numbers. 'Take courage,' answered he, 'we will count our enemies when we have conquered them.'"

"On observait means, literally translated, 'they observed,' as on is an indefinite pronoun which stands for 'they,' although it has no exact equivalent in English. Now, by to-morrow I expect you will be able to stand an examination in all the vowel-sounds, and to repeat the anecdote by heart. To repeat it in French, I mean; for I have dictated to you the sound as well as the meaning of the words."

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON II.

MECHANICAL PROPERTIES OF BODIES (continued).

24. Why does a piece of india-rubber when stretched fly back if left to itself?—Because the particles, when displaced, tend to recover their former position.

25. Do we observe the same tendency under other circumstances?—We do; for example, when we squeeze an india-rubber ball in our hand, or bend a piece of whalebone.

26. What is said of such a substance?—That it is elastic.

27. Mention other highly elastic substances.—Glass, ivory, steel, air, and all gases.

28. In how many different states does matter exist?—In three states—solid, liquid, and gaseous. A stone is solid, water is liquid, and air is gaseous.

29. How may a substance be made to pass from one of these states into another?—By increasing or diminishing the amount of heat which it contains. Water is converted into vapour by heat, and into ice by cold.

30. Suppose two polished plates of glass or metal are laid one on the other, and slightly pressed?—It will be found, if we undertake to separate them, that they stick together.

31. What is the force that holds the plates together called?—Attraction of adhesion, or simply adhesion.

32. What is the reason, that if two panes of common window glass are placed on each other they do not adhere?—Because they are not even and smooth enough to come into close contact.

33. Mention one or two familiar facts that are to be explained by adhesion.—The marks made in writing with chalk or a lead pencil; the sticking of dust to the walls and furniture of rooms.

34. Does adhesion manifest itself between liquids and solids?—It does; if I dip my finger into water it becomes wet, because a film of water adheres to it.

35. Mention other illustrations of adhesion between liquids and solids.—Writing with ink, painting, varnishing, smearing, rubbing surfaces in machinery with oil.

36. Does attraction manifest itself between bodies at a distance, as well as between those which are in close contact?—It does: the earth attracts all bodies, and causes them, if unsupported, to fall toward its surface.

MECHANICS OF SOLIDS.

INERTIA OF MATTER—PRODUCTION OF MOTION.

37. Do we ever see a chair in a room, or a stone on level ground, set itself in motion of its own accord?—We do not.

38. To start such a body, what must be done?—It must be pushed, or pulled, or struck, with a certain force.

39. If a stone or a ball be rolled on the ground, it goes only a certain distance and then stops. Does it stop itself of its own accord?—It does not; it encounters a resisting force, which gradually checks its motion, and finally stops it.

40. What is this resisting force called?—Friction; it arises from the roughness of the ground.

41. Can you mention any facts which go to show that there is such a force in operation in the case supposed?—If a boy undertakes to draw a hand sledge on the bare ground, he must pull quite hard, but on the smooth snow he can draw it very easily.

42. Suppose a round stone be rolled on smooth ice?—It would go much farther than on the rough ground; the smoother the ice is the farther it will go.

43. We sometimes see a moving body, as a rolling ball, suddenly move off in a new direction. Does it change the direction of its motion by its own inherent power?—It does not; it is made to take a new direction by striking against some obstacle, or by receiving a blow from one side.

44. In view of what has now been stated, what may we conclude?—That matter is perfectly passive, or inert.

45. By what are all the motions and changes of motions that we observe produced?—By the action of external forces upon bodies.

ADVENTURE WITH A LION.

It was a warm, pleasant evening in November, and our ship was off the coast of Tripoli. A party of us, who sat upon the quarter-deck, had been conversing upon various subjects concerning the vast desert to the southward of us.

"I think you have travelled across the desert?" said one of our number, addressing the captain.

"Not exactly," replied Captain Bushwick. "Some years ago I spent a few months in Abyssinia and the country south of it."

"Was it there you had your adventure with the lion?"

"Ah—you've heard of that scrape, eh?"

"Only that you had such an adventure, captain. Your mate told me you had met the animal."

"Well, I have; and if you would like to hear the yarn, I will tell it."

A vote was immediately and unanimously carried that Captain Bushwick have permission to relate his adventure; and without further preliminaries he proceeded:—

"It is now five-and-twenty years since I took the notion to travel amongst the African natives. I had an uncle living in Mocha, engaged in trade there, and I had gone out to see him. He was going into Abyssinia on business, and I accompanied him. Our party consisted of six—my uncle and self, and four Nubian servants. These Nubians were faithful fellows, and long tried, and were, moreover, strong and fearless, having lived with my relative several years. When the business was over, I proposed that we should take a trip to the southward and see the country. The Nubians were anxious to go, and, after a deal of persuasion, my uncle consented to the arrangement."

"On the seventh day we reached a large lake upon the extreme southern border of Abyssinia, where we pitched our tent, and then went to hunting for game, we having been informed that we should find plenty of both fish and fowl in this region. Our luck was moderate, much more so than I had expected, and my uncle was bent on returning; but I was determined to have a few more trials."

"The only boat we had been able to find was a small canoe, fashioned from a log, and one morning I declared that I would take a cruise in it if some one would accompany me. The canoe would not carry more than two of us with any degree of safety; and as all four of the Nubians offered to go, I was obliged to make my own selection. So I took Lari, the youngest of the lot, but the brightest and most cool and brave in the presence of danger. I took my rifle and pistols, while Lari took his rifle and spear; and thus equipped we set out. The canoe was easily managed while we kept our proper places, and all went on finely until afternoon. It was very warm and sultry, and I had removed my pistol-belt, and laid it in the bottom of the boat with my rifle. Lari had just proposed turning back, when I saw a large flock of birds settle down upon a tree close by the shore, and I bade my companion to help me paddle in that direction. He did not object, for he wanted a shot at them himself."

"We had come to within a dozen fathoms of the shore, when a quick, loud cry from Lari startled me from my aim, and in the next instant the canoe struck upon some hard substance."

"A rock?" I asked.

"A hippopotamus!" the Nubian shouted, springing back towards me.

"Hardly had the words escaped his lips before a huge black head was lifted above the gunwales, and as I cast my eyes over into the water, I saw the whole body of the monster. It was as large as an elephant, but ten times more hideous in look. Its mouth was opened to a distance of three feet, or more, and its great teeth, all of a foot in length, looked like destruction itself. He seized the bows of our boat in his capacious jaws, and crushed it like an egg-shell. With all the force I could muster I leaped into the water, and struck out for the shore. I never swam faster, though when I reached the land I found that the hippopotamus had not followed us, having sunk to the bottom, probably as soon as he had destroyed the canoe."

"We were now in a quandary. We had come quite twelve or fifteen miles from the camp, and we must foot it back the best way we could. If we could have followed the shore the task would have been easy enough, but this we could not do, for a deep, dark swamp, overgrown with reeds and bushes, and gnarled trees, lay between us and our tent, so we must strike up into the wood upon the higher land and make the best of it. Our only weapons were two knives and Lari's spear. The latter he had grasped as he started from the boat, but the rifles and pistols were at the bottom of the lake. I bade my companion to take the lead, and he did so."

"For three hours we tugged on through a thick, matted forest, and at the end of that time we reached the edge of a wide expanse of rocky desert. There were clumps of bushes scattered over the place, but they looked dry and parched. Here we took an observation, and finally decided to keep down upon the right-hand side of the rocky plain, knowing that the lake must lie in that direction. By the time we had passed over half the length of the barren waste the sun was behind the trees. A little while afterwards, just as the dark shadows spread over the whole width of the plain, Lari uttered a low 'hist!' and placed his hand upon my arm."

"Do you hear anything?" he asked me.

"I listened a moment, and told him, yes. 'Perhaps they are coming after us.'"

"Who are they?" said he.

"Our party," I answered.

"That fellow walks on four feet, and has a weight equal to all the men we have left behind. Hark again." "I did so, and could now plainly distinguish the tread of some heavy animal."

"Is it a lion, do you think?" I asked.

"Lari hesitated a moment, and then, grasping me by the arm, he pointed into the wood."

"Look!—See!—There!" he cried, whirling me half around as he spoke.

"I did look—and I saw a sight—a sight that made my hair start and my heart leap. Not a rifle!—not even a pistol!—and yet there—not twenty yards distant—was a huge Nubian lion crawling towards us. I could see his eyes burn; I could see his long tail sweep the grass; and I could see that he was advancing for a spring."

"He's hungry," said the Nubian, 'or he wouldn't be coming on in that way.'"

"Then he'll attack us?" I suggested.

"Of course he will."

"And not a weapon for defence!"

"I have my spear," returned Lari. 'Now to the back of these bushes—quick—and let him come. Have your knife out in case of need.'"

"I hardly knew what my companion meant, but I saw, just upon our left, a clump of bushes bearing a small, red berry. They were not over four feet high, and occupied a space some eight feet long by four wide."

When we had gained a position behind them, I looked for the lion. He had stopped as he saw us take this covert, but we were not hidden from his sight, as there were openings in the foliage through which both parties could obtain a view of each other."

"We are gone!" said I, trembling with fear, as I saw the huge monster settle upon his belly and move towards us."

"Perhaps not," whispered Lari, without taking his eye from the lion. 'Keep still—don't move for your life!'"

"But what can you do with that spear?" I asked.

"Perhaps nothing; but wait and see."

"I did wait; but though it was but a few moments yet it was a season of terrible suspense to me. I am not a coward, nor was I ever one; but come to be situated as I was then, with a full-grown lion before you—not twenty yards off—and only a little patch of bushes for an apology for a shelter through which the beast could watch your every movement, and with that unearthly, purring, roaring growl, hardly perceptible in tone, but making the air tremble with its intensity—have all this, as I had it then, and if you don't tremble, then you're made of sterner stuff than I am."

"Once I cast my eyes upon Lari, who was at my right, and I saw that he was as calm as a rock. His great brown eye was fixed upon the lion with a burning gaze, and his teeth were set like the jaws of a vice. He was upon his right knee, with his left foot braced before him, and his long spear, which he held with a firm grasp, had the end of the shaft set against the hard ground behind him, with the sharp steel head elevated just to the top of the bushes."

"Hist!" he uttered, gathering himself for an effort; and as I turned I saw the lion cautiously advancing upon his belly. When about five yards off he stopped and gathered himself for a spring. I saw his huge claws settle into the ground, and I saw his great, shaggy head start upward as he left his couch. With my heart as still as death I bowed my head, and shrank down towards the earth. I heard a shock—a momentary struggle—a crashing sound, as of the breaking of wood, and then I was knocked over by a heavy body's coming in contact with my right shoulder. With a powerful effort I struggled from beneath the weight, and gained my feet."

"The first thing I saw was Lari, for it was he who had fallen upon me. The next was the lion, who lay only a few feet off, with the head of the spear buried deep in his throat, the shaft being broken off about midway. He was roaring with a deep, hoarse sound, and tearing the dirt up with his claws."

"I think that found his heart before it broke," said Lari, as he gained his feet. 'If the shaft had held I'd have pinned him through the heart, and sent him twenty feet over behind us. But, I tell ye, he's a heavy one to lift.'"

"The monster was dead in a few minutes, and we then held an examination. The lance-head had entered the lower part of the throat, directly beneath the fore-shoulders, and gone clean through the heart."

"You must have had a good aim," said I.

"But 'twas a good mark," replied Lari. 'When I saw him coming I just turned the point right for his heart, and he killed himself.'"

"It was all very simple, and it may have been very easily done; but, I assure you, a man must have a pretty steady nerve to do it effectually."

"We could not move the lion then, nor could we stop to take his skin off, for it was very nearly dark. So we resolved to wait until morning, and then have help."

"When we reached the lower corner of the waste, we saw a glimmering of water through the trees; and, upon pushing our way down, we were lucky enough to find ourselves only a few rods from the tent. On the next morning we all went out together, and found the lion just as we had left him. His body measured, from the end of his nose to the insertion of his tail, eight feet and nine inches; and, when standing, he must have been nearly five feet high. We took off his skin very carefully, and when I reached home I had it stuffed and set up. It looks very innocent now, as my children pat it with their hands; but I never look at it without thinking of the time when it looked terrible enough to me."

ARAB PROVERBS.—If your friend is made of honey, do not eat him all up. If you travel through the country of the blind, be blind yourself. When you are the anvil, have patience; when you are the hammer, strike straight and well. He who cannot take a hint, cannot comprehend a long explanation. Take counsel of one greater, and one less than yourself, and, afterward, form your own opinion.

THE SWING. FROM A PAINTING BY F. GOODALL, A.R.C.

CHILDREN AT PLAY

CHILDREN at play are a pleasant sight to the kind-hearted observer who has not yet forgotten his own youthful days. If a man or woman has no love for children—no enjoyment in their company—no sympathy with their sport—there is something wrong in them, depend on that. Children soften the heart; foster kindly feelings; recall the pleasant passages of our own childhood; make us forgetful of age and infirmity, of toil and trouble; and in their company we may throw aside all restraint, and become as unsophisticated and open-hearted as we were before the world taught us another lesson.

With a geniality of spirit that is positively cheering, an American poet, looking on such a scene as that which the artist has pictured, indited the following lines:—

"I love to look on a scene like this,
Of wild and careless play,
And persuade myself that I am not old,
And my locks are not yet gray;
For it stirs the blood in an old man's heart,
And it makes his pulses fly
To catch the thrill of a happy voice,
And the light of a pleasant eye.

"I have walked the world for fourscore years,
And they say that I am old,
And my heart is ripe for the reaper Death,
And my years are well-nigh told.
It is very true—it is very true,
I'm old, and I bide my time;
But my heart will leap at a scene like this,
And I half renew my prime.

"Play on, play on, I am with you there,
In the midst of your merry ring,
I can feel the thrill of the daring jump,
And the rush of the breathless swing.
I hide with you in the fragrant hay,
And I whoop the smothered call,
And my feet may slip on the seedy floor,
But I care not for the fall.

"I am willing to die when my time shall come,
And I shall be glad to go,
For the world at best is a weary place,
And my pulse is getting low.

But the grave is dark, and the heart will fall
In treading its gloomy way;
Yet it wiles my heart from its dreariness,
To see the young so gay."

Our picture describes itself. Story there is none to tell. Children at play is something always to be seen—in pent-up city courts, or in open country parts—and always to be admired. The artist has given us a merry, light-hearted group—full of frolic, and has arrayed them so well, and bestowed on them, with magic pencil, so much vitality and so much vivacity, that the whole scene is thoroughly natural in every particular.

AFRICAN DISCOVERY.

THERE is invariably an immense attraction in that which is unknown—a terra incognita always possesses interest to excite curiosity and provoke enterprise. It was so when Columbus discovered America,* and is so now since Livingstone—the modern Columbus—has opened up, to some extent, the long-hidden resources of the African continent.

With regard to Africa there has been felt in all ages much interest and curiosity. Her extensive shores which seemed to baffle the daring navigator, her sandy plains inexorably shutting out intruders, her mighty rivers irrigating unexplored regions, and having their sources in inaccessible localities, have united in awakening and sustaining an anxiety to become acquainted with the mysterious regions which were, to all appearance, closed against intruders.

All that was known about Africa in early times was vague and inconclusive. The Carthaginians, who, of course, were the best acquainted with it, prevented other commercial powers from penetrating into the country. Herodotus relates a curious story of the circumnavigation of Africa. The truth of the statement has been seriously questioned, and the learned have taken up both sides with laudable zeal, but no very important result. The Romans do not appear to have made any strenuous effort to visit the interior of Africa. The merchants of Alexandria opened a trade with the country, and profited much by its slaves and its gold; but as to what the Africans were "at home," and what sort of a home it was, never enlisted their sympathies, nor excited their curiosity.

Ptolemy's geography is considered the most complete geographical treatise of ancient times. But his ideas of Africa are by no means precise. He seems to have fallen into grievous errors, and to have blundered sadly about the extent and position of the country he described. The knowledge he acquired about it was chiefly derived from the caravans; and the course taken by these travellers had never advanced beyond certain steps in the great search, so that they knew nothing of the interval separating northern from central Africa.

In the seventh century the followers of Mohammed, inspired by religious zeal, and animated by the desire of conquest, poured forth from Arabia, and spread along the Mediterranean coast of Africa, planting cities and establishing kingdoms with marvellous celerity and consummate skill. But it was not till the grand career of maritime discovery fairly set in, that African enterprise began to take possession of the European mind. Speculators heard of gold mines rich in inexhaustible treasure; and for gold they were ready to embark in any hazardous undertaking. Vigorous efforts were made to penetrate into the interior. There was a report of some mighty monarch or bishop, who was supposed to rule all things in the unexplored regions, and whose will was law. This was the mysterious Prester John. The name is supposed to have originated in the reports brought by early travellers of a Nestorian bishop, or Christian prince in Abyssinia. To the court of this great king every African traveller resolved to go; yet Prester John was never to be found.

But Africa had other treasures. People were interested in the source of the Niger, the gold producing streams, and the trade of Timbuctoo. An English company was formed in 1618, for the purpose of penetrating thither by ascending the Gambia; but the difficulties were so great, and the resistance of the natives so pertinacious, that the effort was virtually abandoned. About a century later, a great effort was made to open a communication with the land of gold, but it ended in signal failure. The spirit of African discovery burst forth with renewed ardour in 1788, when an African Association was formed of the leading scientific celebrities of that period. The result of the expedition sent out by the association was so encouraging that the enthusiasm for African discovery was raised higher than ever. Mungo Park's investigation threw a flood of light on African geography, which served to increase public curiosity and to excite speculation. Under Sir John Barrow a still more extensive and organised effort was made. It was attended by severe disasters; but this did not shake the perseverance of the British government, nor the zeal of private enterprise. To Clapperton and Oudney, to Lander and M'Gregor Laird, to Cowan, Donovan, Campbell, Owen—most of all and latest of all, to Livingstone, a debt of gratitude is owing for their indefatigable exertions, and for the important discoveries which they here made.

* See ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER (Old Series), Vol. IV.

WATERFALL IN PRINCE'S ISLAND, GULF OF GUINEA.

The expedition of Livingstone to South Africa will form a crisis in the history of that interesting country, and the advantageous results of that expedition cannot be over-estimated. It opens up a new world to industry and enterprise—a new field for the benevolent exertion of the philosopher and the Christian.

Our illustration is thoroughly characteristic of African scenery. It was sketched in Prince's Island, in the Gulf of Guinea.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,
SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

A creature not too bright and good
For human nature's daily food.

WORDSWORTH.

If to her share some female errors fall,
Look in her face, and you'll forget them all.

POPE.

MERRY BLOSSOM, who, in spite of many faults, had a good, warm, affectionate heart, and was always very anxious to atone, and eager to be forgiven, did all in her power to assist her mother. Silent, humble, and very ready and active, she washed and dressed little Nussy and baby Ben, gave them their breakfast, and begged so hard, as Hope still slept, to be allowed, after taking the children to school, to come back and keep the stall for her mother, that Apple Blossom, moved by her tears, her penitence, and her promises, and aware how much she would need her aid, consented, with many stipulations and warnings.

Merry was very sorry to think her father had got drunk, and she cried to see the evidence of his crime on her mother's dear face; and she was more distressed still to hear of Larky's misfortune. That being a new trial, struck her much more forcibly than one to which she had been used from her cradle—her father's coming home reeling at night, and lying ill in bed the next day.

But Merry was very volatile, and she was soon quite engrossed by the new and important duties of her office. She was to sit at the fruit stall,—she was to set out and sell the apples, oranges, chestnuts, and cocoa-nuts.

How nice she would make them look! how civil she would be! How many she would sell! and how strictly she would keep an account of every farthing! Merry's eyes danced with joy, her plump cheeks were crimson. How she brushed her clustering black hair, and washed her round face, till it shone from within with honest pleasure, and from without with friction and yellow soap. Merry looked very pretty!

Apple Blossom in winter generally pinned a scarlet woollen handkerchief over her pretty head, and round her handsome face, fastening it beneath her polished, rounded, satin chin. A clean white apron, very coarse, also formed part of her costume. Little Merry assumed the scarlet handkerchief and the white apron, and looked like little Red Riding Hood, before she has listened to the wolf.

No sooner was Merry off with Nussy and baby Ben, than Apple Blossom took her bonnet and shawl, and began to get ready to go in search of Jem Goodman. As the poor creature went to the little glass that hung near the window, to "settle herself a bit," she started to see how Bob's savage blows had disfigured her,

One eye was blood-shot, and discoloured all round with green, blue, and black. Her pretty little nose was swollen, her cheeks were pale—she looked wretched.

"I cannot go out such a fright as that 'ere," thought Apple Blossom. She was a very pretty woman; and though with very little vanity, yet she knew she was handsome, and did not like to look a fright. "I declare I'm ashamed to show myself, I never zeed such a figger. I've a great mind not to go out; and yet, if I doan't, what's to become of poor Larky Grigg? Jem doan't know nothink about his misfortune, that's sartain. If he did he'd have been here afore now; Jem all'ys wor a friend in need, and that's a friend indeed! But, after all, what's looks compared to Larky? Beauty's only skin-deep; that my poor face can prove. He'd rather see me as black as a African from Africa than not see me at all; so here goes. I'll just set another jug of water by Bob, and then I won't let the grass grow under my feet. I'll be back in time for the ladies. The more people sees me, the more Bob'll be ashamed; and it's nothing but shame will make him take the pledge. I've all'ys hid up his bad usage, but I'd better not have done it, may be. It's hard to tell right from wrong in this world. But it can't be right to let Larky come afore the judge without a friend to speak for him."

Apple Blossom made the best of her way to Jem Goodman's. She passed Merry on the road, and saw her presiding cheerfully at her stall and selling briskly.

Many people looked with pity at the black eye, which all attributed to Bob Blossom. In that neighbourhood his weakness was well known; and also poor Apple Blossom's merits were acknowledged.

It was in a very tidy house that Jem Goodman lodged. A little maid he had taken out of charity opened the door, and Apple Blossom heard to her dismay that he was not at home.

Peggy, the little maid, who was very talkative, hastened to explain that master was gone out on business—first, to see a lawyer about Tippling Ben, and then to see Ben himself at Newgate; "which," added the girl, "this is a day for seeing the poor guilty creatures; and master won't be home till dinner-time; which I hope he won't be late, else the bit of roast meat will be over-done, and the taters too. Taters ain't wuth eating when they has to stand."

Apple Blossom was in no mood to listen to idle talk. She turned away, weeping bitterly. As the door closed, a man accosted her. It was Sam Slybrute, one of Bob's boon companions.

"What's up now, missus?" said he, "any trouble? Can I help you? How's Bob?"

"Middling, thank ye, Sam Slybrute," said Apple Blossom, meekly. It had struck her that Sam Slybrute would go with her to see after Larky.

"Ah, only middling I fear. 'Twarnt my fault, missus, this time, any ways. And the last time he took a drop too much and hit you (a month ago now) 'twarnt my fault; but my mother-in-law, she wouldn't take no denial, and Bob's so quarrelsome in his cups—'twarnt no use. And now I see he's been at his old pranks. Lor! never cry about it, Apple Blossom. You're handsomer so nor any other in her best looks."

"Tain't about that I'm crying, Sam Slybrute, it's about Larky Grigg."

She then explained what had happened, and Sam Slybrute—who knew, as he said, all the hins and houts, and all about such matters, and had often been had up before a magistrate after a night in the station-house—offered to escort her to the police-office, where, in all probability, Larky Grigg was being examined relative to the alleged offence of maliciously and afrethought breaking the shop-windows of Messrs. Cheete and Grudge, general dealers.

Apple Blossom felt so forlorn, ignorant, and helpless, that she was glad even of the advice and company of Sam Slybrute; though, on ordinary occasions, he was an object of some distrust, and even dislike, to her.

"You wor looking arter Mr. Goodman, warn't you, missus?" said Sam.

"Yes," replied Apple Blossom, simply. "He's such a kind friend of ourn. If he'd been in he'd a gone along of me. I needn't have troubled you then, Sam."

"No trouble at all, missus. Do Bob and Jem Goodman pull together?"

"Bob knows Jem's his best friend," said Apple Blossom, not choosing to discuss her husband's weaknesses with Sam Slybrute.

"Jem Goodman's a very good sort of man," said Sam Slybrute.

"He's an hangel on hearth, that's what he is!" said Apple Blossom.

Sam noted the words, and the warmth with which they were uttered; and there was an evil glitter in his eye, and something very false in his smile, as he replied—

"Well, there ain't many of them now-a-days, missus. Hangels don't wist every 'ouse. There's more of t'other sort—but here we are. Now, don't'ee be flabbergasted, Apple Blossom, don't'ee now. If Larky have a done wrong, it's a fust offence, and they won't be hard with him."

"Larky has done no wrong," said Apple Blossom, passionately. "He's the best, steadiest boy in the world; he's a good son to me; and a good son can't be a bad boy, Sam Slybrute, no more nor a bad son can be a good 'un."

Sam Slybrute turned very red, and stole a quick, sly, angry glance at Apple Blossom to see if she meant that at him.

Sam Slybrute knew that it was said he had been very cruel to a poor old crippled mother, whose only fault was over-indulgence of him; and that when he was in full work he had let her want, and creep into the union to die.

"Steady, is he?" said Sam. "Then he takes after his mother, not his fayther; for when we've carried Bob home some nights he warn't so over steady,—no, that he warn't."

The kind policeman who had taken charge of Larky Grigg's note, and who had a slight acquaintance with Apple Blossom, admitted her and Sam Slybrute, after a brief parley, to appear as witnesses on Larky's side. The magistrate had just disposed of several aggravated cases of drunkenness and violence attendant on that vice, by sentencing the culprits to a month's imprisonment with hard labour.

Doleful indeed was the appearance of these votaries of the (misnamed) jolly god.

Many of them had been taken up on Saturday night, after having squandered in drink a great part of their week's wages, thus robbing their wives and children even of bread.

Some had been taken off by the police for kicking and beating their wretched wives when the poor victims went to fetch them home. Some for fighting like wild beasts with those whom they seemed to love as brothers till the animal was roused by fiery spirits, and man, made in the image of his Maker, assumed that of something lower and more revolting than the swine.

Livid, haggard, in many cases blood-stained, muddy, unkempt, unshorn, humbled, dirty, cold, hungry, and stupefied were these wretches, who, but for drink, would have been whistling at their work, well fed, well covered, happy and fresh for the day's labour from the night's rest, and looking forward through the day to the welcome home again—to the neat, warm hearth, the smiling, happy wife, and the plump, rosy, loving, obedient children. What a sad proof of the prevalence of this brutish vice does every police-court in London present on Monday morning.

The week's wages, spent in a great measure during the Saturday night at the public-house, so often securing a Sabbath lost at the station-house, and a sentence to be fined or to hard labour for a month or more in the house of correction.

Yet these selfish, cruel wretches had wives, haggard, wasted, hungry, and tattered, waiting outside, ready to forgive, refusing to prosecute—even when disfigured with bruises, and sore and aching with blows—and weeping in passionate despair when "Tom," or "Joe," or "Bill," or "Jack"—loved in spite of all as woman only loves—was sent to hard labour at Coldbath-fields instead of hard drinking at home.

These cases summarily dismissed by a magistrate, whose bright eyes, shining through his gold-rimmed spectacles, clear complexion, steady voice and hand, energetic manner, and manly bearing, told that he, at least, had "never applied hot and rebellious liquors to his blood," Larky Grigg's case came on.

The magistrate had a fine forehead. Both the perceptive and reflective organs were fully developed; and, as the hair was no longer in the first luxuriance of youth, benevolence was also apparent.

He took a long and scrutinising survey of Larky Grigg through his spectacles; and, in all probability, the result was favourable, for he did not address him with the mingled pity and contempt with which he had addressed the drunkards.

Larky looked pale; for he had for the first time in his life slept on a stone bench, instead of in a warm bed, and he had tormented himself a good deal about the anxiety which he knew his mother and Hope would feel—his father too, if sober; but Larky's mind was eminently philosophical; and after the first hour, he remembered that fretting would do no good, and would make him ill; that "what can't be cured, must be endured;" and that in all probability, as he had done nothing wrong, except in having, even against Apple Blossom's and Hope's advice, formed an intimacy with Stunning Steenis and Prigging Peter he might drive his own affair from his mind, and by the aid of a bit of charcoal, he commenced working out some calculations on the white-washed walls of the station-house.

Sleep, gentle but irresistible sovereign of the young, surprised him thus employed, and he did not wake till the policeman on duty shook him to rouse him to the necessity of going before the MAGISTRATE, to answer the charge of Mr. Chete, for breaking his shop-windows, maliciously and with evil intent.

Larky Grigg had been brought up by Apple Blossom in habits of personal cleanliness and neatness, not common in that rank of life. He obtained leave to wash his face and hands. Of all who were in durance vile at the same time, none but himself had even wished to perform any ablution.

Larky, by the aid of cold water, yellow soap, and a coarse towel, made himself shine like a silver spoon. He had a pocket comb, with which he brought his clustering black hair into order. He was in his Sunday's best, and though somewhat pale, his appearance was singularly prepossessing, and even interesting. The magistrate felt it to be so, and that impression was shared by every one present, save Chete, who was still livid with revenge, and trembling with passion.

Poor Larky! a tear twinkled in his fine black eyes as he found himself in the same place with those really guilty of great offences. At first he hung his head a little; but recollecting that he had done nothing to be ashamed of, he raised it, looked round, and perceiving his mother—who, as we have said, had got admitted by stating the case to a policeman, and was there as a witness to her boy's uniform good conduct—the orient blush of quick surprise suffused the boy's bold, handsome, intelligent face, a smile of unutterable love, sympathy, and gratitude lighted up his features, and, parting his lips, showed his white, even teeth, and, with an involuntary feeling of duty and reverence towards that good, loving mother, Larky Grigg bowed his head.

The filial reverence of this act in one of a rank of life in which outward demonstrations of such a dutiful feeling are far more rare than even its inward existence, did not escape the quick glance of the magistrate, who, in one moment, detected the relationship between Apple Blossom and Larky by the strong resemblance of features, colouring, and expression.

"That's a bit of reg'lar play-acting, that is, your wushup," said Mr. Chete, who saw the effect on the magistrate's mind of Larky's bow and smile when he saw his mother; "that's picked up at them low, scandalous gaffs that chap's so fond of."

"What is the charge against the boy?" said the magistrate, addressing the policeman who had taken Larky Grigg into custody.

The policeman stated that he had taken Gregory Blossom (commonly called Larky Grigg) in charge by order of Mr. Chete, who accused him of maliciously breaking his shop-windows; and that, certainly, stones had been thrown from the empty house where he and Mr. Chete found the boy; and that he (the boy) was quite alone there when they discovered him, and seemed not a little startled and confused.

Larky saw, with dismay, the reporters busy taking down the evidence; and he remembered with alarm that all that was said against him, and which he could not disprove, would be published in the papers, and read by "the ladies" who had shown him so much kindness, and whom he loved so well, and by many others who, of course, would believe whatever they saw in print. Besides this, he was well aware that, as he could not disprove what Mr. Chete and the policeman affirmed, he might be sent to prison, and Larky thought if he was so disgraced and degraded, he could never bear to look Hope or his mother in the face again.

Larky began to feel very uneasy, to grow very pale, even his lips were white, and there was a choking sob in his throat, and an agony in his innocent young heart. But Larky had been early taught by Apple Blossom and Jem Goodman to pray—to pray for help against despair in adversity, and against security and vain-glory in prosperity. A fervent, though a silent, prayer then ascended to heaven from the boy's inmost heart; and that prayer, winged by faith, brought down comfort, confidence, and patience into his soul.

Mr. Chete was then examined. His was in truth a villainous countenance, and a head which phrenology would shudder at.

The magistrate felt he could not be a good man; but he listened patiently while Chete, with a forehead like an adder's, a small, cunning eye, sensual mouth, and long, red, snipe-like nose, bedrid by spectacles, and turning up at the point, said, in a voice trembling with revenge and rage, and naturally very shrill and squeaky—

"Your wuship, last night, I was sittin' at supper with Mrs. Chete, your wuship; and, as we were having a bit of a grill off a turkey, says I, 'My dear, get a bottle of Cayenne to season it,' which she had just ris for to do so, when rattle came several stones, and crack went the shop windows, partly open to haccommodate the public, which I'm a licensed dealer in cigars, snuff, and tobacco, your wuship, kind a general dealer besides, your wuship. A minute later, and Mrs. Chete might have been a corpse: for the cayenne was in the very window broke by that young vampire and sarpiant. He looks, my lord, for all the world as if butter wouldn't melt in his mouth, but these wouldn't choke him, your wuship, for all that copy o' his countenance. It's a Providence, my lord, that I ar'n't at this moment a widower, which it's well known Mrs. Chete is in a very delicate sitivation, and expecting he-time; and it's my opinion that 'ere young ruffin—he's well known to have a great head for calcoolating, he's called the calcoolating boy, he is; and I'd even thoughts of taking him into my service as shop boy—it's my opinion, hoping no offence, he'd reckoned on Mrs. Chete's sitivation, and thought to do for her, and, perhaps, break my 'art, your wuship. Well, your wuship, when she hears the smash, 'Oh!' she cries, a-sittin' down, 'that's quite turned my nerves;' and she was as white as a curd.

"So out rushes I, and, seeing a policeman at the further end of the street, my lord, I calls him; with him I makes for the empty houses opposite, and there I finds—not them I expected, your wuship, but one I'd always the highest opinion of—quite a pet of Mrs. Chete's, your wuship. But it don't do, my lord, to pet such low creturs: there ain't no gratitude in 'em, and you can't put it into 'em, your wuship."

"Are you certain that boy threw the stones?" asked the magistrate.

"There warn't no other cretur near, your wuship," said Chete. "In course he denied it, and began a cock and a bull story, your wuship; but I give him in charge, and I do hope, my lord, your wuship'll order him to prison; and I'd take it very kind of your wuship if he was to be privately whipped."

"More so than he would, I dare say," said the magistrate. "Now, what's his name—Gregory Blossom?"

"Commonly called Larky Grigg," said the policeman.

"What's that—an alias?" asked the magistrate, looking very sternly at Larky.

"No, sir; it's only a nickname. Larky means full of fun, and Grigg's the short of Gregory," said the policeman.

"I hope your love of fun, boy, has not brought you to this disgraceful situation. You will find it poor fun to be sent to the house of correction, with hard labour and a whipping."

Larky Grigg started, turned scarlet, then ghastly white; tears gushed from his eyes; for a moment, he seemed about to faint; but a little cry of extreme pain escaping his sobbing mother, he controlled himself by that strong effort of will peculiar to the great and good, whatever their station, and, in a firm voice, he said—

"Don't cry, mother dear. I'm as innocent as his worship; and when I've told his worship the whole truth, he'll see the rights of it."

Chete rubbed his ugly, dirty, grasping hands. "Whipping's the thing for 'em, your wuship! they dreads that. Why, I was whipped like a nigger when I was a lad. If I hadn't abeen, I shouldn't be what I am now."

"That I can readily believe," said the magistrate, without moving a muscle.

Chete rubbed his hands again.

"What have you to say, Gregory Blossom?" said his worship.

"Not guilty," said Larky, who thought he was on his trial, and that that was the proper foria; "not guilty, your worship, not guilty, my lord."

Larky had noted (he was very observant) how often the cringing Chete had said "my lord," and "your worship," and therefore he determined to copy what he supposed was right, and threw in the right and the wrong titles as often as he could.

"How came you in that empty house opposite Mr. Chete's?"

"Ay, answer that," said Chete.

"I was coming home, my lord," said Larky.

"Where had you been?"

"To look after father, your worship."

"What for?"

"Mother and Mr. Goodman wanted him, your worship."

"For what purpose?"

"To take the pledge; and father, your worship, wouldn't be persuaded, and, half in a spree, ran off; and seeing mother so cut up, likewise Mr. Goodman, I rushed out after father; but I couldn't see him, not nowhere, and, as 'twas bitter cold, I wor hurrying home, when I heard voices as I knowed, calling, 'Larky! Larky Grigg!' so I see the head of a gal I knows at the doorway, and I sprung across the road and went in. There was some boys with stones in their hands; and no sooner did I come in than they axed me to throw some, too, at Chete's windows, 'cause they owed him a grudge. I owed Mr. Chete no grudge, and wouldn't have done him no harm, any way—taint loikely—so I told 'em; so says they, 'Well, here goes. You're a white-livered chap arter all, Larky; but, no matter, we'll do the trick.' So they throws the stones, and, the next moment, off they scampers out at the back windows—leastways, the holes where they is to be; 'twas woundy dark, and I didn't know my way, and was just a-thinking of getting back into the street, when in comes a policeman, flashing his bull's-eye lantern in my face, and Mr. Chete accusing me of breaking his windows, and give me in charge; and that, your worship, is the whole truth; and, if I was to die this very day, I'd say the same."

"What are the names of the boys and of the girl who called to you?"

Larky hesitated to answer.

"What are their names, boy?" said the magistrate, sternly.

"I cannot answer that question, my lord," said Larky Grigg, blushing deeply. Every eye was on him; people who had begun to smile upon him now looked very stern.

"Why can you not tell me their names? You make me suspect that there were no boys there but yourself."

Chete rubbed his hands.

"Once more," said the magistrate, "why do you refuse to tell their names?"

"Because, your worship," said Larky Grigg, "it's against my principle to peach, or in any way to betray a pal."

As he spoke he looked like a young hero—his eyes flashed, his lips were compressed, his hands clenched.

"That's another bit of play-acting, my lord," said Chete. "Your wurship might see that at any penny gaff."

"Have you seen it there?" asked the magistrate.

"Not I, your worship. I'm a pious man—a family man. If I went inside a theatre I should expect the roof to fall on my guilty head."

"I fear," said the magistrate, "if you persist, Gregory Blossom, in refusing to give the names and addresses of the boys, we must consider them to be fictitious, and without 'a local habitation and a name.' Consider it well, if they do exist. It is a false principle you are going upon. Unless you can verify what you have said, I must sentence you to be imprisoned for fourteen days with hard labour, and —"

"To be privately whipped, your wuship," put in Mr. Chete.

"I am here to administer justice myself," said his worship, haughtily.

Mr. Chete begged a thousand pardons.

"And," continued the magistrate, "I hope, if you can give their names you will for the sake of your mother."

"Oh! do, Larky, do, my good, dear boy," sobbed his mother.

Larky turned very pale, and the tears came bubbling up.

"I cannot," he said. "I cannot peach. I cannot betray a pal. I must go to prison."

Just at this moment there was a stir at the door. After a short parley a policeman came to say that there was at the outside door, demanding to be admitted, a little girl dragging one much older, and that the little one insisted on seeing his worship, as she had brought with her the girl who had been in the empty house, and who knew the boys who had committed the offence for which Larky was given in charge.

The magistrate's brow unbent.

"Show the girls in," he said.

A buzz of admiration and surprise passed through the court, as in came, eagerly making her way to the bench, and dragging Potato-heels with her, little Hope Evermore. In her haste she had forgotten her bonnet, and her exquisite gold hair streamed from her pretty head on her bare shoulders; her large blue eyes were dilate and burning; her cheeks glowed, her forefinger was raised.

"Beautiful!" "Lovely!" "Cherub!" "Angel!" whispered the assembled crowd.

"My lord," said the little girl, panting with haste, "Larky Grigg is innocent; this girl, Meg Grimes, knows he is. I overheard her say she know'd who had broken Chete's windows, and she'd a great mind to tell, only she was afeard, besides not liking to peach. I persuaded her to come here, and she can't deny her own words. Come, Meg, speak up for Larky; don't see Larky sent to prison for a fault he didn't do, don't ee, Meg!"

Meg's appearance excited much laughter.

Meg never looked very tidy or very pretty, but on this occasion her wild, red hair stood on end, her dress was in tatters, her lip was cut and swollen, there was blood on her face and neck, and her large, red heels protruding over slip-shod shoes, justified her title to the nickname of Potato-heels. She buried her fingers in her mouth, and looked very silly.

"How old are you, my little girl?" said the magistrate to Hope Evermore, smiling lovingly at that brave angel child.

"Going for eight, my lord," replied Hope, with a pretty curtesy.

"What is your name?"

"Hope Evermore, your worship."

"Do you know the nature of an oath?"

"Yes, my lord."

"What is an oath? Bring the Testament here."

"An oath, my lord, is the calling God to witness I'm speaking truth; and if I do that when I'm telling a lie, I'll, maybe, be struck down dead with that lie on my tongue, like Ananias and Sapphira was."

"Let her kiss the book," said the magistrate. "Few grown persons would have answered so well."

"Where do you go to school, little girl?"

"I go to the Green Fields Ragged School, my lord."

"Then it's a good school, and you're a credit to it."

Then, turning to Meg, he said—

"Now, girl, what's your name?"

"Meg Grimes."

"How old are you?"

"Going fifteen."

"Do you know the nature of an oath?"

"Yes! I've took 'em afore. I kisses the bible and calls God to witness I speaks true."

"Administer the oath," said the magistrate.

Meg kissed the book.

"What do you know about the breaking of Mr. Chete's shop windows?"

"Twarn't Larky Grigg done it."

"Who was it?"

"Twarn't Larky Grigg."

"That's not enough. We must know who did it," said the magistrate, "else Gregory Blossom, who was found on the spot, will be sent to prison, and perhaps whipped."

"Larky whipped!" cried Hope; "oh! Meg, do ye hear that; you who love Larky, now speak out!"

"I don't like to peach about pals," said Meg; "but if Larky's to be whipped for their doings, I suppose I must, though they'll half murder me—I knows 'em will, they're such cruel brutes. I'm afeard, and besides, I don't like to peach."

"Think of Larky Grigg," said Hope; "look at him, Meg."

Meg cast one look at Larky, pale and trembling, —that was enough.

"Larky shan't be punished for them chaps," she said.

"How did it happen?" asked the magistrate.

"Well then, my lord, Mr. Chete had behaved shameful bad to three chaps as owed him a grudge. Mr. Chete sells very bad things, very dear, and often won't trust—Chete by name and chete by natur."

"My lord," said Chete, "this is defamation."

"It's truth," said Meg.

"Keep to the point in question," said the magistrate.

Meg continued—

"Three boys resolved to break Chete's windors, and I went with 'em to see the fun, 'twor a reg'lar spree. Just as they'd got ready, Larky passed. We called him in, and told him what we were arter, and axed him to jine. He wouldn't no ways. He took Chete's part, he did. So the chaps throwed the stones, smash went the windors, and off we hurried, calling Larky to follow. I don't know why he didn't. When I heard he wor took up, I said to Stunning Steenie, Prigging Peter, and the Fox, says I, 'Taint fair to let Larky bear the blame;' 'but,' says they, 'he's never been up afore, he'll get off easy; we're knowed—we'll come bad off;' and then they goes off to hide under Blackfriars-bridge."

The magistrate here gave a look to the policeman, who understood it, and darted off.

"Then what are their names?" asked the magistrate.

"I can't tell upon 'em," said Meg.

"Then I can," said his worship; "they are Stunning Steenie, Prigging Peter, and the Fox."

"I never said they wor, or they worn't," said Meg.

"Yes, you did. Where are they hiding?"

"I can't say."

"Then I can, under Blackfriars-bridge."

"Lor, you be a knowing beak, you be," said Meg.

"I have sent for them," said the magistrate.

"They knows you, my lord," said Meg.

"Indeed, I do not think I know them."

"More people knows Tom fool than Tom fool knows," saucily replied Meg.

Just at this moment in came three policemen bringing in Stunning Steenie, Prigging Peter, and the Fox. The young scoundrels had resisted manfully.

After a few questions they were convicted, Larky acquitted, and the culprits sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment with hard labour.

Vainly Mr. Chete pleaded for the private whipping, in which he had such faith.

The magistrate thought it brutalised human beings to treat them like brutes. He never ordered corporal punishment.

Stunning Steenie, Prigging Peter, and the Fox went off vowing Potato-heels should smart for it, and that they'd do for her when they came out.

Larky was complimented by the magistrate, who had some little talk with him, and told him to call on him, as he might be able to help him to a situation. He expressed great interest in little Hope, who was weeping for joy at Larky's acquittal.

Mr. Chete put his hand in his pocket, intending to give Larky half-a-crown, but when his fingers touched the coin, he could not make up his mind to part with it, and he gave him his blessing instead. But Larky's greatest joy was when he found himself in the embrace of his mother, little Hope the while fondly kissing his hand. The party left the police court amid the acclamations of those who had seldom witnessed so interesting a case. Potato-heels was in such favour with Apple Blossom, that she invited her to dinner. And the whole party hastened back in high spirits, to be in time to receive "the ladies."

Hope, the first moment she was alone with Larky Grigg, said, raising her little rosy forefinger, "Never go with bad boys again, dear Larky. Oh, Larky! when I heard all about it from Meg, I prayed to God for you, and you see He sent me, and enabled me to prevail with Meg to speak the truth. Thank Him on your knees, dear Larky."

(To be continued.)

WHAT WE ALL THINK.

THAT age was older once than now,
In spite of locks untimely shed,
Or silvered on the youthful brow;
That babes make love and children wed.
That sunshine had a heavenly glow,
Which faded with those "good old days,"
When winters came with deeper snow,
And autumns with a softer haze.
That—mother, sister, wife, or child—
The "best of women" each has known,
Were schoolboys ever half so wild?
How young the grandpapas have grown!
That but for this our souls were free,
And but for that our lives were blest;
That in some season yet to be
Our cares will leave us time to rest.
When'er we groan with ache or pain,
Some common ailment of the race—
Though doctors think the matter plain—
That ours is "a peculiar case."
That when like babes with fingers burned
We count one bitter maxim more,
Our lesson all the world has learned,
And men are wiser than before.
That when we sob o'er fancied woes,
The angels hovering overhead
Count every plying drop that flows,
And love us for the tears we shed.
That when we stand with tearless eye
And turn the beggar from our door,
They still approve us when we sigh,
"Ah, had I but one thousand more!"
That weakness smoothed the path of sin,
In half the slips our youth has known;
And whatso'er its blame has been,
That Mercy flowers on faults outgrown.
Though temples crowd the crumbled brink
O'erhanging truth's eternal flow,
Their tablets bold with what we think,
Their echoes dumb to what we know;
That one unquestioned text we read,
All doubt beyond, all fear above,
Nor crackling pile nor cursing creed
Can burn or blot it: GOD IS LOVE!

Chemical Experiments.

COLOURED FLAMES.

Most young people who take a fancy to chemistry begin by performing experiments which result in fire, flames, or explosion. Too often the appearance is observed without ascertaining, far less remembering, the reason of it. I shall occupy you on this occasion with a few coloured flames, and we will endeavour to turn the appearances you observe to some good account.

Firstly, observe the peculiar yellow colour occasioned by throwing common salt on the fire. It is a dull yellow colour, which will be rendered still more evident by powdering a little salt, wetting it with spirit of wine, and setting fire to the mixture. The human countenance, when seen by the light of common salt and spirit of wine set on fire as described, is perfectly ghastly. The colour of things depends upon the sort of light which they reflect. Pure white light is composed of the three colours, blue, red, and yellow. An object which absorbs all three passes for black to the eye; an object which absorbs none, reflecting the whole, passes for white; an object which absorbs all except red, appears red; and so on for the two remaining primitive colours. Now, the flame produced when common salt and spirit of wine are mixed together and ignited is almost pure yellow; of course, therefore, it cannot reflect blue or red. Now, in the human countenance there is much red, as every one knows—there is yellow, too. It follows, then, that a pure yellow light will only develop the yellow, whilst the reds and blues must necessarily tell as blacks.

Common salt is a soda-salt, as, I presume, most readers of this notice are aware. Now, potash and its combinations so nearly, in many respects, resemble soda and its combinations that any easy means of discriminating the two is desirable. The chemist remembers, then, that all soda-salts tinge flame of a peculiar yellowish colour; whereas, all potash salts tinge it violet. It is surprising how readily and on how small a quantity of the material under examination the discriminative experiment may be performed. It is by no means necessary to mix the salt under examination with spirit of wine. It suffices to dip a bit of thread into the solution to be examined, and immerse the string thus saturated in the faint halo on the exterior of the flame of a candle. If the thread be previously immersed in candle grease the distinctive colour of that with which it is saturated will be rendered all the more obvious.

Alcohol may be caused to evolve a lovely green flame, by incorporating it with boracic acid, previously fused in an iron spoon and powdered. Salts of copper, moreover, have the property of yielding a green flame, as may be readily seen by dipping a copper wire, first into a little vinegar, and afterwards plunging it into the flame of a spirit-lamp or a candle. Indeed, if the flame be strong, the preliminary dipping of the copper wire into vinegar may be dispensed with. Baryta and its combinations are substances which also turn flame green. If it be desired to tinge alcohol with baryta green, the muriate of baryta (more properly called the chloride of barium) is the most eligible body; when, however, it is desired to tinge fireworks with a green tint, then the nitrate of baryta is called into requisition. Similarly as baryta and its combinations tinge flame green, so strontia and its combinations tinge flame red. Muriate of strontia and its combinations may be employed for mixing with alcohol, but it is the nitrate of strontia which the firework-maker uses.

I will now describe how spirit of wine (alcohol) may be made to ignite without touching it with flame. Powder a little chlorate of potash (a material which has already come more than once before our notice), and mix a pinch of it with about a tablespoonful of the spirit. If now a few drops of oil of vitriol be thrown in, the whole will take fire. Whether the alcohol be pure, or united with any of the substances already described as capable of tinting it, the result will be similar.

As we have been dealing in the course of this paper with fire and flame, I cannot do better than conclude it by explaining how lightning flashes are produced in the theatres. The cryptogamic plants called lycopodium produce what is sometimes called lycopodium-seed. The term seed is wrong—as a little book published by Mr. Cassell on Botany will inform you—but, seed or no seed, it is the material which actors employ for producing their lightning. Trying to burn lycopodium (you can procure it at the druggist's under that name), you will hardly succeed at first. In vain may you touch a heap of it with a burning stick, or even a flame—the lycopodium will not ignite. But if a little of it be sprinkled into flame, it burns furiously, evolving a brilliant white light. The way lightning is managed on the stage is this:—A long tin box is procured, something like a pepper-box; that is to say, its cover is perforated. The box, however, which contains the lycopodium, is in the shape of a flambeau, and near the perforated cone is placed a bit of sponge saturated with spirit of wine. This sponge, being ignited, burns with an insignificant sort of flame, scarcely visible until the box is shook, and the lycopodium made to enter the burning spirit. Then, it at once takes fire, and produces the brilliant white light which passes for lightning on the stage. As regards the stage manufacture of thunder, it is so completely out of my line, that I must be content with indicating how an Irishman said it was produced: namely, by rolling about large stones in an empty bowl.

LETITIA'S BRIDAL GIFTS.

"COME, Letitia, and see how your friends love you; we have arranged your gifts. Some have come since last evening."

And two lovely young women, hand in hand, went slowly from one room to another, where stood a table beautifully ornamented with flowers, and laden with superb silver, jewelry, vases, and all the choice and rare achievements of modern art.

About the table were two or three young girls, who had busied themselves with the arrangement of the table, and now stood looking on with much satisfaction.

It was the affectionate plan of these friends and Letitia's sisters to receive all these gifts and arrange them before she saw them, that she might have all the enjoyment without any of the trouble and loss of time; for Letitia was about to perpetrate marriage, and her time was very full, as we all know, from intuition, that the time of young expectants must necessarily be.

Letitia looked a moment at the glittering table, and immediately burst into tears, as she was bound to do, and would have been very hard-hearted not to do; for though Love had followed her and watched over her all the days of her life, and prosperity had smoothed the path before her, yet here were testimonials which she had earned by her sweetness of temper, her honest, courageous friendship for her companions, her fine talents, and her good principles. And she felt a glow of inward joy and gratitude, deeper, perhaps, than she had ever felt before; for she saw that her life had not been unworthy of its great requirements.

Prosperity may be compared to a garden, in which grow choice fruits against sunny walls. Careful hands turn the peach to the sun, guard it from the insect, the shower, and the frost; and it ripens into a rare, delicious flavour. The richness of the garden may breed a race of poisonous and destructive creatures, making the gardener's task no easy one. He must watch his peach; but, if heaven is propitious, and the gardener watchful, the fruit is like that which grew in the gardens of the Hesperides, and fills the world with its fragrance.

Letitia had been cared for like the peach. Heaven had given her a sweet and lovely appearance and noble talents; fond, careful parents had nurtured and tended the precious fruit; the long summer of an uninterrupted prosperity had perfected what nature so well began; and Mr. Vaughan, walking along the sunny parterre, saw the fruit, and—selfish man—plucked it. But here the simile ends, for Letitia was not made to be eaten.

"Here, Letitia, wipe your eyes; they will have crying enough to do hereafter. See this perfect vase which Blanche has sent you."

"And this lovely set of mosaics from Mrs. Emory—"

"And this pair of silver pitchers, which will hold a pipe of wine—"

"And this loveliest of bracelets—"

"And this fan—"

"And set of gold forks and spoons—"

"And gold tête-à-tête set—"

"And here, dear Letitia, a cameo from dear Gertrude. A most exquisite thing! Two angels flying through space; the one angel guarding the other. See how sweetly regal the face of the one, how trustful that of the other! And here is her letter:—"

"Dear Sister,—Thus did you guard me when we were together; and thus, I hope, may we one day float through the soft atmosphere of a better world."

"GERTRUDE."

Letitia took the little ornament and kissed it. It was from her younger sister, who had married and gone abroad, and who could not return for the marriage of this beloved older sister, but who sent her this token. It was long before Letitia could look at anything else.

"But, Letitia, the great surprise remains. Here!" And Caroline drew a curtain, and revealed a superb piano, a gift from Mr. Vaughan's father.

Letitia felt the keenest delight. Music was her passion; and she sat immediately down to the superb instrument, and ran her fingers over it. It was thoughtful of her future papa to give her a piano. She thought with pleasure of the many hours of delight which this piano would give her—so pleasantly associated, too, with her wedding.

But a shade of disappointment crept over her face—Frederick had sent nothing. Frederick, the bridegroom, was he to be distanced in anything, even the giving of presents? No; for the cunning damsels had foreseen and arranged everything in a scientific manner. All the emotions were to come in proper sequence.

A beautiful little table of Marqueterie came to light, which was only a casket of things more beautiful than itself. It opened in every direction, and revealed camels'-hair shawls; lace in all arrangements; elegant handkerchiefs, marked with Letitia's cipher; gloves; and many other belongings of a lady's wardrobe. In one of the drawers was a card, on which was written,

"For my wife."

That little legend was worth all the rest. There was written the most eloquent word in the language; the word most full of all emotion, all trust, all hope!

Yes! Frederick had distanced them all. Things which could only pertain to herself—the shawl that folded her fair figure, the glove that covered her little hand, the lace that gave grace to her most stately toilet—all alike were from him; and her jealous, womanly pride rejoiced that his presents were the most beautiful and well-chosen of all.

Then the card! We will not say what became of that. Every woman knows; and it is of no consequence that the men, who are conceited enough already, should ever know.

But it is time to dress for the wedding, and we must go.

Grace Afton, Letitia's friend, and one of the Machiavels of the policy of the wedding-presents, was the next victim sacrificed at the altar, and from Letitia's gorgeous and grand wedding she returned to prepare for her own simple and quiet one.

Grace Afton was the daughter of one of those men who seem to live on the uncertain surface of a glittering bubble. No house so gay, no expenditure so lavish as that of Mr. Afton; no dinners so good, no dressing so extravagant, no visits so constant as those indulged in by the Aftons. One day Mr. Afton's last bubble burst, and there was no convenient bubble near for him to step on, and he, poor man! stepped into another world, where, it is hoped, he found something better than a bubble.

There was a "little something," as there always is, for the family; but they became gentely poor, sustained by their old friends, and holding their own position in society, but no longer the gay and successful Aftons of former times.

Grace, pretty, stylish creature, attracted young Mr. Liston, who was beginning life as an author, and had already made a name. Mr. Liston had a small fortune, and did not care for more, but was a favourite—and deservedly so—in society; Grace had very little education, and was not at all prepared to recognise what was most valuable in her lover's character, but "somehow" (that invaluable word) she fell in love with him. It was considered a very poor thing for both. Liston, every one said, might have done so much better; he might even have married Serafina Quesado, the great West Indian heiress, who liked him; or Alice Bruen, the Miss Counts of the place, who was not indifferent to him; but he foolishly preferred a girl he liked—with nothing.

The club thought he had done a very "green" thing; and Alice Bruen married immediately a man she detested, to spite him, which was a very sensible thing to do, as she is at present convinced.

Grace was thought to have done a very foolish thing, for young Veau, with his immense fortune, began to look attentively at her when she danced, and even leaned over her opera-box one entire scene of the "Trovatore," which was thought by some to be encouragement enough; and perhaps if Grace had assiduously flattered and courted Veau for a year, he might have thrown her the handkerchief. It would have been a very handsome handkerchief undoubtedly, but Grace did not wait for it, but took Liston's plain one.

So, perhaps, all things considered, it was not unnatural that Grace looked rather enviously on Letitia, and thought that fortune had been unjust. Her own bridal gifts were pretty and useful, but not superb; for by a certain magnetic power wealth attracts wealth, and every one's purse opened wider for Letitia than for Grace. People said, "Letitia's gifts will all be so handsome it will not do for me to send anything plain; but poor Grace will have a much plainer establishment, and will be glad of any little tasteful thing." Then Liston stood alone in the world, and there were no rich relatives to shower down silver teacups; on either side, a few books, bronzes, tasteful, quiet ornaments, and some rare and beautiful antique gems from Liston, the spoils of a Roman winter, were the bridal gifts of Grace; a few old friends of her father contributed some handsome pieces of silver, but the "show" was poor compared with that of Letitia's.

Grace looked at the meagre preparation, and shed a few tears. To her surprise one pearly tear fell down on her lap, turned amber-coloured, and, gradually taking shape, became a little glittering snake. It crawled down her dress, and, writhing about after the fashion of its tribe, finally reached the table, and ascended its standard by little lithe movements. Reaching the table-top, it settled down in graceful curves, and remained as still and rigid as if really carved out of amber. Grace was somewhat astonished, of course; but reaching out her hand for it, she took it up, and discovered that it was a real and very graceful little amber presse papier, and would look very well on an etagère. Before she had time to consider how very profitable it would be if all the tears of discontented young women could be turned into amber ornaments, her fairy godmother, a very nice little old woman-fairy, appeared, looking very displeased.

"Ah! my dear, I trust every fit of crying you have over the superior fortunes of others may result in a large crop of serpents, and every one turn and sting you, if they will only run out of your eyes instead of your mouth. Ah! how ugly, and venomous, and yellow he looks!" And at that moment Snakey's eyes sparkled; his little delicate tongue wriggled; he looked as if he were tasting a reputation.

"See, dear Grace, that creature is a distillation of your brewing. Could you believe it? Could I believe it—looking at your delicate face—your sweet lips! and you a bride, the chosen among women. What would Liston say?"

"Well, Fairy Godmother, I am not so bad. I was only quietly regretting that I had not as much on my bridal table as Letitia has, and I don't know why that little snake should have run out of my eyes. I am sure that was not as bad as if I had spoken ill of any one, or had done anything wrong."

"That little snake is the representative of a large family, dear Grace, and he has providentially been caught, so as to tell you where his tribe congregates, that you may smoke out the whole race. Those animals live, I am sorry to say, in the secret warm foldings of the human heart, and your false human life steadily warms them into existence. They might be stifled if this terrible warming process did not go on all the time. If each and every one of you could only stand nobly on your great high pinnacle of humanity, living an individual life, regardless of all this foolish emulation, as you might do, and as some of you have done, then these creatures would die, and you would be comfortable. I have found that a great idea is a very good vermifuge. Poetry, humanity, love, maternity—but how I am spreading. I should include it all in one word."

"Religion, you mean. No, dear Fairy Godmother, call it by all these other names. They are nearer my weakness; they are less abstract. I am reached by them."

"True, dear child. Then let me give you an axiom from a man I very much respected—Dr. Franklin."

The Fairy here adjusted her false front, took a delicate pinch of snuff, and looked sentimental. It was an idea to which she always, perhaps, lent a colouring, that she and the Doctor had had a flirtation!

"Speak not but what may benefit others or yourself; avoid trifling conversation; use no hurtful deceit; think innocently and justly; and if you speak, speak accordingly."

"A course of conduct systematically pursued, my dear," said the Fairy Godmother (who was a little dogmatical), "although it may not kill the serpents at once, is apt to so starve them that they die at length. If you have the strength to walk in bravely and strangle them; if you can say at once, 'Die, little disturbers! I will not listen to your poisonous suggestions; you shall not come between me and peace,' then you are a very great woman, and I have nothing more to say; but if you are weak, and would fain be strong, then I would recommend you to the words of—in fact, there is no use mincing matters—my old admirer, Dr. Franklin."

"Fairy Godmother, have you ever thought why Fortune is so very unequal?"

"Dear, I am a Yankee, and must answer your question by asking another. You saw Letitia receive her presents. Which affected her most?"

"Her sister's cameo, her piano, and lastly and most powerfully, her lover's gifts," and Grace cast a fond look toward the Roman gems.

"Fraternal feeling, taste, love. So far, very good; and now you know Letitia—tell me, if your positions were reversed, would she have cried over the superiority of your fortune?"

"No, she would not. Letitia is too elevated a person. She would have rejoiced, and have enjoyed my fortune as her own." Grace said all this with quite a glow, for she was an honest little thing.

"Very good—very good. The snakes are being exterminated. Then let me tell you that Letitia has been well chosen for the ordeal of prosperity. That, of all others, my dear Grace, is the climate which nurses the snakes! that rich, tropical climate of eternal sunshine! Oh, what noxious growths it can put forth! what poisonous and what monstrous creations! Firstly, Idleness, the slime in which these things take birth; then Excess, which educates them; then diseased Sensation, which makes the mind a prey to the gangrene of the worst passions."

"Good gracious! I hope Letitia isn't coming to all this."

"No! Letitia will be a happy wife—the joyful mother of children. She will be honoured and cared for. The wind shall not visit her cheek too roughly; and she shall be able to bear it without vainglory or presumption. But she will still suffer; for is she not God's creature; to be fitted for his eternal world? and is not her life here, like yours and all others, a probation? She is to be tried with prosperity; that is all. And let me tell you what that brings. She has a clear, comprehensive mind, which will tell her the immense uses and power of wealth; an enlarged conscience, which will demand that she administers her trust well. There is work enough for one poor little woman. Then prosperity almost always has its peculiar disappointments and trials, which wrinkle the brow and depress the spirits, such as losses, defection of tried and trusted servants, and the like. Then, more potent than all, it separates husband and wife, while adversity draws them together. Each is necessarily independent of the other. The bonds which draw them together are few; there is no mutual dependence, save of mutual tastes. The husband may like his wife's music, and she his literary tastes, but there is no mutual sacrifice—an important bond, dear Grace. Then detraction and envy (your little snake) will follow her like shadows, nestle in her footstool, climb to her very chamber-door. She shall never have peace from them! So, does she not need all she has—her noble principles, her strong sense, her warm affections? Yes, all of them."

The snake had gone to sleep during this homily of the Fairy Godmother. There he lay, a mere amber toy, pretty in his lithe, graceful curves and transparent texture, a silent and motionless stone.

"Hark! who knocks? I am off. Good-by, dear," and the Fairy Godmother disappeared.

Enter Agnes, a bridesmaid.

"Well, Gracey, how pretty everything is! how tasteful! Do you know I thought the display at Letitia's perfectly disgusting—such taste! And I have heard such stories of Mr. Vaughan—been so gay! Well, well, if anything will only take down Letitia's pride! Ugh! what an ugly little snake! Ah! does he bite? Oh no, only a presse papier. I am sure, however, as I took hold of him he stung me."

"It is amber, and perhaps may have some electrical effect. You may be highly charged, and have received a shock."

"Well, it is an ugly creature. I would not have it about. See, it absolutely snaps its eye at me!"

"Fancy, dear Grace—fancy."

"Well, good morning. You have been crying, I declare—begin to repent, hey?"

Enter Fairy Godmother, with her front hair awry, and a colour on her cheek probably gained in rapid descent from the chimney.

"My dear, keep that snake as a talisman. It really stung Agnes; it recognised a nestful of its kindred. Whenever such a tongue as that's let loose, do you let loose the snake, no matter how much he bites, only be careful that he is the only one you keep about you."

Two breakfast tables await our presence, we are expected at both. First Letitia's, as befits its superior elegance.

"The sun on the east oriel shone
Through slender shafts of shapely stone,

By foliaged tracery combined;
Thou wouldst have thought some fairy's hand,
'Twixt poplars straight the osier wand
In many a freakish knot had twined;
Then framed a spell when the work was done,
And changed the willow wreaths to stone."

Mr. Vaughan sat at the table reading the paper. The light fell from a beautiful window, with its artistic tracery, on the table, which threw back the light from its burnished surfaces of silver and glass. A conservatory opened from the room, and lent its fragrance and beauty to the morning. Now and then a bird trilled a note from his pretty cage among the flowers, and a fountain plashed in a marble basin surrounded by lilies. So much had art emulated nature, that one's senses were irresistibly compelled to believe that summer reigned, and that the snow outside the window was an illusion.

Mrs. Vaughan entered presently. Her husband rose and kissed her hand. "You are pale this morning; not ill, I hope?"

"No, only fatigued; I was so late last night. Three balls! but I was obliged to show myself at all of them; and you—I hoped to meet you at Mrs. Calton's; where were you?"

"Oh, I dined at Montgomery's, you know; and then looked in at the club; and stayed late at whist, feeling little disposed for a ball."

At this moment a beautiful child was brought in by his nurse; both father and mother turned to kiss and caress him.

"How is he, Rosine? Has he slept well?"

"Passablement, madame."

"I want him to walk to-day."

"Mais, madame. Madame knows I have such weak ankles."

"Ah! well, you can go in the carriage."

"Rosine is such a tyrant," said Mrs. Vaughan, laughing.

"Why keep her, then?"

"Oh, all good nurses are, particularly French ones. If you could only have competent ones without tempers and wills, it would do very well; but you must take them as they come; and Rosine is very competent. She keeps him beautifully dressed, and is very kind to him, and her accent is perfect; so I must submit to a few airs."

"Do rest to-day, dear Letitia! you look very pale."

"Oh! rest! impossible! I must go to my society at twelve, after spending an hour with my baby; and then I must make at least twenty visits. I shall be very glad if I can rest twenty minutes before dressing for dinner. Remember, to-day we have the two young foreigners to dinner; and to the Browns' this evening. You will not fall me?"

Letitia observed her husband looking anxiously at his watch.

"Excuse me, dear wife, I must be off. I have a busy day before me, and, I fear, some trouble. Gardner, my head clerk, has been behaving oddly; I fear he has been somewhat dishonest, poor fellow! So good, so competent a clerk! He is married to a little, vain woman, who evidently makes you her model in dress, as she sees you in the street, and I fear she spends more than he makes. So I am in no mood for dinners. It is not a cheering spectacle to see a man ruined by an amiable weakness. I wish I could ever find a day to spend at home with you; but, good morning! Try and rest, dear, and get back your bright eyes."

So the man of fortune, driven by invisible scourges, was forced away from his luxurious breakfast-room, his beautiful wife and child, to a counting-house where trouble of all sorts awaited him, and where he toiled until dark; then coming hurriedly up to town to dress for a dinner, which he ate without an appetite and presided at while his heart was far away with his disgraced and discharged clerk, one of the many victims of our false and ruinous style of living.

And Letitia left with a sigh her pretty nursery and its sweet little tenant for a round of duties which her wealth and commanding position required of her. She came home happier than her husband, for her day had been blessed with some opportunities of doing good, and its record went not unworthily up to heaven. Yet she was worn and pale, and even her exquisite toilet at dinner did not conceal from the anxious and loving eyes of her husband that this daily and nightly effort was telling upon his wife, and causing her roses to wither all too soon.

In a very neat little dining-room, which has for its ornaments some good engravings, a few flowers growing, and a green vine twined about the window in place of stone tracery, we come to our second breakfast. It is a plain, neat little affair, not elegant, but quite inexpensive. A bright coal-fire gives it cheerfulness, the same gorgeous sun illuminates it that brought out the superb points of Letitia's grand apartment. At the table are Liston and Grace, talking and laughing.

"So your book will not be published this spring!"

"No, and farewell to our continental summer."

"That is a disappointment. I had hoped to see the Alps this season."

"A disappointment! Grace, you speak as if you had simply lost an opportunity to go to the theatre. Does it not deserve a more 'falling inflection' than that?"

"Well, no, Alfred. I am so happy, so much more so than I dared to hope, that I can well afford to wait another year for this great enjoyment. Then the boy may be able to go with us; now he is too young—hear him crow up stairs! By-the-way, I am about to tell you of something pleasant. We are invited to dine with Letitia on Thursday. I met her to-day, as I was returning from the German school, dispensing her charities. How that woman works!"

"Yes, too much. I saw her yesterday, and thought I had never seen her so lovely—but a trifle pale."

"Oh, she looks dreadfully!"

"No, she does not, Grace; that is your jealousy, because I praised her so much. She simply looks as all gay ladies look who go every night to some heated party, who dine, pay visits and the like all the time, and have also hearts and minds which must be attended to. They burn the candle at both ends."

"And how do I look?"

"Very old, and wrinkled, and ugly. Mrs. Liston, do not expect to induce me to become complimentary at such short notice. But good-by. At three I will come to go with you to see those pictures."

Grace and Liston had overcome the world. They were content to live plainly, dress plainly, receive their friends unostentatiously, and, in fact, to have all the gold without any of the glitter. They thus spared themselves a great deal of trouble and many heart-burnings, and were in the enjoyment still of all that their elegant tastes demanded. Every one liked to come to their house; no one envied Grace her camels'-hair shawl, or Liston his fast horses, because they had no such luxuries; but no one was more eagerly sought for than Liston as a companion, and all the women, even, acknowledged that Grace had never been so handsome in her life.

It occurred to Grace shortly after this conversation to look on her etagère for the little amber snake which had once shown such vitality. For several years it had remained in yellow composure, only showing its potency by giving an electrical shock occasionally to some slanderer or careless talker; but Grace remembered that, for some time, she had not seen it. She now looked for it in vain. It was gone. It had crawled off probably to some more elegant mansion. It was a luxurious snake, and liked more riotous living; at any rate it was gone. Grace never saw it again, and the places that had known it knew it no more for ever.

THE FIRST KISS.

Who has forgotten the emotions inspired by the first kiss? Pierce Pungent has exhausted himself in a vain attempt to describe what may be remembered, but cannot and should not be told. He says:

"We never believed Pope's line,

"Die of a rose in aromatic pain," till we once accidentally got a kiss awarded to us at a game of forfeits, some fifty years ago. Eheu! fugaces! The fair one in question was the secret idol of our heart. Oh, those cerulean eyes! those flowing silken tresses! that exquisite waist, which seemed the isthmus of earth and elysium. How we longed to make our arms the only railroad of that region, transferring the wild Atlantic of our boyish admiration into the calm Pacific of reciprocated love! But we must tear ourselves away from our geography and return to our sheep, or, rather, our lamb, for our heart's worship was only eighteen pence a pound—confound the butchers! the high price of meat has confused our notions—we mean, she was only eighteen years of age. When we found ourselves entitled to a kiss by the sacred game of forfeits, the keenness of the rapture almost grew into a toothache. A kiss seemed more than we could manage; it grew into Titanic dimensions. We had a vague notion of asking the company to help us out by sharing our bliss, as the school-boy who, when he hears of his two hundred pound cake being on the road, promises all his comrades a slice, but when it arrives he keeps it all to himself!

"A kiss from Mary! and all to our own cheek! Oh! and then the blushing shame of a first love, vulgarly called calf, came over us, and we stood looking at our Mary's lips as a thief does at the galleys! Oh! those sunny eyes! Oh! those luxuriant tresses! as she shook them off her radiant face, as a dove shakes her feathers and a dog his hide, in order to leave more cheek to kiss! Oh! those provoking lips, pursed up ready, like the peak of Teneriffe, to catch the first kiss of love, that rosy light from heaven! Oh! that circling dimple, couched in her cheek like laughing wile! And oh! that moment when she said, 'Well, if Cousin Pierce won't kiss me, I'll kiss him!' She stooped down—my sight grew dim—my heart beat fast, as though I had swallowed a dose of prussic acid; her lips touched mine; the world slid away, as it does when we soar in a balloon; and we were carried away into a calm delirium, which has never altogether left us."

The Matron.

NO. XX.

WHAT vast treasures have been consumed by fire! Arsenals and theatres, houses of legislation, palaces, and temples of prayer,—nothing comes amiss to the destroyer. Yet, vast as may be the ruinous consequences of conflagrations, they can generally be traced to the carelessness of individuals. Some thoughtless official has over-heated a flue, neglected to extinguish a light, or left combustible matter too near the fire. Even precautionary measures often prove abortive through servants' neglect. Thus, in the case of the fire at the Tower of London (many years ago), the first time the water-tank was resorted to, it was found dry! Neglect in the high and the low, in the rulers and the ruled—in this one word neglect we have the secret of almost all the devastation caused by fire. True, the dire calamity does sometimes descend on us like a judgment from above, in the shape of lightning; but how few are these instances compared with conflagrations caused by carelessness!

Fire let loose on our homes is the subject of the present chapter, and I shall try to point out both cause and remedy.

Now let us consider a few of the most frequent causes of fires at home.

First and foremost, neglecting to have your chimney swept.

2nd. Leaving the poker in the fire till it gets red hot, and (very likely) falls out and sets fire to any combustible thing within its reach.

3rd. Leaving lucifer matches about; letting them fall on the ground, be trodden on, and set fire to your clothes, or those of your children.

4th. Letting children go too near fires, or carry about candles.

5th. Having candles put up in so loose and careless a manner that they fall about, right and left, and often envelop the sloven in flames.

6th. Ladies (when their crinoline, hoops, or capes are so large that they hardly know their own dimensions) sitting, standing, or dancing incautiously near the fire.

7th. Reading in bed by candle-light.

8th. In summer time, placing candles near windows, with the sash up and the curtains down.

9th. Keeping spirits of turpentine so near the fire that it ignites.

Most of the preceding causes need only to be mentioned in order to be avoided; but the two last-mentioned dangers, and also those incurred by ladies in crinolines, require some comment. I begin with reading in bed by candle-light. This practice is so dangerous, that it is like madness to indulge in it. You will agree with me when I remind you how likely the stillness of night and the warmth of bed are to draw a person to sleep; and as sleep comes on unawares, consider how likely the contact of your night-dress and the lighted candle must be. The lady in the crinoline would not be in such danger as the lady reading in bed, did she constantly bear in mind how very far she extends. The lamentable part of her case is the difficulty of extinguishing the flame, should her dress unluckily have come in contact with it. To smother the flames is the great object, and to do this the air must be destroyed; but her dress, balloon-like, is inflated with air, and its inflated state is maintained by means of wood, whalebone, or steel. However, she must follow, as far as possible, the rules for all persons on fire.

Immediately lie down on the ground, because flame tends upwards; and if you have been able to seize a piece of carpet, a hearthrug, or a heavy shawl, wrap it round you, and roll on the ground in it; thus you will probably extinguish the flames. If there is no wrapper handy, you may partially protect your neck and head by throwing your own clothes over them, never omitting to lie down, and to roll over anything wrapped around you. In the meantime, it is to be hoped that your screams will have attracted help; but do not run about the room: the air occasioned by your running feeds the flame.

In case of a chimney on fire, handfuls of flour of sulphur, thrown into the grate, will extinguish the flame; and a wet blanket must be immediately applied to the front of the fire-place.

From what cause soever fire may have arisen, the great object is, to maintain one's presence of mind when the alarm is actually given. Bear in mind that even a small quantity of water may obviate great danger. Get a bucket of water, and wet the blankets through it. Spread out these blankets on the floor of the room where the fire is. Should it have broken out in your own apartment, use the following means in escaping:—Crawl with your face near the ground. How dense soever the smoke may be, near the floor the air is pure, and may be inhaled. If you have to come downstairs, put a pillow before your face, and a wet blanket round your body, recollecting to hold your breath as much as possible.

Should the alarm be given when you are in your own house, with your children, you need hardly be told, first of all, to direct all your energies to the saving of life, and to let property be a secondary consideration. Avoid as much as possible opening doors or windows, for this increases fire, by letting in fresh air. When you have collected every human being in the house, calmly consider the best means of escape. Sometimes there is perfectly easy access to the roof of an adjoining house. Should the staircase be passable, I have already given rules how you are to descend it. Supposing there is no escape but through the window, getting down by a knotted rope is thought the best means; but if a leap cannot be avoided, feather-beds or mattresses should be thrown out first, that by jumping on them you may be less injured by your fall. Should you use the fire-escapes, fasten them to the bed-posts, and send down the children by the sack, fastened to a rope. Do not forget to beware of the spikes; and when your dear ones have reached the ground in safety, take good courage, and lower yourselves.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD.

A YOUTH would marry a maiden,
For fair and fond was she;
But she was rich and he was poor,
And so it might not be.
A lady never could wear—
Her mother held it firm—
A gown that came of an India plant,
And not of an India worm!
And so the cruel word was spoken,
And so it was two hearts were broken.
A youth would marry a maiden,
For fair and fond was she;
But he was high and she was low,
And so it might not be.
A man who had worn a spur
In ancient battle won,
Had sent it down, with great renown,
To gild his future son!
And so the cruel word was spoken,
And so it was two hearts were broken.
A youth would marry a maiden,
For fair and fond was she;
But their sires disputed about the Mass,
And so it might not be.
A couple of wicked kings,
Three hundred years ago,
Had played at a royal game of chess,
And the Church had been a pawn!
And so the cruel word was spoken,
And so it was two hearts were broken.

PADDY IN THE WITNESS-BOX.—A certain witness, in an action for assault and battery, mixed things up considerably in giving his account of the affair. After relating how Dennis came to him and struck him, he proceeded: "So, yer honour, I just hauled off and wiped his jaw. Just then his dog cum along, and I hit him again." "Hit the dog?" "No, yer honour, hit Dennis. And then I up wid a stun and throwed it at him, and it rolled him over and over." "Threw a stone at Dennis?" "At the dog, yer honour; and he got up and hit me again." "The dog?" "No, Dennis. And wid that he stuck his tail betwixt his legs and run off." "Dennis?" "No, the dog. And when he came back at me, he got me down and pounded me, yer honour." "The dog came back at you?" "No, Dennis, yer honour; and he isn't hurt any at all." "Who isn't hurt?" "The dog, yer honour."

Small Change.

DR. JACKSON, the elder, of Boston, meeting his old friend Josiah Quincy (both past eighty years of age) on the sidewalk, accosted him with, "Well, Mr. Quincy, how much longer do you intend to live?"—"Till I send for a doctor," was the quick reply.—"And when did you send for one last?" inquired Dr. J.—"Just eighty-six years ago!" answered Mr Quincy, adding the precise date of his birth.

"LET the toast be—dear woman!" as the hungry husband said to his wife, who was in a hurry to clear off the breakfast-table.

A LADY wrote upon a window some verses intimating her design of never marrying. A gentleman wrote the following lines underneath:—

The lady whose resolve these words betoken,
Wrote them on glass, to show it may be broken.

"OH, Johnny!" said one little boy to another, "let us play fighting! and you stand on the table; that's the fort; and I'll be the enemy, and undermine the fort, and blow it up—take the table by the legs, you know, and tip you over. Won't it be fun?" Johnny was doubtful, and suggested that Charley should stand upon the table, or else he must decline playing.

FRIENDSHIP is silent and makes no parade; the true heart dances no hornpipe on the tongue.

THE following words, if spelt backwards or forwards, are the same—Name no one man.

THE patient mule, which travels night and day, will, in the end, go further than the Arabian courser. —Persian Researches.

WHY is a clever detective like a precocious genius? Because he possesses great quickness of apprehension.

OLD Sir James Herring was remonstrated with for not rising earlier, and advised to make up his mind to it. "I can make up my mind to it," said he, "but I cannot make up my body."

"JOHN, can you tell me the difference between attraction of gravitation and attraction of cohesion?"—"Yes, sir; attraction of gravitation pulls a drunken man to the ground, and the attraction of cohesion prevents his getting up again."

CHARLES BANNISTER going into a pastrycook's shop with Parsons, the latter gentleman was very curious in examining an electric eel, and inquired of Bannister what sort of a pie he thought it would make. "A shock-ing one," was the reply.

TRUE joy is a sincere and sober emotion; and they are miserably out who take laughing for rejoicing; the seat of it is within, and there is no cheerfulness like the resolutions of a brave mind. —Seneca.

A COXCOMB, teasing Dr. Parr with an account of his petty ailments, complained that he never could go out without catching a cold in his head. "No wonder," returned the doctor; "you always go out without anything in it."

"ARE those pure canaries," asked a gentleman of a bird-fancier, with whom he was negotiating for a pair. "Yes, sir," said the dealer, confidentially; "I raised them 'ere birds from this very canary seed."

IN a recent ride to Peoria, says a country editor, we discovered the following placard upon a gatepost:—for Sail too story Hows And ben the Oner Xpex to Go 2 californny."

A PERSON looking at some skeletons the other day, asked a young doctor present where he got them. He replied, "We raised them."

ALPHABET OF PROVERBS.

A GRAIN of prudence is worth a pound of craft.
Boasters are cousins to liars.
Confession of a fault makes half amends.
Denying a fault doubles it.
Envy shooteth at others and woundeth herself.
Foolish fear doubles danger.
God reacheth us good things by our own hands.
He has hard work who has nothing to do.
It costs more to revenge wrongs than to bear them.
Knavery is the worst trade.
Learning makes a man fit company for himself.
Modesty is a guard to virtue.
Not to hear conscience is the way to silence it.
One hour to-day is worth two to-morrow.
Proud looks make foul work in fair faces.
Quiet conscience gives quiet sleep.
Richest is he that wants least.
Small faults indulged are little thieves that let in greater.
The boughs that bear most hang lowest.
Upright walking is sure walking.
Virtue and happiness are mother and daughter.
Wise men make more opportunities than they find.
You will never lose by doing a good turn.
Zeal without knowledge is fire without light.

Chess.

Problem No. 40. By R. B. WORMALD, Esq.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in three moves.

Problem No. 41. For the Juveniles. By DOMINO.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in two moves.

Solution of Problem No. 30.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. B to K Kt 7	Black's moves are forced
2. P to Q 4
3. B to K R 6
4. Kt mates

Solution of Problem No. 33.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. B to Q 7	1. Q to K Kt 8 (ch)
2. K takes Q	2. R takes Q (ch)
3. K to R sq (dis ch)	3. K to R 5 or P moves.
4. R mates

Solution of Problem No. 34.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. Q to Q Kt 5	1. R takes Q
2. P moves	2. R takes P
3. Kt to Q 4	3. Any move
4. Kt or R mates

T. B. SMITH.—You are incorrect in your observations on Problem No. 31. Your second move gives stalemate.

TROS. J. LEEMING.—The Problems sent by you are not sufficiently interesting for publication. We shall be happy to examine the other positions to which you refer.

ROMULUS.—1. There is no difference between the two. 2. In solving a Problem it is necessary, of course, that mate should be effected against the soundest defence on the part of Black.

G. H. COOKE.—You omitted to send the solution of your Problem.

J. PHENIX.—Many thanks for your letter and the Problems which accompanied it.

Solutions of Problems by R. Thompson (Southport), Nos. 31 and 32; Grapes, Nos. 31 and 32; Ars sur Mosello, No. 30, and Enigmas Nos. 10 and 11; F. G. Rainger, Nos. 29, 30, 31, and 32; Oxon, No. 32; M. A. R., Nos. 31 and 32; J. Russell, Nos. 29, 30, and 31; E. Grant, Nos. 31 and 32; R. Hunter, Nos. 31 and 32; Douglas, Nos. 29, 30, and 31; C. Austin, Nos. 30, 31, and 32; J. McCoy, Nos. 31 and 32; J. Palmer, Nos. 31 and 32; Caisse Amicus, Nos. 30, 31, and 32; D. W. S., Nos. 30 and 32; Inquendo, Nos. 30 and 32; A. Mayhew, Nos. 30 and 31; G. Farrow, Nos. 30, 31, and 32.

Our Editorial Table.

A YOUNG STUDENT.—The work about which you inquire is entitled Astronomy; or, Astronomical Geography, and is admirably adapted for your purpose. It forms the second volume of the "Educational Course." The first volume of the series, Science Popularly Explained (576 pp. for 3s. 6d.), you will also find extremely useful. The other volumes of the "Course" include Outlines of Botany, English Language in its Elements and Forms, Utility of Mathematics, and Political Economy.

"THE LADIES' TREASURY," price sixpence, monthly, is the most useful, instructive, and entertaining magazine for ladies. This beautiful periodical is profusely illustrated. The May number, now ready, contains—Conduct and Character; or, Rules for the Guidance of Young Ladies in their Intercourse with the World; Easy Lessons in French and German; Fancy Work, by Mrs. Warren; Paper Flowers; the commencement of a new and original tale of great interest, entitled "Unmeaning Attentions," by the author of "Lucy Blair," &c. &c. The illustrations in this number are more than usually good, and comprise a beautiful view of Heidelberg, "Family Enjoyments," "The Bride," &c.

X. Y. Z., STUDENT, ADMIRER, CONSTANT READER FROM THE BEGINNING, and other correspondents, address us under some apprehension that our circulation may be affected by the numerous publications which threaten to compete with us for the favour of the public. We beg to assure our kind friends that their fears are entirely groundless. Our circulation is based upon too solid an appreciation of the merits of our Paper to be affected by competitors of the class to which our correspondents refer. As the education of the people has progressed, the masses have become more and more enlightened, and are, in consequence, now well able to discriminate between the pretensions of mere transient, platitudinous, and witless productions, and the sterling value of established periodicals like our own, upon which no expense is spared, and from which no available talent is withheld, which can render it acceptable to high and low, rich and poor, young and old. We can have no safer or more satisfactory proof of the permanency of our popularity than the fact that, in spite of the unusual competition of the ephemeral rivals who have sprung up, mushroom-like, during the last few months, our circulation has reached a higher point than it had ever before attained. We have, indeed, no doubt that, with the assistance of that persevering propagandism which some of our correspondents assure us they are determined to employ, CASSELL'S PAPER will attain a sale not yet reached by any other periodical. We will continue to do our part towards producing this result.

REDMOND, PRIMROSE, JOHN McMAHON, PETER.—"Redmond," Alexander Dumas, sen., is the father of Alexander Dumas, jun. They are both authors. You will find your wish anticipated, and that there is a faithful likeness of J. F. Smith in this number of our Paper.—"Primrose" is referred to the answer given to "Moss Rosebud."—"John McMahon" should not give the forward lady an "uncivil notice"—but a very decided one—that her preference is not returned. As to making the acquaintance of the young lady he admires, "John" will find hints in a former number how to proceed with propriety.—"Peter" objects to writing, so he cannot forward his suit until the lady's return. When that takes place, we think he has a good chance of a favourable reception, but he must make up his mind, or some other suitor may do so before him.

YOUR WELCOME GUEST, Edward, Securable, Despondency, Broekley, Brickmaker, An Impatient Subscriber, M. J. H., Army and Helen, Alma, Tamora, A. Veitch, Emma Jane, A New Subscriber, A Young Farmer, Fiddler Dick, P. Stringer, Dumfries, R. E. M. H., A. Owen, R. Markham, W. Coop, F. G. F., M. T. Hull (Burnley), H. N., A Reader of Cassell's, Alfred, F. W., A Subscriber, and several other correspondents, afflicted with various bodily ailments or defects, can only receive reliable advice from skillful medical practitioners. Remedies for corns, warts, &c. we have given repeatedly, as well as washes for the hands and face.

P. Q.—We are not astonished at your being struck with the antiquity of some of the buildings in Holborn, but Furnival's Inn can hardly be called an antiquity, because it was completely rebuilt by Mr. Peto in 1819. The Inn that formerly stood on this site was the town mansion of Sir William le Furnival, who flourished in the reign of Richard II.

TOPSY, SUSAN, A CONSTANT READER.—"Topsy:" Under the circumstances, it would be contrary to etiquette to ask a gentleman to write to you.—If "Susan's" white ribbons are of satin, she may make them look almost as well as new ones by rubbing them (in the first instance) with stone blue and flannel, and afterwards with crumbs of bread; to sarcenet, she had better apply the bread only.—"A Constant Reader" will find a remedy for a flushed face given in a recent number. As to arsenic, it is a deadly mineral poison, and we advise her to have nothing to do with it.

PETER THINKIN.—We have already expressed our opinion of the folly of boys of sixteen wasting their valuable time in flirtations, but you, Peter, have not a moment to lose, for your incorrect orthography shows you to be backward in your education.

CATHERINE.—We refer "Catherine" to the answers given to "H. Yates."

WARTERTON.—Tears, blushes, laughter, and all physical symptoms of mental excitement, prove the constant influence of mind over matter. The explanation of the causes of these symptoms would occupy a treatise, and perhaps give little satisfaction after all. We think when you are introduced as "the new shopman," your alacrity and zeal in waiting on the customers will give more satisfaction than any set speech we could dictate.

ALICE, U. R. T.—The unsightly pimples respecting which you ask our advice, are not very easily removed. They are called by some "worm pimples," by others "grubs," but it is quite a mistake to imagine there is any vitality in them. They result from obstructed perspiration. They should be gradually pressed out of every pore, or they will remain and nothing will dislodge them. When the pimples are removed, the skin should at night be anointed with a salve made of the following ingredients:—1 oz. of pounded bitter almonds, 1 oz. of barley-flour, mixed with a table-spoonful of honey into a smooth paste.

T. S.—Manure has little effect on a wet soil, and gypsum, which so beneficially stimulates dry soils, is lost on wet ones.

CURIOS CALCULATION.—Under this title a correspondent has forwarded to us a calculation respecting pins dropped daily into the hold of the Leviathan. The paragraph appeared in No. 22 of our journal. From several letters we have since received, it seems that the calculation is erroneous. "J. A. H." informs us that it has been incorrectly copied from a contemporary, to which he forwarded it for insertion. "Will you allow me, therefore," he says, "as the original promoter of that curious calculation, to give you the correct results thereof. The number of pins dropped according to your paper is stated to be 4,509,599,627,370,495; it should be 4,508,599,627,370,495. You state the weight of them to be 628,299,358 tons, allowing 20 pins to the ounce, it should be allowing 200 pins to the ounce." Our correspondent "J. A. H." has our best thanks. Thomas Bethel Leeman, N. O., Peterkin, A. Constant Reader, G. T. Taylor, J. B., and Thomas Later, have also furnished solutions.

ANNETTE.—The apostrophe to London is by Cowper. It runs thus:

"London—opulent, enlarged, and still Increasing London! Babylon of old,
Not more the glory of the earth than she
A more accomplished world's chief glory now."

MARGUERITE.—When introducing the second sister in a family you should merely put her Christian before her surname. Miss M. or N. junior is an incorrect expression.

A MERRY GRIG had better not apply Fuller's earth to her skin, but follow the rules for improving the complexion given in a preceding number. We do not think "A Merry Grig" need be alarmed at awaking with cold eyeballs and eyelids. Awaking with hot ones would be more indicative of ill-health. We advise "Merry Grig" to beware of entertaining a very "tender sentiment" for a gentleman who could have her without declaring himself.

HOPE EVERMORE.—The seventh day of the week is Saturday. The Jews conscientiously observe this as the Sabbath, because they are so directed by the law of Moses, which is the rule of their faith and practice.

D. C. L.—Your statement has excited our sympathy. If you have not heard of, or from your wife for seven years, the law allows you to believe her dead, and leaves you at liberty to marry again. If, however, after you have done so, your first wife should return and claim you, your second marriage would be declared illegal, though you would not be subjected to any criminal indictment.

EGG-BOILER.—We believe the opinion to be a "vulgar error."

F. G. F.—The first and second volumes of "Cassell's Illustrated History of England," may still be obtained in numbers, at one penny each; but it would be more convenient to purchase it in volumes.

JACK.—Have nothing to do with the proposed "investment."

W. ROBERTS.—You are greatly mistaken. Please to repeat your question.

MACEETH.—A "bill of sale" is a deed given by a person as a security for some consideration received, such as a loan of money, &c. It empowers the person who holds it to sell the property in the event of the loan, &c., not being repaid according to the conditions.

A VERY OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Try a solution of isinglass in weak spirit, or try your present solution somewhat weaker.

AJAX, A. A.—Wash the parts affected every morning and night with warm water and yellow soap.

D. A. MACSLAN.—The composition of which the ornaments for picture frames are formed, consists of whitening finely powdered, made into a kind of paste or putty with melted glue. The ornaments must be moulded or formed immediately after the composition is made, as it very soon becomes hard.

SNAKE.—We really cannot instruct you in the art of feeding, keeping, and training slow worms, vipers, or adders.

JACK MANDERS.—Good lemonade powders may be made thus:—To two pounds of loaf sugar, finely powdered, add a quarter of an ounce of citric acid, also powdered, and half a dram of essence of lemon; mix well.

J. H.—The numbers of our Old Series may still be obtained of Messrs. Petter and Galpin, Bell Sauvage Yard; but the price, for reasons we have before stated, will be three halfpence per number.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Capern (the poet) resides at Bideford, North Devon.

A COUNTRYMAN.—St. James's Park received its name from Henry VIII. It was then a wild, wet field. Charles II. improved and planted it, and the game of mall and ball was played there by the nobility in 1638. It has since received numerous improvements.

N. W.—Calchas and Mopsus were celebrated soothsayers and inveterate rivals.

HOMO.—We fear your plaid is injured beyond recovery.

R. WALTON.—Our series of "Easy French Lessons" commenced in No. 23.

HENRY.—Gum paste is simply gum arabic dissolved in soft water. If closely corked it will keep good for at least three months.

MAGGIE.—The best remedies we can recommend are active and industrious employment, abstemiousness, both as to solids and fluids, and regular exercise.

A STUART.—Most assuredly Queen Victoria is a descendant of the Stuarts through Elizabeth Queen of Bohemia, daughter of James I. of England, and sixth of Scotland.

THOMSON.—It does not follow that because a person is reprieved, that he is therefore pardoned; his sentence may be reversed, or its execution may be only suspended for a time.

HENRY B. might possibly overcome his extreme nervousness by going more into society. Why does he not improve his handwriting? It is really disgraceful.

J. LISTER.—We received your enigma; but we have already published one exactly similar.

PHILIP.—You need not be in constant "pain" because of your Lancashire dialect. Read the best authors aloud; listen attentively to good speakers, and do not associate too freely with those who, like yourself, speak broad Lancashire, and you will be able to overcome that which causes you so much anxiety.

VIOLET AMY.—The final e is not sounded in Anne, Therese, Louise, or Auguste; in Julie, Eugenie, and Emilie, the e is sounded as e; and in Louise, Therese, &c., the se is sounded long and soft.

AN ENSIGN.—According to a decision pronounced by the Lord Chancellor in 1855, you are not entitled to any part of the property. It is true that in a case in Chancery, where a testator had left his property to his cousins, the Vice-Chancellor Stuart held that this included first cousins once removed, as also second cousins; but the Lord Chancellor, in the year above mentioned, reversed this decision, and held that first cousins were alone entitled to the benefit of the will.

EMMA, A FOND AND TRUE LOVER, AUGUSTA GRACE, A BRIDE ELECT.—"Emma's" case seems most piteous, but we trust her heart is not so near breaking as she supposes. Very likely the letter she expected to receive from her lover has been intercepted or lost. Things do not always go on so smoothly in France as in England. The best thing "Emma" can do, is (if possible) to return to her own country.—As "A Fond and True Lover" does not find our poetry sufficiently strong, he had better compose some verses for the lady in his own ardent strain.—"Augusta Grace" can, without impropriety, write to ascertain the fate of the portrait.—"A Bride Elect" (who should have come first instead of last) is informed that the bridesmaids sit down to breakfast in the same dresses they wore in church, and that the cake should be cut by the bride.

F. B., MYRTLE, BAYLEAF, F. K., A DOUBTFUL LOVER.—If "F. B." requires to be taught how to make a proposal, we advise him to put off his intended nuptials until he has grown wiser and older.—"Myrtle" should show the letter to her parents, and follow their advice respecting it.—"Bayleaf" blames Adrian Tom for complaining to us about her conduct; but her foolish question, as to whether she ought to write to a gentleman who has never written to her, makes us conclude that Tom did not complain without cause.—"F. K." must be very young indeed, to suppose that pity and love are one. A person's pain and suffering may call forth our pity, but his personal or mental qualities must excite our admiration before we can love him.—"A Doubtful Lover" cannot offend the lady by offering the ticket, at the same time he should not be hurt or discouraged if the lady refuses it.

A TRAVELLER.—We disagree with you about the statue of Queen Elizabeth at St. Dunstan's-in-the-West, Fleet-street. We consider it a fine piece of art. It was formerly placed on the western side of Lud-gate, and it is referred to by Defoe in describing that structure as "a fine figure of the famous Queen Elizabeth."

ETIQUETTE.—Repeat your questions.

IGNORAMUS.—The word should be pronounced as if written—Fo-toog'-grafe.

JOHN (Derby).—A catalogue may be obtained at the publishers'. We cannot reply to your first question.

A CONSTANT READER.—You must get two or three friends to join with you in starting your debating society, and then spread among your acquaintance the pleasure and profit which arise from attending its meetings. Make it interesting, and you are tolerably sure to succeed.

COPENICUS.—We are obliged for the information.

SELF-EDUCATED.—The "Model Copy Books" are published by Ward and Lock, Fleet-street.

RED RALPH.—The puzzle is no puzzle, and is, besides, very old.

READER.—You are right.—ETON: We decline to furnish the information.—E. S.: Why destroy the chirping crickets? We, at all events, will have nothing to do with it.

INQUIRER.—1. When two members, opposed on any question before the House, agree that neither will vote, they are said to pair off. 2. We decline passing any opinion as to the respectability of the office. 3. Teetotalism is not "taught" in all ragged schools. 4. Apply to the district registrar. 5. Not without a hawkers' license.

RHODODENDRON.—The rapid growth of London renders it difficult to define its extent. London really reaches from Blackwall to Chelsea, and from Walworth to Holloway. This would make its length seven miles, and its breadth four and a-half. The common statement, however, as to its size is, that it is six miles long and three and-a-half wide. It covers an area of sixteen square miles.

F. E. (An Old Subscriber).—The Zollverein (zoll, duty, verein, union) is a German commercial union, including the following states—Prussia, Luxembourg, Bavaria, Saxony, Wurtemberg, Baden, Electoral Hesse, Ducal Hesse, Thuringian Union, Brunswick, Nassau, and Frankfurt-on-the-Maine. In order to promote, as they believe, the interest of their respective countries, they are banded together by levying a tariff, or scale of duties, on the manufactures and produce of foreign countries entering the different states of the Union.

A SUBSCRIBER TO THE NEW SERIES.—A few practical lessons in bookkeeping would be more useful than any treatise on the subject. Your suggestions will meet with the consideration they deserve.

F. O.—1. Phonography. 2. Among our "Living Celebrities" men of all classes may be included—but self-made reformers will not be left out.

J. C.—We are obliged by your "kindness," but cannot accept it.

* We cannot guarantee the return of rejected manuscripts.

All Letters and Communications for the Editor to be addressed to JOHN CASSELL, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

London: Printed and published for JOHN CASSELL by PETTER and GALPIN, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

[THE RIGHT OF TRANSLATION AND REPUBLICATION IS RESERVED.]

NEW SERIES. VOL. I.—No. 26.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 29, 1858.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARTLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER II.

Wisdom's self

Oft seeks for sweet retired solitude,
Where, with her best nurse, contemplation,
She plumes her feathers, and lets grow her wings.

MILTON.

GRIEF is not the only passion which courts the solitude of nature: joy, too, flees from the busy hum of human life, to indulge in contemplation, to brood o'er budding hopes, and nurse sweet fancies which the careless world might either mock at in its lightness, or chill for want of sympathy.

Like most lovers plunged in the dream of a first passion, Richard felt this peculiar desire to be alone, to commune with himself, paint sun pictures of a happy future, without any other witness to his feelings than the birds, the trees, and flowers.

No sooner, therefore, had the ladies retired during the great heat of the day to their siesta—an indulgence as general in India as in Italy or Spain—than our hero, instead of joining his host and Sir Charles in the billiard-room, the idler's last but certainly not best resource, quitted the house, and wandered into the neighbouring wood, to seek beneath its more than Valambrosian shade a cool retreat from the noontide sun—a confidant in whose discreet ear he might pour forth his young heart's first music, confide its waking reveries, delicious musings, nor fear that babbling tongues would betray the almost sacred trust.

Not that nature should be painted dumb—on the contrary, her voice surpasses human eloquence; her lessons are drawn from herself; she instructs, delights, astonishes, and amuses, but never repeats: her confidences are of herself alone.

Love! The cynic may sneer, and pronounce it weakness; but wisdom knows that it is strength—for it is not only the incentive of youth, but the energy of manhood, and the solace of age. What a sad, dull thing existence would become without it! Ambition, avarice, or the less ignoble thirst for fame, may replace it in the brain, as fever replaces warmth, but never in the heart; and desolate indeed is that shrine upon whose altar a pure and virtuous love has never offered sacrifice.

Love! What does it not comprise?—The wife's affection, the child's obedience, the husband's and the father's tenderness, the mother's fondness—all that is true and beautiful in humanity. Deity has not disdained to symbolise itself in that one expressive word. Therefore we bid the world love on, that youth may draw strength from its generous impulse, and embalm sweet memories for age to rest upon.

We pity the man who never dreams. We speak not of visions that crowd the sleeper's pillow—they are common even to the coarsest, most unimaginative natures—but of those glorious day-dreams, golden reveries which haunt life's waking hours, anticipate the wing of time, and paint in rainbow hues a happy future. Such images are like pictures seen in a camera—Providence may never realise them, but it is something to have seen them.

KEHODA DANCING BEFORE RICHARD.

Our more youthful readers can readily imagine the feelings of our hero as he wandered into the depths of the dark Indian forest, whose interlacing boughs formed a leafy canopy over his head, excluding the midday sun. A more delicious spot for self-communion could not have been chosen. The only sounds that broke the stillness of the scene were the hum of insect life and the song-bird's note.

It was not long before he came to a secluded dell, inclosed with trees on either side. From the giant branches of one of these a hammock hung suspended, and seemed to invite him to repose. After several attempts, he succeeded at last in taking possession of the swinging cradle—no very easy achievement, as all who have tried it can testify; and, having lighted a cheroot to keep off the mosquitos, he gradually yielded himself to the indulgence of those reveries which make the heart's rich music.

He thought of Lillian—drew in imagination a future home of love blessed with her presence; then of the moment that should restore him to his mother's arms, his sister's kiss, a father's blessing. In the trustfulness of his years, he saw that father's fame cleared even from the suspicion of a crime, and the past—the sorrowful past—atoned.

"Let others pray for wealth, for power, or fame," he murmured, as the visions of happiness his imagination had conjured up filled his eyes with tears; "if heaven grants me these, I ask no more."

Richard had been plunged some time in that dreamy state in which

Visions of heaven with thoughts of earth combine
To form a whole, half human, half divine, when the sound of music stole gently on his ear, and recalled his wandering senses from the ideal future to the present.

On the undulating sward, at a short distance from the hammock, stood a female figure, whose proportions were entirely concealed by the ample saffron veil peculiar to the Nautch girls of India.

It was Kehoda, on her return from the temple of Mariatele.

Richard had frequently seen her on his visits to the house of Sir Charles Fourreau, and the looks she had cast on him had not passed unnoticed; even his inexperience had interpreted them; but his heart—to say nothing of his principles—was filled with too pure a love to be scathed by the glance of passion.

Being veiled, of course he failed to recognise her. There is something exceedingly touching in many of the native Indian airs, to one of which the lovesick Nautch girl sang the following simple, but impassioned lay:—

There is music in the air,
But my ear is deaf to gladness;
Changed to murmurs of despair
Ev'ry note of joy hath grown;
And my heart is filled with sadness,
For on earth I am alone.

Lips I heed not press their suit,
Breathing vows whose words are gladless
As the minstrel's broken lute,
On the desert idly thrown;
And my heart is wrung to madness,
For on earth I am alone.

Involuntarily our hero pronounced the name of Kehoda, well knowing that no other Indian maiden could address him in such strains.

In an instant, the saffron veil which enveloped her form was dashed aside, and the Nautch girl appeared in the same sparkling, embroidered dress she had worn in the temple. Heavy bangles of gold glittered on her arms and ankles, and the flowers of the scarlet pepul were bound in the long tresses of her hair, which fell in rich profusion half way down her graceful figure, whilst passion and triumph flashed from her dark, dreamy eyes.

He must have been cold indeed to the spell of beauty, who could gaze unmoved upon her, as, bounding forwards with a graceful step, she commenced one of the dances peculiar to her profession.

We know not whether the old poet Suckling ever visited India or not, but are inclined to think he did, so admirably would his quaint lines describe her—

"Her feet, beneath her petticoat,
Like little mice, stole in and out.
As if they fear'd the light,
And, oh! she dances such a way—
No sun, upon an Easter day,
Is half so fine a sight."

Perhaps we ought to explain, for the information of our non-antiquarian readers, that it was a common belief in Suckling's time that the sun danced in the heavens for joy on Easter Sunday—the day of the resurrection. There was much poetry in many of these old superstitions, and we often feel inclined to regret that all but the memory of them has passed away.

Richard, who had half raised himself in his hammock, gazed upon her as he would have gazed upon a lovely picture, but with feelings of admiration alone. Her singular beauty made no impression upon his heart. The one great charm, the spell, the crowning grace of womanhood, was wanting—modesty. The wondrous tissues human skill hath fashioned—the silken veil—the jewelled zone—the treasures of the loom or mine cannot replace it. It is the beautiful garment the hand of the Creator clothed our first mother with—the inheritance even of her poorest daughters: pity that any should be found to cast the gift aside.

At the end of the dance the Nautch girl approached the hammock, and stood with her arms folded before our hero.

Again he repeated her name.

"Alone," murmured Kehoda, "I am alone."

"What seek you?" demanded the youth, with surprise.

"What seeks the bird," exclaimed the Indian, passionately, "when the dull rains are past, and earth puts forth its earliest flowers? I am alone."

The last words of the speaker in the picturesque language of the East imply, "I am unloved;" and Tyrrell was too well acquainted with its metaphorical expressions not to understand her.

"You know, Kehoda," he replied, "that my heart is another's. I have no love to give."

"You scorn me," muttered the girl, in a sorrowful tone.

"No," answered the object of her passion, kindly. "I have no scorn in my nature, unless for crime; for weakness I have only pity. I would not uproot the simplest flower," he continued, "unless to replant it in a more genial soil, far less pluck, then cast it from me like a worthless weed to perish. Even if my heart were free, we could be naught but strangers to each other; the difference of our faith forbids it."

"Thy temple shall be mine," replied the girl; "thy cold and sunless land my home. I have risked my life in loving thee, think not I would regret my country."

"This is madness! folly!" said the young man, more and more embarrassed by her perseverance.

"You think me poor," urged Kehoda.

"It is not wealth that could tempt me," interrupted Richard. "I have more than I desire of the shining dross already."

"Hear me," continued the maiden, rapidly, seeing that the speaker was about to leave her. "You know not, dream not of the value of the gift you have rejected. Answer me one question."

"You must ask it briefly, then," observed our hero, vexed at her importunity.

"What honours would your island Queen bestow upon the man who preserved the brightest jewel in her crown—rescued his countrymen from slaughter, their wives and children from desolation?"

"The highest that a subject can attain," replied Richard Tyrrell.

"I offer them."

"You!"

"With my love."

The prediction of his friend Marsh that British supremacy in India was threatened with some terrible convulsion, flashed on the recollection of her hearer; but, notwithstanding his earnest desire to hear more, he scorned to trifle with her feelings, or feign a love he could never feel.

"Kehoda," he replied, "if you indeed—as your words imply—possess the knowledge of any danger menacing my countrymen, reveal it, for your own—for your country's sake. The vengeance of England will be terrible!"

"More terrible than her rule?" replied the Nautch girl, scornfully. "Has it not levelled the thrones of her princes—reduced the successors of the imperial race of Timour to a vassal state—profaned our temples—scoffed at our laws and priesthood? You know the only means," she added, "to unseal my lips."

"I am sorry for you," answered the youth; "sorry for the misery and crime your obstinacy will bring on all your race."

So saying he walked away, leaving Kehoda a prey to disappointment and the shame of a rejected love. For several minutes after his departure she stood rooted to the spot, a living image of despair: tears filled her eyes, which lately flashed with hope, and fell upon her sun-kissed cheek. Suddenly she dashed them aside, as ashamed of her weakness, and her agitated features gradually resumed their usually calm expression.

"Past," she murmured, "my dream of life is past! I would have saved him; but not for another—not for the pale-faced girl preferred to me! It is his fate: why should I seek to stay it?"

With thoughtful step the speaker returned to the spot beneath the plantain tree, where she had stood whilst chanting her impassioned lay, and raised from its root a round ball composed of grass and leaves, in which the priest had concealed the deadly cobra. Without the slightest symptom of fear or disgust, Kehoda drew forth the serpent, which curled round her wrist, but made no effort either to escape or inflict its deadly bite.

Doubtless the juice of the plant with which Nadir had rubbed her hand was an efficient protection.

"The avenger!" she murmured, gazing on the reptile; "the avenger!"

Carefully enveloping it once more in its leafy nest, the Indian girl drew her veil around her so as to conceal her peculiar costume, and walked with a hurried step towards the residence of Mr. Chutnee.

As Kehoda disappeared, a Hindoo, dressed in the garb of a fakir, crept from out the thick brushwood from which secure retreat he had been a concealed spectator of her interview with our hero. With a menacing glance, he cautiously followed her footsteps.

The words which he had heard made a far greater impression upon the mind of Richard Tyrrell than the beauty of the temptress had produced upon his heart, and he felt anxious to impart his suspicions to Sir Charles; but, on his return to the house, he found the ladies assembled in the saloon. Not to alarm them unnecessarily, he determined, therefore, to write.

Several times during the evening both Lady Bell and Mrs. Chutnee rallied him upon his abstraction; Lillian, too, appeared anxious. With an effort, therefore, he cast off the gloomy humour which oppressed him; and, when the hour of separation came, the circumstance was forgotten by all but himself.

Instead of retiring to rest, the youth seated himself at his writing-desk to draw up a report of the conversation, which, without compromising the weakness of the Nautch girl—he possessed too manly a spirit for that—might serve to put the commander of the gallant 01st upon his guard.

The task was both a difficult and a delicate one. The writer became so absorbed in it, that the low, sullen growl of the Newfoundland dog, crouched at his feet, failed to disturb him. When at last compelled to notice it, it was merely by—

"Quiet, Nelson, quiet."

But Nelson would not be quiet; the sagacious brute had perceived the presence of the deadly cobra, which, not liking its resting-place, had crept from the bed, and was gliding about the floor.

The restlessness of the sagacious brute became at last so troublesome, that our hero rose from his seat to drive him from the room, when in an instant he became transfixed with horror: within three feet of him was the serpent. Alarmed and angry at his sudden movement, it had coiled itself up, its head waving with a quick, undulating motion, its hood distended—a sure sign that it was prepared to spring.

Terror kept the young man motionless. He both saw and felt his danger; but, like the victim of the oppressive nightmare, was unable to stir hand or foot. The dog was equally alarmed, for it whined piteously. The instant the cobra made its spring, the noble animal caught it in his teeth, and the spine was broken—but not before it had coiled round the muzzle of its captor, and inflicted its deadly bite.

The action, followed by the plaintive cry of Nelson, broke the spell. Richard sprang forward and crushed the head of the venomous reptile beneath his heel.

Alarmed by the noise, Sir Charles and Mr. Chutnee, accompanied by Corporal Stock and several native servants, rushed into his room.

They found Richard with his preserver in his arms, sponging its already swollen lips.

"What has occurred?" demanded the baronet.

"A cobra!" exclaimed the merchant, in a tone of surprise. "This is most unusual: they are seldom found so near Calcutta."

Richard entreated his aid to save the life of the affectionate creature whose courage had preserved him. His host shook his head.

"European skill cannot avail him," he replied; "the antidote is unknown to all but Brahmins of the highest caste."

His master still continued to bathe the lips of Nelson. The faithful animal appeared sensible of his kindness: once or twice he wagged his tail gently, and looked in his face with an expression so eloquent that it wrung the heart of our hero. In less than ten minutes after receiving the bite, a fearful convulsion shook the limbs of the dog, which gave one howl and expired.

On examining the bed, the leaves and grass in which the reptile had been concealed were discovered, and it was evident that a murder had been attempted.

The native servants were all closely questioned—all but Kehoda; she had disappeared.

After such a discovery, further concealment would have been superfluous. Richard related both to Sir Charles and Mr. Chutnee the interview between himself and the Nautch girl.

The following morning the party returned to Calcutta.

Not to alarm the ladies, the cause of their sudden departure was concealed from them till their arrival there.

CHAPTER LII.

I have heard her with sweetness unfold,
How that pity was due to a dove,
That it ever attended the bold—
And she called it the sister of love.
But her words such a pleasure convey,
So much I her accents adore,
Let her speak, and whatever she say,
Methinks I should love her the more.

SHENSTONE.

In the midst of his own happiness, and the feeling was bright and strong as youth and love could make it, Richard Tyrrell did not forget the duty he had undertaken to the poor, forlorn youth, who had once been his companion; and, in the eyes of the world, almost, if not quite, his equal.

In their long and frequent conversations, he found occasion to study his character, and quickly discovered that his errors had truly been errors of ignorance. No one had ever taught him that honesty was to be adhered to for honesty's sake. All he knew was that the world both looked upon and treated him as a pariah, and he had retaliated, as outcasts generally do.

Regularly did our hero devote several hours daily in teaching Jack to read and write, and it was extraordinary how rapid a progress he made. Gratitude is a powerful incentive.

"Now, Jack," said his instructor, "when you have mastered the next two rules of arithmetic, and put your words together a little better, I promise you a recompense you little dream of."

"I don't require any," replied his pupil. "Your kindness to me is quite recompense enough."

"Aye, but you will enjoy this!"

"I won't have it!" exclaimed Jack Manders, with something like his former speech and determination. "You have done enough for me already, more than my whole life can ever repay."

"Suppose it was to present you to an old friend again?"

"Poor Caleb?" answered the former.

"I don't mean Caleb."

"I have no other friend."

"Have you forgotten Lillian?"

Her former protector bounded from his seat as if he had received an unexpected electrical shock, and stood for an instant mute with surprise and emotion.

"Don't jest with me," he said; "pray don't jest with me. How should Lilly be in India? Poor little angel, her sorrows are over, I trust, by this time."

"I trust so, too," observed Richard, smilingly.

Jack Manders looked at him anxiously.

"But not in the way you suppose. Circumstances which I must explain hereafter, for I am not yet in possession of all the facts myself, drew on the orphan the protection of one of the noblest and best of men. He and his wife have reared her like their own child. She accompanied them from England."

"Oh, Mr. Richard!" exclaimed the lad; "can this be true? And yet I am a fool to ask it—for Providence, that you so often talked to me about, watched over you. And why should I doubt her escaping from the cruelty of Mike and Andrew, and the fine lady who employed them?"

It is needless to say how earnestly Jack devoted himself to the task of self-improvement. His instructor, even sooner than he expected, found himself called upon to fulfil his promise.

Previous to doing so, he found it necessary once more to consult Sir Charles Fourreau, for he looked upon his recommendation to conceal a portion of his early life from Lillian in the light of a command.

"This is indeed remarkable," exclaimed the gallant soldier, when he had heard him to an end; "and Providence, which is wiser than poor blind mortals dream of, is working for our good. This is the first time that I have heard of Lady Boothroyd having been mixed up in the affair. I must see Rose and her husband."

Both were sent for. Mark Rayner, whose exemplary conduct in his regiment, to say nothing of the influence of Lady Bell, had won for him the grade of sergeant-major, was quickly summoned, together with his wife, to the presence of the colonel. When they beheld him seated in the library with our hero by his side, both dreaded that the explanation they felt anxious to avoid was now inevitable, for they had remarked the attentions of Richard to Lillian.

"Mark," said the baronet, "I have sent for you in order to obtain some information respecting my adopted child which you alone can give. That you will afford it me, and truthfully, it would be injustice to doubt."

"Certainly, colonel."

"Whose child is Lillian?"

"The daughter of an old comrade and school-fellow," replied the husband of Rose, "named Barney Gee, who was formerly a soldier in India."

"And related to you?"

"No, colonel."

"How came you, then, to take charge of his orphan, and, having done so, to place her in the hands of a wretch who treated her with cruelty?"

"Speak, Mark," said his wife: "better to suffer for truthfulness, than deceive those who have so nobly befriended us."

"Had she no relatives to protect her?"

"Yes: an uncle—one of the kindest, simplest-hearted beings in the world—Simon Gee, a weaver in our village."

"Did he reject her?" inquired the baronet.

"No."

"Die, then?"

"No."

"What am I to understand?"

"That she was stolen from him!" exclaimed Rose.

The colonel knit his brows as he repeated the words, "stolen from him." He was one of those men who never compromise with principle.

"By whom?"

"By my unhappy husband," replied Rose, "and myself; for I shared his guilt. But it was forced upon us. Vainly we struggled to avoid the crime,—we had fallen into the hands of one who mocked at our prayers, and knew not the meaning of pity."

"Lady Boothroyd?" demanded the baronet.

The unhappy wife, believing that the vindictive woman had fulfilled her threat, and denounced Mark as the murderer of the keeper, could scarcely articulate the word "Yes."

"And her motives?"

Rose briefly related the dispute which had so long existed between Sir Norman and his tenants, touching the right of shooting on the common, the arrival of Barney Gee on New Year's eve, the poaching party, and its fatal results.

"Mark, I presume, was one of them?" observed Sir Charles.

"He was."

"I will not press you with any further questions," said the gentleman, "although my opinion is clear that he yielded to a groundless fear. For, even had he been present on the occasion, and fired the fatal shot, a thing difficult to prove, the crime could only have amounted to manslaughter."

These words were the first gleam of consolation respecting the horrible event which had exercised such a fatal influence upon her happiness that Rose had received, for they afforded her hope, lessened the fear which haunted her, and she looked towards her husband in surprise, mingled with speechless gratitude.

"Still I cannot comprehend her ladyship's motives," continued the speaker, "for such an extraordinary step."

"Pride!" exclaimed Rose. "After poor Barney's death, a paper was found upon him signed by Lieutenant Alan Boothroyd, the brother of Sir Norman, stating that the wounded man had saved his life. The whole village cried shame upon the heartless lord of the manor; and she felt that whilst Lillian remained at St. Faith's, the events of New Year's eve would not be forgotten."

"Possible," thought the gentleman, "but improbable, for the abduction was a clear case of felony." Then, speaking aloud, he asked "if there was any doubt of Lillian being really the child of Barney?"

"Not the least!" exclaimed both husband and wife: "he brought her with him on the night of his arrival, and left her in the care of his brother."

Having dismissed them with the assurance that he should still continue his protection to Mark, the worthy man turned to our hero, who had hitherto listened in silence to the conversation, and asked his opinion.

"I believe her ladyship had some other motive," replied Richard Tyrrell, decidedly; "the one assigned is ridiculously inadequate."

"I think so, too; and to discover it shall be the object of my endeavours. You know the man, I believe, to whose charge she gave poor Lillian?"

"Yes."

"And his character?"

"Most vile: he forced his nephew to dishonesty."

"All of which confirms my suspicions," observed the baronet. "The story of your former companion interests me, independently of his protection of Lillian, who has spoken of him and described him to me a thousand times. I will prepare her for the meeting," he added, "by relating to her as much of your story as is necessary to explain the kind interest you have taken in his welfare."

The following day Jack, who had already recovered something of his former appearance, and been well dressed by his protector, accompanied him to the residence of Sir Charles Fourreau. Lillian, whose grateful heart recollected him only as a boy, sprang forward to meet him, with the apparent intention of offering her cheek to his salute. But a feeling of maidenly modesty restrained her, and she extended her hand, exclaiming—

"Oh! how happy I feel at once more beholding you."

Jack coloured deeply. He scarcely recognised in the graceful, lovely girl before him the timid child that trembled at every word Mike uttered, and in her helplessness had clung to him for his protection. He now saw her surrounded by affectionate friends, in the splendid home of her second parents; and yet, somehow, the change did not afford him unmixed pleasure; it made the distance between them too apparent.

"You are very good, miss," he faltered, "to recollect me!"

"Call me Lilly," replied our heroine, her eyes filling with tears. "And as for recollecting you, my heart must be insensible to every sentiment of gratitude before I forget you. Were you not to me as a brother?"

"A very humble one."

"But a true one," interrupted the fair girl. "Tell me all that has passed since Mike took you from the cottage; I am anxious to learn."

With some slight hesitation, for Jack Manders had never before found himself in such society, the poor fellow narrated the cruel manner in which his uncle had trepanned him, the brutal treatment he had experienced on board the Caradoc, where, but for the kindness of Bunce and Caleb, he must have succumbed to the captain's systematic persecution.

"Heaven reward them for their goodness," sighed Lillian, deeply moved at the recital of her former companion's sufferings.

"Who is this Caleb?" inquired Lady Bell.

"An apprentice on board ship."

"And how was he treated?"

"Scarcely better than myself."

"Richard," exclaimed Lillian, her countenance flushed with indignation at the tale of sorrow, "can we not contrive some means to rescue this poor fellow from the heartless tyranny of his captain?"

"I have been thinking of it," replied our hero.

"Alas, he has signed his indentures," added Jack.

The fair pleader turned an imploring look upon Sir Charles.

"I can take but one step to liberate him from his slavery," observed his guardian.

"And that is?"

"By an appeal to a court of justice."

"Captain Gall would murder him," exclaimed Jack, "before it could be decided. I tried it in China, before the consul."

"And the result?"

"They refused to listen to me," replied the young man, blushing deeply, for he but too well remembered the cause.

"Can nothing be done?" said Lillian, anxiously.

"Of course there can," answered Lady Bell, whose beneficent heart rejoiced in alleviating sorrow in whatever form it presented itself to her notice. "The first thing will be to get him on shore."

"I will undertake that," exclaimed our hero.

"And the next?" said her husband, smilingly—for there is little doubt he had an inkling of her purpose.

"Enlist him into your regiment," answered his wife.

"A court of justice alone could compel you to give him up."

"That is true."

"Where the question must first be tried."

"Soon could not have come to a more wise conclusion."

"And his friends could then bring forward proofs of cruelty sufficient to justify the breaking of the indentures, or whatever you call them."

There was very little doubt but Lady Bell had suggested the only real solution of the difficulty; and the question was, how to proceed to insure the escape of Caleb. As a matter of course, Sir Charles could take no part in that.

"Go away, Charlie," exclaimed his wife. "We are plotting treason. You must not listen to us."

"Certainly not."

"Or thwart us."

"Still less."

"When the time comes for you to act as an ally, you shall be called upon," added the lady, playfully.

The baronet withdrew to the veranda, lit a cigar, and, seeing Major Plinlimmon walking on the parade-ground, hastened to join him.

"Now that we are alone, the council of war is opened," resumed her ladyship, with mock gravity. "In the first place, you will require assistance: for, no doubt, since the escape of Jack, the monster of a captain has taken double precautions, to prevent his companion's following his example."

This was pronounced a positive conclusion.

"In the first place, there is Rayner."

"You forget," observed Lillian, "that he is a soldier."

"He need not go in uniform," was the reply to the objection; "and we can trust to him. There are several of the officers," she continued; "but, on second thoughts, which some wise heads pronounce to be invariably the best, we will not employ them."

"I must suggest one exception," said Richard.

"And who is that in favour of?"

"Fred Wharton."

"Your melancholy friend," exclaimed Lady Bell, with a laugh. "I had forgotten him; he may be trusted: for, beneath an armour of reserve, I am much deceived if there beats not a kind heart."

"You only do him justice."

"I had forgotten all this while that we have a friend in the enemy's camp, a sailor on board the Caradoc," exclaimed Richard.

"And what is his name?" inquired Lillian.

Our hero looked at Jack for a reply; he had forgotten it.

"Bunce," replied the youth.

Lady Bell gravely wrote it down in her note-book, and then ran over the contents of the page on which she had all the time been scribbling.

"Let me see," she exclaimed, "our opponents are Captain Gall, his mate, and the crew of the Caradoc, minus Bunce."

"Exactly so."

"To meet them we have, Richard, myself—"

"A tower of strength," said Richard, gallantly.

"Thank you, but don't interrupt me," replied the lady. "Next, Lieutenant Fred Wharton, and Jack Manders. Why, what are we deliberating about?" she added; "the odds are so completely in our favour that I almost fear we shall be accused of cowardice in the event of employing all our strength."

At this good-humoured sally there was a general smile.

"Still, we wait for orders," observed our hero.

"You shall have them."

Lady Bell hastily wrote a few lines, tore them from the case, and placed them in the hands of Richard.

"Excellent!" he exclaimed; "this cannot fail. Your ladyship would make an excellent commander-in-chief."

"You being my aide-de-camp, I suppose!" replied the lady. "But seriously, I think my project cannot fail, for it has humanity on its side, and zealous hearts to execute it."

The council being ended, Sir Charles was beckoned to rejoin them.

Full of his generous design of liberating Caleb from the tyranny of Captain Gall, Richard Tyrrell lost no time in securing the assistance of the young cornet—the very fellow to feel his heart swell at a story of oppression, for he had suffered from it; and the memory of wrong is one of the last that fades.

The usually impassible countenance of Fred Wharton flushed as he listened to the description of the poor lad's sufferings; and his clear blue eyes—in which thought and contemplation revealed themselves—flashed with a fire which a casual observer would have deemed them incapable of concentrating or expressing.

Calm does not always prove content;
But, like the frost on Etna's brow,
Too oft it hides the fires unspent,
Which rage beneath the chilling snow.

"Will you assist me?" demanded our hero, as he concluded his narrative.

"Will I not?" exclaimed the young man, warmly. "The question is almost a treason to our friendship: for it is to suppose me heartless."

"Not so. But the object of our benevolent exertion is one so far removed from your sphere that possibly you might feel—"

The speaker paused and hesitated.

"Go on," said his friend.

"But slight interest in the fortunes of a poor sailor lad. His birth, I believe, is exceedingly humble; but his heart—"

"It is from his heart I judge him," exclaimed Charles Wharton. "I am sick of the herald's mockery—the idol-worship which the wrongly-judging world pays to the adventitious accidents of rank and fortune. If ever I felt thankful for my own position in the social scale, it arises from the fact that it permitted me to choose my friends without reference to the opinions and prejudices of society—to grasp honour by the hand wherever I encountered it, and select worth instead of tinsel, gold instead of pinchbeck—although the latter may have received the stamp of fashion. Fashion!" he added, warmly, "I detest it! it is the mask hiding a moral death's head—the painting which veils the sepulchre!"

"In that case," observed Richard, quietly, "all we have to do is to concert the means."

"There," said the cornet, "I must trust entirely to you. I have an arm to assist, but a poor head to invent. What is it you propose?"

"Our first care must be to let Caleb know that he has friends who are both willing and able to assist him."

"Certainly."

"The next to contrive the means of his evasion from the Caradoc, which, I fear, may be difficult, for, since the escape of Jack Manders, the ruffianly commander is more than ever on his guard."

"Why not appeal to justice?"

"It would be useless. The poor fellow is an apprentice. His tyrant has him completely in his power."

"Surely the evidence of Jack, describing the treatment he has received—"

"Impossible."

"How so?"

"I cannot explain my reasons to you, but they are imperative. Only as a last resource can the victim I have already rescued from his brutal tyranny appear against him in a court of justice."

Our readers are perfectly aware of what those reasons were. Richard Tyrrell did not wish it to be known that his former companion and playfellow had ever lived by the exertion of a talent which, however ingenious, society has long since decided upon reprobating; or, in other words, that he had been a pick-pocket.

"Do you doubt me?" added the speaker.

"No," exclaimed the young man, seriously. "For what is friendship if a doubt can shake it? Proceed."

"The secret is not mine," observed our hero, "or it would have been no longer one. It affects only my friend."

"He is your friend, then?"

"A very humble one," said Richard; "but not the less valued on that account. We were boys—I may say children together, and circumstances made me attached to him. He had fallen into evil hands. The man who should have protected him turned out his greatest enemy."

"The old story," ejaculated Wharton.

"Sought to corrupt his heart by implanting lessons of vice, and training him to crime, before he had reached an age to distinguish the difference between them."

"The wretch!"

"In the midst of this social degradation poor Jack displayed such goodness of heart, that an angel might have wept over his errors, and would have judged them far more mercifully than man."

"There you are right," exclaimed his hearer.

"Man judges the crime alone—Heaven the temptation. But pray proceed. I have no longer any wish to listen to details which honour requires should be concealed. On one point, at least," he added, with a smile, "I may praise myself."

"And what is that?" inquired Richard Tyrrell, with a slight feeling of surprise. "I never heard you yet praise yourself for any one good quality, although your nature teems with them. Even more than just to others," he added, "you are severe only to yourself."

"I was simply about to remark that my friendship is stronger, far stronger, than my curiosity; and now let us change the subject. I am sick of the eternal Ego in conversation. Our first step is to communicate with the lad Caleb."

"It is."

"How do you propose to accomplish it? Not by going on board the Caradoc yourself, and accepting the ruffian's hospitality? You cannot wear a mask, even with a wretch like Captain Gall."

"Certainly not," replied his friend, emphatically. "As for the means of communicating with him, I have already arranged that. The after proceeding we must leave to fortune and the chapter of accidents. You know Hirim?"

"Your native groom? yes."

"The boy is intelligent," said his master, "speaks English perfectly; and what is better for our purpose, is truthful and devoted to me. Since I threatened to dismiss my steward for ill-using him, I believe he would risk his life for me."

"Which only proves," observed Wharton, "that few soils are so barren but the seeds of gratitude will take root in them, and expand, in time, into a hardy flower. You intend to make Hirim your medium of communication with the ship."

"I have so arranged it."

"Has the commander ever seen him?"

"I believe he has."

"Will he not recognise him—not by his features, but your livery?"

"That is the only risk; and to obviate it I intend to disguise him in the dress of one of the dingie boys, who ply their trade in fruit from ship to ship in the Hooghly. It is possible that he may not succeed in getting on board the first, or even the second time; but, by selling his wares cheaply, and furnishing himself with the freshest, I have little doubt of his ultimately succeeding."

"How will he recognise Caleb?" demanded his hearer.

"Jack has described his person so minutely that he cannot mistake him," answered our hero. "Besides, you have no idea how quick and clever Hirim is. Nature, in one of her caprices, has given him the tact of a diplomat, the agility of a monkey, and the cunning of a serpent."

"An epigram which characterises the wisdom of the east," exclaimed the young soldier, with a smile. "You ought to have been a portrait-painter, instead of a merchant."

(To be continued.)

YOUTH AND MIDDLE AGE.

She is lovely and I love her, though as yet I dare not speak; All were lost to me, perchance, should I my breathless silence break;

Now, at least, I dare to gaze for ever on that dear young face— Dare to follow all her footsteps—dare to haunt her dwelling-place.

Is there love in those shy glances, as they gently rest on me? Is there hope in those sweet blushes, as they deepen while they flee?

May I deem the first faint tremblings of that virgin heart my own?

Can I dare to trust the tenderness that lingers in her tone?

Dream thus fondly, dream thus ever, if thou canst, oh, weary heart!

Think not of the hopeless years that lie before thee when we part:

Let a long and sunny future cheat thee with its promised bliss; Youth is not for ever vanished, or thou could'st not love like this!

Eyes can gaze as fondly, dearest, 'neath a care-worn, wrinkled brow,

As before the locks that shadow them were silver-tinged as now;

Yet thy wealth of youth and beauty, and thy spirit glad and free,

Can they mate with one who offers but a heart that yearns for thee?

If she loves me, in that moment I am young for evermore; If she leaves me, I am old, and life's sweet spring is o'er;

Yet I linger, fearing ever, on the threshold of my joy, Or perhaps beside the gateway that opens to destroy.

Let me bask a little longer in that pure and fearless smile: Let me linger in the sunshine but yet a little while;

For cold the mists will gather round my pathway dark and slow,

When her sweet lips once have uttered a kind and pitying No!

THE gallant Colonel McClung was addicted to fits of abstract thinking, even in the presence of his friends. The following will illustrate this peculiarity, and the epigrammatic mode of thought which made it so. I was once sitting at the dinner-table opposite him; between us was an antediluvian duck, which I was making desperate efforts to disintegrate. I observed the Colonel regarding me with a steady smile, and remarked, "Colonel, you appear to be amused at my awkwardness." "No, sir," replied he, "I was thinking why the term duck was used as a word of endearment, and goose one of reproach."

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

PHYSICAL EDUCATION.

EDUCATION is but half complete when the mind only is cultivated. It is necessary that the body as well as the mind should be trained and educated. To a great extent the mind is dependent on the body. They are so closely identified that neither can work well without the other is in health, but the body would suffer less from an enfeebled mind, than the mind from an enfeebled body.

Physical education is of the utmost importance, and is one of those things in which the ancients were better informed than we are.

"I hold it as a doctrine," says an eminent writer, "that the mind in its utmost perfection must not be utterly ignorant of any species of human knowledge or accomplishment within its reach; and that the body, being part of us, and that part most prominent and visible, has also a legitimate right to its careful education—for we are not all soul. The frame should indeed be the servant of the mind; but neglect or scorn the slave too much and he rebels, and may become the tyrant in his turn. The notion of this all-accomplishment, mental and corporeal, is an old one; it is one upon which the character of the ancient nations, and of Athens especially, was formed. . . . The bath and the gymnasium, which made a necessary part of their existence, served without an effort to harmonise, to strengthen, and to embellish."

Gymnastics, the art by which physical education is effected, is a Greek word. It signifies stripped of clothing encumbrances. Its purpose is to impart strength and agility to the human body by exercise; this is best accomplished by dispensing with all superfluous articles of dress—hence the appropriateness of the word.

In Athens the gymnastics assumed a scientific form, and were taught in the academy, lyceum, and places especially appropriated to the purpose outside the city.

At Rome, as well as in Greece, gymnastics were taught as an art necessary to the proper development of man.

In the middle ages athletic sports represented a new form of the old gymnastics, and the pastimes of the English were chiefly those which tended to strengthen the muscles and give energy and freedom to the limbs.

Physical education is in our age regarded as a science. Our gymnastic exercises are founded on scientific principles. The mechanical construction of the human body has been attentively considered, and its motive agents have been divided into two kinds. The bones we call the passive agents, and the muscles we describe as the active agents. Exercise develops those muscles which are mainly employed in it; thus the arm of a blacksmith is always found strong and muscular. But as the bones and muscles of the body are called into requisition, important results are to be observed in the enlargement of the internal system; thus active exercise with the arms expands the chest, and one of its most valuable effects is the greater freedom which it gives to respiration. The breathing in its turn affects the energetic actions of the heart, consequently circulates the blood more rapidly through the whole body, and thus accelerates and improves digestion.

Walking, running, leaping, riding, rowing, wrestling, all have their advantages, and all more or less act favourably on the physical functions of the body. Athletic games, such as cricket or football, are also highly beneficial; and while they afford amusement, confer solid good on those who practise them. The whole of the energetic operations of the body have a corresponding effect upon the mind. While they impart activity to the body they invigorate the mind.

We recommend our readers to cultivate physical exercises—they are positively useful. Whether or not they study gymnastics as a science, let them not neglect active exertion. The river and the field, in this bright summer weather, are exceedingly attractive; and time spent in those pursuits which tend to the development of the human frame is never spent in vain.

If it is a duty incumbent on us to cultivate our intellectual and moral faculties, it is no less a duty to strengthen and develop our physical organs. This important part of education should never be neglected—never can be neglected without injury to the whole man. Physical as well as mental exercise may be carried to excess, and the result in either is an enervated system; but, properly used, nothing is more valuable than exercise to secure health and happiness.

FRENCH LESSONS; OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH. CHAPTER IV.

"Now for the consonants, George," said Robert, as he joyfully sat down to the fourth lesson. "If you remember, we talked about the th, and you told me that the French seldom use it, but that when they do employ it, they sound it like our t."

"Exactly so," answered George; "and now, as I know you like to see the little difficulties placed before you, to give you the opportunity of conquering them, I will tell you the names of most of the consonants that in French differ from ours. They are c, m, n, t, g, j. I see that you are looking at me quite reproachfully, Robert," added George, half smiling; "what is the meaning of that expression in your countenance?"

"It means," said Robert, "that I am rather disappointed. You said, the other day, that the French and English consonants were nearly alike."

"And so they are," retorted George, "when taken singly; but the French have rather a teasing habit of putting together a great many letters, and giving to this assemblage only one sound. It is a peculiarity in the language, and you must become familiar with it. I'll just give you an instance of it. The French sound ai just as we do our a. Now, that you may gain something we'll make a sentence with ai in it."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.	SOUND.
They were there.	Ils étaient là.	Ees ettay lah.

"It is to give you a few easy rules for conquering the sound of the 'many joined in one' that I am obliged to enter somewhat into detail."

"We start with c. Before a and o, c is sounded like k. Before i and e it is sounded like s; but even before a and o the French sound c like s, if it has a little mark under it, thus (ç). This mark is called a cedilla."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.	SOUND.
That will be for to-morrow.	Ça sera pour demain.	Sah serraah poor demang.

"I will not detain you with other examples on the sound of c, because it offers little difficulty. We will get on to m. When m is at the beginning of a word or syllable, it has just the same sound as our m; and this is also the case when it is immediately followed by a vowel; but if used in a syllable, followed by any other consonant than another m, it takes much the sound of the following syllable aum."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.	SOUND.
Mary is there.	Marie est là.	Mahree a lah.
Emulation does good.	L'émulation fait du bien.	Lemmulahseon fay du beang.
I see the mark.	Je vois l'empreinte.	She vwa l'aum-prangte.

"M placed between i and a consonant has the sound of our word am. Instance—l'impertinence, l'impertinence. G is a good deal like the same letter in our own alphabet. It is hard before an a or an o; that is, it sounds like our g in garden and got. It is soft before e and i, viz., it sounds something like our g in gin, and generous. Now observe, I say something like, for when the French g comes before e and i, it has a tendency to the sound of our sh. When you talk with French people, you will find it is not exactly that sound, but you will easily catch the pronunciation—in fact, you have already acquired it from me; and the g (before i and e) and the j (in all instances) sounded as we sound sh, would be tolerably correct."

"S sounds like our a, with e or ai before it. Z also sounds like our a, with e or ai preceding it."

"X is not sounded, excepting when followed by a vowel, and then it takes the sound of s."

"The remarks I have just made about m could be applied almost verbatim to n. N sounds like our n at the beginning of a word, and with a vowel after it; but it sounds like the syllable ang when followed by a consonant, or when preceded by the vowels ai; and there is an instance in which ai placed before n produces the sound ang, and that instance shall head the examples illustrating n."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.	SOUND.
I am hungry.	J'ai faim.	Shay fang.
No, I thank you.	Non, je vous remercie.	Nong, zhe voo remairsee.
It is inestimable.	C'est inestimable.	Set inesteeimahble.
It's all the same to me.	Cela m'est indifférent.	Slah met angdef-fayrang.

"Now follows t—and there is something about t so curious that it will make you laugh. Let the French put what letters they choose before t, the result is the production of a sound like our a: so that et, est, ait, and aient, all sound like our a."

"Thus, Robert, you have passed in review the principal difficulties of pronunciation in French."

"The next thing you must do is to look back to that part of our lessons where the rules for the sounds of the letters (both vowels and consonants) begin. You will find we have considered fourteen letters. In sixteen days from the present time, I expect you to be able to repeat every word of this discussion about the sounds of the letters. To accomplish this take one letter daily, with its modifications and examples. At the end of sixteen days the whole will be familiar to you, and no French sentences ought to frighten you. A foolish person may observe, 'What's the good of my being able to read them, if I can't understand them?' Great good, I reply: French people will be able to understand them, and so will you very soon; and when you have in your hand the promised book, and read of things you are likely to want, and of circumstances in which (supposing you visit France) you are likely to be placed, I am much mistaken if you do not astonish the natives, and, what is more, if you answer my expectations, you will soon know enough to astonish your uncle. You look surprised, and you wish to remind me that he is a good French scholar. I know he is; but things are much changed since he was in France. When there, he had nothing to do with stations, trains, or railroads; and I doubt whether he knows the French names for all these things. Perhaps we could puzzle him, if we asked him to tell us directly the names for the terminus, the train, the station, and the excursion train."

"But to prevent your being puzzled, I beg you will write down the French of all these words immediately."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.	SOUND.
The train.	Le convoi.	Le kongvwa.
The station.	L'embarcadère.	Laumbarkahdare.
The excursion train.	Le train de plaisir.	Le trang de play-seer.
The terminus.	Le débarcadère.	Le daybarkahdare.

"The time is soon coming, Robert," said George, "when you will have to make out all the sounds of the words without my spelling them. You have only to recollect the few rules I have given you; and how pleased you will be when you can read out a whole French book written by yourself."

"Written by myself, George! You are jesting."

"No, indeed I am not," said George. "You shall write it, and I shall dictate it; and the name of this important book shall be—"

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.	SOUND.
A journey to Paris.	Un voyage à Paris.	Ung voyashe ah Pahree.

"It will be in the form of conversations; and I mean it to contain every word and sentence necessary for common use, either at home or abroad."

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON III.

PRODUCTION OF MOTION (continued).

46. How is the VELOCITY, or rate of motion, of a moving body measured?—By the space which the body passes over in a second, or any other interval of time.

47. If there were no friction, or other resistance in operation, would the continued exertion of a force be necessary to keep up the motion?—It would not; a body once set in motion would move on for ever with the same velocity, and in the same direction.

48. Can we realise this supposition of a motion free from all resistances?—We cannot; in every case of motion on the earth there is, of necessity, some resistance in play.

49. To keep up the motion of a body unchanged, what, then, is necessary?—That a force should be continually exerted just sufficient to overcome the resistance.

50. Illustrate.—When a horse draws a loaded wagon at a uniform pace, of some three miles an hour, his muscular effort continually overcomes the friction.

51. Give another illustration of the same principle.—When a railway train proceeds at an unvarying speed, of say twenty-five miles per hour, the power of the locomotive neutralises all the resistances, and so keeps up the velocity acquired at the outset.

52. Is any particular amount of force required to overcome the inertia of a body and set the body in motion?—The smallest force would produce some motion, no matter how large the body might be, if it were not opposed by a resistance.

53. How has this truth been strikingly illustrated?—It has been said that the kick of a fly moves the earth.

54. Give another illustration.—If there were no friction to be counteracted, a small boy could set a railway train in motion.

55. Is there any exception to the general truth that bodies of matter do not move of their own accord?—There is; a man, or any animal, can move, or stop moving, at pleasure.

56. Do external forces take effect upon men and animals, as well as upon ordinary bodies of inert matter?—They do; if the support upon which we stand gives way, we fall to the ground, just as a body of inert matter would.

57. Every one knows that if a horse, when going fast, suddenly stops, his rider is thrown forward—what is the reason of this?—It is owing to the inertia of matter; the rider merely retains the motion he had in common with the horse.

58. How do you explain the fact that, when a man jumps from a carriage in rapid motion, he falls forward as soon as his feet strike the ground?—In the same way; he is going forward just as fast when he reaches the ground as when he left the carriage.

Fig. 1.

59. When a circus rider, standing on a galloping horse, wishes to leap over a rope, what does he do?—He merely jumps up, and allows the motion which he has to carry him past it.

EFFECTS OF FORCES UNDER DIFFERENT CIRCUMSTANCES.

60. When a force acts by PULLING, as when a horse draws a wagon, what is it called?—A force of traction.

61. When a force acts by PUSHING from behind or from above, what is it termed?—A force of pressure.

62. Will the same blow from a club communicate as great a velocity to a large ball as to a small one?—It will not; if the large ball contains twice as much matter as the small one, it will go only one half as fast.

63. The velocity imparted to any body perfectly free to move, by a given amount of force, depends, then, upon what?—Upon the quantity of matter in the body. If the mass be great, the velocity is proportionately small.

64. That the same velocity may be imparted to a large mass as to a small one, what is necessary?—The force applied must be greater in the same proportion that the mass is larger.

65. How can the effect of a force on a body be counteracted, so that no motion will ensue?—By applying a force of equal intensity in the opposite direction.

66. Illustrate by an example.—If two men of equal strength pull at opposite ends of the same rope, it will not move.

67. Suppose two blows of equal force are given to the same ball, at the same moment, in opposite directions?—The ball will remain at rest, just as if it had not been struck at all.

68. When a body moves forward constantly at the same rate, as when a horse trots for two hours with the same speed, what kind of motion is it said to have?—A uniform motion.

69. When a body goes faster and faster every instant, as a falling stone does, what is its motion called?—Accelerated motion.

70. When a stone is thrown upward, it moves slower and slower every instant; what motion is it said to have?—Retarded motion.

LEAVES.

What is life, and what are we?
Only leaves upon a tree;
Green to-day, to-morrow here,
Then we are no longer here!

Others, fair and brave as we,
Grew, of old, upon the tree;
Now they crumble in the mould,
With their histories unknown.

So shall we—it is our lot:
Thus to die and be forgot:
By-and-by the tree will fall—
One oblivion waits for all.

WHAT WOMEN TALK ABOUT.

THERE is scarcely a book, humorous or poetic, satirical or romantic, in the language, that has not some allusions to the tongue of woman. That "little member"—as it is commonly called with respectful gravity, as one speaks of a terrible and potent though invisible agency—has commanded the attention of the world so entirely, so many good jokes, so many poor ones, have been made over it, that there seems little left to say on the subject. But as long as the language endures there will be written and read lives of Washington and Napoleon—stories about love are as interesting to-day as they were when Romeo and Juliet first "did" the balcony scene, and will be as long as time lasts. To say all in a curt way, there are some subjects which are inexhaustible, and of these (without intending a joke) is woman's talk.

That women can talk, and do talk well, is as true and as generously acknowledged by their natural enemies, the opposite sex, as that they sometimes talk foolishly and too much. The charm of woman's conversation is well remembered and immortalised by many a wit and memoir-writer. Some philosophers, who have weighed the important subject with deliberation and care, have decided that it was more fascinating than beauty, this power of attractive conversation; but have, unfortunately for the theory, generally married very handsome women who talked very foolishly. However, the philosopher and his theory should never be called upon to answer for the weakness of the man.

Women can talk well, there is no doubt, but do they?

In the first place, what do they talk much about?

Firstly, DRESS.

Secondly, EACH OTHER.

Thirdly, SERVANTS.

Now the first, rightly considered, is a very pretty subject. The mind can scarcely paint a lovelier picture than that of a room full of pretty girls, all charmingly dressed, talking of colours and costume; wondering whether an ivy wreath running over white muslin would be becoming, and pausing to remember how beautiful the clematis looked, last summer, running over the white trellis in the country; or grouping the red poppies together to loop up the yellow crape, remembering the while how the cornfields "waved in the wind," suggestive of yellow crape and poppies!

It reminds one of Diana and her nymphs, of all that is classic and beautiful—and this sweet power of dress cannot be overrated; but it also reminds us that this talk is generally so vapid—so wanting in all that is fanciful, in the best sense of that word—so false in taste—that we would almost repudiate the subject; and while we would beg that dress might always be handsome and appropriate, we would almost ask that it might never again be spoken of.

For dress is not now chosen for its becomingness, but for its display; and in talking of it, women forget that it is dress which is subordinate to the woman. Woman has become subordinate to dress. To hear beautiful, well-educated, charming women spend their entire mornings and evenings in wondering why Mrs. Macwhirter wears real point over blue, while Mrs. Macstinger wears Brussels over yellow, is a most painful waste of the taste, the fancy, and the wit which does undoubtedly belong to the speakers, if they would but speak what they do know.

But the subject ascends from the simply foolish and idle into the dangerous, when we approach the second head of our discourse—Each other. The hand is palsied with its inability to grasp this part of its work. What do not ladies say about each other? Men dare not, however much they hate each other, talk freely of the vices, fancied or real, of their fellows. The law lays a potent finger on their lips, but none on the mouth of women.

It is too true, unfortunately, that our lives in the present day offer but few objects of competition to woman, and at the same time woman is as ambitious as man. She has all the desire to conquer worlds, but no worlds to conquer. After being educated as well, if not better than most men, she enters the world and finds nothing to strive for but the attention of gentlemen, pre-eminence in dress and style, and the dangerous distinction of being much talked about. These are her worldly prizes: for these she must strive, for these she must exert her talents, her charms, and all these efforts are degrading.

For we do not count the probability of her falling in love, wisely and well, marrying the man most suited to her, as one which is so common as to be other than an exception to the rule; for even in this free country, where every one marries (it is supposed) his or her unbiased choice, the thirst for distinction and pre-eminence is so intense that worldly marriages are almost as common as love matches. But for the sake of the argument we will take the fortunate exception, and show how even then woman is exposed to the temptations of envy and detraction.

She loves and is beloved—so far she is safe; but her day must be spent (taking the average) in competition with her servants, in small and uninteresting duties which give her mind no food, no occupation. If she has ever in mind that she is keeping in order a machine which, if allowed to get rusty, will creak horribly and disarrange a vast edifice—if she can remember that if she leaves this pin unset, or that wheel unturned, the consequence will be fearful, she may go on with a semblance of content to the end, and, remembering Milton's glorious line,

"They also serve who only stand and wait," may look with calmness on the sacrifice of powers which she knows are "too good for the place," and add to her other virtues the sublimest of all, cheerful patience; but if she is less great than this (which frequently happens), she is annoyed and fretful, she must have some amusement, she finds a sort of relief in dress and company, and alas, in talk; and it is vexatious to "see some women succeeding, you don't know how," and the tongue once loosed it is a difficult steed to rein in, and hence scandal and its horrors so acrid and intense that the poor subject may well say,

"So farewell hope, and with hope farewell fear,
Farewell remorse; all good to me is lost:
Evil, be thou my good."

What meannesses have not women committed under the influence of that most belittling passion, "a desire to succeed in society!" What detraction and even falsehood is not pressed into the service! and yet, remove this temptation and place this same woman in a position where she is called on to succour distress, and she mounts again to her original high position! She will not shrink from the night-watches by the sick-bed. She will not forget the poor—she still prays; but would that she could remember to hold her tongue!

So long as society is organised as it now is, these passions will be aroused. Beauty, talent, success will always be followed by envy and detraction as by shadows.

But somewhat of the fell malignity of passions can be softened by simply not expressing what one feels. An idea spoken is a much stronger thing than an idea thought. The hatreds that we tell of are much harder plants to weed out than the hatreds which, in silence and in sorrow, we endeavour to free ourselves from. In this very city of ours thousands of instances daily occur where, if one or two words had been left unspoken, the ill-feeling would have died away; but the words were spoken, and their "echo is endless!"

One lady, feeling a mortal aversion to another lady, goes to the house of a friend on some idle pretence, and introduces the subject of the general bad nature of lady No. 2. Fortunately the friend is a true one, and is not influenced, and stops the scandal by causing lady No. 2 to clear herself. But those little words of lady No. 1 resounded far and wide, and affect whole families; dissensions grow up apace, and instead of an ill-feeling between two people, there comes ill-feelings between two hundred. Now if lady No. 1 had staid at home that morning, and had not said a word, the ill-feeling might have died a natural death; some future day she and No. 2 might have been friends; but now a broad gulf lies between them, and nothing but time and the influence of a higher Power can bring them together.

Servants! Servants!

"If you knew the trouble I have had with Bridget!"

The "most elegant pisantry in the world" have to answer for a great deal. If they have done nothing more, they have lowered the tone of conversation in our ladies. We suppose, if we could enter all the handsome, well-lighted dining-rooms of our luxurious city this evening, we should find nine-tenths of the women telling their poor tired husbands of the shortcomings of Catherine, and Mary, and Lucy, and Margaret, while he would rather hear almost anything else, even of the unpaid bills. One very neat, methodical housekeeper once took her husband up into the fourth story of her house, and showed him a table which had not been dusted. "There," said she; "can you imagine a deeper grade of vice than that Margaret is guilty of? I have told her to dust that table every day since she has been here."

"My dear," said the husband, solemnly, "I have to-day been cheated out of a thousand pounds, I have had a forgery brought to my attention, two murderers were brought into court before my face. I looked at them with horror, but anything like the guilt of Margaret remains for me yet to see!"

The solemnity of these remarks, we have reason to believe, checked the volubility of one lady for some time.

We all have very noble sentiments about making home happy, no doubt; we all wish to make the "fireside," and so forth, attractive, and perhaps we succeed; but then again perhaps we might succeed better; at any rate it would not make the fire on the domestic altar any less bright if we weeded our conversation of these three topics, particularly the latter.

Women can talk well and wittily of the events of the day, of music, of all the arts—in fact, most women have a gift that way, and can describe a picture, a play, a public speaker, better than men; and it being their peculiar and proud province to make the world more agreeable to man, how can they throw away the immense privilege? Man is the king of this world; he should have a royal consort.

One may say that a good temper would be the cure of all the evils herein described. True enough, if one were never annoyed by a dilatory dress-maker, or an unbecoming dress, or no dresses at all, or ruffled by a slanderous report, or worn out with poor servants—if these ills of life found all serene and composed, one should be simply perfect, and nothing more need be said or written; but we have not attained to that dull level of perfection. To be those "faultless monsters whom the world ne'er saw" would be worse than to mount the perpetual hobbies of dress, parties, scandal, servants; but greatest virtues being faults overcome, we can improve very greatly without running much risk of becoming perfect.

Women, when together, do not talk much of love, except in quiet parlours in the country. There little groups, or more often two, speculate on the great subject. The sentimental woman is rapidly disappearing from the face of the earth. The busy life of cities, the wonderful exertions our women have to make to attain even the poor prizes which the world offers them, precludes sentiment. Perhaps that is well. The Rosa-Matilda school was not a good one, but it might be worse; and some women of unoccupied minds and hearts have found a worse in the novels of Balzac and his contemporaries. But we have little to fear from this; a few may feel the vitiating influence, but the many are too busy and too pure. The individual who always "Finds some work

For idle hands to do."

according to Dr. Watts, would seem to find his occupation gone in this country.

We have simply skimmed the surface of society, and have quoted the style of talk of many women. Far be it from our intention to say that no women talk better. The image of many a beloved mother, many a good wife, many an attractive and most admirable person, rises up to silence such an assertion. But we believe it not unfair to say that the conversation which is cultivated in fashionable circles, and even in the more exclusive home circles, is, among women, flat, foolish, and most unprofitable. Its chief spice is abuse, and that is a very poor spice to use. Still, as we before said,

"Errors, like straws, upon the surface flow;
He who would search for pearls must dive below."

Straws sometimes show which way the wind blows, however; and there is no surer way of becoming envious, flippant, and undevout than to talk as if we were.

There is, in a library in Belgravia, a statue of Silence, with finger on lip. The effect of the statue is said to be electrical. Every one who looks at it immediately stops talking. If we could have one in our parlours how admirable the effect would be! To be in the full tide of furious talk, to look up, and see this marble finger perpetually raised!

"Come, then, expressive Silence!"

We all know some people who say more by saying nothing at all than all the rest of the world achieve by talking perpetually. Let us then cultivate, as one step toward reformation, the "great talent of silence;" and, as another step, let us discard the three most fascinating subjects to woman, and the three most detestable ones to man.

We have not touched at all the possibility of making these subjects interesting and instructive. Perhaps there exists that Circe from whose lips even the evil doings of servants may come clothed in golden utterances; but she is indeed a Circe, and to be avoided by her unfortunate sisters, for they would only contract her faults without her fascination, and that result we have all seen and felt.

Nor can the remedy be so readily pointed out as the disease. But that we leave, with much confidence, to the discretion of the fair speakers. Our women find out very readily what is becoming in all other senses of the word. Let them find out, as undoubtedly they will, what is most so in conversation.

THE BLACKBIRD'S SONG.

It is not in the wild valley, flanked with birchen slopes, and stretching far away among the craggy hills, that the music of the blackbird floats upon the evening breeze. There you may listen delighted to the gentle song of the mavis; but here, in this plain, covered with corn-fields, and skirted with gardens, sit thee down on the green turf by the gliding brook, and mark the little black speck, stuck as it were upon the top twig of that tall poplar. It is a blackbird; for now the sweet strain, loud but mellowed by distance, comes upon the ear, inspiring pleasant thoughts, and banishing care and sorrow. The bird has evidently learnt his part by long practice, for he sits sedately and in full consciousness of superiority. Ceasing at intervals, he renews the strain, varying so that, although you can trace an occasional repetition of notes, the staves are never precisely the same. You may sit an hour or longer, and yet the song will be continued; and, in the neighbouring gardens, many rival songsters will sometimes raise their voices at once, or delight you with alternate strains. And now what is the purpose of all this melody? We can only conjecture that it is the expression of the perfect happiness which the creature is enjoying, when, uncared by care, conscious of security, and aware of the presence of his mate, he instinctively pours forth his soul in joy, and gratitude, and love. He does not sing to amuse his mate, as many have supposed, for he often sings in winter, when he is not yet mated; nor does he sing to beguile his solitude, for now he is not solitary; but he sings because all his wants are satisfied, his whole frame glowing with health, and because his Maker has gifted him with the power of uttering sweet sounds.

Chemical Experiments.

ARSENICAL PAPER.

THERE has been a great deal of discussion of late relative to the injurious consequences arising from certain green papers employed for paper hangings. I remember once reading an account of a certain Prussian policeman, who, coming into a private house in a manner which policemen think right and proper in Prussia, but which would be quite wrong and improper in England, and perceiving that the walls were hung with brilliant green paper, immediately tore it down, fearing lest the health of the inmates might be damaged by its remaining there. Now you must be made aware, if you do not already know, that all the most beautiful greens which one finds on paper, are arsenical greens, and the important question arises thus: Are they or are they not dangerous? On this point we have very precise testimony indeed.

Public attention was first drawn in England to the injurious nature of these green arsenical papers about a year and a half ago, when a medical gentleman resident in Birmingham—then as well as now, I believe—made known his experience. It appears that being very partial to green, the gentleman in question caused his study, a little room lighted with gas, to be hung with green paper. The inmate could not at all understand the painful symptoms from which he began to suffer very soon after the paper-hanging operation; until at length the symptoms of arsenical poisoning became so marked, that he began in earnest to try to discover the cause of this. He succeeded in proving without doubt that the heat of the gas flame sufficed to evolve a considerable amount of arsenic, and arsenic, poisonous enough though it be when taken into the stomach, is still more poisonous when taken into the lungs.

I will mention now how you yourself, without any apparatus almost, may demonstrate the existence of arsenic in nearly every specimen of bright green paper which you can lay your hands upon. Firstly, set a bit of such paper on fire, and notice how strongly the smoke evolved smells of onion or garlic. This in itself is an almost unfailing sign (under the conditions involved) of arsenic. Not more than a hundred years ago, so imperfect were the means at the disposal of chemists for the discovery of arsenic, that a celebrated German writer on poisons recommended, in a suspected case of poisoning by arsenic, the burning of the whole body—the peculiar colour evolved during burning being particularly noticed!

This was rough practice for the occasion; nevertheless, the garlicky smell is a very good rough indication of arsenic. By following the subjoined directions, any person, however little adept in chemical matters, may succeed in evolving the arsenic, and obtaining it in a metallic form. Procure a physis bottle, to the mouth of which a cork is attached perforated with a hole, and into the perforation the stem of a tobacco-pipe is thrust. Place a few fragments of the paper in question into the bottle, then a few fragments of the metal zinc; moisten the whole with a few tea-spoonfuls of pure water; lastly add about one tea-spoonful of oil of vitriol, and close the whole with the perforated cork. Wait a moment or two, then apply a candle-flame to the end of the tobacco-pipe, so that the gas which escapes may inflame, and hold a piece of white porcelain over the flame, and in contact with it when burning. A black spot will appear on the porcelain, which spot is arsenic, so reduced to its metallic state. There are very many other methods of discovering the presence of arsenic, and actually of obtaining it; but I shall not mention them here, because they would be far more likely to confuse the learner than to be of assistance to him. If these first notions set forth in these papers create any love for chemistry, there are plenty of books which will carry the learner further.

GENERAL THOMPSON.

"WHAT is a radical? One who seeks the root of the evil of which he complains; one that knows what is amiss, and goes to work the right way to rectify it. Every man is a radical, irrespective of party politics, which we leave others to discuss, who shuts his mouth to keep out lies. Does any man go to a doctor and ask for a cure that is not radical? All men have been radicals who ever did any good since the world began. Adam was a radical when he cleared the first place from rubbish for Eve to live in. Noah was a radical when, hearing the world was to be drowned, he went about such a common sense proceeding as making himself a ship to swim in. An antediluvian whig would have laid half-a-dozen sticks together for an ark, and called it 'a virtual representation.'" Such is part of the definition of a radical by that sage old soldier and statesman whose portrait we present.

General Thompson is a liberal of the old school. The incidents of his life would furnish materials for a dozen novels. He has served and commanded both in the army and navy; in two hemispheres; going through fire and water; in contests with Frenchmen in the Peninsula, South Americans at Buenos Ayres, slave traders on the coast of Africa, Arabs round the Persian Gulf, and Hindoos up the Ganges. In the midst of moving incidents in flood and field, he mastered the French language, also Spanish and Arabic; studied Jeremy Bentham; wrote pamphlets on law and morals; negotiated commercial treaties; and qualified himself for a brilliant campaign in the field of literature and politics.

General Thompson is one of those who sustained the real respectability of the popular cause when to be a radical was to be little less than infamous. It was the fashion in those days to ridicule as ignorant, illiterate, vulgar anarchists, those who held opinions that are now regarded as anything but extreme. People in these days can form no idea of the tyranny exercised towards men of liberal opinions, who had not gone through the ordeal of fashionable instruction, or who had not received an university education. Hence the vast importance of a man like Thompson, who, on their own chosen ground, was the equal of almost all the oligarchical deriders of the masses—not only graduate of a university, but a distinguished prize man of a famous college; both a classical scholar and mathematician of high order, familiar with the whole range of belles lettres, of some eloquence in speech, and prompt, pungent wit on paper; versed in political economy, conversant with mercantile matters, no stranger to commerce, at home in military and naval affairs from actual experience, and the jurisprudence of nations from his residence abroad—such was General Thompson, and such he still is, a man who has not only grown gray, but white as snow in his laudable zeal for the public good.

We may here briefly notice the leading facts of his eventful career, naturally beginning with his birth, which took place at Hull, in 1788. His father, who long sat for Midhurst, Sussex, was a banker, and an active adherent to the cause of Wesleyan Methodism. Perronet Thompson was educated at the grammar school of his native town. He took a bachelor's degree at Queen's College, Cambridge, in 1802, and the following year entered the navy, and served three years under Vice-Admiral Gambier. In 1806 he exchanged the navy for the army. As second lieutenant in the rifle corps, he was present at the attack on Buenos Ayres, and was one of the many British officers who were captured in that disastrous affair. On his liberation from South America he returned to England, where he resumed his acquaintance with his father's early friend, Wilberforce. In 1808 he was sent out to Sierra Leone. There he set to work with all his energy to put down the slave trade, and fully to carry out the principles of the Negro Emancipation Act. His exertions met with little encouragement at home, and still less favour from the slave dealers, who at length induced Lord Castlereagh to recall him. Another governor was accordingly nominated, and, in 1812, Perronet Thompson returned to active military service. At the peace of 1814 he was promoted to the rank of captain, and served in India, Persia, and South America. In 1821 he returned to England, and in 1825 was promoted to the rank of major. He was subsequently made lieutenant-colonel, and became major-general in 1854. Retiring on half-pay, he became leader of the radicals, and began to distinguish himself both as a politician and a man of letters. For ten years he wrote many of the ablest papers on current public questions that appeared in the Westminster Review, of which journal he was for some time joint editor and proprietor with Dr. Bowring. He possessed high claims to the position he occupied in the Corn Law struggle; for twelve years before the controversy began, he wrote "The Catechism of the Corn Laws," which contained the substance of all that was subsequently elaborated by Mr. Cobden and his coadjutors.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

MAJOR-GENERAL THOMPSON, M.P., F.R.S. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY JOHN WATKIN.

He was returned to parliament for Hull in 1835, and represented that constituency till 1837. He was an unsuccessful candidate for Preston in 1835, for Maidstone in 1837, for Marylebone in 1838, for Manchester in 1839, for Hull in 1841, and for Sunderland in 1845. He sat for Bradford from 1847 to 1852, when he was defeated; but again elected in 1857.

The following lines are strikingly appropriate, and with them we conclude this sketch:—

- " His hath been a life of travel,
Viewing cities—studying men;
Tangled sophisms to unravel,
Artful knots t' unite again.
His to dissipate delusion,
Truth to drag from error's den,
And to make deceit's confusion
Plain, as honesty is plain.
- " Ever battling with the oppressed,
Against the oppressor we shall stand;
Blest as generous men are blessed,
Who, with ready, out-stretched hand,
Aid the weak and raise the lowly,
Firm through all vicissitude—
His the mission high and lowly,
Trusted to the free—the good.
- " Not a hair-breadth will he wander
When conviction points his way;
Censures scare him not nor slander,
To turn back, or halt, or stray;
No temptation can allure him,
Ask what liberty commands,
In her service you insure him,
Midst her firmest, foremost bands.

" Ready wit, and racy diction,
Illustrations quaint and new;
Fancy's touch without her fiction,
Truth adorned, but still most true.
Class, creed, country, do not narrow
His affections, nor control;
Straight as flies the archer's arrow,
Straight he speeds him to his goal.

" What's the goal! emancipation!
Slavery's fetters to unbind;
Liberty for every nation,
Love and peace for all mankind!
Rights maintaining—wrongs redressing,
Law revered and understood,
Sovereignty both blest and blessing,
Universal brotherhood."

THE GROTTO OF MARTINSWAND.

ONCE seen, the Tyrolese country is never to be forgotten. There is about its scenery that grandeur and beauty which are indelibly impressed on the memory; its lofty mountain range, its snow-covered heights, its green, fruitful valleys, its picturesque villages, its straw-hatted men and sugar-loaf capped women, its wild sports, and its quiet homes, are to be remembered with pleasure. For a kindly hospitable people are the Tyrolese, and a bright sunshiny spot is the Tyrol.

Round about Innspruck (the capital) there are some charming bits of scenery—barren highlands, fruitful lowlands, gray old mountains looking down at themselves in placid lakes, little villages, and stray houses in acres of rye and buckwheat, and here and there some natural curiosity—some lion, which every tourist in common courtesy is bound to visit.

THE GROTTA OF MARTINSWAND.

And one of these lions is the grotto of Martinswand (Martin's Wall), the locality of which is represented in our engraving. Here is the still water, encircled by luxuriant herbage and lofty trees that nevertheless shrink into mere shrubs under the shadow of the magnificent mountain. Well, more than half way up this mountain the observer will notice a dark, cavernous recess; that is the Grotto of Martinswand.

The grotto opens on the steep acclivity of the mountain. It is nearly sixty feet high, and about thirteen feet deep. It has, since 1767, been used as a sort of chapel, and in it have been placed a crucifix and two statues, one representing the Virgin Mary, and the other the apostle St. John. Thither flock pilgrims to recite their prayers in memory of the marvellous escape of Maximilian I., who met with a serious accident while pursuing his favourite diversion, the chamois-hunt. He fell over the edge of a perpendicular cliff a hundred feet, but was saved, notwithstanding, by the courage of a brave Tyrolean. It appears, from what the peasants relate, that Maximilian had three of the ordinary fastenings used by the chamois-hunters on each foot; that five of the six gave way, and that he hung suspended by the sixth. In this perilous position he remained for some time; that the country people assembled from all parts; that they offered their prayers at the foot of the mountain; rang the church bells; carried the holy sacrament to the spot; that they were exceedingly pious, but not at all practical, till a poor huntsman, Zipps by name, bethought him of a plan to save the emperor. He ascended the mountain, lowered cords and grappling-irons to the unfortunate prince; was rejoiced to find himself understood; still more, that the emperor was strong enough to avail himself of the means of rescue; most of all was he rejoiced when the escape was over, and safe and sound, in life and limb, Maximilian stood by his side, and, in the gratitude of his heart, made Zipps the peasant, Zipps the peer.

This happened—or is reported to have happened—three hundred and fifty years ago: the grotto marks the spot. It may be true, or it may not. People are at liberty to believe it or reject it, as they please; but at all events, the thing is quite within the range of probability: and as to the scenery, which, after all, is the chief attraction to the tourist, there is nothing more striking in the Tyrol.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,
SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Oh, for a law to noose the villain's neck
Who starves his own, who persecutes the blood
He gave them, in his children's veins, and hates
And wrongs the woman he has sworn to love.

COWPER.

APPLE BLOSSOM's heart was lightened of a great load when her darling boy, her only son, her Larkie Grigg, left the police-court; not merely without a stain on his pure though humble name, but evidently raised in the opinion of the worthy magistrate and all present by the indirect proofs of his honest and straightforward nature, which the cross-examination of Carrot Meg had elicited.

There were volumes of appreciation and approbation in the grave smile with which "his Worship" recognised Larkie Grigg's low bow of heartfelt thankfulness, and there was a touching courtesy (always to be found in a true gentleman towards any woman) in the grace with which he returned Apple Blossom's deep obeisance, and, "May God bless and reward your Worship for the justice you have done this day, to the best son that ever comforted a mother's sore heart."

Sam Slybrute, who liked to share in any sort of triumph, noted, what mother and son, and even sweet little Hope Evermore were too engrossed to observe; namely, that the magistrate, referring to his notes, copied into a little pocket-book of his own the name and address of Larkie Grigg.

Many were the castles in the air built on this slight foundation. But the very poor, who have not even a cottage on earth, very soon run up the loftiest castles in the air.

Sam Slybrute still hung on to the Blossom party. He had a sort of vague hope, that some kind of carouse would celebrate Larkie's triumphant acquittal.

He forgot that the only person likely to propose a glass in honour of Larkie's return home, was not only not present, but, as he shrewdly guessed, not likely or able to appear.

They were approaching their own neighbourhood, when Hope suddenly exclaimed, "Where's Meg! poor Meg! mammy? it was all owing to Meg, that we got Larkie Grigg back safe. Do'ee give her a bit of our dinner, mammy. Do, dear mammy."

Hope had been clinging fondly to the arm of her rescued Larkie, clasping round the firm muscular limb of the son of the people, her own delicate, taper, and rose-tipped fingers, making him tell her every particular of his meeting with the bad boys, and of his dreary night at the station-house; all he had thought, felt, and suffered. But even Larkie Grigg could not make Hope forget Meg, who had told the truth (certainly almost by accident), but still she had told the truth, and saved Larkie Grigg from disgrace, imprisonment, hard labour, vile associates, and perhaps, oh, horror of horrors! a whipping! And in saving Larkie Grigg from all this, from what had she not saved his mother and his little foster sister?

"Let us go back, dear Larkie Grigg," she said, "and see where Meg is." Larkie agreed, and Apple Blossom hastened home. Sam Slybrute, still led on by the ignis fatuus hope of something to drink, kept by her side. It was a hope which yielded to a surly despair, when having reached her little room, Apple Blossom asked him in, saying—

"Thank'ee, kindly, Slybrute, for thy help, and thy company. I'm a-going to make a cup o' tea, and fry a few taters and herrings by way of a bit o' dinner; will thystay and share our poor meal? My children and I never drink any strong liquors, so I won't offer thee any; and of course, thee guesses, Slybrute, that Bob had too much last night, and pays for it to-day, as he always do, by losing a day's work and lying ill in bed with a splittin' head-ache, and the thirst upon him. But, come, Slybrute, I'll make you a good strong cup o' tea."

"No, thank ye, Apple Blossom; I hates tea, and teetotalers into the bargain—the present company always excepted, you know. I own I's dry, uncommon dry; there's somehut very choky in them police-courts; but I'll go and talk mother-in-law over—her corkscrew don't want much oiling; and if fair words don't butter no parsnips, they does mother-in-law; butters she up to some purpose, they does. We had a bit of a shindy this morning, but she don't like drinking alone, she don't; she'll be very glad to have I back to hob-nob with her; so, good-bye to thee, Apple Blossom. I's glad Larkie's come off with flyin' colours. I hears Bob in there a-crying out for water. Lor! what a poor head Bob have; he always had, poor feller. He'll be a teetotaler some day."

"I hope he may, Slybrute," said Apple Blossom, as she filled a jug.

Slybrute took his leave, murmuring to himself: "They're a beggarly set, them teetotalers; people be, to be sure. Here, three blessed hours have I been in the police-court for she, and not so much as a glass o' gin or a pot o' beer, by way of compliment. I declares, I loike old mother-in-law better nor e'er a one of them: she be hearty. Liquor may make the temper and the face a little fiery; but then, it do warm up the heart, too. Them teetotalers' veins seems to me full of cold water; and no wonder, seeing how they guzzles it down. I'll get mother-in-law to make a regular good 'brew'; I'm perished, just; I am out o' work, and out o' heart, and down in the mouth, and down in the world. Slops o' tea or cold water won't make me forget that I haven't a day's work before me, nor a shilling to call my own. That mother-in-law of mine, who has just come to Lunnon, is complete my missus, and teaching Kitty to be as bad as herself. But mother-in-law's a trump, after all; her 'brew' will drive all trouble out of my head and heart—leastways, for a bit. A man that is drunk is as great as a king. What 'ud I do to-day, out o' work and out o' sorts, if I hadn't mother-in-law and her whisky to turn to? I begin to be glad the old lady won't budge. What would I do to-day, without liquor? Out o' work, too."

He forgot that it was owing to liquor that he was out of work. He had been dismissed by a master builder very reluctantly (for Sam Slybrute, when sober, was a capital workman, earning thirty shillings a week, and worthy of his hire), dismissed for almost habitual drunkenness; and, but for old Mrs. Piche's arrival, he would have been turned into the streets, or into the union with his wife and babe.

It was very fortunate they had a home with her, but very unlucky that it was a home where his bad habit was confirmed, and where his love of liquor alone gave him a claim, and made him welcome. Mrs. Piche hated lonely drinking, and, when she summed up the long, black catalogue of Sam Slybrute's faults and vices, she generally wound up by remarking that all she could say in his favour was, that he was no water-drinking, total-abstinence chap, but could take his glass like a man, and enjoy it like a Christian (what curious ideas of a Christian's attributes have those who trust to themselves and their own criterion, and not to the written word of God). However, this boundless capability for imbibing alcohol in her opinion made up for many crimes and misdemeanours.

Larkie Grigg and little Hope Evermore found Carrot Meg beset by some pals of Stunning Steenie's, Prigg Peter's, and the Fox's, who were pelting her with snow-balls, and calling her "tell-tale" and "blab," with other opprobrious names, unfit for our pages.

Poor Potato-heels! she cut a very ludicrous figure: her wild, tangled, curling hair, red as fire, on end on her head like a blaze of flames—her ragged dress, almost torn off—her face flushed—her large, white teeth, or rather tusks, contrasted with the sealing-wax red of her thick lips and open mouth, giving her the appearance of some wild animal in a rage—her clenched hands—the red heels, that, bulging through her rusty, black, worsted stockings, explained and justified her nickname—and her wild cries of rage and defiance, all reminded one of pictures of some young savage, or even demon.

There were about four ragged, stunted, street boys at her when Larkie appeared.

Larkie's bravery and skill as a boxer and wrestler, a skill acquired from Lame Luke, were well known.

Not one of these cowards would have stood his ground a moment, but Larkie stole upon them from behind, punched the head of one, rolled another in the snow, knocked a third down, and let the fourth take to flight, and then he and Hope helped Meg to put herself a little to rights.

It was touching to see little Hope taking a small pincushion from her pocket (the darling was so notable and orderly), pinning up the wild tatters of the ragged girl's wretched frock, smoothing her obstinate, spiral, wiry, red locks of matted hair, stroking her down, and touching her up, until at last Meg Grimes looked a little better, rather than worse, than usual.

Larkie Grigg, giving one hand to Meg, and the other to Hope Evermore, ran with them at full speed back to his own home to dinner.

CHAPTER XXXV.

For man must work and woman must weep—
There are few to earn and many to keep.

OLD SONG.

All the care
Ingenuous parsimony takes, but just
Saves the small inventory—bed and stool,
Skillet and old carved chest—from public sale.

COWPER.

DINNER!

There is something very affecting in the dinner of "the Poor"—at least when he who should enable the wife to provide a comfortable meal is, either by illness or vice (the vice of drunkenness more especially and generally), out of work, and therefore out of pay.

Tea is almost always the result of such a state of things in country cot, or small, close London room. And such tea!—often without milk or sugar—and with nothing to eat but a little dry bread or a few cold potatoes!

This to be the principal meal of the day, for the able-bodied adult poor, and their hungry, growing children! But it was not quite so bad as this at Apple Blossom's, on the occasion to which we allude.

She was very honest, and very thrifty; and, on a day when Bob could not earn anything, she was resolved not to spend much. But still, she made some very good tea, and fried some red herrings and some cold potatoes, so as to make a dish that seemed to all those hungry ones (Meg especially) most tempting, both to the sense of taste and smell. Nor did it offend the eye—the meals of the poor so often, alas! do; for everything—cloth, crockery, knives and forks—shone with cleanliness; and Apple Blossom cooked to perfection.

Merry's dinner was carried to her (by little Hope) in a clean, hot, white basin; and Apple Blossom, hearing Bob groan, went in to ask him what he would have.

A basin of tea and a bit of dry toast were the objects of his desires, and these Apple Blossom got ready, and took them to him, as nice and inviting as if he had deserved all her love and care, and were laid up through a chance sickness, not through his own vile and besetting sin.

Apple Blossom did her duty by Bob, but of course she could not—hurt, wounded, and disappointed as she felt—approach him with that playful tenderness and winning confidence which were among her greatest charms.

Bob was no longer savage, brutal, and unmanageable, but he was sullen, downcast, and reserved.

He watched Apple Blossom out of the corners of a half-shut, bloodshot eye, as she placed the tea and dry toast on a table beside him, and then he saw that she was bruised, her nose swollen, her eye blackened, her complexion pale, her looks dejected, tired, haggard.

He loathed himself as he recalled the scene at the "True Briton;" and the thought crossed his mind, for the first time in his life, that no woman could love a man who could use her thus; that Apple Blossom did not love him, but that duty made her endure a man and a fate which she could not escape.

There was great anguish to the wretched Bob in this thought, for he doated on his wife. She was as pretty (in his eyes, and almost as much so in reality) as on the day he married her.

He loved her bright, laughing eyes, her plump, firm cheeks—the red and white that made the nickname of Apple Blossom so appropriate; the open brow, so sunny and so candid; the red lips of a mouth, which was rather too large for regular beauty, but was finely formed, and whose ready smile, or hearty laugh, showed such large, even, brilliant teeth. True, a little matron cap concealed her still clustering hair, and the slight girl he had married had now the fine full figure of the ripened woman.

"That sylph-like form—'twere idle now to flatter—
Had grown, indeed, considerably fatter."

Apple Blossom had no longer the promise of being a fine woman. She was one, with broad shoulders, a very full bust, but still a finely-shaped waist; in all other respects a full-sized, full-blown, blooming young matron. But of all her charms what had Bob left her—at least, what did he blink at from his bed, with that bloodshot, and now tear-dimmed eye?

Apple Blossom was unlike her usual self. Her hair, owing to that night of anxiety and watchfulness, was now dragged, dull and uncared for, off a sad and sorrowful brow; one eye was blackened; the rose and lily were gone from her face; her soft, bright, velvet skin looked dark and discoloured; her pretty little nose was still swollen; her mouth was pale, and had no smile; its corners, where generally love nestled, were drawn down. There was no trimness in her waist; no care in her dress. She was bent, weighed down, neglected.

"There's tea and dry toast, Bob," she said, in low, sad tones. "Can thee take it without help?"

"Yes," said Bob, nettled that she did not raise his head of her own accord, and pillow it on her bosom, "I want no help—leastways," he muttered to himself, "none that's grudged."

Apple Blossom did not appear to hear him.

Bob, in spite of racking agony in his head, redeemed his boast. He took up the basin and the toast, and, having drank the tea and eaten the toast, he lay down again, turned his face to the wall, and pretended to sleep.

But there was no sleep in that aching head—no peace in that tormented heart.

The thought that Apple Blossom did not love him—had ceased to love him—was soon followed by the (to him) terrible idea that she loved some one else. Jack Badger's words came back to his mind. Jem Goodman!—Ha! how Apple Blossom always welcomed and praised him! How often he came—how much they were together!

Bob tossed about in a positive fever of jealousy. He could have killed Jem Goodman then and there, but he resolved to watch—to wait—to bide his time.

Meanwhile the poor dinner of the little contented Christian family went on merrily. To Meg it was a perfect feast. And then to be near Larky Grigg!—to be thanked by him and little Hope, and praised by Apple Blossom for speaking the truth! Meg was wild with delight. For the first time in her life she felt herself almost respectable—a person of importance. She tried not to scratch her head, bite her nails, shuffle with her feet, or do anything for which she was always reprov'd.

She was very stiff and awkward in her efforts to behave politely; twice nearly choked herself in trying to drink quietly; and greatly amused Larky, who was endeavouring to count the pins in her old frock, and the wild, spiral, matted curls of her porcupine head.

Hope, seeing what Larky Grigg was doing, shook her pretty golden head, and raised her little forefinger, and prevented some practical jokes he was about to play off on Meg by saying, "O Larky Grigg! but for Meg and her speaking up for thee, in spite of Stunning Steenie, Prigging Peter, and the Fox, where would thee be now?"

"Thee must all take theeselves off to the ragged school," said Apple Blossom. "Thee'll be expected there, and only in the way here, for I expects the ladies to call; so, Larky, good lad, take 'em along of thee. I'll tidy up the place a bit."

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Her lot is on you; to be found untidied
Watching the stars out by the bed of pain,
With a pale cheek, and yet a brow inspired,
And a true heart of hope, though hope be vain;
Meekly to bear with wrongs, to cheer decay,
And oh! to love thro' all things, therefore pray!

MRS. HENANS.

The remnants of the poor meal were cleared away, the little room was put to rights, the hearth was swept, a cheerful fire blazed, Apple Blossom dressed herself neatly, smoothed her rich hair, and hid as much as she could the marks of Bob's drunken brutality. She had washed her honest, handsome face until it shone again; her best cap, her clean collar and cuffs, neat dark stuff gown, and white apron, were a very suitable and becoming costume. But still poor Apple Blossom did not look herself, nor feel herself either.

There was a sick, low, hysterical flutter at her heart, a shivering dread of she knew not what, a feeling of deep and bitter disappointment, and, added to all this, there was a constant, dull, aching pain, and occasionally a sharp pang in that poor, faithful breast which Bob had kicked in his drunken rage.

Had not Apple Blossom herself looked so sad there would have been something almost pleasant in the aspect of that little, humble, tidy parlour.

As it was also a kitchen, pans and saucepans, bright as gold and silver, adorned one side and reflected the warm glow of the fire.

Coloured prints of the Queen and Prince Consort filled the place of honour over the mantel-shelf.

The great and good Howard of the past century, and the noble Howard of this, the Earl of Shaftesbury, flanked the Queen and Prince; and then came two little highly-coloured likenesses of Bob Blossom and Betty Blythe, as they appeared when asked in church; and, certainly, if they had so appeared, matrimony had vastly improved them.

For Bob in a blue coat, brass buttons, white cravat, cornelian brooch, stiffly-curved hair, and dull, heavy, face, looked both an idiot and a clown, while in reality he was, when sober, a fine, manly, intelligent-looking fellow; not a gentleman, certainly, but what is much better, a bright, brave, handsome man.

While Miss Betty Blythe, with bows and plaits of hair on the top of her head, staring black eyes, very round face, earmine cheeks, cherry mouth, small body, short waist, yellow dress, and coral necklace, brooch, and ear-rings, was a very inferior person to Apple Blossom, whom any painter might have converted into an Eve or a Madonna.

There were as chimney ornaments some curious models in wood and cardboard by Larky; and there were tufts of feathers given to Merry by a bird-seller who lived close by.

A bit of green baize covered the floor; an old dark mahogany table was in the centre, and on it the large old family Bible, and Apple Blossom's work-box (given to her when she was Miss Blythe) and her work-basket, the ragged school magazines, and a few other tracts and books.

The walls were covered with Scripture prints, highly coloured and illuminated by Larky and Hope with gold and silver tinsel. And there were some hideous, small-eyed, flat-mouthed, bulbous-nosed, dreary, dingy little pictures of creatures so ugly and lifeless, they seemed scarcely human; and there were photographs of lovely little Hope Evermore, Hebe-like Merry, bold, handsome Larky, large-eyed, wizen-faced, picturesque Nessy, and chubby, cherub-like, blue-eyed baby Ben.

The whole lot, frames and all, done for eighteen pence.

Devoutly believed in and warmly admired by all the neighbourhood, and much valued by simple people, who believe every picture like, and all they see in print, true!

As Apple Blossom sat in Bob's easy chair (there were chairs of all sizes, from a large old arm-chair to baby Ben's little low straw ditto), sighing and stitching, stitching and sighing, and now and then dropping a tear on the frock she was mending, she heard gentle voices at the door, followed by a knock, and she hastened to admit "the ladies."

Apple Blossom's manner had not its usual cheerful, modest ease, for she was ashamed of her black eye, her swollen nose, and pale cheeks, and she felt that though Ada and Ellen made a point of looking away, the keen glance of Mrs. Golightly, sharpened by a pair of refulgent, powerfully magnifying spectacles, was fixed inquiringly, and almost angrily, upon her.

"Are the children at the ragged school?" asked Ellen, eager to say something to break the awkward silence.

"Yes, miss," replied Apple Blossom, trying to smile, "all but Merry—she's keeping my stall to-day. I'm not that well—"

"Where's your husband?" asked Mrs. Golightly, in an almost sepulchral voice. "Is he at work?"

Apple Blossom started and reddened all over. She hesitated for a moment, and then she said:

"Bob's ailing, too, ma'am! he's obliged to keep his bed."

"What's his ailment?" asked Mrs. Golightly, as if she were a very brow-beating counsel for the plaintiff, cross-examining a witness for the defendant.

"He's bad in his head and in his inside, ma'am," said Apple Blossom.

"So I suspected," said Mrs. Golightly; "but his worst disease is here," touching her heart.

"No," said Apple Blossom, raising her eyes and boldly confronting Mrs. Golightly's spectacles and all; "Bob's all right there, ma'am."

"As right, poor woman, as you are here!" and Mrs. Golightly touched her own large masculine forehead.

"Well, ma'am, barring that I never could take to book-learning, little or big, my head-piece ain't much to complain of; I've brought up my family decent enough. I've kept matters together pretty tidy considering. I don't owe nobody nothink, and I hope I does my duty to God and man, as far as my poor abilities and means goes, and allowing for the infirmities of human nature—and that we can't none of us do nothink of ourselves to help ourselves."

"You make too much allowance for the infirmities of human nature, woman," said Mrs. Golightly. "You do not do your duty to God or man, or you'd break your wicked husband of drunkenness. You'd not let him squander in liquor, what ought to maintain his wife and family in comfort. You wouldn't let him knock you about. Nay, no fims, woman! 'Lying lips are an abomination to the Lord.' What Blossom is, can be read written in black and blue on your poor temple."

"It's long since he was overtook, ma'am," said Apple Blossom, crying. "Sober, he's the best husband ever woman had, the kindest, gentlest, goodest—he's an angel, sober."

"Then, why don't you keep him sober? Why don't he take the pledge?"

"He's so much agen it."

"Then, why don't you take your children, and what money you have, and go to him and say—If you don't take the pledge, I'll sell off every stiek and take my children and emigrate with them? Why don't you do that?"

There was a quiet, quaint humour in Apple Blossom, and, all unlettered as she was, she was not deficient in mother wit and quickness of perception, but she had all the respect for "gentry" of the genuine country-bred woman, and she did not answer until Mrs. Golightly, drawing closer to her, and speaking more sternly, and glaring more fiercely even than before, said—

"Why do you not threaten, and if necessary leave him?"

"Because, ma'am," said Apple Blossom, "when I went to church along of Bob, we got married."

"What does the fool mean?" cried Mrs. Golightly. "Of course you got married."

"Manning no offence, you never wor married, wor you, ma'am?"

"No, thanks to a merciful Providence, I never was."

"If you had abeen, ma'am, you'd have knowed that when a woman marries, she swears to love, honour, and obey her husband."

"Not if he turns out a brute, a beast—for what else is a drunkard?"

"In coorse, ma'am," said Apple Blossom, "I can't argufy with a bookish lady like you, 'tain't likely; but as far as I can see, I took Bob for 'better for wuss,' and I swore to forsake all others and cleave to he, and to keep him in sickness and in health."

"But you don't keep him in health, woman, by letting him get tipsy, do you? Isn't he now laid up in his bed, and unable to do his work and earn his wages, because he's been drinking again? That is not the way to keep him in health, is it?"

"No, ma'am; and I does my best to hinder him; and for nigh three weeks he hasn't been overtook. If he's ever quite cured, and do take the pledge, it'll be along of I. If I wor to leave 'un, he'd soon take up with them low, guzzling pals o' his, and he'd drink hisself into his grave. I dare say a broken heart 'ud soon bring me to moine; but that ain't the end of all, as I heerd at the ragged school from that 'ere great rousing speaker. The gates o' death is the entrance to life; arter the grave comes the judgment; and how 'ud I stand at that bar if I'd forsook poor Bob, and left him to ruin hisself, and he the kindest, best partner in the world when he is sober, and wouldn't never be no other if it warn't for the drink?"

Mrs. Golightly shrugged her shoulders, and looked at poor Apple Blossom with a smile of ineffable contempt, mingled with pity. Apple Blossom bore this very well, and, to divert attention from herself, took out of a drawer in an old oaken bureau some of little Hope's triumphs in crochet, and copy-books of Larky's; but this was not allowed to go on long.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Yon cottager who plies at her own door,
Pillows and bobbin, all her little store,
Content, tho' mean, and cheerful, if not gay,
Shuffling her threads about the live-long day.

She reads her Bible, and believes it true,—
A bliss the brilliant Frenchman never knew.

COWPER.

"I WONDER," at length burst in Mrs. Golightly, addressing Ellen St. Ange (and taking the while a very crabbed-looking roll of closely-written foolscap out of her pocket), "whether this poor white slave could catch any sense of her degradation and her wrongs, and be roused to anything like resistance to oppression, by the opening of my pamphlet?"

"Oh! I should think not," said Ada, who had already heard that terrible, wordy cannonade three times.

"I am sure, dear friend, she could not understand a word of it," said Ellen, who heard it whenever she was alone with Mrs. Golightly; for that lady never made any addition or alteration in her pamphlet without insisting on reading it to Ellen St. Ange, and always proposed to begin at the beginning, ostensibly that Ellen might judge of it as a whole, but, in reality, because she had, as she thought, brought all her best field-pieces into play at the onset.

"I am not of your opinion, young ladies. At any rate, I shall give it a trial."

Ellen smiled, and Ada bowed. Ellen was all kindness, and never could find it in her heart to check or wound her old true friend.

"Just to prepare and awaken her mind," said Mrs. Golightly, "I will ask her a few questions. My good woman," she then said, addressing Apple Blossom, "are you aware that you, even you, crushed, beaten, degraded being that you are, have in that bruised, battered body an immortal soul? that you have rights which you ought to enforce, and wrongs which it is your duty to get redressed? Now, think before you answer me. The woman has a good philosophical development," she said to Ellen, as Apple Blossom put her well-shaped, red, hard-working hand to her pale, broad, throbbing forehead, to aid her in the laborious process of thinking. "With her head, I cannot think what it is makes a fool of her."

"Her heart," suggested Ellen.

"You have hit it—you have hit it, my dear!" almost screamed the excited Golightly; "and throughout the whole female population we find the fond heart misleading the wise head. Well, Apple Blossom, what do you consider to be your rights and wrongs?"

"Well, ma'am," said Apple Blossom, "I am, as you know, no scholar, but 'twor only last week as I spelled over to you at the ragged school some texts of Scripture, as Larky Grigg have since a-helped me to get by heart. You, ma'am, who read 'em off so glib-like, maybe don't get 'em so much by heart, as a body may say, as poor as I, as goes over and over them again and again like! Now one of them texts is our Lord's own words, 'Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth,' and another wor, 'But I say unto you, that ye resist not evil,' and again, 'Be not high-minded.' And more than all, ma'am, 'If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses.' That's all in the sermon on the mount, ma'am, and Larky Grigg, as knows it off by heart, is teaching me to get it off, too. And, ma'am, I wor a long time spelling out to you what the apostle Peter says, 'Likewise, ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands, that if any obey not the word, they also may without the word be won by the conversation of the wives, while they behold your chaste conversation coupled with fear.' Now, ma'am," and here Apple Blossom drew up her fine womanly form, and a bright glow suffused her face and neck, "I think that's woman's best of rights, to be allowed by the grace of God to win over her husband, the lover of her youth, the fayther of her bairns, he as works hard to keep her. Moin do, ma'am,—Bob do when he gets a job, and no mistake, over hours, till he comes home down-right beat, and so proud to put the wages into my hand, knowin' I ain't one of your dressy, spending gad-about, but that I'll make it go as far as I can. That's Bob's way when he's sober. I'll get him yet to leave off drinkin' or any other bad way he've felled into. And as to woman's wrongs, I read to you, ma'am, in St. Paul, 'If we will marry, we shall have trouble in the flesh,' and so wrongs we must put up with, for what are our wrongs compared to those of our blessed Lord? How was he beaten and spit upon, and nailed to the cross! He as never did or thought the thing that was wrong."

"You are quite right," said Mrs. Golightly, a little taken aback by one who, simple and untutored as she was, was a much better Christian and even theologian than the learned and spirited Golightly,—"you are quite right to get as many texts of Scripture by heart as you can, but they none of them exactly meet the exigencies of the case. There is nothing in Scripture to forbid your leaving a drunken brute who ill-uses you."

"Only," said Apple Blossom, "St. Paul says, in a chapter you taught me, 'Let not the wife depart from her husband.' I don't see how I can go off to Australy with the bairns without departing from him, ma'am. But I'm a poor, ignorant creatur, and your a larned, bookish lady; may be, you can tell me how to do boath."

"I will tell you what, on second thoughts, I consider a better course for you to pursue; and one which you can carry out without disobeying St. Paul's injunction."

"That's what I'd be downright thankful to hear, ma'am," said Apple Blossom.

"Listen, then!" said Mrs. Golightly, her eyes blazing, clenching her hands, and turning fire-colour; "have him up! appear against him! show your bruises! and take my word, woman, he'll get his deserts. And while his fingers are picking oakum, they may itch to be at you, but they'll itch in vain!"

Mrs. Golightly had risen in her wrath, and looked like an old Amazon about to destroy a foe.

Apple Blossom rose, too; deadly pale, even her lips white, and large tears in her eyes. She pressed her hands on her full bosom, as if to keep down her beating heart. Several times she tried to speak, in vain. At length she gasped forth, "Excuse me, ma'am, I can hear no more. I appear against my Bob!—I get the law of him, poor fellow!—I show the bruises he gave me while he wor in liquor, then, and no one half so ashamed of having marked a 'ooman, his own wife, too, as Bob when he comes to!—I try to get him in trouble!—I lie down in my warm bed at night, and think that through me Bob's a-shivering on a straw mattress in prison; that the head that for fifteen years has rested on my buzzom's bowed with shame; no pillow to lie upon, and can't never hold itself up again, no more as it have done? Ah, ma'am, it's clear you knows nothink of a wife's feelings. I'd rather die by Bob's hand when he's drunk, than do what 'd break his poor heart, sober! Seventy times seven, if he sin against me ever so bad, seventy times seven, I'll forgive him still!"

"My good woman," said Mrs. Golightly, "you interpret Scripture too literally. Do you suppose that when our Saviour says, 'If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out, and if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off,' he means you really to pluck out your eye and cut off your hand?"

"No, ma'am; our superintendent, Mr. Stephen his blessed self, at the ragged school, taught I that that wor a figgur of speech, and that what wor meant was not the eye or the hand, but any habit, affection, or sin that stood between us and salvation; and that might be, perhaps, as dear to us as a right eye or a right hand. Them's what we've to pluck out or to cut off, ma'am."

"Well spoken, Apple Blossom," said Ada. "Oh, what encouragement is the case of this poor and uneducated woman to Ragged Schools, and their wise, benevolent, and Christian founders and supporters!"

Ellen, her eyes moist with tears, took Apple Blossom's hand, and said, "I shall tell Mr. Stephen how you answered that question, Apple Blossom. I am sure he will be pleased with you; and so will all who have helped to prepare the soil of your heart for the good seed!"

"A work at which no one has toiled so hard and so incessantly as myself," said Mrs. Golightly. "Whatever Apple Blossom knows she owes to me."

"I'm sure, ma'am, I'm very thankful to you, and the 'mother' class teachers. I learns a lot one way and t'other; leastways I would, if I had the head for it. I ain't 'cute enough to explain nothink, but it seem to I, I learns to read of you, ma'am, and to feel of Mr. Stephen."

"I wish I could say you learn to read," said Mrs. Golightly. "However, Miss St. Ange says it will come all at once; and, certainly, I do think the great pains I have taken, and the admirable system I have pursued (one I invented myself), have succeeded better than even I was aware of till to-day in opening Apple Blossom's mind; so much so that, partly to enlighten her, and partly to reward her, I shall read her the opening of my pamphlet, entitled, Apple Blossom! 'The Rights and Wrongs of Woman.' Put down your work, my good creature, and give me your undivided attention."

Apple Blossom did as she was ordered, clasped her hands on her lap, and looked very earnest and demure. Ellen tried to avoid catching Ada's glance of humorous annoyance.

Mrs. Golightly spread the terrible-looking sheets of foolscap—so closely written, and even to the eye, so very forbidding—before her on the table. With a nervous gripe she untied, clutched off, and flung down beside her on the floor her large black beaver bonnet, pushed back her grizzled curls, and, clearing her voice in a very loud and rather irritating manner, she began:—

"The Rights and Wrongs of Woman: Rights which have yet to be recognised, and Wrongs which shall yet be Redressed."

"Well, that's foine, any ways, that is!" said Apple Blossom; "that do sound grand, that do!"

Mrs. Golightly bowed, with a little smile at Apple Blossom's tribute. Like many other authors, she was very vain; but, like them, very irritable too. She liked the tribute, but she hated the interruption.

"You must not make any remark until I pause, my good Apple Blossom," she said, kindly. "Restrain your enthusiasm until I allow you to give it vent."

Mrs. Golightly again cleared her voice.

"The Rights and Wrongs of Woman," she said, in a very loud and excited tone.

"Rights which have yet to be recognised, and Wrongs which shall yet be redressed."

"It is a melancholy, but an incontrovertible, fact, that more than one moiety of the population of the United Kingdom (that kingdom which boasts of the abolition of slavery) is yet composed of slaves—white slaves, female slaves, beings whom the state considers eligible for punishment, but not for reward."

"Intellectually (and in spite of tyrants, chains, and bondage), intellectually enlightened, morally responsible, physically and mentally, acutely sensitive to pain and pleasure, freedom and slavery; and yet, as wives, legal nonentities, and even as spinsters, widows (or, in the old law term, femmes soles), shut out alike from all public careers. These bondwomen are excluded from the senate, the bar, the pulpit; refused admittance to the groves of Academus, not allowed even to enter the porch of the temple, not permitted to sit even at the feet of Gamaliel. Trained from the cradle in habits of helplessness, dependence, and vanity, with which they go to their unhonoured graves. Toys, dolls, drudges, sultanas or slaves, Odaliques or scape-goats, in other words, WOMEN; and yet, in spite of all that laws, made by man, can do to crush—in spite of all that customs established by man can do to enslave—in spite of all that fashion (in other words, man's base policy) can do to encroach—some women in all ages have been found with genius so potent and self-sufficing, energy so resolute, and will so indomitable, that they have taught the world the fallacy of the old misnamed sage's axiom that 'there is a sex in the soul,' and have convinced the most bigoted advocates of female bondage, that if so much would be done by woman, in spite of her fetters, she could challenge man to any moral lists, any mental tournament—any conflict in which bodily strength (lowest of attributes, and most eminent in the brute creation; but to which alone woman owns her subjection) were not brought into play. If these fetters, which are worn from the cradle to the grave (some hidden in roses, as in the case of young beauties, some with the iron entering into the very soul, as in that of the pure, noble, despised race, coarsely designated old maids), if these fetters, we say, were never put on; if the girl were trained as the boy is trained, if beauty and dress, and futile accomplishments were not made the objects of an immortal being's life, woman, who, even as it is, has done so much, would, by the aid of her genius, her fortitude, her energy, and her virtues, take an intellectual stand at least equal to, and often far above, that of her now contemptuous oppressor. What mothers, what wives, what daughters, what sisters, and, above all, what citizens would such women be!"

So earnestly and vehemently was Mrs. Golightly engaged in her oration (for it was nothing less), that she did not perceive that poor Apple Blossom, who, as we know, had been up all night, had, after vainly trying to follow Mrs. Golightly, sunk into a sound sleep; and that Ada, who had spent the night in an assiduous watch by her father's bed-side, had also been unable to resist the soporific influence of the monotonous tone of the champion of her sex.

Ellen alone was listening attentively, when a gentle knock was heard. It did not arrest the orator nor wake the sleepers; but, being repeated, Ellen rose and, in doing so, disturbed Mrs. Golightly, who, looking angrily up, saw Apple Blossom and Ada asleep, and Ellen moving towards the door.

"Ah!" she exclaimed, bitterly, "what avail my efforts? Women are content to be slaves. Speak to them of a new fashion in dress, they are in raptures; talk to them of their social regeneration, they fall asleep! But it is education does this, and—"

At this moment Apple Blossom and Ada, missing, even in their sleep, the monotonous tones that had lulled them to rest, awoke, and were both declaring (as people always do in such cases) that they had only closed their eyes for a moment, when Jem Goodman entered.

(To be continued.)

AN INFERENCE.—A man, being assured that the sun never rose in the west, said it was very strange, as he had a cousin in Iowa who was always writing how pleasant it was in that district. He concluded it must be all moonshine.

LA FLEUR TAKING LEAVE OF HIS FRIENDS AT MONTREUIL.

STERNE.

LAURENCE STERNE is an author of whose works everybody has heard, and about whom everybody can talk, but of whom very few form an impartial opinion. "Tristram Shandy" and the "Sentimental Journey" are standard books. Uncle Toby, the elder Shandy, Corporal Trim, Yorick, La Fleur, Dr. Slop, and the rest, have achieved an immortality. But it is a small minority who read the volumes in which they figure. Sparkling and brilliant, touching and pathetic as they are—playing on the heart-strings, and calling forth responsive notes—they are left untouched on the shelves of the library; people contenting themselves with fragments gathered here and there, and endlessly repeated.

There is something in the style of Sterne's books which fails at first sight to interest an ordinary reader, and much that is offensive to all moral readers: the humour is subtle and ethereal, but the want of decency is plain and palpable—one looks in vain for simplicity, and one is ruffled by the whim and caprice of the sentiment. The careful, thoughtful reader is amply repaid by an attentive perusal of either his story or his journey; but the eccentric affectation of both are uninviting to the majority. And thus it is that the books are neglected. There are beauties enough to be found in them, but they have to be sought, and literary oungers give up the search.

It is a hundred years ago, or thereabouts, since Tristram Shandy was first published. Its author was born in Ireland, in 1713, was educated by a cousin, matriculated at Cambridge, entered holy orders and became incumbent of Satten, and Prebend of York. At Satten he lived for a score of years, "reading, painting, fiddling, and shooting, with occasional quarrels with his brethren of the cloth, with whom he was no favourite." For that matter he was no favourite with anybody, for he put all his fine feelings on paper, and while sentimentalising over an ass, or dropping a tear for a starling, was hard and morose enough in real life. After the publication of his Tristram Shandy, he went to France and touched Italy (it was a journey then), and on his return published a record of his wanderings, or an imaginary picture of what his wanderings might have been. He also issued a large number of sermons, most of which are excellent as moral essays, exquisite in pathos, and forcible in appeal—eccentric and abrupt, and consequently striking, but withal too humorous for a church pulpit, and with now and then an expression approaching the profane.

When Sterne came to London he was petted and popular. He had made a hit, and lion hunters trapped him for their entertainments. David Garrick says of him, "He degenerated in London like an ill-transplanted shrub: the incense of the great spoiled his head, and their ragouts his stomach. He grew sickly and proud—an invalid in body and mind." He had often expressed a wish to die at an inn, where a few gold guineas would purchase the few cold offices he might require. His wish was in one sense gratified. He died at his lodgings in London, with none but a hired nurse to close his eyes.

The subject of our engraving is taken from a scene in the "Sentimental Journey."

The sentimental traveller wanted a valet. The landlord at Montreuil knew of "a clever young fellow who would be very proud of the honour to serve an Englishman," because "the nation was so generous."

La Fleur is the clever young man in question. Once introduced, the genuine look and air of the fellow determines the matter in his favour: so he is hired first, and asked, secondly, what he can do. Do! he can beat a drum and play a march or two upon a fife. Can he do nothing else? Oh qu'oui! he can make spatterdashes and play a little on the fiddle.

"The next morning La Fleur entered upon his employment. I delivered to him the key of my portmanteau, with an inventory of my half-dozen shirts and silk pair of breeches, and bid him fasten all upon the chaise, get the horses put to, and desire the landlord to come in with his bill.

"C'est un garçon de bonne fortune," said the landlord, pointing through the window to half a dozen wenches, who had got round about La Fleur, and were most kindly taking their leave of him, as the postillion was leading out the horses. La Fleur kissed all their hands, round and round again, and thrice he wiped his eyes, and thrice he promised he would bring them all pardons from Rome.

"The young fellow," said the landlord, 'is beloved by all the town, and there is scarce a corner in Montreuil where the want of him will not be felt; he has but one misfortune—he is always in love!'"

The character of La Fleur is not altogether imaginary. A recent writer says:—"That excellent man was born in Burgundy; from his infancy he felt an insatiable desire for travelling, and at eight years of age fled from the paternal roof, and set out to seek his fortune. Having led a wandering life two years, he enlisted as a soldier, remained a drummer in the French army six years, deserted in the dress of a peasant, arrived at Montreuil-sur-Mer, and was presented to Sterne covered with rags, but with an erect bearing, a piercing eye, and a ruddy complexion."

RICHES AND POVERTY.—That poverty is a real evil, it would be absurd to deny; and that it is the parent of many other evils, moral no less than physical, experience teaches, and will for ever teach us. Not only that poverty that stands between its victims and the common comforts, almost necessities of life, is thus pregnant with sorrow and sin, but that, too, which closes the access to every elegant enjoyment, and binds down to petty cares and worldly anxieties the time, the thought, the whole spirit. But to believe that the reverse of all this must in itself be happiness is to have little experience indeed of life, with all its varieties, of pain and disappointment, of blighted hopes, of unavailing repentance. Some, who have never known what it is to possess riches, believe that the power of dispensing them must, and does bring happiness; but in vain does "the widow's heart sing for joy" if no chord in the breast of her benefactor echoes to the sound of her rejoicings. If personal regrets have closed the heart to sympathy, he may be beneficent, but the blessings of beneficence do not return upon him.

The Matron.

NO. XXI.

FIRE, and escape from fire, furnished the subject of the last chapter. We left off where the whole family was rescued; but had saved nothing but their lives. Perhaps, the poor father gazes for a moment on the savings of years, as the fire is reducing his all to ashes.

"A beggared outcast must he roam,
But one sweet solace checks despair;
He counts the loved ones of his home,
Not one dear head is wanting there."

SCHILLER.

Those who have live stock find (when fire breaks out) the greatest difficulty in removing horses. They are such nervous creatures that, nearly paralysed by fear, neither coaxing nor blows avail. Still, very difficult things can be done if one only knows the right way. Supposing it is a saddle-horse that you wish to extricate, place the saddle on his back and he becomes so docile that you can lead him out of the stable in spite of the threatening danger. In case it is a draught-horse you wish to lead out, throw the harness over him and you will succeed. I suppose this means is so effectual because the badges of his subjection banish from the horse every feeling but the necessity of his habitual obedience.

I now turn from fire to water, from the dangers of "the devouring flame" to those of the more devouring flood.

How many poor mothers will see the return of this delightful summer season with alarm; because, it may lure their sons to risk their precious lives in sailing, bathing, or boating. Now, I do not hesitate to say that boating on our rivers, where steamboats ply, is fraught with danger when only boys are rowing or steering the boat; and parents and guardians ought to exercise their authority to avert bad consequences.

It is all very well to know how to swim; but there are cases in which swimming avails little, and such cases are not unfrequent.

I recollect it was the opinion of an old friend of mine, an East India captain, that there was more danger in boating in Chelsea-reach than in going in a sailing-vessel to India.

How often a young party sets off in the morning full of glee to be plunged in despair before sunset.

It's a good thing in this life of trials to be prepared for the worst; and really sometimes where water parties seem to be conducted with the greatest prudence, fatal accidents occur, especially in small boats on the River Thames, whether beyond London or Westminster bridge. The fact is, the great swell caused by the river steamers upsets the little boats, unless steered and propelled by very strong, experienced hands. I fancy I can hear some of my young readers exclaiming, "Oh, there's no danger for me, I can swim." But, as I observed before, there are cases in which swimming is of little avail; cases (on our river) in which one sticks in the mud, is wedged in between other boats, or has one's head dashed against the balustrade of a bridge. And supposing the upset happens in an open space and in clear water, how often those that can swim are drowned in trying to extricate others who cannot. And now, my young friends, do listen to the advice of one, who has been very nearly drowned herself, and who knows how invaluable a little of the calmness which knowledge gives would have been to her in the moment of danger.

I address myself first to those who cannot swim. Should you ever find yourself suddenly plunged into deep water, remember you are sure to rise to the surface. The object is to keep there. To effect this, mind you keep your arms under water. By a slight paddling motion, you may so regulate the position of your head, as also to keep your mouth and nose above water. While you do this you cannot sink; and remember to keep one leg a little forward, the other a little backward. And now for the most important thing of all. When succour comes, do not grasp hold of the person who advances to save you. I know it is the most natural thing to do; but what are the consequences? You take away all chance both from yourself and your friend.

Secondly, instead of disconcerting the efforts to save you, remember that the water contributes so greatly to hold you up, that by a very little support and pulling, your friend will be able to drag you to the boat or the shore. His plan will be to seize you by the hair. You will have to throw yourself on your back, and, by kicking against the water, to urge yourself in the direction intimated. Do your utmost to keep your face upwards, your neck stiff, and the back of your head in the water.

Now for a few cautions to your brave deliverer. Never suppose you can lift the person in danger out of the water: by attempting it you will sink yourself. While swimming, all you can do is gently to hold up the person by the hair, and to draw him to a place of safety. Thus, swimming with your strongest arm, dragging on your friend with the other, and taking care, of course, that the faces of both of you are above water (you on your breast, and he floating on his back), you may, side by side, reach the boat or shore. What cheers will greet you then from the assembled crowd! what blessings from your trembling, anxious friends!

With the thoughts of preservation of human life from drowning, the life-boat—the light of all nations and of the Royal Humane Society—come naturally before the mind's eye. But it is not within my province to enlarge on these things; a few more precautions of a very domestic nature will suffice.

When going on the water put on shoes instead of boots. The latter greatly increase the difficulty of swimming. If you should fall into the water with a common black hat on your head, snatch it off, and hold it with your hand inside the crown, and the top downwards. While you can keep the inside free from water, it acts as a buoy, and enables you to keep your mouth above water till help reaches you.

Now for a cheap life belt, one which might be used either by a lady or a gentleman. If you have an old boa, take out the wool, and fill it with fine cork cuttings instead. In any case of danger this life-belt may be tied round the body with strong ribbon, which should be fastened to the boa for the purpose.

But recollecting the rules I have given for your proceedings when suddenly immersed in the water, is more important than to furnish yourself with a great variety of life-belts. Knowledge gives presence of mind, and presence of mind is (under Providence) our great deliverer.

THE NEWLY MARRIED; OR, A GOOD LESSON.

"Oh dear! this weather is cool enough for November," said Mr. Ashton; "I wish, dear, you would order some fire to be made; I declare I am shivering all over."

"Well," said his wife, "I think that would be superlatively ridiculous to have my grates soiled after they have been cleaned so nicely, and my summer fire-papers are up."

"Oh, nonsense! what are the grates made for but to use? If they are so very nice, why cover them up with those papers?"

But the wife remained immovable and inflexible.

"Say, Emily, may I ring the bell and order a fire?"

"No, no," quickly interposed his wife; "I have just got my rooms decorated for the summer, and I won't have them touched."

"Decorated for the summer! I wish I could live in a place where it was considered a crime to clean your house more than once in twelve years!"

"Then I should be more particular than I now am," said Emily, "for fear I might get poisoned before my time came. Men seem not to have any perception of dirt. It is fortunate somebody has."

"I don't care; it is unreasonable to close up the fire-place so soon," muttered her husband.

"What! at this season of the year, almost the middle of June? We ought to expect summer weather by this time."

"Suppose we should have callers to-day?"

"No one will call to-day, I should rather imagine. I think the clouds predict a storm."

"In doors or out?" inquired her husband, roughly.

Just at this moment the door-bell rang, which betokened something more than an errand-boy or pedlar. Presently a visitor was ushered in.

"Ah! good-morning, Mr. Norris," exclaimed Mr. and Mrs. Ashton; "when did you arrive?"

"About an hour ago," replied the visitor. "This is singular weather for June," he continued; "it's more like November."

"It is, indeed. I have been telling my wife that we ought to have a good fire. Emily, dear, don't you think I had better ring the bell and order a fire?"

Emily frowned, and cast an impatient look at her husband. Mr. Norris quickly read the answer.

"Oh, I am not cold," protested Mr. Norris, with shivering limbs; "do not have a fire made for me. I have called rather early I am already aware—hope you will excuse me—but as I had some particular business with you, Mr. Ashton, I thought you might be at home at this hour."

"I am glad to see you," said Mr. Ashton.

After a short time, Mr. Norris took his leave.

"Small favours received, acknowledged, and gratefully accepted, and larger ones in proportion," said Emily, "as soon as the visitor had closed the door. 'I gave orders this morning to the servants to say, if any one came and inquired for us, that we had gone into the country.'"

"For my part, I was glad to see Norris," said Mr. Ashton, "as well as mortified at the cool reception we gave him. Poor fellow! he had the shivers when he went out. I must ask him to tea to-morrow. Say, sha'n't I, Emily?"

"Well, if you must, why, you must, I suppose; but—"

"But what? Have you any objection?"

"Nothing, only I have just got my table-service nicely cleaned and polished, and my table-cloths all put away with the exception of those we have for our own use."

"Capital!" said Mr. Ashton. "How proud I shall feel to have things look so nice! I don't doubt if Mr. Norris takes tea here that he will be a married man in less than a year. What do you think, Emily, eh?"

At this pleasant turn of affairs, Emily did not feel to have things look so nice! I don't doubt if Mr. Norris takes tea here that he will be a married man in less than a year. What do you think, Emily, eh?

Emily took things to heart. Everything in house-keeping appeared burdensome to her. She trusted nobody; she was continually finding fault. Servants were "the greatest plague in life," flies a source of irritation, moths were horrible; and all the daily vexations of life tended to make this a world of tribulation and anguish.

She had been married about two years, and wanted to be considered an excellent housekeeper. So she was, so far as neatness and punctuality was concerned; but when we consider comfort and happiness in another point of view, she missed it decidedly.

When her husband came home, she would commence repeating in detail all her little trials with her domestics during the day, and she would generally conclude with the sorrowful reflection that she should not live long, and he might see whom he would get that would keep things in as nice order as she did.

"Well, why don't you dismiss them?" said Mr. Ashton, impatiently.

"What would be the use of that? I cannot do the work. I did not get married to make a slave of myself, or to put my hands out of shape by doing housework. There was Tom—he came with a recommendation full a yard long; and Susan did the work for one family thirteen years—she too came to me highly recommended; and another thing, she will come and go when she pleases, and say what she pleases."

"She is punctual in her work, is she not?" inquired Mr. Ashton.

"Oh, yes, she always does her work quickly and neatly; but she will not allow me to give her any advice about it—is even saucy enough to tell me sometimes that if she were to follow my directions in cooking she would have nothing fit to set on the table."

"I am very sorry that you have so many trials, my dear. I have a great many in my business, and have secretly hoped that you might be spared all these little trials, that you might be able to divert my mind in an agreeable chit-chat when I return home weary and dispirited."

"Have you seen Mr. Barre to-day?" inquired Emily.

"No, I have not," replied Mr. Ashton, glad to turn the conversation.

"Come, tea is ready," said Emily.

They both sat down in silence, and appeared to be wrapped in their own thoughts.

Soon after tea, the door-bell rang, and visitors were announced. The evening passed off in lively conversation. The hour for retirement came. Both went to bed with a resolution that nothing should occur to cloud the sky over their matrimonial life. For many times, our young wife had contrived to feel sad, and make her husband as gloomy as if some real misfortune were hanging over them.

"What say you, Emily, to giving up housekeeping and going into lodgings?" said Mr. Ashton, after another chapter of the servants' deficiencies, and shortcomings, and overgrown ideas as to "what was their place, and what was not." "I should like to try it, at any rate," continued he.

"Why, Mr. Ashton! I thought you wanted to keep house, because you could have so much more liberty, and—

"Well, Emily, so I did: but it is more for your sake than my own that I would make the change. I see your housekeeping is a source of torment to you. It has been nothing but one uninterrupted chain of complaints ever since we were married. Precious little comfort do I see!"

These remarks sank heavily into the heart of the young wife, and she could not refrain from weeping passionately over them when she was alone. One day, while conning over the ills of life, she said—"I know what I'll do—I'll just run over and see my good and valued friend, Mrs. Wilson." And so she went. Mrs. Wilson was a friend from infancy; to her she unfolded the whole matter—her whole heart and all her troubles.

"My dear child," said Mrs. Wilson, smiling kindly, "you are young yet, that is all."

"Well, dear Mrs. Wilson, is there no hope while I am a young housekeeper to make my husband happy? Still, I would like to have everything in perfect neatness, move in a perfect system, and yet have quietness and ease."

"In the first place, the object of good housekeeping is comfort, and comfort implies quiet and ease. Always try and have everything pleasant for your husband. If you have any trials of a trivial nature, never mention them. With youth, health, means, and last, though not least, a husband that you dearly love, what right have petty trifles to intervene between you and happiness?"

"Oh well, but I have the worst domestics in the world! They will not let me instruct them at all; and nothing is done as I should do it."

"I think I heard you say, not long since, that they were very neat and prompt," said Mrs. Wilson.

"Oh, yes; but they will not let me command them at all. I cannot exercise any dignity whatever in my own house."

"Do not exact too much," said Mrs. Wilson.

"Yes—but they are so obstinate."

"Don't you think, by your own short experience, that perfect obedience is the most difficult of human virtues?"

"Well, perhaps so," said Emily. "But how is it that you take everything easily, Mrs. Wilson?"

"By keeping a general superintendence; by not interfering too much with my servants, encouraging them when I have an opportunity, and sympathising with them in their trials; in short, by endeavouring to make everything as pleasant as possible by an even course with my husband and servants. Don't let little difficulties grow into large ones. You will find them much easier to conquer. One must pass over much to get through life happily."

Emily went home, firmly resolved to put in practice the good advice given her. Mr. Ashton soon observed the change, and, with great delight, remarked that he did not envy a man his "single blessedness" while he had such a sure recipe for crushed spirits—a pleasant wife, and, in short, a Happy Home.

Small Change.

WHEN Algernon Sydney was told that he might save his life by telling a falsehood—by denying his handwriting—he said: "When God has brought me into a dilemma in which I must assert a lie or lose my life, He gives me a clear indication of my duty, which is to prefer death to falsehood."

MARKET REPORT.—"Tim plates are flat, lead heavy, iron dull, Champagne is brisk, rhubarb and senna are drugs, starch is stiffening, and paper is stationary. There is no life in dead hags, but considerable animation in old cheese."

ONE of our finest writers says that "the nightly dews come down upon us like blessings." How very differently the daily dews come down upon us in these hard times.

"I WOULD do anything to gratify you, I would go to the end of the world to please you," said a fervent lover to the object of his affections. "Well, sir, go there and stay, and I shall be pleased."

WE know of a beautiful girl, who would prove a capital speculation for a fortune-hunter of the right sort. Her voice is of silver, her hair of gold, her teeth of pearl, her cheeks of rubies, and her eyes of diamonds.

THE TEST OF FRIENDSHIP.—There is no trial of friendship but adversity. He that is not ashamed of my bonds, nor daunted with my checks, not aliened with my disgrace, is a friend for me; one drachm of that man's love is worth a world of false and inconsistent formality.—Bishop Hall.

If you wish your children to revere things pure and lovely, and of good report, set them the example. POMPOSITY REBUKED.—"Westminster Hall," said pompous Lord Thurlow, "is open alike to the richest and the poorest." "Yes, my lord," said Erskine, "and so is the London Tavern."

A CANNIBAL.—A lady advertises in a country paper that she wants a man for "breakfast and tea." SOME great genius has discovered that the "centre of gravity" may be found in a Quaker meeting.

"My boy, what does your mother do for a living?" was asked of a little barefooted urchin. "She eats cold victuals, sir."

PATRICK O'FLAHERTY said that his wife was very ungrateful, for "whin I married her she hadn't a rag to her back, and now she's covered with 'em."

THREE things despise—a brawler in a workshop, a fool in fine clothes, and a slanderer everywhere.

"NED, who is the girl I saw you walking with?" "Miss Hogg." "Hogg, Hogg,—well, she's to be pitied for having such a name." "So I think," rejoined Ned; "I pitied her so much that I offered her mine, and she's going to take it soon."

AN American paper has this advertisement, "Two sisters want washing." How many, besides the two sisters, want washing?

MOST of the shadows that cross our path through life are caused by standing in our own light.

"CIVILITY and good breeding," says Lord Chesterfield, "are as much matters of interest as honesty or virtue."

A CANTAB asked a Cambridge clown, "If he could conjugate—knew verb or noun—Or etymologise what a duel meant?" Sure "from do-ill—a life mispent."

THE liar who possesseth the courage to mock heaven in the face, will turn his back when he contendeth with men.

"JOHN, what is the past of see?" "Seen, sir." "No, it is saw—recollect that." "Yes, sir. Then if a sea-fish swims by me, it becomes a saw-fish when it is past, and can't be seen." "You may go home, John."

A WATERING-PLACE.—The essentials for a watering-place may be given as—sea, salt, sun, shingle, sand, shrimps, shells, steamers, ships, and sailors.

THE mind has more room in it than most people think, if they would but furnish the apartments.

FEW take care to live well, but many to live long, though it is in a man's power to do the former and not the latter.

MILTON, when blind, married a shrew. The Duke of Buckingham called her a rose. "I am no judge of colours," replied Milton, "but I daresay you are right, for I feel the thorns daily."

"Who pigs are these, my lad?" "Who, they belong to that there big sow." "No! I mean who is their master?" "Who, again answered the lad, 'that little 'un there: he's a rare 'un to feight.'"

AN enterprising furrier "respectfully announces to ladies who wish genuine furs, that he makes muffs, boas, &c., out of their own skins!"

JAMES I., in a capricious mood, threatened the Lord Mayor with removing the seat of royalty, the meetings of parliament, &c., from the capital. "Your Majesty at least," replied the mayor, "will be graciously pleased to leave us the River Thames."

LABOUR was the son of Necessity, the nursing of Hope, and the pupil of Art; he had the strength of his mother, the spirit of his nurse, and the dexterity of his governess, and came down upon earth to oppose the devastations of Famine.

HE that blows the coals in quarrels has nothing to do with, has no right to complain if a spark fly in his face.

VICE can never know itself and virtue; but virtue knows both itself and vice.

VERY few persons have sense enough to despise the praise of a fool.

LOTTY LOWE.

LOTTY LOWE, Lotty Lowe,
You know my love, you know my woe;
I think of you where'er I go,
You charming, wicked, Lotty Lowe!

Lotty Lowe, Lotty Lowe,
See the crested corn-ears grow—
My love for you grows twice as fast,
But at this rate things cannot last.

Lotty Lowe, Lotty Lowe,
I wonder if your tears will flow,
If you some day behold a grave
Down by old Thames' transparent wave.

Ah, Lotty Lowe, the summer dies!
Ah, Lotty Lowe, the green leaf dies!
I need not fall, I need not flee,
If you a summer make for me!

Chess.

Problem No. 42. By Mr. WILLIAM GREENWOOD.
BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in four moves.

Game played between Messrs. WORMALD and CADMAN.

WHITE.	BLACK.
Mr. Wormald.	Mr. Cadman.
1. P to K 4	1. P to K 4
2. B to Q B 4	2. B to Q B 4
3. P to Q Kt 4	3. B takes P
4. P to K B 4	4. Q to K 2 (a)
5. Q to K 2	5. P takes P
6. K Kt to B 3	6. P to K Kt 4
7. P to Q B 3	7. B to Q R 4
8. Castles	8. P to Q 3
9. P to Q 4	9. B to K Kt 5
10. R to K sq	10. Q Kt to B 3
11. P to K 5	11. P takes P
12. B to Q R 3	12. Q to Q 2
13. P to Q 5	13. Q Kt to K 2
14. Q takes K P	14. P to K B 3
15. Q to K 2	15. P to K R 4
16. B to Q Kt 5 (b)	16. P to Q B 3
17. P takes P	17. P takes P
18. Q B takes Q Kt	18. B checks
19. K to R sq	19. B to K 6 (c)
20. B takes K B P (d)	20. Kt takes B
21. R to Q sq	21. Q to Q Kt 2
22. B to Q R 6	22. Q to K 2
23. Q to Q B 4	23. Q to K 5
24. Q Kt to Q 2	24. Q takes Q
25. Kt takes Q (b)	25. Kt to K 5
26. Kt to Q 6 (ch)	26. Kt takes Kt
27. R takes Kt	27. B takes Kt
28. P takes B	28. P to Q B 4
29. R to K Kt 6	29. Q R to Kt sq
30. R takes K Kt P	30. R to Q Kt 7
31. R to Q sq	31. K to B 2
32. B checks	32. K to B 3
33. Q R to Q 5 (e)	33. R to Kt 8 (ch)
34. K to Kt 2	34. R to K Kt 8 (ch) wins

(a) P to Q 4 is the usual play. The move made, however, is very strong.—(b) He ought to have played K to R sq first. The move made is premature and affords Black a loophole of escape from the attack.—(c) A saving clause for Black, preserving the piece and retorting the attack on his opponent.—(d) Perhaps B to Q B 5 would have been better. White, however, was unwilling to exchange his K B.—(e) This slip loses at once. He should have played the other R to Q 5, and the game would have been drawn.

Solution of Problem No. 35.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. R to K B 4	1. R takes R (best)
2. Kt to K 3 (ch)	2. K to K 5
3. Q takes P mates

Solution of Problem No. 36.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. K to R 4	1. P takes P
2. P to B 4	2. P moves
3. B to K Kt 8	3. Any move
4. B takes P mates

Solution of Problem No. 37.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. B to Q 5 (ch)	1. K takes Kt (best)
2. Kt to K Kt 5	2. Any move
Mates accordingly

Solution of Problem No. 38.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. B to K B 5	1. Q to Q R 6
2. P moves	2. Kt takes B (best)
3. P to K 8 and exchanges for a B	3. R takes B
4. Q takes P (mate)

* Owing to the great increase in the number of our Chess correspondents, it is sometimes difficult to find room for answers to all their communications, but they may rest assured that each will receive attention in due course.

Our Editorial Table.

ONE WHO HAS PASSED THROUGH THE HORROES OF FAGGING.—We do not often receive vulgar or intemperate letters, and if we did we should not of course reply to them. If we deviate from this course in the present instance, it is because a principle, which we believe a sacred one, has been called in question. Our correspondent is a staunch advocate of the system of fagging, still maintained at our public schools—a system to which the author of "Smiles and Tears" is as strongly, but somewhat more courteously opposed. The only argument—assertion, perhaps, would have been a better word—that we feel called upon to notice, is the extraordinary one, "That all emulation would cease without it." A proposition we emphatically deny, believing it to be a libel on the future manhood of the country to suppose that the desire of escaping from a degrading tyranny, or the questionable pleasure of exercising it over others, is the only incentive to be employed in training youth. In the public schools of France fagging is unknown; yet we question if its most bigoted partizan will venture to deny the existence of emulation amongst their pupils. The number of remarkable men they annually send forth would render such an assertion ridiculous. Unhesitatingly we repeat our conviction that it is not only unnecessary but brutal and degrading. The boy who feels no other incentive to learning than the fear of being caned, flogged, and kicked by those in a class above him, will never distinguish himself either as a scholar or a gentleman; and the boy who first learns at school to be a bully by the help of the fagging system, will more than probably retain his amiable propensities through life, though their exercise may be a good deal restricted, perhaps confined to anonymous invectives of the class with which we have been favoured.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—The best solvent for india-rubber is naphtha. The solution may be hastened by warmth, but it must be borne in mind that it is inflammable.

INDIGNANT.—You will find it next to impossible to make the outside of a house "permanently white" if your house is in the metropolis. The walls are usually coated with "Parker's cement," called also "compo," or "Roman cement," and then painted. You have no foundation for accusing us of "partiality."

HARD UP.—As a wheelwright you might, perhaps, obtain employment in some parts of the United States, but not, we think, as a book-keeper.

A SCHOOL-BOY.—It is impossible for us to tell you for certain whether the sun is inhabited or not. The great Arago thought that it might be peopled by beings similar to ourselves, and Sir William Herschel was of opinion that it was not only inhabited, but thickly inhabited.

FICTITIOUS.—We decline giving an opinion on your question. It has been discussed in the House of Commons year after year without any satisfactory result.

E. T. C.—Apply to the Secretary of the Leviathan.

TIPLING BEN.—You must select some name less liable to suspicion, if you hope to obtain a situation in the Fire Brigade or as prison warder. Why do so many of our correspondents adopt such exceptionable signatures?

A CONSTANT READER.—You are at liberty to remove shrubs, flower-roots, &c., such as you can pull up without digging, but trees—except gooseberry and currant, and such like—become the property of the landlord.

BEE SWING asks us to give him the origin of all the names now in use! Is he aware how many of our numbers this would occupy?

PRO TEMPORE.—We sincerely feel for your distress, but we do not consider your case desperate. May not some enemy have calumniated you to your lover, and his protracted silence be occasioned by a misunderstanding? On the other hand, it is possible that, thrown into fresh company by his new appointment, some other young girl may have captivated his fickle heart, and, in the intoxication of the moment, he may make your rival his bride. Should this be the case, a feeling of duty will come to the assistance of your common sense, and you will learn by degrees to conquer an unfortunate passion, and to find solace (if not in another attachment) at least in the prosecution of your duty. If you carefully read our Editorial Tables, you will find you have fellow-sufferers of both sexes. We think your letter (of which you sent us the copy) was rather harsh.

CORTE KEW.—What clothes?

A. B.—The present market in Covent Garden was built in 1830, at the expense of the Duke of Bedford, the ground landlord.

JOHN J. W.—Your lines are pretty enough for a lady's album, but are not fitted for publication.

LILLY VALE, D. D., BEATRICE, OLD BREWER.—"Lilly Vale's" hair is brown.—"D. D." need only read, recollect, and discuss the topics treated in this Paper, to render her conversation pleasing and intellectual. With regard to French, she may easily acquire it by studying the new method for learning that language, the publication of which begins in No. 23 of this Periodical.—"Beatrice" may safely use camphor and borax for the hair. She should make the wash in the following manner:—Dissolve half an ounce of borax and a quarter of an ounce of camphor in a pint of boiling water. When cold it is fit for use. Damp the hair with it three or four times a week.—"Old Brewer's" is a very sad case. His wife is inexorable, supposing he does his utmost to make her home comfortable, and that she prefers idling and chattering with her neighbours to remaining with him and making him cheerful and happy. We advise her quickly to return to her duty, or she may repent when it is too late.

JACK ROBINSON.—The canvasser will hold you bound by your order, unless you can prove that you countermanded it within a reasonable time. You had better repeat the countermand, and have it duly witnessed.

POLLY, GEORGE MARKHAM, PADDY.—"Polly" must refrain from smiling at strange gentlemen, unless she wishes to be considered forward and vulgar.—"George Markham:" Aberration of intellect may follow severe bodily illness, or any very great grief. Under these circumstances the sufferer may, in course of time, and with proper remedies, permanently recover medical sanity; but if the lady of whom you speak is afflicted with constitutional or hereditary madness, admitting only of lucid intervals, you must be mad yourself to think of uniting your fate to hers. For twisting gun-barrels, we refer you to a gunsmith.—"Paddy" will show a mean and ungenerous spirit if he forsakes the lady who accepted his attentions from the first, in order to return to one who repulsed him, and who may now be encouraging him only to rob another of an admirer.

ELSIE, PROTECTOR, MOSS ROSEBUD.—"Elsie:" We strongly recommend you to wait a little longer. You are too young to know your own mind. If, at sixteen, you take the first man who offers you, may, when too late, discover him to be quite uncalculated to make you happy.—"Protector:" In spite of the delicacy of the subject, and the chance of misconstruction, you must warn the young lady of the danger in which she is placed. The man you describe belongs to a class that should be shunned by every member of the female sex who values her reputation and peace of mind.—"Moss Rosebud" should apply the curling-fluid as she would hair-oil; but if her hair is long, she had better use curling-paper. For preserving sea-weed, first of all wash it in fresh water, and having placed it on a paper in a large dish, spread it out in a natural form, with a good-sized camel-hair brush. You must sound "apropos" as if written "ah-pro-po."

BLUE EYES, KATE HOWARD, MADGE, ROLAND.—"Blue Eyes" has no reason to believe the gentleman in love with her merely because he has looked at her.—"Kate Howard," who is twenty-one years of age, asks us if we do not think it is time for her to look out for a nice, steady, domesticated man. Our reply is, that it is the gentlemen who should be looking out; the ladies should be sought, and the gentlemen should seek. "Kate" may rest assured she will be found out (in spite of the retirement that makes her so anxious) by her future husband, if such be the will of Heaven. Let her continue to be intent on the performance of her duty, and leave the future to Providence. We are glad "Kate" likes our Paper, and we hope she will occupy herself thoroughly with mental improvement.—"Madge's" hair is of an ardent auburn. If "Roland" is convinced he loves the lady, and that she returns his love, he had better marry her as soon as possible.

YOUNG CURIOUS.—Copper articles may be "silvered" by an application of a mixture made as follows:—To one small teaspoonful of nitrate of silver add one and a half of powdered alum, six of cream of tartar, and six of salt. Make the articles very clean, and rub them well over with as much of the above as may be required, applying it with a piece of wash-leather slightly wetted. Polish with dry soft leather. The above quantity may be varied, only observing the proportions.

W. MARTIN.—You should consult the taste of your lady-love; but if you put her name, or any compliments, in the inside page, you will have to pay the ordinary letter postage.

COUNT OF MONTE CRISTO.—You must first prepare your maps or engravings with size made of isinglass; if the paper be soft, too coats will be required. Crystal varnish is composed of Canada balsam and rectified oil of turpentine, equal parts; but it is not easily made by an amateur, and had better be purchased of a varnish maker.

MRS. TIDY.—The reason why your gilt frames have so soon become tarnished and discoloured, is most likely because the work has been executed without one particle of gold. In most of the "cheap gilding," the metal used is copper beaten out into very thin plates, and afterwards rendered yellow, like gold, by exposing them to the fumes of zinc.

A SHOPKEEPER.—We believe that the serious expense attendant on the use of voltaic electricity for the purposes of illumination, is the great drawback to its use. There is reason to fear, that until some new discovery is made, it will remain a scientific, though certainly a very beautiful, toy.

FARMER FRANK.—The original name of guano is huano, which is a term in the Quichua dialect, meaning "animal dung." As the word is now generally used, it is an abbreviation of pishu huano, "bird dung."

ANVIL.—The application of a little spermaceti ointment will generally prevent chaps on the lips.

QUESTIONER.—You can obtain our FAMILY PAPER by order of any bookseller. One penny stamp will cover the postage of three numbers. Your remaining eight questions must "bide their time."

A YOUNG TRADESMAN.—Inquire of your baker.

WILLIAM II.—Your question is answered in a recent number.

SUSAN.—We refer you to the Bible for pictures of excellence in women, and for directions to attain such excellence. We advise you especially to study the thirty-first chapter of the Book of Proverbs, and the third chapter of the First Epistle general of Peter.

R. ELDRIDGE.—You could not purchase such merino as is produced from the wool of the Spanish sheep at the low price you mention. In reply to your questions about the Merino sheep, you will be surprised to hear that it travels every season from the cool mountains of the north of Spain to feed in the winter on the southern and warm plains of Andalusia, Mancha, and Estremadura. Of these well-clad travellers there are supposed to be about 10,000,000, and they are guarded by 50,000 shepherds and 30,000 dogs.

EMMELINE, STELLA.—"Emmeline" and "Stella," who wish us to assist them in "getting beaux," should remember that it is much wiser in young ladies to give their energies to the cultivation of useful and pleasing talents, and thus to deserve admiration, than to be so very anxious about securing admirers. The more ladies do to "get beaux," the fewer they are likely to obtain. "Fly, and they follow; follow, and they fly."

ELIZABETH LUCY.—You may clean soiled kid gloves by rubbing them with spirits of hartshorn on a bit of flannel.

FLORENCE MAY.—Of course a child born in England is English by birth; but, politically speaking, he is of his father's country. Thus, if Scotland had still its separate sovereign, your son would be a subject of that sovereign.

T. H. P.—In your walks through the metropolis you should not omit to inspect the statue of Charles I., at Charing-cross. It is of bronze, and it was cast by Le Sueur in 1633. The king is well represented. He is in armour, and of the size of life. The horse is remarkably spirited. The pedestal, which is also fine, is the work of Grinling Gibbons. This statue of King Charles was once condemned by the Parliament to be broken in pieces; but one Pennant, who had purchased it, contrived privately to bury it whole.

S. B.—We do not consider that gentlemen with red hair are more deceitful than those who can boast of black or golden locks.

N. V.—You complain you have suffered from lumbago more this spring than during the whole winter. Try this remedy: sprinkle some turpentine over a flannel previously wrung out in the hottest water possible, and apply it to the part affected. Repeat the process till you find relief.

MARIE JANE.—In our Editorial Tables of the New Series, Marie Jane will find plenty of cures for unhappy love.

AN ANGLER.—We are aware of the truth of your assertion. Fish have voices. As to tench, they croak like frogs.

X. Y. Z.—All you can do is to treat the young gentleman more politely when next he calls.

L. BAKER.—That a poker laid across a dull fire revives it, is not an old woman's tale. The poker concentrates the heat, and makes a draught through the fire.

BLANCHE GEETRUDE.—To remove the pimples growing on your temples, bathe them several times a day with lukewarm water and a sponge; but first rub the sponge over a piece of common yellow soap. There are valuable properties in soap besides those that conduce to cleanliness. The young lady you describe must be handsome; but we should not admire her unless she were also discreet, amiable, and intellectual.

A COOKMAID.—To cleanse bottles, put in them pieces of brown paper; then fill them up with water. Shake the bottles, leave them for a day or two, and then rinse them with pure water.

A THREE YEARS'-OLD SUBSCRIBER.—We refer you to the answer given in a recent number.

JESSIE, LETITIA, A CONSTANT READER OF CASSELL'S FAMILY PAPER, EFFIE.—If the gentleman who accompanies "Jessie" to the Crystal Palace, &c., is an intimate friend, she should not deprive him of the pleasure of defraying her expenses on the trip. It is difficult to lay down rules on the subject of the propriety of gentlemen treating ladies, but we will just observe, that if one gentleman takes a party of four or five ladies to any exhibition, it would be imposing on his kindness, if the ladies allowed him to treat the whole party. In this, as in everything else, one must be guided by circumstances. Gentlemen, however, who wish to please the ladies, should, above all things, avoid betraying a mean, stingy spirit.—"Letitia" cannot in strict etiquette visit the gentleman to whom she is engaged, unless this gentleman's relative (also invited by the gentleman) is a near connection and of mature years.—We think that "A Constant Reader," &c. would indicate a warmer feeling than esteem, either by asking the gentleman for his portrait, or by making him a present.—As to "Effie," her bowing to the gentleman on meeting him in the street must depend on his having been formally introduced to her at the ball. If formally introduced, she may bow to him with perfect propriety.

G. HODGE.—Water may contain animalcules and yet be fit to drink. It is only when these minute creatures are dead and corrupt that they make the water unwholesome.

IVY.—There is no reason why an engaged lady should absent herself from a ball, merely because her suitor cannot accompany her, but within a few days of the wedding it is thought more decorous for the bride elect to absent herself from parties. In the meantime she may receive as many presents from her intended as he is disposed to offer.

CROOKING JACK.—It is evident your voice is not yet formed. On this account, and also because you suffer from a bleeding at the nose, we advise you to abstain from singing for some months.

BARNY GEE, DAISY, MANGLE.—The object of "Barny Gee's" affection appears to us to have met with some one she prefers to "Barny." This would explain her long silence. From her wish to conceal her proceedings from her mother, and her inconstancy to our correspondent, we consider that any one who selects her will have a bad bargain.—"Daisy" would, on the contrary, make an excellent wife, taking it for granted that she really feels the sentiments she expresses. Amiability and gentleness have an attractive power that never fails in the long run; and we trust that "Daisy" will soon be able to tell us that she has met with some one who deserves to be the object of her pure and warm affections.—As to Mr. "Mangle," we are disposed to think he is too diffident. Residing in the same neighbourhood with the lady, and frequenting the same church, he is sure to find some means of procuring an introduction, if he sets about it in real earnest. At thirty years of age he should be certain that "a faint heart never won fair lady yet."

NOTICE.

COMPLETION OF VOL. I.

Now Ready, handsomely bound in cloth gilt, price 4s. 6d., the First Volume of the New Series of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER, containing upwards of One Hundred beautifully-executed Engravings, which include Twenty-six Portraits of Living Celebrities. The volume may also be obtained in paper covers, price 3s.

Title, Frontispiece, and Index to Vol. I.

Now ready, the Title, Frontispiece, and Index of Contents to Vol. I. of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER, New Series, price One Penny.

Cases for Binding.

Handsome cloth gilt cases for binding Vol. I. may be obtained of any bookseller in town or country, price 1s. 6d.

London: Printed and Published for JOHN CASSELL by PETER and GALPIN, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

[THE RIGHT OF TRANSLATION AND REPUBLICATION IS RESERVED.]

NEW SERIES. VOL. II.—No. 27.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 1858.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH.

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARBLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER LIII.

As brightest rays pierce through the darkest clouds,
There dawns a hope, when all seems hopeless
To the wretch's gaze.

OLD PLAY

From the day of Jack's escape, Captain Gall had no other victim on whom he dared to exercise the brutal tyranny of his cruel nature than poor Caleb, whom he suspected of having assisted the fugitive to leave the ship. His first impulse, after questioning him more like an Old Bailey lawyer than a seaman, and failing to obtain the least clue, was to order the boy to be lashed up for punishment.

"We are in port," suggested the first mate. The captain repeated the order with an oath. "Weel," said the cautious Scot, "ye mun e'en gang your ain gate. It's no' my affair, but I ken the consequence."

He repeated the order to the men.

We need scarcely remind our readers that for the commander of a merchantman to flog a sailor in port, within appeal to the civil authorities, is a stretch of power almost unheard-of in the service, and totally at variance with maritime law—a fact no man on board the Caradoc was better aware of than Bunce.

It was not without reason that the crew had given him the name of the sea-lawyer.

The old seaman heard the order with astonishment.

"What!" he exclaimed, as Caleb, who—hopeless of avoiding his punishment—had already begun to strip; "you don't mean to stand it?"

"What can I do?" replied the lad, mournfully.

"Refuse."

"It would be useless."

"I don't know that; I'll back you for one."

Several of the crew promised to stand by him, for all were sick of the rough usage the victim had so long been subjected to.

"Did you hear me?" shouted the captain, furious that his orders had not yet been obeyed.

There was a cry of shame.

Being in port gave the ruffian confidence—he knew how slight a chance the men would have of obtaining justice in India. He strutted, therefore, into the midst of them, his eyes flashing fire, breathing curses, threats, and imprecations on their heads.

"This," he exclaimed, "is mutiny—but we are not at sea now."

"That's why you have no right to flog him," replied Bunce. "It's against both law and justice. You may stare, and look big, Captain Gall," he added, "but I ain't afeard on you—you know I am speaking the truth."

As our readers are aware, it was not the first occasion on which the speaker had interposed between his commander and his apprentice; and this last attempt filled the cup of bitterness and ill-feeling towards him.

CALEB ENLISTING IN FRED WHARTON'S REGIMENT.

"Dog!" he exclaimed, enraged at not being able to carry out his design of punishing Caleb; "you have done nothing but preach mutiny since I shipped you on board the Caradoc."

"Deuced glad to unship," replied the old man.

This, however, was not the captain's game. The difficulty of procuring fresh hands in Calcutta is too well known to all who have traded to the port. It not being prudent, therefore, to punish him by turning him adrift, by which he would only inflict a loss upon himself, Captain Gall determined to make, not only Bunce, but the entire crew feel his resentment in another way—by stopping their liberty, and not allowing one of the men to go on shore.

To accomplish this, he had only to go before a magistrate, and make oath of his suspicion of their intention to desert,—backed by Mr. Chutnee's interest, to whom he was consigned, there would be little difficulty.

With this resolution he retired to his cabin to dress, previous to going on shore.

"Saved for the present," murmured the lad.

The mate now came forward, and ordered the men to their duty. This was a command they could not lawfully refuse to obey, and consequently the old sailor and the poor outraged boy were left together.

"Thank you," said the former.

"Thank me! for what?" demanded Bunce.

"Your kindness."

"Well, there may be something in that," replied the seaman, musingly, "as far as feelin' goes; but I wouldn't give a broken, mouldy biscuit for the man who hadn't the pluck to stand up for his mate. Captains would never be tyrants if the crews only stuck by one another."

"I fear for you."

"For me!" exclaimed the former, turning his quid, and giving his inexpressibles the true professional hitch. "Lord, bless you, I ain't a-goin' to give the skipper no hold on me; it ain't for nothin' the crew christened me the sea-lawyer. I know my game. I only wish I could see yours as clearly; but those infernal 'dentures' ain't left you a single pint in the compass to steer your course by. How much longer have they to run, do you know?"

"About two years."

"Sorry for it."

"I shall be dead by that time," observed Caleb, with a sigh; "and, if it were not for my poor mother, I should scarcely regret it, but she has no one to look up to for protection but me."

"And yet she 'prenticed you to the skipper?"

"Not my mother, but her husband."

"Your father?"

"My father-in-law," replied the boy. "Every one thought him such an excellent man; people said when she married him that he would prove a father to her fatherless son."

Bunce gave an emphatic whistle,—with his usual perspicacity, he began to see through the whole affair.

"Money, I suppose," he observed.

"When I am of age."

"And if you die before?"

"It goes to my mother, and consequently to her husband," replied Caleb; "and now you know the reason why Captain Gall was selected for my skipper. I only wonder that he has not driven me to throw myself overboard long since. I have often thought of it."

"Never think of it again, then," exclaimed the old man; "not that a sailor ought to fear death when it is the will of Providence to call him, for it's my belief the road to heaven from the bottom of the sea is quite as near as from the churchyard, and may be a shorter tack. I wish you were safely out of the clutches of our infernal skipper."

"I wish so, too."

"Jack escaped him," continued Bunce, musingly, "and why shouldn't you?"

"Jack had a friend."

"Providence may raise you up one. Take an old sailor's advice—never return home till you are one-and-twenty, what the land lawyers call being of age, and then you may overhaul the accounts of that shark of a father-in-law of yours in safety."

The eyes of Caleb sparkled at the thought.

"I must think," added the speaker. "I have unravelled many a tangled yarn in my time; but this is rather more knotted than usual. Howsoever, never despair."

"I will not."

"And no more thoughts about jumping overboard. Do you hear?"

Caleb promised that he would not.

"It would only be just what your enemy wishes," added his adviser; "and, above all, don't try it in the Hooghly. The crocodiles have ugly jaws, and are a deuced sight worse than the skipper."

Their conversation was broken up by the appearance of Captain Gall upon the deck of the Caradoc. He was dressed ready to go on shore. Calling to his mate, he directed him to get the boat ready.

It was lowered with alacrity,—for not a man on board but felt delighted at the thought of his absence from the vessel, although it should last only for a few hours.

"Fraser," said the commander, as he stepped into it, "you will not allow any one to quit the ship."

The Scot touched his cap.

"Or to come on board."

"Not Mr. Chutnee, sir?"

"Of course you may admit him," replied the captain. "Seeing that he is part owner, I don't very well see how to prevent it."

"Nor any of the dingiewallahs with vegetables and fruit?"

"I mean Europeans," said his superior, angrily, for he felt assured that Jack Manders could never have escaped and remained concealed so long in Calcutta, had he not contrived to interest some one of his countrymen in his favour.

The speaker had not quitted his ship more than half an hour before a boat, rowed by several natives, came alongside. It was filled with the choicest fruits, which a boy about sixteen years of age expressed himself anxious to barter.

"You no soda-bottles?" he shouted, holding up a basket of magnificent mangoes.

The mate shook his head.

"Me sell cheap."

"Got no money."

"But you got rum, old clothes, anything. Me have pretty things—shells, boxes for ladies, and dis for sahib."

The lad held up several of those carved articles, such as card and cigar-cases, work-boxes, inlaid with ivory, for which the native workmen are celebrated. The canny Scot, thinking he might procure a bargain, could not resist the temptation, but made signs to him to come on board.

In a second, the boy, who was no other than the sycee or groom of our hero, was upon deck, his goods spread out before him. As he sold remarkably cheap, the sailors bought freely. The mate felt anxious to purchase an elegant basket, the price of which was five rupees.

The agent of Richard had paid ten for it in the bazaar that very morning, only an hour previously.

"Four," said the Scot.

"No, me must have five."

"Four is enough," exclaimed the mate, holding out the money, thinking the sight of it might tempt him.

"And you give me soda-water bottles?"

"I told you we had none."

"Old clothes, den."

The mate recollected that he had an old jacket and trowsers in his cabin. The present appeared an excellent occasion for disposing of them to the best advantage. Telling the boy not to part with the article till his return, he left the deck to fetch them.

"You no buy something?" said the sycee, addressing Caleb, who stood leaning disconsolately against the mast, regarding the scene.

"I have no money," replied the lad, sorrowfully.

"I trust you."

"I have no friend to give them to," added Caleb, with a sigh, "even if I were to purchase them."

"No friend!"

"Not one."

"You forget Jack," whispered the lad, in excellent English.

Caleb started. The name brought the warm blood into his cheek, and caused his heart to beat with a feeling which had long been a stranger to it—hope. It seemed as if Providence at last had heard his prayer.

"Ah," continued the speaker, seeing by the glance of intelligence which passed between them, that he understood, "you no money. Me like English sailor-man—good for me—me give you nut for notink."

Several of the men laughed and declared that it must be an empty one—in all their experience they had never known a native give anything before.

The boy smiled and shook his head.

"No, no!" he exclaimed; "nut very good inside; try it."

Caleb took the hint and darted with it down the cabin, just as the mate made his appearance upon deck with the old clothes he had been to fetch. As a matter of course, the lad did not higgie long over his bargain, but accepted the four rupees and the jacket and trowsers for his basket.

"I should like to have the fellow to it," observed the Scot, examining it admiringly. "Have you got one?"

The boy nodded in the affirmative.

"Will you bring it?"

"For five rupees."

"Well," said the purchaser, "we won't quarrel about the price; come on board in the evening, and I'll see what I can do with you."

The agent of our hero returned to his boat, which soon rowed rapidly away.

On reaching the fore-castle, Caleb cracked the nut, and was not deceived in his expectations: for he found in it a note, not written by Jack, but purporting to come from him.

It ran thus—

"The gentleman who assisted me to escape from the Caradoc has heard how badly you are treated by the captain, and is anxious to rescue you. The person who will give you this may be trusted with your reply; have one ready against his next visit to the ship, and consult Bunce as to the means."

Tears dimmed the eyes of the lad several times as he perused it. There was something so unusual in any one taking an interest in his welfare, that it touched his heart.

His first care was to communicate its contents to the sea-lawyer.

"All right," said the sailor; "I knew that young fellow," alluding to our hero, "was a trump. Bless him, he deserves to be an admiral. We'll soon have you out of dock, and that is better than pitching yourself overboard, ain't it? Never doubt Providence again," he added; "she has an especial care for sailors. The difficulty will be to get you clear of the ship."

"I can swim," exclaimed the boy, eagerly.

"You forget the crocodiles," answered Bunce, drily. "Better not try a race with them. I remember once upon land to have seen a couple of hounds following a hare—coursing, I think they call it. It was curious to see how they doubled and turned upon their prey, till they ran it down at last; but, Lord bless you! their coursing was nothing compared with the crocodiles."

Caleb shuddered at the thoughts the words of the speaker suggested.

"That plan must be given up."

"I have it!" exclaimed the old man, suddenly.

"The cargo is not cleared yet. In the morning there will be several barrels of dry goods to land."

"Well."

"I will head you up in one of them, and, once on shore, you must trust to a clean pair of heels and the chapter of accidents for the rest."

"But where am I to go when on shore?"

"Providence will direct you."

"How find Jack?"

His adviser still made the same reply.

Caleb did not like the risk. The project might be feasible, but there was one danger attending it: once headed in the cask, it would be impossible for him to release himself without some assistance.

Bunce admitted the validity of the objection. "I have it!" he exclaimed. "What a couple of fools we are to be casting about for an anchor when we have three ready for use on the occasion."

"Three!" repeated the young man.

The old sailor pointed to the ship's boats.

"The skipper," he said, "gives a spread to some of the landmen to-morrow, and not one of the boats will be hauled on deck; the second mate will be ashore, and Fraser left in charge of the crew."

"I see."

"When all is quiet except the feasters in the cabin, slip down the side, and cut the rope."

"But the oars will not be in her."

"The tide will drift you," replied the seaman, in answer to the objection. "When did the Hindoo boy say he should be on board again?"

"The note says in the morning."

"Write an answer."

"Should it be found upon me?" urged Caleb.

"I'll take charge of it, and give it to him."

"Should it be found on you?"

"Well, they can't hang me for three words, tho' I once heard one of the land-lubbers say that a line of a man's handwriting might be twisted into a rope for his neck. Besides, they could never prove it to be my writing, seeing as I never learnt."

"But what am I to write?"

"To-morrow night, twelve!—that will be sufficient," said Bunce. "The youngster who befriended Jack will understand it; take my word for it, he will be upon the watch, and keep a sharp look-out."

The scheme was arranged accordingly; the words as the speaker suggested, written upon the back of an old card, and carefully stowed away in the pocket of Bunce till the opportunity should arrive for using it.

In the course of the day Captain Gall returned on board the Caradoc, accompanied by a party of the Calcutta police, which the authorities had sent upon his representation of the mutinous spirit of his crew. One of the men was stationed at the gangway with strict orders to allow no one to descend or come on deck without the permission of the captain or the first mate.

The next morning the sycee again made his appearance. Fraser, who was waiting for him, called out that he should fasten the basket he had brought with him to the end of a line.

"You send me de money first."

The Scot shook his head. He had not intended to pay him for it in rupees, but in old clothes.

"Den me must see dem," exclaimed the pretended fruit and curiosity dealer. "De last jacket very bad—very."

"There can't be much harm," thought the officer, "in letting him come on board. The skipper is not stirring yet; he will never know it."

Having come to this conclusion he gave the order, and the messenger of Richard mounted the side of the vessel. He had the basket in one hand, and could only use the other to grasp the rope.

Bunce stepped forward to assist him, and the instant he stepped upon deck slid the card in his palm. The boy conveyed it to his girdle unobserved.

The old sailor walked away.

Having accomplished the object of his visit, the pretended dealer did not higgie longer than was absolutely necessary in order to avoid suspicion over the bargain; but, taking the clothes at a rupee less than the mate's valuation of them for his basket, he descended by the same means to his boat again, and quickly rowed out of sight.

One person only had recognised him—the officer of police on guard, who knew him to be the sycee, or groom, of the young Englishman who drove so frequently about the streets of Calcutta. With the cunning of an Asiatic, he kept his knowledge of him to himself, thinking it would be time enough to use it if anything occurred, and a reward should be offered. Your true oriental never does anything without a recompense.

The party, which consisted of Sanford and several of Mr. Chutnee's clerks, came on board at sunset to dine with the captain, and remained till a late hour.

Their host, at the conclusion of the evening, saw them to his boat.

"Police on deck!" observed the head clerk, as he was about to descend the gangway; "what's up, captain?"

"A mutinous spirit on board," replied the latter, "but I know how to lay it. They haven't got a child to deal with."

"Lay it in the Red Sea," hiccupped one of his guests, "that is the place."

The witticism was rewarded with a laugh.

"You can't lay any spirits in the Hooghly," added the speaker. "I should like to see the spirit you talk of."

"That may be easily done," said the captain, at the same time shouting for Caleb.

But no Caleb answered him, and to the rage and disappointment of his persecutor may be better imagined than described, when he discovered that his victim had contrived to baffle his precautions and escape from the Caradoc.

As a matter of course, not one of the crew had the slightest idea how the lad had got away.

"Look to the boats!" roared the first mate.

It was soon found out that one was missing, and the curses of the commander became loud and fearful. "Pshaw!" said Sanford, coolly. "Why make all this fuss for a mere boy; doubtless he has gone on shore for a spree."

"I'd give twenty rupees rather than lose him," replied his host, savagely.

The officer of police pricked up his ears.

"Nay, thirty for the matter of that. He must have had some assistance from the shore. He is the second apprentice I have lost."

"Thirty rupees," said the policeman, "and you shall have him back."

"Do you know where he is?"

"No."

"What do you mean, then, by promising to bring him back?"

"I can find him; no one was ever lost in Calcutta."

"You may rely on what he says," observed Sanford. "There are no better bloodhounds in the East than our police. I feel rather curious to see how the affair will end. Speak out!" he added, addressing the man.

"And the money?"

"I will guarantee it."

The Hindoo shook his head.

"Pay him it," said the clerk, turning to the commander of the Caradoc. "If he fails in keeping his promise, I shall know how to recover it from him. The head of his office is my particular friend."

The money was counted to the man; for, avaricious as Captain Gall naturally was, the passion for gold was second only to revenge.

The policeman placed the rupees carefully in his girdle.

"Now speak!" exclaimed the gentleman.

"A boy came on board the Caradoc this morning, under pretence of selling an inlaid basket to the mate. He accepted a rupee, a few old ragged clothes, worth at the most two rupees more, for an article which must have cost ten, at least."

"The rascal!"

"Fool, I should say," observed the clerk.

"He was no dealer."

"How do you know that?" demanded the captain, eagerly.

"Because I have seen him for the last three months in the service of a wealthy young Englishman, who resides in Calcutta. The gentleman is a friend of Mr. Sanford's."

"And his name?" demanded the latter.

"Hiram."

"What, Tyrrell's groom?"

"The same."

"Whew!" whistled the confidential clerk of Mr. Chutnee; "this, then, explains the refusal of Tyrrell to join our party. If he has mixed himself in the affair, you had better give it up as a bad job," he added, addressing himself to the captain. "He has ingratiated himself with all the big wigs of Calcutta, visits at the government house, is hand and glove with Sir Charles Fourreau, and dines with the judges. Your case must be clear indeed to succeed against him in a court of law."

Had he been less excited with wine, in all probability the commander of the Caradoc would have remembered that his case, as far as Jack was concerned, was anything but clear. Caleb was his apprentice; he held him fast, as far as writing and parchment could affect that, and he determined to proceed to the residence of our hero.

"I will see him at once!" he exclaimed.

"What for?"

"To recover my apprentices; doubtless they are both there. If Mr. Tyrrell were the friend of all the authorities in India, he should not interfere between me and my crew. Will you accompany me?"

Sanford would fain have excused himself, for our hero was one of the few persons whom he did not like the idea of quarrelling with, or taking an active part against; not that he liked, but because he feared him.

At last, however, he permitted himself to be persuaded; and descending to the boat with the captain and the police officers, they rowed off together.

"Ill luck go with them," muttered Bunce. "What have the land lubbers to do with it? But they never can let us sailors alone; they take as natterally to tormenting as a gull does to water. I'd rather be put on the black list for six months, or drink three water grog for the rest of the cruise," he added, emphatically, "than see either of the poor lads on board the Caradoc agin."

"Ye'll see Caleb again, at any rate," observed the mate, who overheard him. "There is no getting over his indentures."

"I don't believe he is 'dentured," replied the old man, sullenly.

"Ye are out of your reckoning there, maister sea-lawyer," said the young Scotchman, "for I saw them myself this verra mornin', when I took the ship's charter out o' the captain's desk; he wanted it to take on shore wi' him."

"Perhaps you are out of your reckoning," retorted Bunce.

"That's no possible."

"Did you read them, then?"

"No occasion for that."

"How could you tell one paper from another if you did not?" demanded the sailor, with half-suppressed curiosity.

"Our readers must recollect that with all his legal learning, of which he was not a little vain, the speaker could not read. His object in putting the question was to obtain such a description of the indentures as might enable him to distinguish them from any other document."

"They don't happen to be written on paper," answered the young Scotchman, proud of the opportunity of displaying his knowledge, "but upon parchment."

His hearer mentally repeated the word.

"And have three or four seals and signatures," added the mate.

The sea-lawyer indulged in a wink, a habit he had contracted when satisfied with himself.

It was not without reason that he felt so on the present occasion, for, to repeat his own graphic expression, "he had washed out the mate's scuppers most effectually," and obtained the information he required.

Everything seemed to favour his designs of obtaining possession of the deed which bound poor Caleb to his persecutor, for the steward, having no longer the two apprentices to assist him, requested the second officer to lend him one of the hands to help clearing the captain's cabin.

"Take Bunce," answered the mate.

Bunce obeyed, trying to look as if he did not like the job. An hour afterwards the dentures, as he called them, were safe at the bottom of the Hooghly, tied with a piece of spun yarn round an old marline-spike.

"A bad skipper makes a bad crew," thought Bunce, as he quietly dropped them overboard. "It ain't exactly what I should call fair sailin'; but with a foul wind, and driven on a lee shore, a poor fellow is often obliged to get the weather gauge of his conscience, and tack as he can."

With this bit of mental philosophy, the old sailor descended the fore-castle to turn in—his watch for the night being ended.

CHAPTER LIV.

"How happy the soldier who lives on his pay,
And spends half-a-crown out of sixpence a day."
OLD SONG.

The escape from the Caradoc had been no less cleverly executed than planned. In the bustle of the party which Captain Gall had given on board, Caleb contrived to descend unnoticed to one of the boats at the stern, cut the rope, and drifted with the tide till he reached one of the numerous landing places, where our hero and Jack Manders were on the look-out.

No sooner did they perceive him than they put off, and took him in tow. Our readers may imagine the joy of the fugitive at once more meeting with his former companion in misfortune.

"I can never repay you, sir!" he exclaimed, addressing himself to Richard. "I little thought that any one would have interested himself in my fate."

"You have nothing to repay," replied our hero, kindly; "your assistance and sympathy to my friend here, merits all that I can do for you; to say nothing of the indignation every Englishman must feel at the tyranny, you have so long endured."

At that moment Jack Manders felt exceedingly proud and grateful Richard had called him friend.

In a few minutes the party landed, and, entering a carriage driven by the native groom, who had resumed his usual dress, started for the cavalry barracks, where Fred Wharton, who was officer of the guard, for some time had been anxiously expecting them.

"Have you succeeded?" he hastily demanded.

Our hero pointed to Caleb.

The cornet, whose feelings were invariably excited in favour of any one who had suffered from cruelty and oppression, congratulated the runaway sailor warmly.

"Should your interference in my behalf cause you annoyance, I shall never forgive myself," observed the young man.

"Do not think of that," answered Wharton; "neither my friend nor myself are ever likely to undertake a foolish, mad adventure; or, having entered upon an honourable one, to abandon it lightly. To give those who are interested in your welfare a right to protect you," added the speaker, "you must enter the service of the Queen."

"Anything," exclaimed the young man, gratefully; "rather than return to the Caradoc again. Even the grave!" he murmured, in an under-tone.

The officer rang the bell; it was answered by Mark Rayner, whose appearance was so greatly improved by his smart uniform, that his old acquaintances at St. Faith's would scarcely have recognised him.

"Here is a recruit for you, sergeant," said the cornet, "and one that will do the regiment credit, if I mistake not."

"At least I will never disgrace it, sir," observed the fugitive, respectfully.

The shilling was given, and the sergeant about to retire with Caleb from the room, when the sound of voices was heard at the entrance of the guard-house.

All started to their feet.
 "Pursued!" faltered Caleb, turning exceedingly pale; whilst Jack, who, since his residence on shore, had recovered no small portion of his former audacity, began quietly to arm himself.

Voices were again heard demanding admission, and amongst them that of Captain Gall might be easily recognised.

"Put down those pistols, Jack," said his protector. His protégé reluctantly obeyed him.
 "And remember, not a word unless you are addressed. Mr. Wharton is the only person here to reply to these visitors."

"They had better retire to the other room," observed the cornet, "whilst we receive them."

In a few seconds Captain Gall, Sanford, and two or three of Mr. Chutnee's clerks made their appearance, followed by the police. They were evidently excited, not only by wine, but by the chase after the runaways.

"So, Mr. Tyrrell," exclaimed the commander of the Caradoc, "I have discovered your pretty manoeuvres at last!"

"Is this addressed to me?" demanded our hero, indignantly.

"Of course it is," replied the ruffian, in an insolent tone. "Do you call yourself a gentleman to colleague with a set of mutinous rascals—assist them to desert from their ship, and hide from justice?"

"What I call or consider myself," replied our hero, calmly, "has very little to do with the question. But I will tell you what I consider you—a wretch, whose brutality has brought shame upon a profession to which he is a disgrace; a thing without one sentiment of humanity or proper feeling; a creature with the form, language, and name of an Englishman, but the soul of an American slave-driver—nay, worse, a hangman's spirit."

Captain Gall coloured deeply. It was the first time in his career he had ever been addressed in such terms—and by a mere boy, too! The youth of the speaker rendered the sting of his words doubly painful.

"I am not accountable to you for my conduct," he replied, with a sneer. "I am come for my runaway apprentices."

"Indeed!"

"Are they here?"

"Your victims are," answered Richard.

"And do you intend to give them up?"

"Not whilst there is law or justice to protect the injured in Calcutta!" exclaimed the young man, in a tone of indignation. "I would as soon abandon the lamb to the tiger, as any human being to your mercy. If you feel aggrieved, the courts of law are open to you. But I warn you that I will carry it from tribunal to tribunal, have your crew examined as witnesses, and hold your conduct up to the execration of an indignant public before I yield them up."

"Both here?" repeated the ruffian; "you said they."

"I did."

"Caleb is my apprentice: I have his indentures to prove it."

"Caleb has enlisted in my regiment," observed Fred Wharton, coolly; "if you have any legal right to his services, it must be proved elsewhere."

The tyrant and bully would have remonstrated, but the speaker cut him short by ordering the sergeant to clear the guard-house—a duty which Mark Rayners and his comrades performed with alacrity.

Captain Gall and his party quitted the place, threatening the law and muttering menaces, which the officer and his friend listened to with the contempt they merited. The two fugitives re-appeared from the inner room; both were armed to the teeth. There was a desperate determination in their looks—the deadly paleness of their features and flashing eyes.

"Saved!" muttered Caleb, when he discovered that his persecutor had retreated.

"I have but one regret," added Jack; "that I did not send a bullet whistling through the coward's brain."

At an early hour the following day, Mr. Sanford proceeded to the house of his employer, eager to relate the adventure of the preceding night to Mr. Chutnee—an adventure which, in his opinion, did not redound very much to the credit of our hero.

"Is it not strange," he added, "that a young gentleman of Mr. Tyrrell's position and fortune should compromise himself in the affairs of a common sailor?"

"Is humanity so rare in your sex?" demanded Zamora, who was present, and had heard the story of poor Caleb from Lady Bell.

The merchant remained silent.

"The fellow is only an apprentice," observed the managing clerk.

"Only an apprentice," repeated the lady, scornfully; "the earthworm is an aristocrat, in its way."

Sanford bit his lips to repress the retort; prudence forbade him to indulge; but he felt the sarcasm keenly; and the more so from the consciousness of having deserved it.

"Had I known," he said, addressing himself to Mr. Chutnee rather than to his wife, "that Mr. Tyrrell possessed so warm an advocate, I should not have presumed to censure his conduct."

Zamora regarded the speaker earnestly for an instant, then broke into a low, musical laugh. There was sadness rather than mirth in the sound.

"You see, Herbert," she exclaimed, turning to her husband, reproachfully, "the consequence of your folly. Order that man away; I feel heart-sick in his presence."

"Send Captain Gall to me as soon as he arrives," said the merchant, angrily. "Not a word, sir; I will speak with you in the counting-house."

"The idiot!" muttered Sanford, as he quitted the room. "She twists and turns him at her pleasure; his heart-strings are in her hand. There is madness in an old man's love, but rarely confidence; and in that lies my hope of avenging myself for her scorn and insolence," he added.

Several times during the day, the managing clerk muttered the word "earthworm" to himself. It had evidently stung him.

"You were wrong, Zamora," observed her husband, as soon as they were alone. "Sanford had not the slightest idea of offending you; his remark was a very natural one. I doubt not but the poor fellow is cudgelling his brains to find out the cause of your anger."

Mrs. Chutnee shook her head mournfully, she was not to be convinced.

"I cannot bear to see you unhappy," added the speaker, in accents of self-reproach,—"to feel that my love has destroyed you."

"Not your love, Herbert, but your suspicions."

"Are they groundless?" demanded the jealous man.

There was something both terrible and sad in the glance with which the outraged wife, a mere child in years, regarded him.

"You would like to be convinced they are," she replied, with suppressed emotion.

"I would give worlds were they mine to offer!" exclaimed the jealous husband; "the fortune it has been the labour of a life to gain; more—all that remains of that life itself!"

"I can give you the proof," observed Zamora, "but the price of my condescension to justify myself will prove a heavy one. It is the—"

"It shall be freely paid," interrupted the merchant, blinded to her real meaning by the madness of his jealousy, "though it should leave me bankrupt."

"Be it so," answered Mrs. Chutnee, coldly. "In a few hours you shall be satisfied. And now," she added, "remember your promise. You must use your influence with the captain of the Caradoc to obtain the liberty of Caleb."

"He shall be free as air," exclaimed the delighted husband. "Fear not but I will bring the fellow to reason."

"Man, man!" exclaimed Zamora, as he quitted the room; "ungenerous and selfish! You either cannot or will not understand our nature. That I should live to be humbled by him I once regarded with the filial affection of a child—whom I have so tried to love. Had the heart he has wronged been all of clay, his suspicions might have made me the thing I was not born to be. I must nerve myself for my task," she added. "Pride and conscious purity will sustain me."

When Mr. Chutnee arrived at the counting-house he found Captain Gall waiting impatiently to see him. The tyrant trusted to his influence to replace both the runaways in his power once more, despite the loss of Caleb's indentures, which he had discovered on returning to his ship.

"I have heard it all," said the merchant, interrupting his statement, "and the treatment to which the lads have been subjected."

At this observation the countenance of his visitor fell.

"The only chance of avoiding a disgraceful exposure," added the speaker, "is at once to abandon all claim to their services."

"Never," exclaimed the ruffian, emphatically, "if there is law or justice in Calcutta. I can prove, by the evidence of my first mate, that one of the rascals is my apprentice, although his indentures have been stolen. He has no right to enlist—they must give him up."

"And you will listen to no advice or representation on the subject?"

"None."

"In that case," said Mr. Chutnee, "I must remind you, Captain Gall, that I own two-thirds of the Caradoc."

"And that I am her commander," observed his visitor, sullenly.

"As long as you remain part owner," added the merchant, coolly, "not an hour longer, unless by my appointment. In the event of any disagreement between us," he continued, at the same time drawing a bundle of papers from his desk, "it is provided that either party may buy the other out. Now, the ship is valued at fifteen thousand pounds: are you prepared to pay me ten?"

"Ten devils!" muttered his visitor.

"I must give you a cheque for five, then, and—"

"Stop, sir!" roared the crest-fallen captain; "surely you cannot mean to—"

"I mean exactly what I say," calmly observed the gentleman.

"Consider the example to the crew."

Mr. Chutnee began filling in the cheque.

"The loss, the humiliation."

Mr. Chutnee signed it.

"I give in," said the defeated ruffian, with a scowl. "It is not the treatment I have a right to expect."

An hour later, the merchant returned to his house, and placed the discharge of Jack Manders and Caleb—legally drawn up, and signed by their persecutor—in the hands of his wife.

Zamora received it with a faint smile.

"In the evening," she said, "you will accompany me in a visit I intend to pay."

"Willingly, my love. To whom?"

"To our late guests—Lady Bell and Lillian."

As the cancelling of Caleb's indentures by Captain Gall did away with the necessity of his becoming a soldier, his benefactor paid the smart-money for him, and the poor fellow found himself once more a free agent. Words can scarcely paint his joy; it was as immeasurable as his gratitude.

"And what do you intend to do with him?" demanded Sir Charles Fourreau, when the affair was finally settled; "perhaps you had better have left him in the regiment."

"Her ladyship thinks not," said our hero.

This was an unanswerable reason, and, like a dutiful husband, the commander of the 01st inquired no further.

"The young man," added Richard, "is exceedingly well educated, and quite capable of a clerkship, which I have no doubt I shall be able to procure him."

"In Mr. Chutnee's counting-house?"

"Yes."

"Admirably arranged!" exclaimed the baronet.

"I see it all. You will have a friend on whom you can rely to watch the proceedings of Sanford. You ought to have been in the army."

"You forget, Sir Charles, what an able adviser I have had in Lady Bell," observed our hero. "Her assistance is invaluable; you can't imagine how cleverly she gets over every difficulty."

"Can't I?" said Sir Charles, with a sly smile. "My dear boy, when you have been a husband as long as I have, the last thing to surprise you will be the tactics of your wife."

As a natural consequence of the active part he had taken in the escape of Caleb from the Caradoc, Hirim, the Hindoo boy, and the young sailor became friends; an alliance, offensive and defensive, to use a diplomatic phrase, existed between them, to which, as a matter of course, Jack Manders was one of the high contracting parties.

On the evening of Caleb's return to the residence of our hero, Hirim appeared exceedingly thoughtful.

His companions rallied him, and asked the cause.

"Something bad will come," he answered.

"From the captain?"

"No; Hassan and Al Moorad, the banker who own this house, meet together every night."

"What for?" demanded Jack.

"Evil," replied the Hindoo, and his eyes sparkled with curiosity and intelligence; "but me not know what evil; me tink 'gainst sahib."

"Against Richard Tyrrell?" exclaimed both the young men, indignantly.

The syce nodded his head.

"We will know what it is for," observed Manders.

"Where do they meet?"

"In de garden of de temple, every night—dis night."

The information was sufficient. The two grateful fellows, whom our hero had rescued from the tyranny of Captain Gall, resolved to be there.

(To be continued.)

RALPH, THE BRICK-MAKER'S BOY.

THE ground of the brick-yard is burning and bare;
By the hedgerow are plenty of shady spots,
But Ralph, when he gets a white apron to wear,
Plays in the mortar, and shapes it to pots.

That is his mother's house over the hill,
With the pitcher of pinks in the window, so sweet,
And Ralph is her darling, and sets at his will,
In the soft bricks, the prints of his bare little feet.

Poor soul!—she is homely, and wrinkled, and old,
And work is her portion, but what does she care
For herself, since no neighbour has need to be told
That her darling has beauty enough, and to spare?

Low down on the limbs of the prickly sweet-brier
Are handfuls of roses, but still he will push
His cheek through the thorns, for the one red as fire,
That grows out of reach at the top of the bush.

Sometimes the old brick-maker, sunburnt and bent,
Will tug him about on his shoulder awhile,
Whereat, growing restless instead of content,
He scarcely repays the good man with a smile.

He makes of a stray piece of cedar a shelf,
Sometimes, where he sets up his pots in the sun,
And then, growing vexed with his work or himself,
He breaks them, and tramples down every one.

From the time when the locust puts on the white mass
Of his odorous plumes, till in summer's decay
His bright yellow jacket he throws on the grass,
And braves the bleak wind, he is busy each day.

I know it is all in his own wilful way,
Yet sigh as I see him a-working so hard,
His hands and his apron so heavy with clay,
He scarcely can toddle about in the yard.

My heart often says to me, wherefore employ
Your thoughts in a fashion so pitiful? then,
Reflecting, I see in the brick-maker's boy
A type of the work and the wisdom of men.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

TALKING AND TALKERS.

MAN has sometimes been defined as a talking animal. But there are two objections to this definition. First, because certain of the feathered tribes can distinctly articulate; and second, because the majority of men do not know how to talk at all. When we say they do not know how to talk, we mean with propriety. They employ words but they do not build up sentences: they make lingual rubbish heaps. The loose careless mode of expression which is unfortunately so common has made our conversation a mere bye-word: and its unintelligible jargon has been carried from the ordinary daily gossip to the platform and the rostrum, and speechmakers bewilder themselves and their hearers in an inextricable labyrinth of phrases.

Now it is really a matter of importance that young men should know how to express themselves with simplicity and elegance. And it is possible for any young man, supposing he is not a stammerer (and even that is curable), to acquire an intelligible and graceful style of delivery. It will undoubtedly cost him some trouble—no part of mental or physical education is perfected without—but the trouble it occasions will be amply repaid.

A most important rule to start with is, never to speak without thought. Think twice before you speak once. Take time to think that you may save time in speech. Comprehend clearly what you have to communicate, and then endeavour to make it equally clear to the person or persons whom you address. Say everything in your best style. Let your questions be pertinent, and your answers explicit. Elegance consists in the purity and clearness of language. Purity requires choice and proper words. Ambiguous words should always be avoided. Ambiguity of expression is sometimes distressing, and always confusing. To cultivate that which is excellent, and carefully to avoid that which is objectionable requires a constant effort. Hence the importance of always attending to it everywhere. After we have practised it awhile it will become easy; when easy it will be pleasant; when pleasant we shall do it frequently; "by frequency of act a thing grows into a habit, and a confirmed habit is a second kind of nature."

As the first blow is half the battle, so to begin the correction of a bad habit is half the cure. The majority of people in all ranks of life have become so accustomed to the unintelligible style of English conversation, that it is a difficult matter to attempt anything else.

"In most countries," says a popular writer, "people of the highest stations, if they do not express their ideas with all the accuracy and formality of a treatise on logic, preserve, at least, with a certain degree of jealousy, the habit of a clear and easy eloquence in conversation. In France, to talk the language well is still the indispensable accomplishment of a gentleman. Society preserves the happy diction and the graceful phrase, which literature has stamped with its authority. But in England people even in the best and most fastidious society are not remarkable for cultivating the more pure or brilliant order of conversation as the evidence of ton and the attribute of rank."

The blame of incorrect and unintelligible conversation belongs to all classes, but this does not make the blame the less. If some dandies hesitate and hum and draw, and others wander in a maze of words of doubtful meaning, and others float on a stream of flippant verbiage—wrong oftener than right, and flowing nobody knows where—it is necessary that something should be done to eradicate the evil. The best way to mend a social error is to begin at home. If it is common to be slovenly in conversation let us be uncommon. If there is the risk of being denounced as pedantic, let us boldly dare the penalty. If it is necessary that a reform should be introduced, let us be pioneers in the reformation.

This description of study may be carried on in all places, at all times, under all circumstances. Felicity of expression will always be a valuable auxiliary in our battle of life. By the force of our example we induce others to adopt our plan, and experience the satisfaction which arises from a sense of doing good.

Let us think before we speak. Understand clearly what we have to say, and "pick and pack" from our Saxon vernacular, until the right word is in the right place.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER V.

ABOUT this time George had to transact a little business for his father. It occasioned a short interruption in the French lessons, but Robert turned the interval to such good account that when next he met his kind friend and preceptor, he was able to undergo a successful examination in the sounds of the vowels, whether single, in diphthongs, or triphthongs; he had also mastered the differences between the sounds of the consonants in English and French. George was delighted with his pupil's zeal, and he asked him if he would try to read a letter he had that morning received from his old French tutor. Robert consented to do so, and with some trepidation he read the letter, with only a little help from George.

"Now," said the latter, "you have conquered the greatest difficulty—the pronunciation. I do not mean to say your accent is as yet completely French; there are some refinements to be acquired,—the liquid sounds, for instance; but as you pronounce well enough to be understood by a French person, I shall not trouble you with the liquid sounds just yet, but pass on to the grammar of the language. Now don't be frightened. In the first lesson I gave you to understand, that a little grammar would be necessary, because, as you cannot immediately mix with the natives, you must, with the assistance of theory, make up for practice.

"The grammar of any language is the art of writing and speaking that language correctly. Grammar is divided into four parts—Orthography, Etymology, Syntax, and Prosody."

"And those four parts," said Robert, dolefully, "I fear I never shall master."

At this observation George could not help laughing. "Why, my boy," said he, "you have already been mastering orthography without knowing it. True, I have not made you spell long words yet, but syllables make words, and this morning, in the examination you underwent, you proved to me that the orthography, or spelling, of the most difficult French words would soon be quite familiar to you."

"What, then," exclaimed Robert, his countenance brightening, "is orthography nothing but spelling?"

"Spelling forms the principal part of it," replied George, "and the discussions on sounds and letters, introduced in voluminous grammars, are not necessary for our present purpose. It is by writing under my dictation that you will perfect yourself in orthography; and now we pass on to etymology."

"Etymology teaches us all that relates to the ten parts into which all language is divided. Of these ten parts of speech, the two first are the article and the noun. We, English people, make very little difficulty about our articles. We have but three—a, an, and the. We only put a or an before single things, but we put the before more than one, or many things. Our articles are just the same, when used for men, women, or inanimate things; in grammatical language, for nouns masculine, feminine, or neuter. The French have divided everything into masculine and feminine, they do not even admit of a neuter, and they change (in learned language, decline) their article accordingly as it is placed before a masculine or a feminine noun. And here comes a little consolation for you: there is nothing easier to understand than the explanation of a noun, or substantive; for it has two names, but we will keep to the noun, as being the shortest.

"Well, then, a noun is the name of everything you can hear, see, feel, or understand. In fact, a noun is a thing, neither more nor less. I told you that the French divide everything into masculine or feminine; and in this division they show more respect for sound than sense. Fancy their making stone, feminine—there's a compliment to the fair sex; and if stone is feminine, of course it requires a feminine article; for, as I told you before, the articles, in French, are declined (or changed) accordingly as they are placed before nouns masculine or feminine, singular or plural. I need hardly inform you that singular means one, and plural more than one. Now for the French of our little articles, a, an, and the.

ENGLISH.
A and an.
The.

FRENCH.
Un, une.
Le, la.

And now, Robert, recollect that to articles and nouns belong number and gender. In this lesson I say nothing about case, I only speak of number and gender. Of course, the French, like ourselves, never put un (a or an) before nouns in the plural; and like us they divide their articles into definite and indefinite. Our the (le) is the former, and a or an (un), the latter.

"You are now going to write, under my direction, a list of articles and nouns likely to be useful to you in 'The journey to Paris' I mean you to undertake; and as I hope you will make an excellent breakfast before you start, we will begin with a few things relating to it. It is no longer necessary that I should spell the sounds.*

ENGLISH.

The tea
The coffee
The chocolate
The cream
The milk
The sugar
The rolls
The new bread
The stale bread
The ham
The spoons
The knives
The forks
The cup
The saucer
The tea-pot
The milk-jug
The sugar
The arm-chair
The sofa
The chair
The table

FRENCH.

Le thé, m.
Le café, m.
Le chocolat, m.
La crème, f.
Le lait, m.
Le sucre, m.
Les petits pains, m.
Le pain tendre, m.
Le pain rassis, m.
Le jambon, m.
Les cuillers, f. (kuleair)
Les couteaux, m.
Les fourchettes, f.
La tasse, f.
La soucoupe, f.
La théière, f.
Le pot-au-lait, m.
Le sucre, m.
Le fauteuil, m.
Le sofa, m.
La chaise, f.
La table, f.

"So much for articles and nouns," said George "Now mind, Robert, when I see you to-morrow, I expect that, on my saying the English of these articles and nouns, you should be able to tell me the French of them, and also of the following sentences, in which they are introduced.

"Imagine that you and I are breakfasting together on the morning of 'Le voyage à Paris.'

"Such intimate friends as we are would, in French fashion, address each other as thée and thou; but, to make the dialogue of more general utility, I use you (in grammatical language), the second person plural.

ENGLISH.

The breakfast before the journey.
Here you are. That's right, dear Robert.
It is ten minutes to seven.
Of course you will breakfast with me?
Take this arm-chair, and make yourself comfortable.
Will you take tea, coffee, or chocolate?
Here is excellent cream.
Give me some of it, please, with a cup of tea.
Do you prefer new or stale bread?
The stale, if you please; it is more wholesome.
Now take a little ham and a good cup of coffee.

FRENCH.

Le déjeuner avant le départ.
Vous voici. C'est bien, cher Robert.
Il est sept heures moins dix minutes.
Sans doute, vous déjeunerez avec moi.
Prenez ce fauteuil, et mettez vous à votre aise.
Prendrez-vous du thé, du café, ou du chocolat?
Voici d'excellente crème.
En donnez-moi, s'il vous plaît, avec une tasse de thé.
Préférez-vous le pain tendre ou rassis?
Le pain rassis, s'il vous plaît; c'est plus sain.
A présent prenez un peu de jambon et une tasse de bon café.

I have made an excellent breakfast.
J'ai déjeuné à merveille.

* m. stands for masculine and f. for feminine.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON IV.

GRAVITY, AND OTHER FORCES.

71. When either end of a magnet is brought near a small nail lying on a table, what happens?—The nail is drawn into contact with the magnet, and is there held by a considerable force.

Fig. 2.

72. What is this force called?—The attraction of the magnet.

73. What is the reason that if a stone or other body be raised from the ground and then left to itself, it falls with an accelerated motion?—Because the earth continually attracts it, just as a magnet attracts a nail.

74. What is this force of attraction called?—Gravity, or the Attraction of Gravitation.

75. What is the entire force which draws the body down called?—The weight of the body.

76. What is meant when it is said that a body is heavy?—That it has weight.

77. How may a heavy body be prevented from falling?—By placing it on some solid support, or suspending it from some fixed point above.

78. Illustrate by an example.—A book put on a table is supported and cannot fall. A lamp suspended by a rod or chain from the ceiling of a church is thereby prevented from falling.

79. With what force does the book press upon the table, and the lamp pull downward upon the chain?—With its own weight.

80. Are all bodies equally heavy?—They are not; their weight is in proportion to the quantity of matter they contain.

81. Have two different substances the same weight when of the same bulk?—They have not. A piece of iron is denser, or contains more matter, than a piece of wood of the same size, and it is also heavier.

82. How is the fact that one substance is, from its essential nature, heavier than another often expressed?—It is said that its specific gravity is greater.

83. What amount of force must we exert upward to lift a heavy weight from the ground?—A force a little greater than the weight of the body.

84. When a grocer puts a quantity of sugar in his scales, and says that it weighs a pound, what is meant?—That the weight or downward pressure of the sugar, is the same as that of the pound weight which balances it in the other scale.

85. Is the quantity of matter also the same in each scale?—It is.

86. Give an example of the operation of another force similar to gravity.—The elastic force of a steel spring gradually uncoiling drives the wheels of a watch.

87. Are all forces of the same essential nature with gravity?—Some forces act by a sudden impulse, and produce their whole effect in an instant, or in a very short interval of time.

88. Give an instance of motion produced by such an impulsive force.—The explosive force of gunpowder impels a ball with great velocity out of a gun.

89. Why should a heavy iron ball shot from a cannon strike with such destructive force against any solid obstacle that it meets.—All the force that was expended in projecting it from the cannon is suddenly exerted against the immovable obstacle.

90. What is the force which a moving body exerts, or is capable of exerting, against an immovable obstacle called?—The momentum of the body.

MOMENTUM OF A MOVING BODY.

91. What does the momentum of a moving body depend upon?—Its mass and its velocity.

92. Which has the greatest momentum, a cannon ball or a musket ball fired with the same velocity?—A cannon ball; it will strike a wall with greater force because its mass is greater.

93. Why are very heavy cannon balls used to batter down the walls of a besieged fortress?—Because of the great momentum with which they strike.

94. Light comes to us from the sun at the astonishing rate of 192,000 miles per second; if we suppose it to consist of particles a thousand times smaller than the smallest shot, with what force would a particle of light strike?—With a force equal to the momentum of a half ounce ball fired with the velocity of 2,000 feet per second.

95. What is this an instance of?—A very great momentum, resulting from the enormous velocity of a very small particle of matter.

96. What is the reason that when two trains of railroad carriages, on the same track, meet under full speed, the effects of the collision are so destructive?

—The masses in motion are very great, and they also rush together with great velocity.

97. Give one or two familiar examples of important effects produced by momentum.—A nail is easily driven by a hammer. Red hot iron is wrought into any shape by a blacksmith with his sledge hammer.

98. What is a PILE?—A long stick of timber, sharpened at one end, that it may more easily be driven into the ground.

99. How are piles driven far into the ground?—By the momentum of a heavy mass of iron let fall upon the top.

100. Are the useful applications of momentum confined to solid bodies in motion?—They are not. The force of running water is used to drive mill-wheels. The wind impels ships across the sea; and on land turns the windmill.

WRECKED UPON THE ROCKS.

In the autumn of 1850, as I was steaming down Lake Erie, from Sandusky City to Buffalo, I formed some acquaintance with an elderly gentleman, who was also a passenger. Mr. Warren, for so he gave me his name, had been one of the early adventurers in the western country, and especially along the lake shore; and finding me interested in matters pertaining to early times, he took not a little pains in pointing out to me, from the deck of the steamer, the different localities where important events had occurred connected with the early settlement of the country. With each locality he had a story to tell—either longer or shorter, as the case may be; but the most remarkable one of all, and which I am going to relate, occurred to himself and a small party of his dearest friends.

"Do you see that dark line, yonder?" he said, pointing to the distant shore.

"I see something," I replied, "that resembles a small cloud stretched along the horizon."

"Well, that, sir, is not literally a cloud, though it proved a cloud of sorrow to me."

As he said this, in a voice somewhat tremulous with emotion, I looked up, and observed a tear stealing down his aged cheek.

"Ah! my friend," he pursued, shaking his gray head solemnly, and passing his hand across his eyes, "the sight of that dark spot yonder brings up a dark memory, and makes me weep as a child rather than as a man. It was a great many years ago," he continued, "and I have since lived to experience a great many changes and reverses—have lived to see one friend after another taken down to his narrow home—but the events of that awful day are as vividly in my recollection now, looming above all others, as if they had occurred but yesterday. Excuse me a few minutes, and I will tell you the story," he added; and turning away, he seated himself, buried his face in his hands, and did not again alter his position till the dark line he referred to had faded from my view.

At length he looked up, as one starting from a dream; and, having swept the horizon with his still keen, bright eye, he turned to me and requested me to take a seat beside him.

"That dark line I pointed out to you," he resumed, and which—thank Heaven!—is now gone from my sight, is an almost perpendicular bluff of rocks, of from sixty to eighty feet in height; upon the base of which the storm-raised waves dash with wild fury, throwing a fine white spray high into the air, and filling the listening ear with an almost deafening roar, not unlike the thunders of Niagara. I heard it once, as a dreadful requiem over the loved and lost, and Heaven grant that I may never hear it again!"

Here he paused, as if overpowered with the recollection, brushed another tear from his eye, and once more resumed—

"It was many years ago—I need not tell you how many, for time counts as nothing in those great events that rend the heart—it was many years ago, I say, that a small party of us—consisting of my mother, sister, a younger brother, and a young and lovely maiden to whom I was engaged—embarked in a Canadian bateau at a point far down the lake, with the intention of finishing the remainder of our long journey from the eastward by water, and joining a few friends who had gone before us, and settled just below the rapids of the Maumee.

"For several days we had good sailing—the weather fair and the wind in our favour—in consequence of which our hearts became light and buoyant, for we felt that we were near our journey's end, and should soon be mingled with those we sought. But who knows aught of the future? who has a right to say that joy and happiness are his?—for in a single moment all his brightest hopes may be dashed for ever, and he be either overtaken by death, or by a calamity that shall make him a life-long mourner!

"One day, with the most gloomy apprehensions—with a presentiment that made me wretched—I saw a storm begin to gather, and I watched it with feelings of the most painful anxiety. It was not long in gathering, but loomed up quickly and fearfully, and, almost ere any one save me was aware of the danger, it burst upon us with fury.

"I had taken in sail, and prepared for it as well as I could, but the first dash nearly capsized us, the waves suddenly rose, and threw their spray completely over us, and we began to drift towards the dark bluff which I pointed out to you. All was now excitement and confusion on board, for all believed that we should soon go to the bottom. I pretended to have a stout heart, and to laugh at their fears, and so quieted them in some degree. But to tell you the truth, I was fearfully alarmed myself, for the boat at once became unmanageable, and set rapidly toward the rocky shore, upon which the surge was now beating frightfully, and I felt that nothing short of an interposition of Providence could save us from being dashed to pieces.

"I spoke not of my fears, however, till I saw it was vain to hope—till I beheld the rocks looming up, black and fearful, immediately before us, the waves lashing them terrifically, throwing up their white spray, and rolling back with a crash which could be heard amid the howlings of the storm—and then I told my friends, shouting the words above the roarings of the tempest, that it was time to commend our souls to God, for we were about to pass the dread portals of eternity, and enter his awful presence.

"The scene that followed I may only describe as wild, fearful, terrible—each clinging to the other in the most agonised distress, and all appealing to God for mercy. The painful and horrible suspense of waiting for death while staring it in the face was of short duration; we seemed but as a bubble on the crest of the angry waters, which now bore us swifter and swifter to our doom; and suddenly, while we all stood locked, as it were, in each other's embrace, we struck. There was a fearful crash—loud shrieks that seemed blended into one despairing cry, and the hissing waves rolled over us.

"We all went down clinging to each other, knotted as it were together, and whirled about in the seething waters, till at length, as we rose to the surface, we seemed to be caught by an unusually large wave, and thrown violently upon a narrow shelf of the rock, where, the huge wave instantly retreating, we were left comparatively dry. From the time of going under till we were thrown upon the rock, I had not for a single moment lost my presence of mind, and though now half stunned and bruised by the concussion, I instantly comprehended all that had happened, and that, if I would save myself and friends, it must be done ere the return of such another wave as had placed us in our present position.

"Instantly I worked myself loose from my almost death-gripping companions, dragged them back as far as I could, shouted in their ears the joyful news of their escape, and then got between them and the water, so that, in their bewildered state, they might not roll back to their destruction. I had scarcely succeeded in making them understand what had happened, and they were just beginning to gather themselves upon their feet—my brother with as little presence of mind as any—when I saw another huge wave returning, and quick as thought threw them down, and fell prostrate across their bodies. The wave came, amid our shrieks of terror, and completely submerged us, but not to a sufficient depth to fling us from the rock, and again retreating, left us as before.

"This occurred at intervals of about a minute, and it took me several of these to make my friends comprehend that we were comparatively safe, though in a perilous position—to give them, in fact, a true understanding of the whole matter, and then the task of keeping them where they were became less laborious to me, because of their assistance.

"I now for the first had a little time to look about me, which I eagerly employed in ascertaining what might be our chances for escape. But, alas! I saw nothing to give me any hope. It was an awful scene—a scene to excite feelings of the blackest despair! The shelf upon which we had been thrown was narrow, some ten or fifteen feet in length, and about five feet above the level of the boiling and seething surge, while behind us and over us was a high, black, overhanging rock, the top of which our position did not permit us to see. There was no chance of escape except by the water, and there the wreck of our boat, in a hundred pieces, was whirling about on the foam-crested waves and frothing eddies, the storm the while still raging in wild fury, and the shrieking winds, the descending torrents, and the lashing waves, making a horrid concert for our affrighted senses.

"My son," shrieked my mother, in a voice of despair, "there seems to be no hope for us. It would have been better had we perished at once, and so ended our misery."

"While there is life there is hope," I replied, in the same shrill, shrieking tone—the only human sound that could be heard amid the howlings of the tempest.

"Let me not recall that scene—the recollection of which, even now, after a long lapse of years, makes the blood run cold in my veins. But little was said by any—for, as I have remarked, the human voice could only be heard when pitched in its highest key—and each was too terribly impressed with the sense of our desolation, to give vent to the feelings of agony which stirred the depths of our inmost souls."

"We clung there together for hours—in almost silent waiting, watching, and trembling—and then, with unspeakable misery, we saw the night close in upon us—shutting out the horrid view, it is true—but leaving us as it were only the sense of feeling that each other was there. Oh, that long and terrible night! an age to me of horror—the storm still unabated—the shrieking winds driving coldly through our drenched garments, and ever and anon a large wave engulfing us! There was no chance for sleep—but only for thought—thought, the wildest, most terrible, most agonising! If we looked around, our gaze encountered nothing but the deepest blackness, or here and there the phosphorescent light of the foaming waters, which seemed to our now distracted fancies only a sepulchral light to guide us to destruction."

"Somewhere about midnight, as near as I may judge—feeling weak, faint, cold, and benumbed—through the painful position in which I had thus far clung to my friends, and my continual submersion beneath the rushing and retiring waves—I released my hold for a few moments, in order to chafe my limbs. But scarcely had I done so, when I was suddenly startled by a wild shriek; and, on feeling for my companions, I found to my horror that my mother and brother were gone! leaving only my dear sister, my beloved Mary, and myself upon the rock."

"I need not dwell upon that night. If your imagination cannot fill the picture of woe which I have so imperfectly sketched, you will never form an idea of my feelings, for language has no power to describe them."

"Morning broke at last—after that long, long night of horror—the storm still raging as furiously as ever—but only three of us alive to know the miseries of living. By the returning light we once more surveyed the awful scene around us; and there, upon the rocks below, but at some distance from where we were, we beheld the bodies of my mother and brother, locked in each other's arms, the lashing waves just sufficiently swaying them about to give an appearance of life. But they were dead!—cold in death!—and the sight so affected my poor sister, that she arose with a shriek, and, whether intentionally or accidentally, plunged over into the boiling surge."

"Almost beside myself with the accumulated horrors, I threw my arms around my only companion, my beloved Mary, and held her down by my side."

"And thus I sat for hours, in a state of comparative stupefaction, gazing upon the storm-maddened lake, but with a kind of stony gaze that scarcely had speculation in it."

"When I again turned to Mary I found she had fainted, though how long she had been in that condition I did not know. This in some measure recalled me to myself; and I began to chafe her limbs, calling upon her dear name in the wildest tones of despair. She did not revive immediately, and I had just begun to think that she had perished in my arms, when I saw signs of returning life, and redoubled my exertions. At last I had the joy of seeing her open her eyes, and of knowing that her senses had returned. She now looked wildly around her, and scarcely comprehending what had occurred, asked for her absent friends."

"They are gone, dear Mary," said I, with a bursting heart; "they will return to us no more; you are all that is left to me now; and may God in his mercy either preserve you, or take us both together to the land of spirits!"

"Yes," she replied, faintly—so faintly that I had to put my ear close to catch the words—"and we must perish too—but we will perish together. We must die—we cannot live—we cannot escape—and so let us die at once, and join those who have gone before us!"

"In God's own good time!" I rejoined. "We have no right to take our lives in our own hands. He gave and must take. It is our duty to be ready at His call."

"But I cannot survive this!" she said; "death is an hundred times preferable to this agonising suspense!"

"I encouraged her as well as one in my situation could; I repeated that while there was life there was hope; I used every argument, and every term of endearment I could think of, to persuade her to cling to life; and at last she seemed to be more resigned to her fate—the fate of waiting and watching with me for the coming death."

"Why should I dwell upon that horrible scene? Why live over again in relation the agony I suffered in reality? No! rather let me hurry on to the awful close—for awful it was, and made these then black hairs turn white in the very prime of manhood."

"Mary gradually drooped—grew faint for the want of food—grew benumbed and torpid through repeated drenchings of the chilling waters; and at length, when another night began to close around us, with the storm still unabated, I feebly, but painfully, foresaw that, should I still live on, I must soon live alone—be the last survivor of that once happy group."

"My forebodings were awfully fulfilled! Another night set in—and proved, O God! the last to the last being I then had in the wide world to love! I had gradually grown weak myself—so weak that I could scarcely keep my hold upon the rocks—to which I still clung with the instincts of life, and for the preservation of my poor Mary, who had long since given up the attempt of preserving herself."

"But the end came. A larger wave than ever burst over us, loosed my feeble hold, dashed me against the rocks behind, and left me half stunned and bleeding on the very verge of the abyss. I crawled up again, and felt for Mary. Great Heaven! she was not there—she was gone! With a shriek of despair I threw myself flat upon my face, determined to make no further effort for life."

"But God, in his inscrutable providence, saw fit to preserve me. The storm had now reached its height, and from that awful moment it began to abate. The morning found me alive, but alone; and the angry waves which had snatched from me all I prized on earth, were gradually subsiding to quietude, as if satisfied with their work of destruction."

"More dead than alive, I kept my position upon the rocks through that day and another night; and then, being discovered by some Canadian fishermen, I was taken off, and conveyed to their home on the other side of the lake. There, after a long and delirious illness, I finally recovered, and learned that the bodies of my friends had been found, taken from the water, and decently interred upon the American shore."

"I have many times since," concluded the aged narrator, in a tremulous voice, "visited the humble grave where they still quietly repose together, and never but with a regret that I did not sleep beside them. It was then, over that lonely grave, I took a solemn oath to be true to my first love; and you now behold me a wifeless and childless old man, whose only abiding hope is that I shall soon join them in a better world!"

THE MOSS ROSE.

THE angel of flowers one day
Beneath a rose-tree lay
(That spirit to whose charge is given
To bathe young buds in dew of heaven);
Awaking from his slight repose,
The angel whispered to the rose:
"Oh, choicest object of my care!
Still fairest found when all is fair—
For the sweet shade thou'st given me
Ask what thou wilt—'tis granted thee."
"Then," said the rose, with deepened glow,
"On me another grace bestow."
The spirit paused in silent thought,
What grace was there the flower had not?
'Twas but a moment—o'er the rose
A veil of moss the angel throws:
And, clothed in Nature's simplest wood,
Could there a flower that rose exceed?

DURING a lesson on the animal kingdom, the teacher put the following question: "Can any boy name me an animal of the order edentata—that is, a front-toothless animal?" A boy (whose face beamed with pleasure at the prospect of a good mark) replied, "I can." "Well, what is the animal?" asked the teacher. "My grandmother!" replied the boy, with glee.

THE NEW LORD CHANCELLOR.

SIR FREDERIC THESIGER, the distinguished advocate lately elevated to the peerage as Baron Chelmsford, and appointed to the important office of Lord High Chancellor, was born in London in the year 1794. His father held an official situation in the West Indies, and his uncle was an officer who distinguished himself under Lord Nelson at the Battle of Copenhagen.

In early life the subject of our sketch took a liking to the sea, and obtained a birth as midshipman in "The Cambrian." On board this ship the young sailor saw some active service, made voyages to different parts of the world, and among other affairs, assisted at the bombardment of Copenhagen in 1807. Although engaged upon the sea, sharing the toil and the dangers of a sailor's life, the young man's prospects were exceedingly good. His father had become possessed of considerable property and a large estate on the Island of St. Vincent, and the young seaman was looked upon as its future master. But fate ordained it otherwise. The eruption of the Souffrier Mountain took place in 1812, and destroyed the whole of the estate of the Thesigers, as well as all property in the surrounding districts. The eruption was as remarkable as it was dreadful. The volcanic matter covered not only the whole of the Island of St. Vincent, but also a number of ships at a great distance at sea. It even extended to the Island of Barbadoes, upon which vast quantities of the lighted particles were deposited the same morning. The disaster was so severe, that the British parliament voted a grant of £25,000 for the sufferers; this afforded some relief to the poorer inhabitants, but it did not mitigate the loss of the Thesigers. Their patrimony was completely swallowed up.

Young Thesiger was now a lad of eighteen, and feeling himself thrown upon his own resources, he determined to study some profitable profession. That of the law appeared more suitable than any other. Accordingly, he underwent the usual course of probation in the office of a master, and was called to the bar at Gray's-inn in 1818. He selected the Home Circuit as the scene of his future labours, and for two-and-twenty years diligently pursued his professional duties, without seeking any other distinction than that of a clever, pains-taking lawyer. As "Mr. Sergeant Thesiger," the learned gentleman earned an enviable reputation on the Circuit; and, in grateful remembrance of his success, he has now chosen the name of one of its principal towns—Chelmsford—as that by which he will in future be known and spoken of in history.

At length Mr. Thesiger was induced to seek parliamentary honours, and was fortunate enough to find a patron in the Duke of Marlborough, whose property and family interest was (and always is) sufficient to secure the election for Woodstock. The learned gentleman's introduction into the House of Commons was greeted very warmly; for by this time he had gained much celebrity by his mode of conducting law cases, and had distinguished himself in the management of petitions on disputed elections. His first speech as a member of parliament was against the policy of Lord Palmerston on the Chinese war, and the second was in defence of Sir James Graham, when that gentleman was charged with opening and detaining certain letters in the post-office. He joined in most of the debates between 1840 and 1844, and voted with the late Sir Robert Peel on the question of the Corn Laws. In 1844 Sir Frederic was appointed Solicitor-General. By accepting office under government, the learned gentleman lost his seat for the borough of Woodstock, but was enabled to resume his legislative duties through the kindness of the electors of Abingdon. While representing this borough, and while Sir Robert Peel was still in power, the death of Sir William Follet gave an opportunity for further advancement. Sir Frederic was made Attorney-General; but did not hold the situation long, as the ministry broke up soon after. It is worthy of mention that had it lasted a few days longer, Sir Frederic would have been elevated to the bench as Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas. That appointment became vacant, and, according to precedent, the learned gentleman, as Attorney-General, would have been selected for promotion. As it was, the good fortune fell to the share of Sir Thomas Wilde, afterwards Lord Truro. Such things are ruled by the chapter of accidents, and Sir Frederic had to submit to his fate. When the general election of 1852 occurred, he relinquished his seat for Abingdon, and was returned for the borough of Stamford. In the same year, Lord Derby reappointed the learned gentleman to the office of Attorney-General, a situation which he held until the next change of government, and then returned to the comparative privacy of his own practice.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LORD HIGH CHANCELLOR. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

The parliamentary life of Lord Chelmsford has not been particularly remarkable. During his tenure of office, first as solicitor, and afterwards as attorney-general, it became his duty to conduct the law business of the country, and to speak continually on technical questions as they arose. Beyond this very little occurred. The learned gentleman always upheld the Protestant institutions of the country. When the Ecclesiastical Titles Assumption Bill was before the House of Commons, the learned advocate went heart and soul into the discussion, and succeeded in putting the government in a minority when they showed themselves unwilling to give the bill the decided character he wished. He has taken a leading part in opposing the admission of Jews into parliament, and as actively resisted the attempts which have been made to alter the law with respect to marriage with a deceased wife's sister.

Lord Chelmsford's professional career during the last fifteen or twenty years was highly successful. He commanded one of the most extensive practices at the common law bar. Among the many interesting cases in which he was engaged may be mentioned the celebrated criminal conversation case "Norton v. Lord Melbourne." The defendant occupied the conspicuous position of prime minister of England. Partly on this account, partly from the usual morbid taste for scandal, and partly from the ability with which the case was conducted, the public interest in the matter was worked up to an extraordinary pitch of excitement. The defence was intrusted to Sir Frederic Thesiger, now Lord Chelmsford, and to Mr. Campbell, now Lord Campbell, the present Lord Chief Justice of England. Another case of a similar kind was that of "Heaviside v. Lardner," in which Lord Chelmsford gained a verdict for the enormous sum of £10,000. This affair caused considerable emotion in the scientific world, as the defendant was the celebrated Dr. Lardner, renowned for his eminent philosophical attainments. Not less worthy of mention is the case of an alleged breach of promise of marriage, "Smith v. Earl Ferrers." Lord Chelmsford represented the noble defendant, and startled the court by pronouncing the whole of the letters upon which the case was founded to be forgeries, concocted with the view to extort money. Sir Fitzroy Kelly was counsel for the plaintiff, and hearing the line of defence about to be adopted, said "he could imagine that if any one was wicked enough to commit a forgery of a promise of marriage, or to extort money by means of conspiracy and forgery, that such a person might fabricate a few lines or a signature to support such promise; but for a young lady to deliberately sit down and forge such a mass of papers as he had before him, appeared incomprehensible and not to be credited." Nevertheless, it was so, and the case afforded a striking proof of the fallacy of the general notion that fraud of a most ingenious kind is inconsistent with youth, education, and social position. "The Queen v. Dunn," in February, 1847, was another of Lord Chelmsford's remarkable cases. Miss Burdett Coutts, a lady well known for her Christian and amiable disposition, had been the victim of a course of conduct on the part of Mr. Dunn of the most offensive and annoying character: presenting her with letters at one time most affectionate, and at another with formal demands for compensation for some imaginary wrong or breach of an agreement. The annoyance at last became so serious that the lady sought the advice of Lord Chelmsford. He recommended that Mr. Dunn should be watched, and, the moment he placed himself in such a position as to render himself legally responsible, the opportunity should be seized for commencing an action at law. Some time after this Mr. Dunn made an affidavit in the Court of Bankruptcy, in which he alleged as facts statements which were grossly false; amongst others, that he had written authority from Miss Coutts to draw upon the eminent banking firm of Messrs. Coutts and Co. A prosecution was instituted, and Miss Coutts, upon being examined on oath, contradicted in toto the statements of Dunn. The trial resulted in his conviction, and the late Lord Denman, after a very severe admonition, sentenced him to eighteen months' imprisonment.

The elevation of Lord Chelmsford to the highest law office in the kingdom, is a well-deserved climax to a long career, marked by great perseverance, skill, and success. On his lordship's entry into the House of Lords he was warmly congratulated from all sides of the chamber. The many eminent law lords who distinguish that assembly vied with each other in giving welcome to Lord Chelmsford as the new Lord Chancellor.

His lordship is now in the sixty-fourth year of his age, but looks much younger, and is in possession of all the mental and bodily vigour of the prime of life. Our portrait is from a fine photograph recently taken by Mr. Mayall.

THE CHURCH OF ST. WILLIAM OF THE DESERT.

Lord Chelmsford is married, and has a large family, one of his daughters being the wife of Brigadier-General Inglis, who lately distinguished himself by his gallant defence of the Residency of Lucknow, and was rewarded by a K.C.B. for his services.

ST. WILLIAM OF THE DESERT.

CHRISTENDOM boasts of more than seven champions. In the annals of chivalry there are, beside these, names that bear comparison with any of the chosen number. St. George of England, St. Denis of France, St. James of Spain, St. Anthony of Italy, St. Andrew of Scotland, St. Patrick of Ireland, St. David of Wales, accomplished great things in their day; and far be it from us to touch their well-won honours with unhallowed hands; especially as the wisdom of our ancestors has selected these worthies as national patrons. At the same time there were scores of brave knights ready to do battle with Jew, Turk, and misbelieving pagan, and to pluck the beard of the soldan himself, whose names have not met with that honourable mention which they so fairly earned.

Now here is an instance. In most parts of the world St. William of the Desert is a name unknown to fame. Who is St. William, when did he live, where was he born, where buried, what did he accomplish, and why should his name be associated with the desert?—Very appropriate questions; all of which, and a thousand more if you please, the peasantry of Southern France can answer, and, as old John Willet pointed out the mounting block before the Maypole door as incontestible evidence that on that very spot Queen Bess once boxed a page's ears, so the peasants will show you all sorts of places round about the neighbourhood distinguished for heroic deeds done by saintly chivalrous William a thousand years ago. There is the castle, there the dizzy height, there the deep valley, there the roaring water-course, all associated with the life of St. William. Most of all is the church dedicated to his memory and founded by himself. It is a curious and interesting structure. Better than any written description of it is the picture we present, the lofty mountain and tall trees rising up behind conveying an idea of the physical features of the surrounding country. It is scenery such as would form an excellent background to a group of bandits, and such as Salvator Rosa would have enjoyed. There are craggy heights lifting their heads to the sky, and precipices lost in unknown depths. There are strips of verdure here and there, and cheerful homes; and there are caves or grottoes, which superstition has filled with ghosts and tradition with the bones of murdered men: besides this there are impetuous torrents, chafing on their rocky boundaries and rushing over their rugged beds with a brawling voice; and to every place there is a legend, and in almost every legend St. William of the Desert plays a conspicuous part.

The wild grandeur of the district is singularly impressive; but there is no impropriety in calling it a desert. It is a wilderness of rock and waterfall, quite in keeping with the stories which are told of the dark deeds done in its mountain passes.

St. William was born in the ninth century. He was grandson of Charles Martel (the hammer), and was reared in a school of barbaric chivalry. From the force with which he hammered down the Saracens, he might have adopted his grandfather's surname, but, without the name, he carried on the work which his grandsire had so ably begun. He tore down the Saracen ensigns, trampled them under his feet, drove the Moslems before him like frightened sheep, destroyed their strongholds, defied their prowess, and conducted himself like a peerless paragon of chivalry. And, besides this, he built up churches, and endowed monasteries, and established peaceful colonies, and cultivated waste lands, and introduced just laws, and punished acts of depredation, so that, as a man of peace as well as a man of war, he was esteemed by the people, and his memory was fondly cherished when he lay sleeping his last sleep, under a stone in the chancel. He was canonised two hundred years after his death, and a monument, with an elaborate inscription, was erected in his honour.

Among the marvellous things related of St. William, is that of an extraordinary leap which he once made on horseback from the highest rock, right over the Herault, without suffering the slightest inconvenience. But the most remarkable story of all, and one which is related with extraordinary versatility, is that of Gellone the giant. If anybody doubts the existence of this formidable ogre, he is requested to observe the remains of his stronghold; he is led up towards the ruins of an old castle, called the Giant's Chamber; and, if the sight of that is not convincing, then the sceptic is unworthy to be told this chivalrous adventure of the great St. William.

A monster of iniquity was Gellone, the giant. Like Blanderion (whose veritable history is related in the "Seven Champions"), he might have had written over his castle,

"Let simple passengers take heed betime,
When up this mountain they intend to climb;"

but no such intimation being given, many and many a hapless traveller was killed and cooked to furnish forth the giant's table. He snapped up plump villagers and dainty children, and set fire to villages to warm his hands by the blaze. He entertained a relish for things atrocious, and was never so happy as when making other people miserable. Now, the giant Blanderion was attacked and overthrown by St. Anthony, of Italy, and St. William of the Desert undertook to do the same for the giant Gellone. How he accomplished his self-imposed task is variously related. According to one legend, he boldly marched up to the ogre's castle, summoned the monster to single combat, and so harassed and worried the man-mountain—after the fashion of St. Anthony of Italy—that he was at length completely exhausted, and at the mercy of his diminutive assailant, who straightway cut off his head and confiscated his property. Another authority informs us that, in the disguise of a pilgrim, St. William of the Desert asked hospitality of the giant; that his grim entertainer was particularly kind—meaning, possibly, to make of him for supper a nice little grill, and led his guest out on the rocky terrace to show him the prospect. The terrace overhung a deep precipice. The pilgrim was delighted. The giant was gratified at the pilgrim's delight. With extraordinary politeness he led him from spot to spot, so that he might catch the most picturesque aspect of the scene. The pilgrim was in raptures. Something attracted his attention below. What was that? The giant, without the smallest hesitation, looked over to observe what it was that had occasioned the inquiry. Availing himself of this excellent opportunity, St. William gave him one good thrust, and, with the howl of a wild beast, the giant fell into the gulf below.

This is the staple story of St. William of the Desert. There are many other legends more or less romantic and more or less fabulous; but true it is that

St. William of the Desert was a great man in his time; that he has left behind him a good name, and a church which excites the admiration of artist, antiquary, and tourist.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

He was a man, take him for all in all,
We shall not look upon his like again.

SHAKESPEARE.

When better thoughts of conscience born,
With sinners wake at morn;
When from our fevered couch we start,
With feeble pulse and sinking heart.

CHRISTIAN YEAR.

JEM bowed to the ladies, and nodded to Apple Blossom, who tried to hide from his view the blackened eye and bruised temple, which she knew he would ascribe to their true and terrible source. At another time Jem Goodman would have remarked the constraint of Apple Blossom's manner, her keeping one hand to her eye, and above all, her pallid, careworn, and dejected look; she, generally so merry, so hearty, and so full of interest in everything. But Jem Goodman himself was very pale, much preoccupied; his eyes were red with weeping, his voice faltered, and his hand shook.

He had been for two hours in Newgate with Ben Darrell. He had been trying to comfort a broken-hearted wretch, to kindle heavenly hope in a mind darkened by the murkiest despair.

If it is heart-rending to witness bodily agony without being able to relieve it, it is infinitely more so to behold the writhings of a conscience tortured by remorse.

It is a wonderful and mysterious thing, that conscience will sleep sound throughout a long and guilty life. It will seem that the guilty mind had kept no record of its deeds of evil, either great or small; and yet, if bodily disease, approaching death, or anything occurs to destroy the mental balance, and conscience wakes, there wakes with him a ghastly memory, by whose sepulchral lamp every detail and record of crime becomes distinctly legible to the trembling, shrinking sinner. All who have attended the guilty when under the influence of despair, or even dejection, must have remarked this. How these records have been kept, that are so fresh, so legible at the close of a long life of sin, it would puzzle science to explain; but so it is.

Jem Goodman listened to one detail after another. Every fault and sin of Ben Darrell's life was laid before him. A terrible and ever-haunting dread of the world beyond the grave overcame the wretched man.

Jem Goodman tried to prove to him that he could do nothing for himself; that there was but one name potent to save; that he must call on that name, and believe in it; and that, if he did so in penitence and faith, his soul would be saved alive.

Ben Darrell, however, was not in a state to listen to this excellent teaching.

He had always led a careless life. For some years he had been fond of liquor; for some months he had lived for, cared for nothing else.

He missed the poisonous stimulants to which he had accustomed his brain. A terrible reaction of unutterable depression followed upon his enforced abstinence.

Two thoughts haunted him night and day: the one, a passionate desire to destroy himself; the other, an agonising and vain longing for the wife he had so long ill-used, slighted—so savagely destroyed, and now so loved and so bewailed.

Jem Goodman helped him to obtain the assistance of counsel: but Natt Stone had secured the most eminent advocates in such cases. They were retained by him with utter recklessness of expense, on the side of revenge, and not justice.

Jem Goodman could not rally, though he tried to do so. Even the account of Larky Grigg's night at the station-house, which, at any other time, would have interested him so intensely, fell flat on a pre-occupied attention.

He declined Apple Blossom's offer to make him, what the poor consider an universal panacea, "a good hot cup o' tea."

There was something to be suggested by him to Ben Darrell's counsel, and he was only waiting the appointed time for an interview with him.

Jem brightened up a little, however, when Ellen St. Ange expressed a wish to go over Newgate, a desire she had long felt, and to take the opportunity of speaking to the unfortunate Ben Darrell.

"Perhaps," she said, "it might be given to me to say something to comfort him; at any rate, I have often found, in visiting sick labourers on my father's estate, that those who were impatient with the clergyman and the squire, have been very gentle, docile, and even thankful, when I have tried to comfort them. There is an innate chivalry of feeling, an instinct courtesy, an untaught politeness in all Britons, whether the sons of the soil and the loom, or its lords and masters, that makes me think Ben Darrell would, perhaps, be more teachable with Ada and me than with even Mr. Goodman."

"I am sure I could rouse him to a full sense of his heinous sins, and his perilous situation, both of mind and body," said Mrs. Golightly.

"He does not require rousing, madam," replied Jem Goodman. "It was with a view to soothing and softening his poor, guilty mind into somewhat of a mood to receive the word, that I thought Miss Ellen's offer so opportune, like."

"I shall have nothing to do with soothing that savage wife-killer," said Mrs. Golightly. "For every sigh he caused his murdered wife, I hope he will have to pay with a howl or a groan. I have no pity for such miscreants."

"Not when they repent, dear friend?" said Ellen.

"They never do repent," replied Mrs. Golightly. "If that villain were acquitted to-morrow, he'd drink again, marry again, and in all probability be in Newgate again for killing his second wife."

"Ah," said Jem, "it's generally believed that when he leaves Newgate, ma'am, it'll be for the scaffold!"

"Do you think he will be found guilty?" asked Ellen; "guilty of murder?"

"I do, miss; and so does he."

"Then I will go and see him!" exclaimed Ellen, clasping her hands, and growing very pale. "Ada, you will come with me? and you, too, dear old friend? I will get papa to write to the Lord Mayor, or one of the Sheriffs, for permission to see the prisoner and go over the prison. But you must come with us, dear old friend, and I am sure when you see the poor distracted, tortured wretch, you will help us to save his soul, if nothing can be done to save his body. And perhaps, when we talk to him of the Saviour, who died a more cruel death than that which threatens him, solely to save sinners, he may shed those tears that soften the soil of the heart (the long hardened heart of unbelief), and they may fit it to receive the good seed. You must go with us, Mr. Goodman," said Ellen.

"Oh, pray do," said Ada.

"I am a M'Gregor," cried Mrs. Golightly, "and therefore I need not assure you that I am no coward; but I certainly shall not trust myself and you young ladies in a place full of acknowledged felons and murderers, unless Mr. Goodman gives us his protection. There are very few men to whom I would trust myself at all, and certainly the inmates of Newgate are not among the number."

"I shall be proud and happy to attend you, ladies," said Jem, "but you need be under no fear, noways. The governor's a noble gentleman. I'm sure, to look at him he might be a prince. He's as firm as a rock, and yet as mild as mother's milk—kind he is, too, to all the prisoners as kind as koinde. He'll most like show you over Newgate himself, and both from fear and love they'll mind their manners if he do, for they're fit to wuship him. They knows he's measter there, but they knows, too, he's a kind and pitying one."

"I shall take the opportunity of asking him some questions that bear upon an argument in my pamphlet," said Mrs. Golightly; "and if I find he has any taste for literature, perhaps I may read him the opening. I hope it will not have the soporific effect on him it has had on those it was meant to benefit—I trust it won't send him to sleep."

"They say," replied Jem, "he's always wide awake, ma'am—leastways, that he always sleeps with one eye open."

"I wish you to hear the introduction to my 'Rights and Wrongs of Woman,' Mr. Goodman," said Mrs. Golightly, taking out the terrible MS.

"It must be another time, ma'am," said Jem, "thanking you, kindly, all the same; but my time's up. I'm going straight to Mr. Quibble's chambers; but, whenever you wish to visit Newgate, and poor, miserable Ben Darrell, I'm at your service, ladies." So saying, and bowing to Mrs. Golightly, Ada, and Ellen, and nodding kindly to Apple Blossom, Jem Goodman hurried away.

"Where is Hope?" Mrs. Golightly said "I wanted to see her. If she's not spoilt, she'll be worth something."

"She's kin to an angel, she is," said Apple Blossom. "She's a downright blessing in the house, ma'am; and I don't think nothink can spoil her."

Just at this moment, as if in confirmation of Apple Blossom's praise, in hobbled Lame Luke. He had a white paper parcel in his hand, and in spite of his roughness and dirt the parcel was unsoiled and uncrumpled: he had carried it so carefully, poor fellow! He laid it gently down on the table, and seeing Apple Blossom had visitors, ladies, too, he turned very red, and made a low, hurried, sailor's bow; and, in return for the amiable smiles and nods of Ada and Ellen, was about to explain his object in calling, and to invite Apple Blossom to open the parcel, but at this moment Mrs. Golightly rose, and seeing an end of pink ribbon peeping out of the white paper, and being herself rather a meddler and a pry, she said—

"What vain trappings are these, woman? What are the contents of that parcel, and what is your business here, fellow? Pah! you smell of beer and smoke. Are you fit to come into our presence? I believe you are drunk, sirrah."

"No, I bea'n't," said Luke, turning his quid in his mouth. "I be as sober as ever you be, old lady, splice my timbers if I bea'n't; and I haven't taken any greater fancy to your figgur-head than you has to mine. There's no love lost atween us."

Mrs. Golightly stalked slowly up to him.

Lame Luke could have stood a broadside aboard ship with all hands piped, as he himself said, better than the menacing glare of those blazing, spectacled eyes. He suddenly, as he told Larky Grigg, resolved to weigh anchor, slip cable, hoist his ensign, and set off full sail, for he felt the rocks were ahead and the breakers were near.

In other words, Lame Luke hobbled off as fast as he could. Mrs. Golightly, snuffing the air, which certainly was redolent of the "baccy" he was chewing, exclaimed, "Who's that low, drunken fellow, Apple Blossom? No wonder Bob is such a cast-away if you make such a wretched sot as that welcome here."

"He very seldom comes, ma'am," said Apple Blossom. "He ain't no chum of my Bob's."

"What rubbish is that he's brought you?—a present from his low, drunken, pestiferous self, I suppose."

"O lor! no, mem. He ain't one to make no presents. All he has he spends on hisself. I think it's the children have got him to bring me somehut from the ragged school. He's unkinmon fond of the children—Larky Grigg especial; and they doats on him; and Larky hopes to get him to the school."

"A promising pupil, certainly!" said Mrs. Golightly.

"Mr. Stephen have made good scollards, and, better still, good Christians, ma'am, of worse nor he. He'd be roight glad to take Lame Luke in hand, he would. He've got his eye upon him. He will have him in one of the adult classes. Lor, ma'am! his be that true charity St. Paul speaks o', and which you told me to get by heart: the charity that hopeth all things, believeth all things, and is not puffed up."

"No one has a higher opinion than I have of Mr. Stephen," said Mrs. Golightly; "and I believe the admiration is mutual. I have a great mind to send him the opening chapters of my pamphlet, Ellen. He would appreciate them. But, now, I insist on knowing what finery that drunken, reprobate old sailor has dared to bring hither."

Apple Blossom opened the parcel. It contained a very pretty cap of fine crochet, trimmed with pink ribbon.

In Larky's round hand was written, "For their dear mammy, from her dutiful and loving children,

"LARKY GRIGG,

"MERRY BLOSSOM,

"HOPE EVERMORE."

"Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted."

"Those that sow in tears shall reap in joy."

"Dearest Mammy,—We all saw you were in trouble, but we did not like to take notice. We hope what we send will comfort you up. Hope has done the crochet, Larky bought the ribbon, and Merry the cotton. So no more at present from your loving and dutiful children,

"GREGORY BLOSSOM,

"MERRY BLOSSOM,

"HOPE EVERMORE."

"Green Fields Ragged School, March 15th, 18—."

This was written carefully on lines, and evidently with the help and under the guidance of a teacher. Ellen and Ada blushed deeply: perhaps they were in the secret.

Apple Blossom was deeply affected; tears poured down her cheeks as she said, "Bless them! they saw I wor well nigh broken-hearted, and not one of 'em ever axed me what I wor frettin' about. Ain't they Christian children? Don't they spake up for ragged school? Bless 'em, bless 'em! And God will bless 'em. And it's Hope—that little angel, Hope—as always puts those thoughts into their heads, and those feelings into their hearts. I didn't ought to be so downcast about Bob, when I've got such comfort in the bairns. I know what I'll do; I'll put that cap by; and I'll never put it on till the blessed day that my Bob takes the pledge."

"Then, my good woman, I fear you'll never wear it," said Mrs. Golightly; "and no great matter, pink ribbons are ill-suited to your station; and I wonder that Hope, who of course is at the bottom of this, showed such a vain, gaudy taste."

"O ma'am, Merry's had a voice in it, I'm sure. But lor, 'tain't too foine for the holiday I'll keep it for. How it have cheered me up, to be sure. I feel a'most certain he'll take the pledge and give up the ruinous drink, and I'll wear the cap yet."

"The cap and bells, you ought to wear," said Mrs. Golightly; "but there's no arguing with fools. However, I've no more time to waste now."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Had she a father? Had she a mother?
Had she a sister? Had she a brother?
Yet was there a nearer one
Or, and a dearer one,
Still than all other?—HOOD.

MRS. GOLIGHTLY took out her large gold repeater. "Nor have I any time to read any more just now," she added, "for I have an appointment with a publisher in Queen-street, relative to my pamphlet. I will call for you on my return. I mean to walk for the sake of the exercise, and were I to suit my pace to yours, young ladies, I should be late; and the man who does not see how important to society is a work like mine, will not await me with smiles, as he would if this MS. were that of some frivolous novel of fashionable life, or some highly-coloured story of illicit love."

So saying, Mrs. Golightly stalked out of the house, and strode away in the direction of Queen-street.

"Lor, what a grand-spoken, bookish lady she is, to be sure," said Apple Blossom. "I did drop off to sleep, I'm ashamed to say it, but I wor up all night, and wor quite overtired, like. But lor, them foine, grand, long words, they're a world too foine to be any 'quaintances of mine. There warn't half a dozen of 'em as I ever heerd before. Some of 'em seemed to me first cousins to Latin and Greek, they sounds so grand. Lor, that will be a foine book; none but fust-rate scollards can make head or tail of it. Please, miss, what's it all about?"

"Well, I hardly know," said Ada; "for I, too, dropped asleep. But just now I want to talk of something else; I want to know all about Hope Evermore. Where is she now?"

"She's taken Ness and baby Ben to school, miss: thanks to you for the kind help that pays what little their keep costs;—we'll see what their Uncle Stone 'll do for them. She's as good as any growed-up daughter to me."

"You knew her mother, did you not?" asked Ada.

"Oh yes, miss, we wor in trouble together: we both laid in at Queen Charlotte's Hospital; and, as we both wor very bad, and had crule bad times, we got quite friendly together. Trouble seems somehow to soften the heart, miss, and put people on a level, as it were. Else she, poor dear, wor a lady bred and born."

"No one could see her and hear her speak, and not feel sure o' that, and it wor pitiful (that it wor) to see her a-lying so patient, for all the world like one of we poor bodies, in that narrow, humble bed; her head as low as our'n, her fine noble face on the coarse pillow, and her delicate, white hand, just like that of a marble statue, on the common coloured quilt of that poor bed."

"And then her patience, her thankfulness: never finding no fault, saying how clean, and nice, and quiet it wor there, and how thankful we poor creatures ought to be—evening herself to us. But all as come anigh her felt she warn't one of us; the very doctor, and matron, and everybody called her 'ma'am,' and spoke to her, whether they would or no, as if she'd been a lady in her own grand house, not a poor ooman lying-in in a hospital. It was pitiful to see the likes of she, with her name over the little rack above her bed—

'CONSTANTIA EVERMORE.'

"When she was lifted out, I saw her large, beautiful eyes looking at it through her tears; and then she smiled and said it reminded her of the zoological gardens, where every forrin baste's name wor stuck up over his den. And the doctor, who come in just then, and heerd her, and wor very pleasant, and seemed much taken with her, said, that, in the case of she, it wor more like a ticket to tell the name of some beautiful forrin flower; and she blushed, poor dear lady, and sighed; and I heerd her say, 'Beauty, what's it worth? it may win love, but it can't keep it.'

"Did the lady tell you anything of her history?" asked Ada.

"Not much, miss; but she did say enough for me to see that she'd married for love, and been forsok: for a poor gal died while we wor there, one as had a child, and no husband to take a pride in it, and she said to me, 'Well, Apple Blossom,' she loved to call me by what she said wor a very sweet name, and reminded her of spring, and the country, and happy days; so says she, 'Well, Apple Blossom, however bad one's lot, there's always some one worse off. I can bear want and pain, but the sense of guilt and shame I couldn't bear.'

"So I made so bold as asked, 'Is you a widder, ma'am?' 'Not that I knows for,' says she; 'but it's harder still to have a husband and no husband, and to bring a child into the world that, without being made an orphan by the will of God, is one through the cruelty and inconstancy of man; and then, with many tears, she told me she knew she should never leave that house alive, and made me promise—if she died, and I could get leave—that I'd take her baby. 'That'll live,' she said, 'I feels it'll live, and I fancies it'll be a girl; and if it is,' said she, 'promise to be a mother to it, and bring it up in humble life and honest poverty. I wish—if she grows up ever so ladylike and beautiful—I wish she may never be noticed by no gay gentleman or man of fashion.' And she busted out cryin', and said, 'Oh, Apple Blossom! those gay, thoughtless men—they don't know the value of a heart; they don't want a wife—she's only in their way. They may, when they're in debt, be glad to marry some grand, rich lady, to pay their bills, and keep 'em in luxuries; but woe to the poor gal that thinks, because a gay man of fashion loves her, and insists on making her his wife, when he can't get her any other way, that her love will make him steady, or suffice for his happiness.' All this time, miss, she could hardly speak for sobbing. I begged her not to take on so—she'd do herself a mischief, maybe, and feel the effects of it arter, when the blessed babe was born."

"There won't be no 'arter' for me in this world, Apple Blossom," said she. 'I've suffered too much, but I forgive it all, I forgive them, I forgive him; only if you has, as I hope you will, the charge of my girl' (worn't it curious that she know'd it would be a gal); 'bring her up as your own, make her a good hard-working Christian like yourself; let her marry some working man that loves his God and his bible, and wants a wife and knows how to value a good one, and will be proud of her, and kind to her, and faithful to her; but keep her from any gay, fashionable man, young or old, as you would from a beast of prey.'

"I promised all she wished, and begged her to be quiet. She closed her eyes for a bit, and then she sat up in bed and asked me—

"Have you a son, my good, kind Apple Blossom?"

"In course I has," says I, 'my Grigg—Gregory's his name. He worn't called Larky then, he worn't breeched even, but he wor a fine truth-telling, quick little fellow, and so I tould the poor lady, as says, 'Then I see it all afore me. You'll be a mother to my babe, and it'll be a gal. Let it be called Hope. My mother's name wor Hope. And you'll bring her up, and they'll be as brother and sister till such time as their hearts speaks; and your son must be a good, feeling, hardworking man, and if he is, and he loves the poor orphan gal, I wish her no better lot than to be an honest Christian working man's wife. But never let her know her father was a gentleman till she's grown up, not then, unless she's a steady, good, pious gal; and never let a gay or fashionable man come near her.' By this time her poor thin face wor flushed, and her eyes shining like stars. I tried to make her lie down, and keep quiet; 'twor no use. She said she knew she should never see another sun, and she was prepared and glad to die; and she gave me a curious old-fashioned box, locked, and a letter with the key in it, and made me promise, when she was no more, to give it as directed, and she wouldn't rest till I'd put it under my pillow, and the letter in my box, and the direction wor 'Mr. James Goodman, Stamford-street, Blackfriars,' and I believe he knows a sight about the poor lady; but I never dared ask him no questions to spake of. And then she insisted on my accepting of her shawl and many other things—and just then she was took bad, and soon after I wor took bad too. We'd both dreadful times, miss. It was long before I know'd anything that was going on."

"When I came to myself, I saw that my poor babe was dead and the sweet lady, hers was alive, just as she had foretold, but she was a corpse; and the kind matron let me suckle Hopy; and when I got well I applied for the nursing of her and got it, and a blessing she's ever been to me—and that's all I know, miss; but Jem Goodman knows more, only he's as close as wax about it; but the Trudges, where she lodged, poor lady, afore Jem Goodman got her into Queen Charlotte's Lying-in-Hospital, they knows a deal about her; and they've got picters she draw'd—so nat'ral—and books, and a watch she sold 'em for board and lodging."

"And who are the Trudges?" asked Ada.
"A very honest couple, miss; and a very happy one now, for Tim Trudge has taken the pledge; and so he's a good husband and father, and is laying by money; but, before Jem Goodman got him to sign, he used to beat his wife and children, and drink up all he earned. There was an execution for rent in the house, and Jem lent Tim the money to get the bailiffs out; and Tim wor so thankful he signed the pledge that very day, and he's never broke it, and never won't. Oh, they're such a happy pair now, and such good, prosperous children they have—all earning somehut; and it's such a pleasant, Christian home," and Apple Blossom sighed. "That's the effect of the pledge, miss."

"And where do they live? Do you think they would tell me all they remember of Hope's mother?" asked Ada.

"Oh, yes, miss. They've moved from where she was with them, up to Pimlico; and all their little ones goes to a ragged school, which for its size is as good as our'n. It's in Duck-lane, Pye-street, Westminster, miss. I knows the young person that's teacher there—such a clever, good, pious, young creature. If you goes to Pimlico to see Milly Trudge, I hope you'll go and look in at that ragged school, miss; it'll do your heart good to see the little, clean, happy faces, that would be so dirty, sickly, and wicked, but for that school."

"I shall be delighted to visit it," said Ada. "But where shall I find Milly Trudge?"

"In Little Ebury-street, miss, number —. Two neat parlours she've got, and a pleasant, honest creetur' you'll find her; and always ready to talk of the poor lady, who lodged with her both before and a'ter she wor married. She's very kind to Hope, for her poor mammy's sake, and often makes her a cake, and gives her a frock or a bonnet, or a pair of shoes. She's offered more nor onst, now Tim's taken the pledge, and they're thrivin' in consequence, to take Hope off our hands. But it 'ud break our hearts to part with Hope. And as to Larky, it seem a'most as if all the poor lady's words wor to come true, miss; for he calls her his little woife, and she looks a'ter him, and mends his things, and lectures him, and tries to keep him steady, just like a wife. And I'm sure they doat on each other, they does. There ain't no love lost between them two."

"And Merry," asked Ellen, "does she love Hope?"

"Don't she just, miss?" replied Apple Blossom. "I wor a going to say they're like sisters; but 'tain't that exactly. Hope, tho' she's three years younger than Merry, is like a mother to that wild, gathless, dear little wench of mine. And Merry minds her, too. If it wor a good deed in us, as Jem Goodman says it wor, to take charge of Hope, I'm sure it's brought a blessing with it. She's our greatest comfort; we'd be lost without her."

"Have you any idea what her father was?" asked Ada.

"Well, miss," said Apple Blossom, "the Trudges knows more nor I do. But I thinks Mr. Evermore were a lawyer of some kind. Out o' the Temple, I think he come. One o' they as hides green heads under gray wigs. A handsome, dressy, gay, drinking sort of a swell I heer'd he wor. And, I believe, the marriage wor private, and kept from his friends; and that he got tired of his poor wife and went abroad. I'm sure he must have used her cruel, from the way she spoke of gay men, and her dread that the gal she was so sure her child would be, should ever fall into the power of one o' those grand, gay swells."

Just at this moment Mrs. Golightly returned; they saw her stride past the small windows. Her tall form reached the top of the sash.

She came in flushed, her eyes flashing, looking much excited, and with the MS. in her hand.

"Come, young ladies," she said; "your respective papas will be expecting you."

"What is the matter, dear friend?" asked Ellen. "You look agitated and vexed."

"Oh!" replied Mrs. Golightly, "I am very wrong to let such trifles upset me; but since I left you I have seen some half-dozen publishers. They all refuse to publish my pamphlet, even on half profits."

"Half profits," said Ellen. "I thought you meant to sell the copyright of the first edition outright."

"So I did, my dear; but there must be two parties to a bargain—buyer and seller. Now, I was willing to sell, but those unenterprising fools are not willing to buy."

"Then you will publish it on half profits with one of them, I suppose," said Ellen.

"There's not one of them has energy, taste, or wisdom to see that he might make a fortune by printing it on those terms. I read Sneer and Jeer a few sentences, and I was quite willing to go through the opening chapters; but the chuckling, giggling noodles rudely stopped me by assuring me they had heard enough to convince them that no good could accrue to them or me from the publication. So I snatched up the MS. and rushed out of the shop. Had I stayed I must have struck them—it is so provoking to see people so blind to their own interests."

"And what will you do, dear friend?" asked Ellen. "Will all your trouble be lost?"

"Ha! ha! ha!" laughed, very bitterly, Mrs. Golightly. "I should have thought you, Ellen, knew me better. Why, rather than not publish that pamphlet, I'd end my days in the Queen's Bench. Opposition only rouses me. Dr. Johnson says, 'Industry is never wholly lost.' He might have added, 'Genius is sure to find its own way to fame.' I know those fellows, Jeer and Sneer, of Queen-street, Undersale and Overcharge, Whim and Wail, Bluster, and even Wasp and Nettle—on all of whom I have called—don't like the tone and object of my pamphlet. The emancipation of woman is to the Englishman what that of the slave is to the American. But, mark my words, my pamphlet comes out this day month. I'll have it placarded in letters a foot long wherever a placard can be stuck. Every omnibus shall carry with its burthen of our base oppressors hurrying from their crushed, terrified, and stay-at-home wives to the City, there to idle and flirt under the excuse and plea of business, those electric words, 'The Rights and Wrongs of Woman.' Men shall carry the announcement about the crowded streets, slung round their backs and breasts, as they do that of some idle show — 'Tom Thumb,' 'The Bearded Woman,' or 'Madame Tussaud's.' I shall not rest till it is out. I'll make all those fellows—those publishers—when they hear the noise it makes, ready to hang themselves for having refused to publish it."

So saying, and nodding to Apple Blossom, Mrs. Golightly strode away, followed by Ada and Ellen, who took a kind leave of their poor, suffering protégée, Ellen forcing upon her a sum wrapped up in paper, and telling her, if she did not want it herself, to distribute it among those who did, or spend it on her little adopted darling, Hope, and the orphans, Nessy and blue-eyed Ben, the baby.

(To be continued.)

A HOME FOR ALL.

The king unto his palace proud
Returneth from the throne,—
The noble to his castle hoar,
The peasant to his cottage door,
The monk to cloister lone.

The soldier hasteth to his camp,
The sailor dares the deeps,
The traveller spreads his tent at night
That flecks the forest-green with white,
And 'neath its shelter sleeps.

The Greenland hunter scoops a cell
Beneath incumbent snows,
The son of Afric to his kraal,
The Indian to his wigwam frail
With cane-like roof-tree goes.

The eagle knows his eyried cliff,
The lion loves his lair,
The beaver builds his lodge of rest,
Foxes have holes, and birds their nest.—
Where dwell the houseless?—Where?

There is a mansion free to all,
Whence none are turned away,
Even those who ne'er had home before,
Are welcome through its unlock'd door
To enter in, and stay.

No fee of gold the lodgers pay,
In that sepulchral bower;
But "dust to dust" on forehead white
Doth give each applicant the right
Of mastership and power.

No gorgeous robes the inmates wear,
No paintings deck the wall,
It bath no revelry by night,
No casement fair with taper'd light,
No downy couch, or hearth-stone bright,
Yet,—'tis the home for all.

INVINCIBLE fidelity, good humour, and complacency of temper outlive all the charms of a fine face, and make the decay of it invisible.—Talfer.

ANECDOTES OF RACHEL.

SINCE the death of the great tragédienne the Parisian journals have been filled with reminiscences of various parts of her career, and anecdotes characteristic of her who so long delighted the French people.

Her parents, as is known, were poor Jews. The mother kept a second-hand clothing stall in Paris, and the two sisters, Eliza Rachel and Rebecca, contributed their share to the family commissariat by singing in the streets, when M. Choron, an old gentleman, formerly director of the Opera, but then teacher of singing and declamation, was induced to give the girls instructions in singing. After being there some time the parents desired again to make them useful. Choron writes his opinion of the merits of the two children: "Eliza (Rachel) will require a little more time, for she has a worse memory and works less than her sister, who is considerably more thoughtful, and understands with greater facility."

Her genius for tragedy being discovered, she was sent to a school of declamation, and having, at a trial declamation, elicited the approval of some of the first critics, she was placed for farther instruction under Samson, the celebrated professor. It is stated that only with the greatest difficulty could she be induced to give up her predilection for comedy—another instance of the errors in self-judgment true genius sometimes falls into.

At length came an engagement at the Gymnase.

"That name, Eliza, will not suit the bill at all," said the director to her, when the arrangement was made. "Have you no other?"

"My name is Elizabeth Rachel."

"Come, that is better! Rachel is a name which will be remembered, and which is not borne by everybody. Call yourself in future Rachel. The selection of a name is of more consequence than you may imagine."

So she came to be Rachel. She made her début on the 25th of April, 1837, in a poor play, "La Vendéenne," written expressly for her. But few of the critics recognised her marvellous power. Jules Janin was the only one who hailed in proper terms the rising star. He takes to himself the credit of being the Rachel discoverer. Her success, however, was rapid. It may be estimated by her income. She began with a salary of 3,000 francs per year. The next year the authorities of the theatre to which she was then attached voluntarily raised her stipend from 4,000 to 20,000 francs; and, finally, when acting independently, her income was estimated at 400,000 francs per annum.

Mademoiselle Mars appears to have been one of the first to recognise her great genius. One who with her witnessed Rachel's début, says:—

"When Camille appeared on the stage Mademoiselle Mars followed her attentively; then, turning to me, she said, with a half nod and a sigh of hearty satisfaction, 'She walks well!' Those who are acquainted with the theatre, well know what praise was contained in these simple words, especially from the lips of Mars."

Among the letters of Mademoiselle Rachel which are now seeing the light, is this one to a well-known Hebrew banker:—

"MONSIEUR—My friend M. asserts that I need only write one word to you to obtain for him fifty shares in the Austrian railways. If you will be kind enough to add fifty more for each extra word, the surplus will be for your ever devoted RACHEL."

There was in her character a curious mixture of genuine liberality and benevolence, and Israelitish meanness. A young author, very poor, had completed a three-act comedy in verse. He presented it to the Théâtre Français, and it was rejected. The poet was in despair, when Rachel took him on one side. "I know an Englishman who has a mania for unpublished MSS.," she said to him; "will you let him have yours for 1,000 francs?" The poet gladly consented; the actress gave him the money and kept him to dinner. A week later the MS. was magnificently bound and placed in her private library.

On one occasion she had to write a letter of thanks to the Home Minister, M. Baroche. Before sending it, she showed it to Arsene Houssaye, who advised her to recopy it, and correct some orthographical errors. "Oh, bah!" she replied, "let them stand. Thus my letter will appear all the more sincere."

Rachel was superstitious, and had an especial horror of dining thirteen at table. She herself told of such a dinner on occasion of the success of Victor Hugo's "Angelo." "What has become of the thirteen?" she asked. "Hugo and his wife at Jersey; Girardin and his wife—she is dead; Pradier is gone; Alfred de Musset, gone; Gérard de Nerval, a suicide; Count D'Orsay, dead; my sister Rebecca, dead. I alone survive." And now she, too, is gone.

CROESUS AND HIS SON.

PICTURES FROM HISTORY.

CROESUS AND HIS SON.

WHEN we speak of a man whose efforts to amass wealth have been crowned with more than the average amount of success, we are accustomed to say, "He is as rich as Croesus." When Paterfamilias, that long-suffering individual, is, at length, driven to remonstrate, under the injury of an unusual number of dressmakers' and milliners' bills, debts contracted by the ladies of his family (who nevertheless have nothing to wear), he indignantly declares that he ought to be "as rich as Croesus" to discharge such exorbitant claims; and Widow Weltum, who keeps the weekly school, at which little boys learn to read and write a little, and to suck slate-pencil a good deal, sarcastically inquires of such pupils as are late with their hebdomadal pence, whether their parents supposed that she, Widow Weltum, is "as rich as Croesus" (Croesus she pronounces it), "to be kept waiting for her money in that manner?" The saying has grown into a proverb, and a familiar one. Without disrespect to our readers, we may take it for granted that many of them have both heard and used the expression without any very definite idea as to its application.

Be it known unto all such, that Croesus was a king of Lydia, famous for his wealth and magnificence. Lydia is one of the small kingdoms into which, in old times, Asia Minor was divided. Nearly six hundred years before the birth of our Saviour did this Croesus live, and yet the fame of his wealth has kept his name from oblivion during twenty-five centuries. He must, indeed, have been a very rich king, as kings went then; but a little margin must be allowed in reading the description left us of his wealth by Herodotus, the father of history, who was fond of dealing in the marvellous. Strabo tells us of certain gold mines belonging to Croesus, who appears to have obtained the bulk of his wealth from these "diggings." The celebrated river Pactolus, of the golden sands, likewise flowed through his dominions, and gold-washing is proverbially a lucrative occupation.

Croesus, like many other rich people, became a little ostentatious, and was fond of exhibiting his riches and splendour to the admiring gaze of strangers. When Solon, one of the seven sages of Greece, came to visit him, the king displayed all his magnificence to dazzle the eyes of the philosopher, and got considerably snubbed for his pains—Solon evidently regarding the wealth of Croesus as a matter of very little moment. So caustic and severe were the remarks of the sage on this occasion, that Æsop, the fabulist, who was staying at the court of Croesus—resting himself, perhaps, after his fatiguing search for "a man"—took the visitor to task, observing, "Solon, we should either not come near princes, or speak such things as are agreeable to them." "Say, rather," replied the imperturbable Solon, "we should either not come near them, or speak such things as are good for them." Whereupon the fabulist, having for once found his man, was silent.

But Croesus would not listen to Solon's counsels, and allowed the sage to depart in disgrace. He soon found, to his cost, that there was one thing stronger even than gold, and that this strong material was cold iron. In an evil hour he engaged in a war with the Persians, and the great conqueror Cyrus was soon marching against him; and the Lydians had no chance against the discipline and valour of the troops of the Medes and Persians. Sardis, the capital, was threatened, besieged, and taken by stratagem; and then it was that the incident occurred which forms the subject of our illustration.

The victorious invaders were fighting their way along the walls of the citadel. The best and bravest of the Lydian defenders had already fallen, and Croesus himself was disputing the ground of his capital with the conquerors, foot by foot, and inch by inch. He was fighting a little in advance of his troops, being the last in the retreat, as became a king. Closely pressed by the foe, his foot suddenly slipped, and a Persian soldier swung his blood-stained sword, with a shout of triumph, over the head of the prostrate monarch. Another moment, and the career of Croesus would have terminated in a soldier's death.

But loving eyes had been watching the king, and beamed on him with the light of mingled affection and terror, as he lay prostrate on the ground, and the trooper's sword waved above him. The only surviving son of Croesus, a young man dumb from his birth, had taken part in the perils and reverses of the siege, and was fighting within a few yards of him when he fell. Horror and affright at his father's desperate position, and an intense desire to render him aid, took possession of the youth's soul. With desperate bounds he rushed forward to prevent what seemed, alas, inevitable; and, straining his throat almost to bursting with a mighty effort to articulate, "the strings of his tongue," to use the impressive language of scripture, "were loosened, and he spake plainly." "Soldier!" shouted the dumb man, "spare him! It is Croesus—it is the king!"

The evening of that day saw Croesus a prisoner in the hands of Cyrus; his boasted wealth the conqueror's spoil; his army dead around him. But he had learned that there were greater treasures than piles of silver and heaps of gold; a greater treasure in the iron energy and the strong arm that could win an empire and hold it, when won; and greater, infinitely greater treasure in the love that could conquer a terrible affliction upon which the skill of the cunning physicians of Lydia had been employed for years in vain.

Reader, if you have a loving parent, wife, or child, you may justly say you are as rich as Croesus; for you have the treasure which the Lydian monarch learned to prize, when it remained to him after his stores of gold and silver had fallen into the conqueror's hands. Prize it, wealthy reader; and never, never give away the most enduring treasure earth can give—even love that conquers all things.

THREE WEEKS WITH THE STOCK-BROKERS.

My friend Miles Plenderleath had often told me to try my luck. He said that young hands always won—that there was a Providence which watched over them, as there is in the case of poor Jack and drunken men. He added that I had only to follow his advice, and I would infallibly double my money in thirty days. As to Agua Frias, he said it was plain that they were going up; it was equally certain that West Mariposas were going down; which would I do—buy Agua Frias or sell West Mariposas?

I said I would rather buy Agua Frias—fancying, from his allusion to selling West Mariposas that he took for granted that I owned some, and not liking to confess that I didn't.

So I gave him £200, just what I realised from my share of Uncle Jotham's estate, and he, the day after, handed me a paper to the effect that Messrs. Bull, Bear, and Co., brokers, had purchased per my order, and for my account, one hundred Agua Frias at eighty odd. I didn't sleep much that night. I snoozed on going to bed, and woke up dreaming that the Agua Frias had been sold by the sheriff for taxes. Then I began to fancy that, as I owned, prospectively, a hundred shares of Agua Frias, I might be elected a director, and I knew that Messrs. Tallow, Grease, and Co., my employers, would never stand that. At times I reflected on the possible decline in the value of the stock, and I saw my £200 melting away at the rate of £20 a day, until all was gone, and Bull, Bear, and Co., were after me, furiously demanding more margin. This vision recurred so frequently, that toward morning I made up my mind to close the transaction and get back the money I had deposited. I fell asleep on this resolution.

Before I was dressed next morning, Miles was in my room.

"Doing pretty well, old boy!" said he, joyously. "Agua Frias went up a quarter last evening."

"The deuce they did!" I answered, rapidly figuring up my profits at the advance.

"Yes, sir! and they're bound to go to ninety. Mark my word!"

"Do you think so?"

I decided, on the whole, that I would not sell out as yet. I went to the shop, and read all the money articles. Flam was a fool, evidently—he sneered at Agua Frias; but Blam was great, and Cram was eloquent, positively sublime. I cannot say that I was as attentive to my duties as bookkeeper of Messrs. Tallow, Grease, and Co., as I ought to have been. I did my work mechanically and carelessly.

That day Agua Frias went up one per cent. Next morning I began to feel excited. My profits were £20, one month's salary. I went to the office as usual, but I could scarcely endure the drudgery. The idea of working hard and figuring round for £6, at Messrs. Tallow, Grease, and Co., as their clerks were in the habit of doing, seemed to me the acme of meanness when a hundred could so easily be made.

In the course of the next ten days Agua Frias rose four, five, six, and eight, consecutively. I had nearly doubled my money. Miles was, after all, a true friend, and a sagacious operator. I could, at any time I chose to realise, make in the fortnight nearly as much as my whole salary for a year. Needless to add that I paid very little attention to my duties. Several accounts which ought to have been posted were left over for several days; one, a matter of some consequence, a purchase of candle-wicks for the Society for the Enlightenment of the Andaman Islanders, I actually lost. It was subsequently found under Flam's money article. Old Tallow was snappish, and hinted that whatever happened to me, the books of the house must be properly kept. Young Grease took me aside, in his kind, friendly way, and said—

"Mr. Flat" (that's my name), "I see how it is. You must be aware that we perceive you have not been as careful of your business as usual of late. I can see at a glance that there's a lady in the case. Now, my dear boy, take my advice, and hurry it up. You're ruining yourself for business by hanging off and on. Get married at once, and we'll do the right thing about salary."

I looked very sternly at Mr. Grease, and thanked him, saying that he was mistaken; that I did not contemplate matrimony at present; and that so long as I remained in it, my situation appeared to me to be suitably salaried.

He replied, "Oh! if that is the case, very well." And I, knowing that I had made twice as much as he had within the month, felt rather exultant at having put him down.

Next day a clerk of Messrs. Bull, Bear, and Co. invited me to the office of these eminent brokers. Old Mr. Bull, a fat old gentleman, with a sleek head, received me in a very friendly manner, and observed that the stock which I had purchased through them had risen considerably since my purchase; that I could now sell out and make £200 profit; that he thought that was a great deal of money; that he understood that I was a bookkeeper in a grocery-establishment, and without venturing to give me advice, he would rather, if I chose to speculate in stocks, that I did it through some other house than theirs.

The old man spent a long while in making this speech, and took considerable pains to soften down those parts which reflected on my act; but I felt what he said none the less, and I answered promptly—

"Mr. Bull, when I want advice I will ask for it. I will close the operation you mention—(you see, I wanted him to fancy that this was only one of my operations, and a small one too)—not because you advise it, or because I think it expedient in a business point of view, but simply because I do not wish to have further dealings with your house."

Old Mr. Bull looked mightily subdued. He made a few remarks about the inevitable ruin of young men who speculate in stocks, and almost beseeched of me to stick to my employment; but I was in no humour to listen to counsel; I demanded my check rudely, got it, and left.

I had, as Miles had prophesied, doubled my money in a little over a fortnight. We dined together that evening (I paid for the dinner), and when I heard Miles talk about stocks, I could not explain to myself why he was not as rich as George Hudson, he appeared to know so much more than any one else. When I asked him the reason in a playful manner, he laughed, and said he could make all he wanted, and desired no more. He was a bachelor, he said, and forty pounds a week satisfied his modest necessities. Would I try another bottle of Chateau-Margaux?

We agreed that night to go into more stock speculations. I had a check for £400 in my pocket, and could raise £100 more. With this for my share, we could buy more Agua Frias, gold quartz crushing, and Toledo, Rock Island, Galena, Panama—and I don't know how many other stocks besides. He knew so much more than I did, that I did little else but listen, open-mouthed, to his convincing arguments, and drink the wine. The end of it was that I handed him over two checks—that of Bull, Bear, and Co., and another upon my cousin, who was my private banker, for the five hundred I had saved.

Next day I was notified that Mr. Curbstone (a liberal broker, as Miles said, not such an exacting rascal as old Bull or Bear) had bought, per my order and for my account, more stocks than I have now room to enumerate.

I sat down at Tallow, Grease, and Co.'s desk, and figured up my profits. At the rate of profit which I had made in my first venture, these last would net me £1,600. That, with what I had, would enable me to keep a fast horse, to make a few presents to Maria, and, in the spring, to go to Paris, and see life as became a gentleman. I ran out at one to see the first board; everything was up; my profits had already begun. When I returned to the office my brain was in a whirl. A pile of accounts lay on my desk to be entered. Some of them had lain there several days.

Mr. Grease came in, drew my attention to them, and left. I spent the afternoon in figuring up my profits at various rates. Toward evening, I was preparing to leave; I wished to call and see the second board before going home; old Mr. Tallow looked into the office, and, turning to Wax and Stearine's account, he exclaimed,

"Why, Mr. Flat, I don't see that last transaction with these people entered!"

"Ah!" said I, carelessly; "then I suppose I must enter it to-morrow."

"Mr. Flat, sir, that's not the way we do business, sir, I'd have you to know, sir!" and the old man's voice rose.

"Don't get into a heat, Mr. Tallow," said I, feeling no small contempt for the old man, for the whole amount of the account in question was not equal to a day's profits on a hundred shares; "the fact is, I'm tired of keeping your books."

"Mr. Jones," said he to the cashier, "draw a check for Mr. Flat's balance."

"Never mind the pence," said I, proudly.

So I left the employ of Tallow, Grease, and Co., and felt myself free to engage in the delightful and lucrative occupation into which Miles had initiated me.

Next day I was in Capel-court early. My new friend, Curbstone, introduced me to several of his friends, who were well acquainted with stocks; he told them the nature of my operations. I took a pretty high stand at first with them, not knowing their means; but we soon became familiar. They all said that I would make my fortune in a month. Bill Put, a leading authority, assured me that the West Mariposas were about to declare a half-yearly dividend of nine per cent.; he had it, confidentially, from the president. Tim Call confided to me that the Barings and the Bank of England had undertaken to lend ten millions to the Mariquita, at four per cent. interest; he had it from a director, and it might be relied upon. Jack Shyster was authorised to state that the East India Company was about to buy the Rock Island Road, taking the stock at ten per cent. premium. These facts comforted me a good deal, and though the stocks which I had bought rather declined during the day, I readily believed that the decline was what they called a "natural reaction," and dined very snugly with Put, Call, and a couple of other good fellows (who, by-the-way, obligingly let me pay the bill), at the Capel-court restaurant.

Next day stocks fell one to two per cent. I felt uneasy. I did not, however, foot up the losses against me at present prices. It could do no good. I called on Curbstone in the morning. He was radiant.

"Nothing in it, my dear fellow! All a device of the rascally bears! We'll have them on the hip presently."

What comforted me more than all this was that the Timbuctoo Mining Company, in which I had bought a hundred shares, was rapidly advancing. As Curbstone said, I was sure to make money in that, whatever happened to the other stocks.

That afternoon stocks fell heavily. I was very unhappy. I called on all my Capel-court friends, but they were all engaged. On my way home I got into conversation with the omnibus-driver, and asked him his view of the stock-market?

He confessed that he knew nothing about it, but he didn't see how then there mines could make such a profit as they said.

"Hold your tongue, you fool!" said I; and I got down and walked home.

My landlady, to whom I propounded a few questions about West Mariposas, further exasperated me by stating that the brokers were most uncivil people, and she hoped they'd all "go to smash"—and serve 'em right!

I slept little that night. Of course I called on Curbstone before he left his boarding-house. He had no doubt about the future, he said. The world could not always be deluded by the wiles of the villainous, lying, dishonest, vile, scoundrelly, thievish bears. There must come a ray of sunshine sooner or later. The only thing was to hold on—and while he was on this head, he thought it was but right that he should suggest that my margin was nearly exhausted, and could I let him have a little more money?

I promised to call on him, and went into the city. On my way I fell in with Jones, one of Curbstone's acquaintances. He, like myself, had bought stocks, and was disgusted by the fall. He held in his hand Flam's last money article, which was opposed to a rise in the stock-market; and we agreed that a more knavish, lying rogue than Flam did not exist. Jones promised to get his uncle, the paper-maker, to call on the editor of Flam's paper, and have the fellow discharged.

When I saw the Stock List that morning it took away my breath. Stocks—all my stocks—had fallen from three to five per cent. "How, in the name of all that is reasonable, did this happen?" said I to a broker.

"Why, sir, you see, that fellow Curbstone, and his friends, went in to hammer down the market, and had it all their own way. Great operator, Curbstone!"

"But he's the very man who persuaded me to buy."

"Ah! very likely; you should have got out in time. He turns like an eel; you never know where to find him. A great operator, Curbstone. Good-morning!"

I hurried, furious, to Curbstone's office. As I entered, a clerk handed me a note. It stated, in brief, that Mr. Curbstone had closed all my contracts, for want of more margin, and that the transaction left me in his debt in the sum of £95, which he desired me to pay forthwith. I was overwhelmed.

But one hope was left. The shares in the Timbuctoo Mining Company had risen that very morning four per cent. My profit on these would at least enable me to pay my debts. I hastened to the office of old Scallywag, who had bought them for me.

"Sir," said he, when he saw me, "this is a hard dispensation. Providence punishes us cruelly at times."

"What do you mean?"

"The fall in stocks, of course. My dear young friend, you are young and elastic; misfortunes glide off from you—glance, I may say, like a musket-ball on the ice. But an old man like me—oh! Providence is very hard!" And the old man put his hand to his eyes.

I was somewhat touched by the old gentleman's sympathy for me, and added, more cheerily than I had thought I could, "At all events, Mr. Scallywag, our Timbuctoo is all right. There is a balance in my favour of some six per cent., and I will thank you to realise it."

"Poor young man!"

"Can you let me have a check?"

"Why!" he answered, sharply, "haven't you heard?"

"No. What?"

"I failed this morning."

How I got home I know not. I remember looking at Mrs. Scallywag's carriage, and wondering what part of it, or of the horses, or of the lady, my £100 had paid for. In the course of the evening, in the depth of my agony, I told my story to my landlady, who gave me notice that at the end of the week my room would be wanted.

I am now living in a wretched little attic in Tottenham Court Road. I have no employment. Old Tallow declines to reinstate me, of course. Grease lent me £2 to go on with, he says. If any of you will employ me, at even £1 a week, pray send word to the editor of this journal, and you may rely upon it that you will not catch me stock-gambling again—so long, at all events, as I continue sane.

The Matron.

NO. XXII.

THOSE who would rather be unprepared for misfortunes than give a thought to unpleasant events, will have disapproved of the two last chapters of the MATRON. But I believe sensible people will thank me for giving them hints how to act in times of terror and difficulty. I am not more partial to horrors than other people, but as accidents and illnesses will occur, it is well to be prepared for them. After advising a mother what she had best do in case a dear child should be brought home to her apparently drowned, I intend to return (as requested) to the subject of cheap dinners, &c. Afterwards I propose suggesting to my readers how they may get the most for their money in the purchase of clothes; and how, by judicious mending, they may, in the words of the immortal Burns—

"Make auld clothes look Amaist as gude as new."

But I must first turn to the poor mother, who, after long and torturing suspense, has all her fears confirmed—and, accompanied by a gaping, curious crowd, beholds the livid, motionless body of her son brought back to her.

I now address the mother. First of all, send without delay for medical assistance; but, in the meantime, do not lose one moment. Take off every article of the child's wet clothing, and place him in a warm bed between the blankets, with the head gently raised. Place bottles filled with very warm (but, of course, not dangerously hot) water to the arm-pits, the soles of the feet, and between the thighs. In rubbing the surface of the body (which should be done with hardly any intermission), have a warm worsted stocking on your hand. By this means more irritation is occasioned, and returning circulation better promoted. But do everything gently. Clear away all froth and mucus from the nose and the mouth. Put the pipe of a common bellows in one nostril, remembering to close the other, and also the mouth at the same time, softly drawing downward, and pushing gently backward the upper part of the windpipe, with the object of allowing a more free admission of air. Then blow the bellows gently, in order to inflate the lungs, till the chest be raised a little. At this moment set the mouth and nostrils free, and gently press the chest. Repeat this until you perceive symptoms of life. Then apply smelling-salts to the nose, and, as a medicine, give a little warm wine and water, but gradually, as the powers of swallowing are still very weak.

In former times a horrid practice existed of rolling on casks persons apparently drowned. This was done with the idea that the body might be thus emptied of water, but it was a process more likely to extinguish than revive the spark of man's existence! for the heart, overloaded with blood, would probably burst through such a proceeding.

Not long ago there appeared in an influential journal, a letter recommending, in cases of suspended animation from immersion in water, the placing the person on the chest, and gently rocking him a little from side to side, as you might a barrel, the half of which you were cleaning with a little water. The movement produced by this rocking was thought to restore the action of the lungs. But the friction, &c., &c., in the plan of treatment recommended above, is one that may safely be relied on. The remedies should be continued for at least twelve hours, unless, in the meantime, recovery has taken place. Then warmth, quiet, restoratives, with continued medical supervision, and constant watching will alone be necessary.

Other dangers attendant on this fine summer season are the accidents that so frequently happen in excursions by land. Recollect that jumping out of any carriage in motion is very dangerous; because, the vehicle having communicated to your body a different movement to that you give yourself by jumping, you are very likely to come down on your head. However, if you are driving out, and see no chance of safety but in leaving the vehicle, get out from behind; but, generally speaking, the safest course is to remain quietly seated.

If overtaken by a storm of thunder and lightning, avoid trees. If the storm visits you when you are at home, avoid being seated in a draught. According to the advice of a learned lecturer I heard at the Panopticon, a feather-bed is the best thing to be on in a violent storm. Dr. Franklin's advice to persons in fear of lightning is, that they should sit in the middle of the room, not under a metal lustre or any other conductor; and that they should place their feet on another chair. He adds that it would be still safer to place two or three beds or mattresses in the middle of a room, and place the chairs upon them. If, in spite of all these precautions, any person should be struck by the lightning, the best way is to throw water upon him immediately. This plan restores lightning-struck persons who are apparently dead.

Must I add to the dangers of the summer the temptation of being urged by thirst to indulge too freely in strong drink? Alas! to the poor wife, the husband, who is brought home senseless from the effects of liquor, is almost as alarming a sight as her beloved son, pale, breathless, and dripping from the river.

Her first care must be to raise her intoxicated husband's head. She must see that he does not get a chill; and she must keep the surface of his skin warm. As soon as he is capable of swallowing, she should induce him to take a mustard emetic.

One more danger that summer brings with it (and it concludes this chapter of accidents) is a "coup de soleil," or sun-stroke. Treat for this as you would for the effects of lightning, that is, throw some cold water over the person struck.

Small Change.

AN avaricious man is like a sandy desert, that sucks in all the rain, but yields no fruitful herbs to the inhabitants.

LONGFELLOW, in his beautiful story of "Kavanagh," calls Sunday "the golden clasp which binds together the volume of the week." A pretty idea.

AN advertisement in a provincial paper states that an active servant is wanted, "who must be a plain cook and able to dress a little boy five years old." Are the advertisers cannibals? And (we ask only for information), with what sauce do they eat little boys five years old?

AN author, complaining of the injustice of the press in condemning his new tragedy, said the censures were unjust, for the audience did not hiss it. "No," replied the friend, "how could they yawn and hiss together?"

A COUPLE of Belgian giants are now in the city for the purpose of exhibition. They are so long, that it takes two days to exhibit them.

MAN'S riches are to be estimated rather by the fewness of his wants than the greatness of his possessions.

"PRAY, Mr. Professor, what is a periphrasis?" "Madam, it is simply a circumlocutory cycle of oratorical sonority, circumscribing an atom of ideality, lost in a verbal profundity." "Thank you, sir."

A FAVOURITE mode of introduction in Brazil is said to be: "This is my friend; if he steals anything from you, I am responsible for it."

SOME one says, that "human heads are like hogs-heads—the less they contain, the louder the report they give of themselves. The smaller the calibre of the mind, the greater the bore of a perpetually open mouth."

THERE have been many definitions of a gentleman, but the prettiest and most poetic is that given by a lady: "A gentleman is a human being combining a woman's tenderness and a man's courage."

COMPLIMENTS may be offered in all sincerity, and yet have a very equivocal sound, as in the case of the city knight unable to aspirate the letter H, who, being deputed to address William III., exclaimed, "Future ages, recording your Majesty's exploits, will pronounce you to have been a Nero."

The following advertisement appeared in an Irish paper:—"Whereas, John Hall has fraudulently taken away several articles of wearing apparel without my knowledge; this is therefore to inform him that if he does not forthwith return the same, his name shall be made public."

"MAY it please your honour," said a lawyer, recently, addressing one of the bench, "I brought the prisoner here on a habeas corpus." "That's a good one!" said a fellow in an under tone, who stood in the rear of the court, "I'm blowed if I haint seen him come here in a cab."

WE are sent to the ant to learn industry; to the dove to learn innocence; to the serpent to learn wisdom; and why not go to the robin redbreast, who chants as cheerfully in winter as in summer, to learn equanimity and patience?

A HIBERNIAN had come far to see Niagara, and while he gazed upon it, a friend asked him if it was not the most wonderful thing he had ever seen; to which he replied, "Never a bit, man—never a bit. Sure, it's no wonder at all that the wather should fall down there, for I'd like to know what could hinder it!"

Chess.

Problem No. 43. By Mr. WILLIAM GREENWOOD.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in four moves.

Problem No. 44. By F. G. RAINGER, Esq.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in four moves.

W. COATES.—The Problem submitted by you is not quite up to the mark. We are gratified at your expressions of good will towards our Journal.

VITE.—Your Problem shall be submitted to the Juveniles.

MONA.—You are correct as regards Enigma No. 13; the Kt should have been placed on the Bishop's instead of the Knight's square.

GRAPES.—Your solution of Problem No. 10 is perfectly sound.

FLUKE.—Problem No. 35 cannot be solved as you suggest. The black Pawn which stands on K 3 would be defended by the Rook.

DOMINGUEZ.—P to K 4 would be the proper defence to your first move in Problem No. 34. The price of the work to which you refer is 5s.

ROBERT BURNS.—You cannot do better than peruse the Chess Lessons which appeared in the earlier numbers of the Old Series of the FAMILY PAPER.

ROOK.—You cannot, as in draughts, take more than one piece at a time.

J. KYLE.—If, in Problem No. 35, Q checks at Q Kt 7, Black replies with K takes R. Where then is the mate?

R. D.—You did wrong to advance your K B P at the 14th move. Kt to Q B 6 would have prevented your adversary from Castling.

Solutions of Problems by F. G. Rainger, Nos. 34, 35, and 36; Fluke, No. 33; D. W. O. (Sligo), No. 32; R. T. (Southport), No. 33; Grapes, Nos. 34 and 35; W. Coates, Nos. 31 and 32; W. Dale, Nos. 29 and 30; W. McKenzie, Nos. 30, 31, 32, and 33; and Enigmas Nos. 11 and 12; Ars-sur-Moselle, Nos. 31 and 32; and Enigma No. 12; Grapes, Nos. 10 and 33; Mona, Nos. 28, 29, 30, 31, and 32; and Enigmas Nos. 11 and 12; G. D., Nos. 30 and 31; Dominguez, No. 35; J. Russell, Nos. 34 and 35; M. A. R., Nos. 34 and 35; Oxon, Nos. 33, 34, and 35; R. Hunter, Nos. 33 and 34; E. Grant, No. 34; Caisse Amicus, Nos. 33, 34, and 35; and Enigma No. 12; D. W. S., No. 35; D. White, No. 35, and Enigmas Nos. 11 and 12, correct.

* Owing to the great increase in the number of our Chess correspondents, it is sometimes difficult to find room for answers to all their communications, but they may rest assured that each will receive attention in due course.

Our Editorial Table.

REBECCA MARY.—The children of your father's first cousin are your second cousins.

H. O. DORSET.—You must suit your conversation to the tastes and disposition of the young lady you are addressing. We cannot furnish you with subjects that will please all. With regard to your second question, we can only say that there have been very celebrated beauties in both styles. We recommend a letter as the means of making a proposal of marriage, and we think it advisable that the gentleman should be five years older than the lady.

LIZZIE.—You should frequently snip the ends of your hair, to prevent its splitting. Where cockroaches abound, a light should be kept burning, as it tends to scare them. If this does not succeed, you must consult a vermin-destroyer.

AN ADMIRER OF DR. JOHNSON.—Abyssinia, the scene of the great Dr. Johnson's beautiful and imaginative tale of "Rasselas," is a very ancient kingdom in Upper Ethiopia.

A SUBSCRIBER.—We consider the hair forwarded for our inspection is rather pretty than otherwise. By candle-light it is almost golden; by daylight it is of an undecided colour.

ESTHER.—It is quite true that when it is said Rome conquered the world, our own "tight little island" is included in the conquests. Agricola was the general who finally established Roman rule in Britain.

ALICE MARY.—"Alice Mary," who is very clever in fancy works, should advertise, stating her qualifications. She might very likely find purchasers for the articles she has made, in ladies keeping stalls at charity bazaars. Many remedies have been already given for flushed faces.

VAN VOORST.—We can easily understand your being proud of Rotterdam; but when you ask what there is in the South to equal it? we beg to remind you of Venice, built on seventy-two little islands, and of the canals of Venice, with nearly five hundred bridges over them.

LEMON BLOSSOM, FLORENCE MORINA, A CONSTANT READER.—We strongly advise "Lemon Blossom" to have nothing more to say to her faithless lover. It is well for her she has found out her suitor's real character before marriage. She would indeed be imprudent if she now put herself into the power of a man she knows to be heartless. "Florence Morina's" case is similar to "Lemon Blossom's"; but, as "Florence" has other suitors, she had better turn her thoughts to the selection of the worthiest among them. We trust she will be enabled to do this without any great effort; for, in the heart of a sensible woman, love never long survives esteem. "A Constant Reader" has only one honourable course—that of remaining faithful to her engagement.

J. D., TRIA JUNCTA IN UNO, DOUBTFUL.—These three gentlemen are all paying attentions to two ladies at the same time, and they seem to think that we can advise them how to avert the evils that generally result from indecision. Our opinion is, that neither "J. D.," "Tria Juncta in Uno," nor "Doubtful" know anything about love. Where this passion exists there is no doubt as to the object that inspires it. We recommend these gentlemen to lose no more time in courting any of the ladies of whom they speak, but to return heart and soul to their business, and not to get into a scrape without having even love to plead for an excuse.

JACK MANDERS, A. G. W., C. T.—The manner to cultivate and to maintain friendly relations with young ladies has been treated of at large in a recent number, and many directions have been given on the management of the hair. "C. T." should make his offer in an eloquent and pathetic letter.

B. M.—It does not seem, from your communication, that the lady ever professed any attachment for you. Recently she has acknowledged her indifference, and

"Too late for redress, but too soon for your ease,

You saw her, you loved her, and wished you could please.

And now, with regret, and deep anguish you find

Words and looks were but civil that once you thought kind."

Your case, though sad, is a very common one; but, at any rate, you have not been deceived, and you should not talk of "giving up" that which you never possessed; and do not forget, that if the lady who captivated you should marry another gentleman to-morrow, you are still her debtor, since she was the means of inducing you to attend a place of worship. If you continue to be steady, you may be sure of soon finding some lady to listen to you.

OSCAR.—The ring given you by the lady would have the most elegant and gentlemanly effect on the little finger of the right hand.

LEILA.—A pale complexion does not necessarily indicate ill-health, and a flat chest is preferable to what is generally called a pigeon-chest. Of course, when we say preferable, we allude to the conformation most favourable to strength.

MAY LILY.—There is something peculiar in your communication. You are engaged to a respectable young man, who is much attached to you, and yet you are demurring as to whether or not you shall encourage another lover. Let your indecision cease. You must break entirely with the man who is willing to marry you immediately, before you can in honour give a thought to his rival. But do not attempt anything rashly. Recollect that this rival cannot marry you till after the death of his parents. How does he know that he will outlive his parents? His forming any plans with reference to the death of those who should be so dear to him, shows great want of proper feeling, and we advise you to banish the remembrance of him from your heart, and to keep true to your present engagement.

W. JAMES.—Use warm water and yellow soap night and morning.

PATERFAMILIAS.—1. The volumes of our New Series will be issued half-yearly. 2. Very good Sunday reading may be found in a work entitled "The Great Sermons of the Great Preachers," published by Ward and Lock, 153, Fleet-street, London, in sixpenny monthly parts, and in two volumes price 4s. each, or in one volume complete, price 7s. 6d.

YOUNG BOB.—Mr. Rarey, the celebrated horse tamer, is a native of Columbus, Ohio. The use of drugs or chemicals in the process of taming is positively denied on the best possible authority.

A POOR BUT CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER wishes to know how many churches there are in England bearing the name of St. Luke. Can any of our correspondents inform him?

FILIUS.—Your question has been solved again and again.

D. W. DARWIN.—Consult the last census.

VIATOR.—We have already furnished several articles on photography.

D. HAYWARD.—How can we possibly divine who has sent you a photographic likeness, when you yourself have no clue?

ANCIENT COINS.—The coins you name are not particularly valuable.

EAST INDIA COMPANY.—Apply at the India House, Leaden-hall-street.

CAIRBREE.—The "Child's Educator" may be had in twelve parts, 6d. each, or complete, bound in cloth, price 8s. The Almanacks, with the exception of that of the present year, are out of print.

J. EVANS.—Apply at the Horse Guards.

A LEARNER.—Pro rata means "in proportion;" it is a term sometimes employed by merchants, intimating that each person must reap the profit or sustain the loss pro rata to his interest, that is, in proportion to his stock. Pro re nata means "according to exigencies or circumstances." Pro re nata meeting, or proceeding, is a proceeding taken, or a meeting called, on the emergence of some occurrence or circumstance requiring it.

ONE WHO TRIES TO IMPROVE.—You ask, "What is the reason that the Bible is not translated into the intelligible English language now in use? It would then be much better understood by the poorer class." Your question, and the subsequent remarks, surprise us. The opinion of competent judges is, that the present translation is a model specimen of pure English; and as to its not being understood by the poor, there are hundreds of thousands, and even children of very tender age, who perfectly understand every portion of it, so far as regards their conduct through life, and their preparations for a happy eternity.

ZUMAS.—We cannot tell you "how to bottle porter so as to give it a head."

H. BROOKS.—The translation is, "Never despair while you are under the divine protection."

CHARLES VAVASSEUR.—To prepare chlorine, mix together in a glass flask, or retort, strong muriatic acid with half of its weight of finely powdered peroxide of manganese. Chlorine gas is immediately evolved, even in the cold, but much more rapidly on the application of a gentle heat. A cheaper method is to pour sulphuric acid, diluted with water, upon a mixture of common salt and biniodide of manganese previously placed in a retort.

J. MONRO.—Advertise in a daily newspaper.

WHITE EBONY.—You must first get your cocoa-nut shells turned by a turner; they may then be polished with French polish; but, as they present but a dull and uninteresting appearance, the best plan is to have them carved.

ALPHA MORLEY.—Study carefully the lessons in French now publishing weekly in our Journal. You will not require any books at present.

C. NAILOR.—The latitude of Manchester is 53° 27' north; longitude 2° 10' west.

J. C. B.—The celebrated cornet-à-piston player's name is pronounced Ke-nig.

CIVIS.—The present population of London is about 2,422,000; that of Manchester, 345,986.

ONE ABOUT TO EMIGRATE.—The most effectual preventive for sea-sickness is the horizontal position. Where there is much pain, a few drops of laudanum may be taken with advantage, or an opium plaster may be applied over the region of the stomach. A little warm weak drink, to which one or two drops of creosote have been added, is said to prevent any disposition to sickness, provided excess in eating and drinking is at the same time avoided.

A RAILWAY PORTER.—We do not write to decide wagers. The plural, certainly, should have been employed, though the singular is very frequently used, in similar circumstances, by the best writers.

H. MASON.—The first volume of our New Series will have been completed and published before this meets your eye.

DELTA.—Apply for a license to the Inland Revenue Office. FRED WHARTON.—We decline furnishing you with "a receipt for a sleeping powder which shall produce a VERY sound sleep, and be immediate in its effects."

A LOVER OF LIBERTY.—The trial of Dr. Bernard produced a good deal of excitement, but you are mistaken in supposing it the most interesting one within the last hundred years. There was the trial of Queen Caroline in the early part of this century, and that of Warren Hastings, Governor of India, which took place towards the close of the last century. In the first the wife of George IV. was tried for her life on the charge of infidelity to her husband. She was acquitted, as was also Warren Hastings, accused of misgovernment and of cruelty to the natives of India. The chief instigator of bringing Hastings to trial was the renowned Irish orator, Edmund Burke. The epigram written on the occasion is so pointed that it may please our readers:—

"I've often wondered that on Irish ground
No venomous reptile ever could be found;
But nature, willing to perform her work,
Sav'd all her venom to complete a Burke."

A CORRESPONDENT.—We do not recommend soft soap as a substitute for those soaps generally used by ladies, but if you refer to the "Matron" of May the 15th, you will find information given about the use to which soft soap should be applied.

CART.—We decline directing people how to make themselves pale; we would rather assist them to become rosy and healthy. All that relates to flushes, unbecoming redness of the face, pimples, &c., has recently been treated of in this Paper.

ADA.—The Pyrenees, like the Alps, are in parts covered with perpetual snow; therefore in your journey you will see some of the beautiful effects of Swiss scenery.

MINNIE.—Our "Chemical Experiments" are original. They are especially prepared by an eminent chemist.

BESSIE L.—We advise you to use prepared chalk as a tooth-powder. We think it much better for preserving the teeth than carbonate of soda. But whatever you use as a tooth-powder, beware of brushing the teeth with too hard a brush. The enamel is more delicate than you suppose.

FOWLER, JAMES, L. SMITH, TOM, L. Y.—Do not give way to grief; your trials, though not uncommon, are, we own, great, but patience and presence of mind can cope with great misfortunes and imminent peril. You should read the lives of those who have seen adversity, particularly peruse the biography of travellers both by land and water. We will just give you an instance of what can be done by resolution under the most frightful circumstances—a ship on fire. The ship was the Boyne, a first-rate man-of-war. When the dreadful conflagration happened, a marine (with a wife and child), finding no other means of escape, took a sheep from the pens, and bracing his infant son on the animal's back, dropped them into the sea. "There," said he, "turn to the land, and God be with you." Encouraged by her husband's resolution, his wife leaped into the sea, and the husband followed her, holding her above water till a boat came to their relief. The sheep with the greatest steadiness made for the shore, and safely landed his young charge.

A FRENCHMAN.—A Frenchman "who has been several years in England," should have known by this time that there are some French syllables that cannot be rendered to a nicety by English ones. In the admirable course of "French Lessons" now published in the FAMILY PAPER, the pupil is furnished with rules that enable him to speak and read French correctly, even though he may never have heard a word from French lips. Should he, after going through the course of lessons above-mentioned, mix with the natives, he will easily acquire those little refinements which written directions cannot give in all their perfection. The "French Lessons" convey good instruction in general grammar. On this account we recommend them to the attention of "A Frenchman." By studying them he may learn to avoid repeating the error he has committed, viz., that of continuing in the first person a communication begun in the third.

MRS. GRUNDY.—"Mrs. Grundy" is informed that, in the major scale, the semitones are from the third to the fourth degree and from the seventh to the eighth. In the minor (on the contrary) the first semitone is, in ascending and descending, from the second to the third degree. The second semitone varies: it is, in ascending, between the seventh and eighth, and, in descending, between the sixth and fifth degrees.

A NOVEL QUIRIST.—For a cheap bandoline, put half a teaspoonful of pure gum arabic into a phial nearly full of cold water. Let it stand for a day. Stir it up with a knitting-needle. Scent with two drops of attar of roses, and it will be fit for use. A receipt for a curling-fluid has been already given. Questions respecting writing are answered en masse.

ADA WILTON.—The name Harriette is supposed to be derived from "arriette," the Italian for "a little air." Anne, or Anna, is a Scripture name. Young ladies of your age should be thinking of improving themselves, not of procuring admirers. You, in particular, should devote yourself to your education, as you are evidently backward.

A PUPIL TEACHER.—Many people are in your predicament, and find great difficulty in impressing dates and numbers on their memory. We advise you to have recourse to "Memoria Technica," which consists in assigning a letter to a number, and, consequently, a syllable to a collection of numbers.

AGENSOR.—If a gentleman goes to dine at a friend's house, he leaves his hat and stick in the hall; if he goes merely to pay a visit, he takes them up with him into the drawing-room.

FILLY GRAY.—The husband is liable for the wife's debts contracted before marriage. As to your husband, of course he can be summonsed. The case would be tried before a magistrate, who would decide for or against the plaintiff.

FRITZ.—We cannot insure the success of any remedy, for some people are so liable to sickness, that even riding in a carriage makes them feel uncomfortable. Perhaps for such persons there is no effectual cure for sea-sickness, but we believe, in a general way, keeping to the following rules will tend to avert it. Mind you do not go hungry on board, nor when there begin eating fat, indigestible substances. Avoid chilling your stomach by keeping your mouth open, uttering useless exclamations. Fix your eyes on something level with your sight, and particularly avoid seizing hold of any part of the vessel. A contemporary recommends a traveller to have good, well-made gingerbread in his pocket, and to eat a small portion of it now and then, in order to keep the stomach and throat warm—a very important point, and one which we consider more safely and certainly attained than by taking spirits. Avoid eating eggs on board. Of course, if your voyage is a long one, you need not be so very careful when you have acquired what sailors call your sea-legs.

SHIZA SOON.—Your own resolution must cure you of the habit of frowning; but a wet cloth applied to the forehead at night, and bound round the head while sleeping, is thought to prevent the formation of wrinkles.

A Bad Writer, J. E. P., Bernard, R. H., R. B.—e, Jonathan, A. Constant Reader, Typo, A. Prentice, J. S. R. S., Small Change, A. Subscriber (Beverley), and several other correspondents, ask us to recommend the best works on a great variety of subjects. In most instances we decline, for the simple reason, that there are so many rival claims. Were we to recommend a book written or published by Mr. A., Mr. B. would immediately assert his claim to notice, if not to preference. Comparisons would be instituted; and, as Mrs. Malaprop observes, "Comparisons are odorous."

* * We cannot guarantee the return of rejected manuscripts.

All Letters and Communications for the Editor to be addressed to JOHN CASSELL, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

London: Printed and published for JOHN CASSELL by PETTER and GALPIN, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

[THE RIGHT OF TRANSLATION AND REPUBLICATION IS RESERVED.]

NEW SERIES. VOL. II.—No. 28.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 12, 1858.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER LV.

Confidence is a chain, whose golden bands
Unite two hearts in one. Break but a link,
And they are severed, ne'er to join again—
Wide as the poles asunder. OLD PLAY.

On their way to Lady Bell's, Mr. Chutnee ventured more than once to remind his wife of the promise she had made, of proving, even to his satisfaction, that his jealousy had been groundless.

"Patience," answered the lady, calmly; "the proof may arrive too soon."

"Impossible!" ejaculated the aged husband.

"You forget the price," observed Zamora.

"It shall be freely paid," answered the merchant, with a smile. "It would take more than one caprice to shake my fortune."

On arriving at the house of Sir Charles, they found the drawing-room, as usual, crowded by the belles and beaux of Calcutta, for it was her ladyship's reception night.

Whilst the gentleman was paying his compliments to Lady Bell, Lillian, who had been struck by the unusual paleness of his wife, glided to her side, and, twining her arm in hers, led her to the balcony.

From the balcony they descended to the garden.

"You are suffering," observed the orphan, affectionately, at the same time offering Zamora a small crystal flask of perfumes.

"Not in body," answered her friend, "but in mind—in heart."

Her companion heard the reply with astonishment.

"You," she exclaimed, "whom all deem so happy!"

"I might have been, but Herbert's jealousy destroys my peace of mind. I cannot smile but he imagines I am thinking of another, or look melancholy but he accuses me of regretting that I ever consented to be his. He has no confidence in me," she added, "and that renders my task more bitter."

"Bitter!" repeated Lillian, in a tone of painful surprise: "I thought you loved him."

"I did, as you love Sir Charles—like a father. I was a child—a mere infant—when he asked me to become his wife. Had he asked me for the life-blood of my heart I should have given it him; and so we married."

"Poor Zamora!"

"Oh! I was not unhappy, for at first he surrounded me with flowers, music, pictures—all that renders life intellectual and beautiful; gave me jewels—I never cared for them—and appeared so happy that I felt happy too."

"And will again. Herbert will soon see the folly, the injustice of his suspicions," observed Lillian.

THE EXPLANATION: JEALOUSY REPROVED

"It does not follow because he is old that you should not love him."

"No, it does not exactly follow."

"Look at Lady Bell and my kind guardian," added Lilly; "he is old enough to be her father."

"True."

"And they are happy."

"Because he never doubted her."

"Jealousy must be a dreadful feeling," observed our heroine. "I wonder what it is like."

Zamora looked at her mournfully.

"I hope I shall never feel it."

"Heaven forbid you ever should!" exclaimed her friend, in a deeply agitated tone, and at the same time kissing her. "It must be something dreadful, to inspire the cruel, unjust thoughts my husband entertains."

"Oh, you must laugh him out of them," replied the fair girl, cheerfully. "What temper in the world could resist your smiles?"

"You flatter me."

"Ask Richard if I do," continued the former speaker. "He told me," she added, with artless innocence, "that when he first beheld you he thought you the most beautiful woman he had ever seen."

Zamora blushed deeply, and cast her eyes upon the ground.

"You must not be angry with him."

"I am not angry," murmured the wife of Mr. Chutnee.

"Remember, it was told to me in confidence; only I have no secrets from you," continued the orphan. "He never imagined, poor fellow, that I should turn traitress and repeat every word he said. You must not betray me."

"Never!"

The word was most emphatically uttered.

"And when we are married," exclaimed the artless girl, "if Herbert should act unkindly and tease you, you shall come and stay with us till he has recovered his good humour, and you feel disposed to forgive him. I have no patience," she added, passing her arms round the waist of her friend; "jealous of you! Why, as Richard says, you have only to present yourself with that innocent face and look of purity at the gates of Paradise, and the angels who guard the entrance would roll them back upon their golden hinges with a smile, and let you in without a question."

"Did Mr. Tyrrell say this?" demanded her hearer, greatly agitated.

"Yes; but why do you call him Mr. Tyrrell?"

"It was no common praise," murmured Mrs. Chutnee to herself; "and I must study to deserve it. I will deserve it."

With a sudden effort, she threw off the sadness which appeared to weigh her spirits down, broke out into a musical, joyous laugh, and kissed her companion several times.

"What an ungrateful thing you must esteem me, Lilly," she exclaimed, "to annoy you with my complainings, at a moment you are so happy, too. I did not think that I had been so selfish; but you know what an impulsive creature I am. The thought of my heart rises at once to my lips; and, like a giddy bird, rests there only for an instant before it is uttered. I never could dissemble."

"Heaven forbid you ever should."

"At least, not with those I love," added the lady, correcting herself. "As for the world, we are compelled, especially when married, to act a part in it—to smile when our hearts are heavy—simply because our lord and master—man—either cannot, or will not understand us."

"Is Herbert so exceedingly unreasonable?" demanded Lillian, archly.

"Fearfully."

"Why not consult Lady Bell?"

"She would only laugh at me: she is happy."

"I, too, am happy," observed Lilly, "and yet I do not laugh at you."

"You are too good to do so."

"Time will cure your husband of his foolish conduct."

"Never!" exclaimed Mrs. Chutnee; "and that is the great source of my uneasiness. Would you believe it, he was jealous because I accompanied Richard—there, I have not called him Mr. Tyrrell this time—to the ball at the government house?"

"How absurd!" replied the maiden, laughing and clapping her hands like one who felt greatly amused at the idea; "why, you had previously written to ask me to dance with him."

"Had I not?"

"And like a dear, true friend, said more flattering things of me than I ever can deserve," added Lillian, for her lover had told her all.

"My husband has even hinted that I wished his death."

"How wicked! but I can understand him. You are so much younger than himself, that he fears his beautiful widow might very soon forget her weeds."

"I shall never live to be a widow," replied the lady; "for if I should, most certainly never be a wife again, but change to a devotee or coquette. I have not exactly made up my mind which."

The escape of the speakers from the drawing-room to the garden, although rapidly executed, had not been unobserved, for Mr. Chutnee and our hero had perceived the movement, and took the first occasion to follow them.

The merchant, however, being the more experienced tactician of the two, contrived to arrive first.

His wife's description had in no one point exaggerated the state of her husband's feelings. He was jealous—foolishly jealous—not only of our hero, but of every man younger than himself.

Seeing that she was alone with Lillian, and her countenance flushed with excitement, he guessed that Zamora had been complaining of his suspicions.

"The guilty do not complain," he thought; "perhaps I am wrong," and a better feeling came over him. The serpent, for an instant, was laid at rest.

"I don't think I ought to shake hands with you," exclaimed Lilly, only half extending her own towards him, as he made his appearance in the garden.

"And why not?"

"Because I find my dear, kind friend out of spirits."

"Are you certain that is my fault?"

"Of course I am; whose else could it be? She never used to be dull till you took all kinds of ridiculous and whimsical crochets into your head. Besides, you have placed me in a very awkward position for a young lady."

"You!" repeated the astonished merchant.

"Yes, me. You have compelled me to tell you what you have no right to learn, and what it is very wrong you should learn before it is properly announced."

"I have promised him that he should be satisfied," observed Zamora, "at any sacrifice."

The curiosity of her husband was roused, and he entreated an explanation.

"You must not receive it in that position, then," replied Lillian, blushing.

"How, then?"

"Upon your knees. Do you hesitate? Oh, very well, sir. Now, I shall not tell you. Let us join Lady Bell."

This was addressed to Mrs. Chutnee, who took her arm.

"Stay! stay! There, I obey. I am upon my knees!" exclaimed the gentleman, suiting the action to his words; "and now that I am there, tell me what sin I have ignorantly committed?"

"Pained me very much."

"But how?"

"By placing me in an embarrassing situation."

"I can't understand."

"Is it not an embarrassing one," said the fair girl, poutingly, "when you force me to confess that—that—that—"

"In heaven's name, what?"

"That I am engaged to be married to Mr. Tyrrell."

The jealous husband started to his feet as if a load had been suddenly removed from his heart.

"And with the consent of Sir Charles?"

"Of course. Richard would never have thought of me but for my kind friend Zamora, who told him I had more virtues than any woman except herself and Lady Bell ever boasted of; and persuaded him—kind creature, you will say, no doubt—that I was almost as beautiful as herself. Before I had ever even seen him," added the speaker, "she had written to engage me to dance with him at the ball at the government house."

"Fool!" murmured the penitent husband; "fool!"

"Well," said our heroine, "the word is rather a harsh one; but don't merit it for the future, and, above all, no saucy looks. If you betray my secret, I shall be compelled, in self-defence, to say why I confessed it, and you may guess which of us will be the most laughed at then."

So saying, she bounded from the pathway, leaving Herbert Chutnee and his wife by themselves.

For several moments the repentant man stood silent and abashed before the youthful creature whose inexperience he had betrayed into a disproportionate marriage. Suspicion had given place to confidence, and he felt, perhaps, how deeply he had sinned.

"Can you forgive me, Zamora?" he stammered.

"I can pardon any one who asks me," replied the lady, coldly.

He advanced, and would have taken her hand.

"But not restore my confidence," she added.

"That, once broken, can never be reunited, You were unwise to destroy it, for it was the surest safeguard of my feelings and conduct. Whilst I could look up to you with reverence and affection, both were safe."

"And now?"

"You have set my heart a-dreaming," exclaimed Zamora, passionately; "and I ask what might have been my fate if I had united it with one of my own age, whose pleasures would have been mine, whose pursuits the same; who, confident in his own truth and honour, had never insulted me by a suspicion of mine. You are astonished to hear me speak thus," she continued, "but I am no longer a child; suffering has made me a woman. Had you acted as you ought to have done, I should have remained a child still."

"Hear me, Zamora. I can again—"

"Make no rash promises, for they are changeable as the winds—unstable as water, and will be broken as soon as made. It needs but for some brainless puppy to pay a compliment to your wife—cause her to smile by his fatuity, perhaps—to till your heart with jealous pangs again. I dare not trust you."

"Yet hear me."

"I will not trust you," added the girl-like creature, in a tone of resolution, which startled him. "You have shown me my destiny, and I submit to it; for the future, a life of care, every word to be weighed before my lips pronounce it, every look guarded lest you should take offence. Would I had known it sooner."

"Zamora!" exclaimed her husband, "these cruel words inflict a deeper pang than all I have yet endured. You know I live but in your smiles, that my soul is so devotedly yours; I know no other existence. Listen to me!"

"I am listening."

"I have not long to live, for I am old; I blame myself when I reflect how much older than yourself. I am rich; make but my few remaining years happy, and all that I possess shall be yours."

Mrs. Chutnee smiled disdainfully.

"You know not yet what wealth can purchase."

"Too painfully," she answered, with a shudder.

"You will drive me mad."

"You have made me wretched."

"Is there no hope?"

"None," replied Zamora. "Henceforth I shall be to you only as a daughter, for you have broken all other ties between us; but, like a daughter who knows her duty, I will consult your pleasure in everything. I give up society—I never cared for its flatteries and pleasures—renounce the companionship of all but my own sad thoughts: I cannot, if I would, divorce myself from them. The poor bird you have limed will remain a prisoner in its gilded cage. If its song is hushed, you have only yourself to blame."

"Zamora!" cried Mr. Chutnee, greatly agitated, "this is cruelty to yourself—to me,—the very refinement of an angry woman's vengeance."

"And yet I am not angry," observed his wife, calmly.

"Can I endure the torture of seeing you wither in solitude, and know that my love has fallen like a blight upon your happiness?"

"Not your love, but your jealousy."

"By heavens," he added, "I would rather a thousand times see you in the world—the idol of every worshipper who sunned himself in your beauty."

"I require no worshippers."

"Friends, then."

"I shall still have Lillian and Lady Bell—but perhaps you will be jealous of them."

"Hear me!"

"More," exclaimed the angry beauty, bursting into a passionate flood of tears; "you have humiliated me—humiliated me to myself. Point out any one action of my life which justifies you in supposing that I would fling my heart unasked at the feet of one who cares nothing for me—more, who is the plighted husband of another."

"It was unjust," murmured the merchant. "It was a fatal hour which witnessed the entrance of Richard Tyrrell beneath my roof."

"You made it so."

"Granted," said her husband.

"The kind-hearted boy!" she added; "he little thought, whilst speaking to me with a brother's frankness, that every word he uttered was watched and weighed by lynx-eyed jealousy, that every smile was misconstrued! And yet you could affect friendship for him! Poor humanity! how easily the clay of which thou art composed receives the vilest impressions!"

"I will ask his forgiveness," said Mr. Chutnee, very humbly.

The eyes of Zamora flashed fire, and her child-like, beautiful lips curled with an expression of scorn so intense, that it startled the weak and doting old man.

"What!" she cried, "let him know that any one dared suspect me of thrusting my love unasked upon him; of breaking the vow I have sworn to him before whom all vows are sacred? Never, never!"

"What can I do?" demanded the merchant, in a tone of helplessness.

"Nothing. We must both submit to our punishment—I, for thinking that an old man, whom I was once weak enough to love, with his affection could bestow his confidence; you, for having doubted where wisdom should have bade you trust."

All this appeared so strange to Herbert Chutnee, that it was no wonder he felt bewildered. Great as his error had been, he felt that the penalty was still greater, and began to experience something very like anger and impatience.

"You forget," he said, "that you are my wife."

"I cannot forget it."

"And that I have rights which—"

Zamora broke into a laugh; not one of those light and musical ones, which speak the heart at ease, but a sharp, metallic one, whose peculiar sounds indicate the depth of the vibration.

"Rights!" she repeated; "rights over a child whom you have betrayed into marriage, only to make her wretched; for I was happy enough at school with my flowers and books, and young companions. Urge them upon me and I quit your house—break the last tie between us."

"And give yourself up to another!" exclaimed her husband, furiously.

"Never," replied his wife, calmly. "I shall not cease to respect myself, even if driven to cease to respect you."

"This is torture!"

"I know it is," observed his wife, coolly; "but the instrument has been invented by yourself."

With these words the speaker returned to the house, despite the entreaties and remonstrances of the man who for the future was only to be to her as a father. In his despair he bitterly cursed his own folly, for every feeling of jealousy respecting Richard Tyrrell was at an end, at the very moment, perhaps, when, if he could have read his wife's heart, he might have found most cause for jealousy.

The truth was that Zamora doubted her own heart; not its virtue, for an impure thought had never yet sullied it; but her husband's groundless suspicions, groundless, at least, in the first instance, had caused her to think more than she otherwise would have done of our hero; and, to her astonishment and terror, the announcement of his engagement with Lillian had caused her a pang.

Well might she accuse Herbert Chutnee of folly in setting her young heart dreaming.

When he made his appearance in the drawing-room, for he did not rejoin the gentlemen at their wine, he saw his wife seated between Lady Bell and Lillian. She had extorted from the latter a solemn promise never to reveal the secret she had confided to her, not even to her protectress.

"I am glad you are come," cried her ladyship. "Zamora is the most unreasonable creature. I really am afraid you spoil her. Use your influence."

"I fear you overrate it," murmured the husband, with a sigh.

"She absolutely refuses to join us in a party to-morrow to one of the lovely islands on the Hooghly. Did you ever hear of such caprice?"

"Why not accept it, my love?" demanded Herbert; "you once were fond of the water."

The insulted beauty shook her head.

"I can trust you," he added, in the vain hope of conciliating her by a display of confidence which, even in his present position, cost him an effort to affect, "to the care of our friends."

"Is not that a temptation?" cried Lady Bell, laughingly.

"Not the slightest."

"It is not every wife that can say as much."

Lillian was about to speak, but a look from her friend, reminding her of her promise, restrained her.

At this instant Richard entered the drawing-room. The mutual glances between him and the fair girl he had wooed and won, convinced the merchant how groundless had been his fears.

Zamora regarded her husband with a cold smile.

"Come, Mr. Tyrrell," said the latter, "you must try the effect of your eloquence."

"Upon what subject?"

"A pleasant party."

"Oh, then, I promise to be very eloquent."

"My wife refuses to join it," added Mr. Chutnee, "because I cannot accompany her. You must reason her out of her caprice."

The speaker led our hero up to the musnud on which the ladies were seated. Bowing in the style of an oriental presenting a petition, he proffered his request.

"Rejected," said Zamora; then, turning to the mortified husband, she added, ironically, "You see I can keep my resolution."

Herbert Chutnee began to feel exceedingly alarmed, and feared she would keep her word.

CHAPTER LVI.

Oh, think what anxious moments pass between
The birth of plots, and these last fatal periods;
Oh, 'tis a dreadful interval of time,
Made up of horror all, and big with death.—ADDISON.

WHILE the scenes we have just described were taking place in the garden and drawing-room of Lady Bell, Caleb and Jack Manders had accompanied the sycee Hirim to the grove surrounding the temple where Hassan and Al Moorad were in the habit of holding their secret meetings, for we scarcely need inform our readers that the wily Hindoo domestic was a household spy upon the movements and proceedings of our hero; his fidelity, if he possessed any portion of that virtue, being engaged to his former master.

The young men had not long concealed themselves by creeping beneath the underwood, before the parties whom they came to watch approached, in deep and earnest conversation. The banker was evidently trying to persuade his companion to something which the fellow either felt declined to, or had not been bribed sufficiently high to undertake.

How Jack envied the groom his knowledge of the language. He felt convinced that some mischief was plotting against his benefactor, and would have given worlds to unravel it.

The words of the principal speaker appeared to make but little impression upon Hassan, till they were joined by a venerable-looking priest, who issued from the temple. At his approach both the Hindoos bowed with the deepest reverence.

Caleb laid his hand upon the arm of Hirim to attract his attention to the new-comer, and found, to his surprise, that the boy trembled violently.

"Not unlike Uncle Andrew," thought Jack Manders, as he gazed upon the countenance of the old man—a reflection which did not increase his good opinion of him.

The appearance of the priest produced a marked change in the conduct of Hassan, whose hesitations and objections seemed at once to vanish. He received a small silken bag, which the former extended towards him, and placed it in his breast.

Immediately afterwards all three entered the temple, and the concealed spectators of their interview cautiously withdrew.

"Who is that old man, Hirim?" demanded Jack.

"Oh! do not ask me," replied the boy, with a shudder.

"What were they talking about?"

"Deen," said the boy, sullenly.

"What is that?"

"Faith. I am sorry I brought you to the place."

"Faith," repeated Jack Manders; "umph! may be; but to speak plainly, I have not much faith in your answer."

"Why did you shake and tremble," inquired Caleb, "when I placed my hand upon you?"

"I have spoken the truth," muttered the sycee, in a sullen tone, "and you have no right to doubt me. When I thought ill was brooding against the sahib Tyrrell, I made you acquainted with my suspicions; but Hirim will not betray his faith!"

This was the only answer they could get from him, and it was far from being satisfactory to either of his companions, who determined to impart their suspicions to our hero, and get him to watch the next night.

"He will ferret it out," said Jack, in confidence to Caleb. "He speaks their lingo as plainly as I do English."

Unfortunately, his benefactor quitted for the counting-house of Mr. Chutnee the following day before Jack could impart to him what had occurred.

Richard had not forgotten the hint Lieutenant Marsh had given him respecting Al Moorad. As the head of one of the largest native banking firms in Calcutta, he was well-known in English society, in which he frequently moved, and was looked upon as one of the most enlightened of his race, the least affected by the prejudices of caste, and the debasing superstitions which render the effeminate Asiatic so contemptible in the eyes of every European.

More than once our hero had detected the eyes of the banker fixed upon himself and Lillian as they danced together, or snatched a few hasty words of conversation in society. On such occasions Al Moorad, instead of appearing confused, would smile, advance, and chat with them.

It might have been friendly—from any but an Asiatic, it must have been deemed so; but in no country are men more clever in masking every emotion or feeling than in the East. "He is but a driveller," says the proverb, "who knows not how to dissemble."

The gentleman in question had read the proverbs of the Hindoo philosophers and writers very carefully; in fact, made a study of them.

Richard was seated in the counting-house of Mr. Chutnee, where his mornings were generally spent, when the party in question entered, and inquired, in no very amicable tone, for Mr. Sanford.

"He is in the private room with the principal of the house," answered one of the clerks.

"You had better inform him," observed our hero.

On hearing the voice, the subtle oriental instantly became all smiles, and inquired most affectionately after his health.

"Quite well, I thank you," said the youth, writing away in the ledger.

"I was not aware that you were a clerk," added the visitor.

"How else should I learn the business?"

"Very true."

Sanford made his appearance, and, recognising the party who had inquired for him, looked exceedingly confused, despite his effort to conceal it.

"Some rascality in hand," thought Richard, but without appearing to pay the least attention to them.

Al Moorad and the managing clerk of Mr. Chutnee retired to one of the windows, where a long and animated conversation ensued. The native banker drew from his pocket a letter, took from it a bill, and handed it to Sanford, who shrugged his shoulders, and muttered something in a very humble tone.

"Dishonoured," thought our hero.

He was not far wrong.

Again the whispered conversation was resumed. At first Al Moorad seemed unbending and haughty, then gradually appeared to yield to the entreaties or representations of the clerk; and once or twice Richard fancied that he could detect a glance towards himself; and yet, what could he have to do with their affairs?

At last they shook hands—a sure sign that some piece of chicanery, after having been duly discussed, had been concluded.

Mr. Sanford saw the Hindoo to the door of the banking house; then returned and stopped at the desk where Richard was writing.

"A troublesome fellow," he exclaimed, alluding to his late visitor; "all natives are alike. The man is as rich as Croesus, if ever there was such a person; and yet he is frightened out of his wits about a paltry bill for five hundred pounds."

"Indeed!"

"Good as the bank of Calcutta."

"So I should suppose," remarked his hearer, pretending to take very little interest in the affair. "I know Mr. Curry would not hesitate to discount Chutnee's signature for ten times that amount, or even more."

"I should think not," exclaimed the managing clerk, with a laugh at his simplicity; "but it does not happen to be the governor's signature."

"I thought it might have been."

"It is mine."

"Yours!"

"Drawn upon the junior partner of the great house of Bently, Kearns, and Company, Lombard-street, London."

Although the heart of the young man beat violently, not the slightest movement of his features betrayed the surprise he felt.

"Perhaps you know them?"

"I never set foot but in one counting-house in England in my life," replied Richard, evasively, "and that was Mr. Curry's. Perhaps," he added, as if struck by a sudden idea, "you forgot to advise your correspondent on the subject."

"No, I did not."

"No effects, then?" exclaimed our hero, laughingly.

"Plenty. The fact is, that several years I have drawn upon him to the same amount, and never before had my bill dishonoured. Something serious must have occurred, or he never would have disappointed me."

"Is your agency so valuable, then?"

"No, but my—," he paused, and replaced the word "silence," which he intended to utter, by—"friendship is."

"I wonder," he added, "if you could discount for me; it would really be of service to me. I have an excellent speculation of indigo in hand—has advanced money to the planter; but if I force a sale—"

"You forget that I have not commenced business yet," observed the young man, carelessly; "but let me look at your bill."

Sanford placed it eagerly in his hand.

"Is this the gentleman's acceptance?" said Richard, pointing to the signature of Carus.

"That I can assure you of. I receive one every year in blank. Some infernal mistake must have occurred. What say you?"

"That I must inquire first respecting the stability of the house. I may have heard the name of the firm before, but most certainly know nothing of its standing in the market."

"For heaven's sake do not make any inquiries of Chutnee," said the managing clerk, greatly alarmed. "By our articles I am bound down not to trade on my own account; and, in fact, I seldom do, unless something very tempting drops in my way. The governor would never forgive me. Since his wife's illness he has been in the temper of a hyena."

"Is Madame Chutnee ill, then?" demanded his hearer, forgetting in his sympathy for Zamora the point in view.

"Her ayah says she is fretting herself to a skeleton."

"And the disease?"

"No one knows. She has had scores of doctors, both native and European, to attend her. But I think I could guess it," added the speaker, lowering his voice, and at the same time giving our hero a peculiar look.

"Indeed!"

"She has discovered that she has got an old husband," whispered Sanford, "and that captivity is still captivity, although passed in a golden cage."

"Very likely," thought the youth, for he himself had frequently wondered how a mere child came to wed a man so much older than herself.

"Well," added the speaker, "what do you say to it?"

"That I must make inquiries."

"Hang it! do it at once; you are rich."

"But not rich enough to lose five hundred pounds."

"When will you give me an answer?"

"To-morrow."

That same evening Richard Tyrrell related all that had taken place to his friend and adviser, Lieutenant Marsh, and asked his opinion whether he should comply with Sanford's request or not.

"By all means, my dear boy," replied the old soldier, after a few moments' reflection. "It is of importance to obtain proof of the connection between this Carus Kearn, your father's calumniator, and his agent—for so I sincerely believe it will turn out that Sanford is, and long has been."

"And what am I to do with the bill when I have discounted it?" demanded our hero, who did not exactly see the use which might be made of it.

"Give it to me."

"Willingly."

"And I will transmit it to your grandfather, who has other and far more serious cause of offence against his nephew. He never confided to me the exact particulars, but I shall never forget his countenance when he alluded to it."

"Have you ever seen this Carus?" inquired Richard.

"Only once."

"And what is he like?"

"Tall and gentlemanly enough in his bearing," answered the lieutenant, "and has all the usages of good society, which, as a matter of course, he has long been accustomed to mingle in; but his countenance did not please me. The features are regular enough; it was from the expression of the eyes and mouth that I drew an unfavourable inference. The former are dark, piercing, and ever restless. When he addresses you, instead of meeting your gaze with open, honest frankness, he steals furtive glances, and seems embarrassed if by accident you fix his gaze. The latter," he added, "is sensual, cruel, and vindictive."

"A sad picture," observed our hero.

"But a true one," answered his friend.

The next day, Richard Tyrrell, when Sanford spoke to him on the subject of the accommodation, expressed his readiness to oblige him, adding that he had received so excellent an account of the position of the firm of Bently, Carus Kearn, and Company, that he felt perfectly satisfied.

The managing clerk was profuse in his thanks, and the transaction concluded that same day, very much to the satisfaction of the holder of the bill, which was at once handed to the lieutenant to forward to England.

At the end of a week, Al Moorad again made his appearance at the banking-house of Mr Chutnee, and inquired with great impatience as usual for Sanford.

"Not in," replied the junior clerk.

"Will he be long?"

"Can't tell."

"It is of importance."

"You will find him at Exchange," observed our hero, saluting him.

The oriental bowed with his usual suppleness, thanked him, and took his leave; but in less than an hour returned again, accompanied by the managing clerk; they both approached the desk at which Richard was writing, and requested a few minutes' private conversation with him.

"With me?" repeated the youth, in a tone of surprise. "You had better come with me into Mr. Chutnee's private room; he will not be here for an hour at least," he added, looking at his watch.

The proposal was acceded to.

Richard could not avoid being struck by the great difference in the manner of the two men. Al Moorad was cold, self-possessed, and wary as a snake, calculating its spring. His companion, on the contrary, greatly agitated, and nervously excited.

"My dear fellow," exclaimed Sanford, "you recollect the bill."

"The one I discounted?"

"Yes."

"Considering it was my first transaction—commercial one, I mean," answered Richard Tyrrell, laughingly, "it would be strange if I did not; five per cent., not a bad hit for a young beginner."

"Money in India frequently brings twelve," observed the Hindoo banker, in a soft, insinuating tone.

"With risk."

"Certainly."

"I have received advices from England by the mail of yesterday," resumed the managing clerk, impatiently. "It was some infernal mistake of the man's who presented the bill. I knew Carus would never trifle with me."

"I recollect you said so at the time."

"He has transmitted me the money."

"Glad to hear it."

"I wish, therefore, you would let me have the bill back again, and as for the discount, that can be easily settled."

"Very easily indeed," answered our hero, "were it in my power to do as you request me."

"Why, you have never parted with it?"

"Sent it to England."

The two visitors exchanged uneasy glances.

"Provoking!" muttered one.

"Kismet!" ejaculated the other.

For the benefit of such of our readers as may not be acquainted with oriental languages, we beg leave to inform them that the last word signifies fate, and is generally used by the natives of the East to express the action of an over-ruling and all-wise Providence.

"Why did you not ask me to keep it?" demanded the young man, anxious, if possible, to obtain some further clue.

"I never thought that Carus would forward the money," was the reply.

"If he is so rich, it will not inconvenience him."

"It is not that," interrupted Sanford, hastily, "but the—in short, it must be disagreeable to any man of his position in the commercial world, to have his bill returned. I suppose," he added, "that it will be presented through the house of Curry and Company?"

"It is the only firm I have any monetary connection with, as you well know," observed the young man evasively.

As the speakers quitted the room, Al Moorad dropped a paper from his girdle. Richard saw it fall, and his first impulse was to secure it. As he was in the act of stooping to raise it, a blush suffused his cheek.

"No," he murmured, "not by dishonourable means. The battle must be so fought, that when the victory is won, I need not shame to claim it."

"See what you have left," he exclaimed, aloud, just as they reached the door.

The Hindoo sprang upon the paper, like some wild animal, with a single bound, and his features appeared ghastly pale as he raised it.

"You should have claimed a reward, Tyrrell," said the managing clerk; "it is not often that our friend drops Treasury bonds."

"That paper is not a Treasury bond," observed our hero.

"True, the colour is different. What made you so eager to recover it? I thought it must have been for a lac of rupees, at least."

The native banker touched first his forehead, then his lips with the paper, and slowly replaced it in his girdle.

The two Europeans knew by this action that it was something of a religious character; and the speaker pronounced the word deen.

Which word signifies faith.

The Hindoo nodded in the affirmative.

Tyrrell only felt half satisfied that the explanation was the correct one, but, as he had no means of satisfying himself upon the point, he made no further remark, and permitted them to take their leave.

That same evening, on paying his usual visit to Sir Charles, he found Lillian in tears and Lady Bell looking very serious.

"What has occurred?" he eagerly demanded.

"The regiment is ordered to Delhi."

"And when does it march?"

"In five days."

"So soon!"

This was addressed to the protectress of the fair girl, whose heart was mourning over its first sorrow. Could she have foreseen all that it would have to bear and suffer, she would have reserved her tears; but Providence mercifully veils the page of the future. Were it displayed to our gaze, the present would lose its charm.

"The Sepoys," said her ladyship, "have shown signs of disaffection,—something about cartridges, I believe; but Sir Charles says it is only a pretence."

Her hearer thought of the warning words of his friend the lieutenant.

"Should there be danger," he observed, "surely, Lady Bell, you would be better in Calcutta."

The generous-minded woman drew herself up to her full height, and her bright eyes flashed scornfully.

"I forgive you, Richard," she made answer, "for two reasons: the first, because you are a lover, and naturally feel anxious for Lillian, to say nothing of the pain of a separation, which can only prove temporary; for when the governor and council have recovered from their fright, the 01st will, I have no doubt, be ordered back again."

"And the second?"

"That my husband thinks exactly as you do."

"Then I am sure you will yield."

"That by no means follows," exclaimed her ladyship, archly. "When I married Sir Charles, he would have quitted the service, but I refused to listen to it, for I knew how closely he felt wedded to his profession. In becoming the wife of a soldier, I accepted all the inconveniences of my choice, even to the packing up of my dresses, the derangement of my boudoir, and the breaking off of so many pleasant acquaintances."

"You forget the danger."

"There is none."

Lillian, however, was not of the same opinion, and she trembled not only for the safety of her protector, who had acted towards her like a parent, but at the thought of a separation from the man she loved.

"Here comes Rose, too, looking as wretched as if her husband were already in front of the enemy!" exclaimed the lady, as the wife of Mark Rayner made her appearance in the drawing-room, her eyes red with weeping. "Why, Rose," she added, "I gave you credit for more courage."

Lilly, who had thrown her arms round the neck of her foster mother, tried to kiss away her tears.

"It is not that," sobbed the woman, "not that."

"What is it, then?"

"Mark has been placed under arrest by order of Major Plinlimmon."

"That horrible little major," observed her ladyship, "is always doing some disagreeable thing or another."

"It cannot be for any very grave offence," said our hero; "we will all intercede with Sir Charles for him."

Rose wrung her hands.

"He will release him," whispered Lillian.

"He dares not," murmured the distracted wife; "it is for no slight breach of discipline, but a far more serious charge."

"Drunkenness?"

"No."

"What then?"

"For having released a prisoner who was placed under his care. My husband commanded the prison guard."

"And the name of the prisoner?"

"Sanderson."

"Poor Rose," said her protectress, when she heard the name, "this is indeed unfortunate. The plot thickens, and the long-concealed truth must soon be known. Better to have told it at once."

(To be continued.)

A FISHERMAN.

A FISHERMAN leaned on a garden gate
He often used to pass:
'Twas sunset, and two little boys
Were playing on the grass.

The watch-dog by the door-stone sat,
And bayed the rising moon,
And the mother milked her cow and sung
An old and pleasant tune.

The children left their play and ran,
And leaning on her knee,
She milked the milk into their mouths,
Laughing with girlish glee.

And as she carried her frothy pail,
Slow to the rustic door,
One little one held at her skirt behind,
And the other one before.

She stopped, and hugging both their heads
Against her loving breast,
They looked like two bright little birds
A-peeping from one nest.

The sunburnt fisher went his way,
Sighing alas, alas!
It was not for the little boys
That played upon the grass.

And when he came where cold, gray stones
Were standing, many a pair,
He put his net from his shoulder down—
His little boy was there.

Hopes and Hells for the Young.

GOOD READING.

Born in reading and speaking a careful attention to pronunciation is essential. Good reading is more rarely to be heard than is commonly supposed, and requires more care than is usually bestowed upon it. By noticing some of the faults of bad reading, we may excite the diligence of those who are anxious to avoid them; and, as bad pronunciation is the common failing, we shall devote our space this week to pointing out in what these faults chiefly consist.

Nothing is more disagreeable than reading too loud. It annoys the hearers; it inconveniences the reader; it obscures the sense of the author. It arises either from ignorance or affectation. Some people read too loud because they have never considered how objectionable it is; others adopt the practice on account of its singularity. The former may be pardoned and corrected; the latter is unpardonable, and those who adopt it are seldom cured, being wiser in their own conceit "than seven wise men who can render a reason."

Another fault is when the voice is too low. This may be less inconvenient to the reader, but is almost equally disagreeable to the hearer as an overstrained effort. Whatever it may arise from, it looks like indolence or inattention, either of which is a tacit insult to the listener, as it intimates the unconcern of the reader in what he is reading, and how little he is himself interested in what he imagines will interest other people.

Another fault is a thick, hasty utterance. By such a process long words are cut short, and short words frequently omitted, or blended with their next-door neighbours, until sense is utterly lost, and reading becomes "gabble." This may arise from defective organs of speech; but in most cases is attributable to a bad habit early acquired, and confirmed by long use.

To read too quick or too slow is equally objectionable. Rapid reading frequently sacrifices the sense of the author to the facile ability of the reader, while it confuses the hearer, and deprives him of half the good things which are uttered. Railway travelling is not adapted for the seeker after the picturesque; he loses the beauties of the landscape in his hurried transit, however important such hasty travelling may be on certain occasions. It is precisely the same with the railway style of reading; and a reader should always have a regard for the memory and understanding of his hearers. They want to enjoy the author, not to arrive at the end of the book.

But very annoying, on the other hand, is a too slow reader. This is most faulty in reading trifles that do not require attention. It is then most tedious. It is, however, a fault rarely to be found, unless in aged people, or those who naturally speak so in common conversation. But most disagreeable in slow readers is the manner which some of them have of adopting a drowsy, sleepy tone—tone indeed is a very important part in good or bad reading.

An irregular or uneven voice is distressing. It rises or falls by fits and starts; is elevated or depressed unnaturally and unseasonably, without regard to sense or stops; it begins a sentence in a high voice, and gradually lowers into a growl; or it begins with a low note, and gradually becomes shrill; or it rises and falls in the same sentence, beginning and ending on the same note.

Sometimes the tone adopted—we employ this term advisedly, for it is never natural—is flat, dull, and uniform, without emphasis or cadence, or any regard to the subject in hand. This fault is often acquired in the routine lessons of school, and is retained in maturity. It is decidedly bad. It may serve well enough for a reading-boy in a printing-office, or an attorney's clerk reading a deed; in neither of which cases emphasis is expected, nor, indeed, is necessary, but otherwise, it is most objectionable. It deprives the hearer of the greatest part of the benefit or advantage he might receive by a close attention to the weighty and interesting parts of the subject, which should always be distinguished by pointed pronunciation. A just pronunciation is an excellent commentary.

But the commonest fault is that of reading in a tone. The large majority of ordinary readers invariably intone. They have one voice—good, bad, or indifferent—for every-day affairs; but set them to read a paragraph, and they assume a tone unnatural to themselves. They become instantly artificial. They clatter or drawl, are tediously monotonous or ostentatiously affected, and are as unlike themselves as it is possible to be.

Next week we purpose offering a few remarks on the acquisition of a correct style of reading; but in concluding these observations on faulty pronunciation, we may notice that both good writing, good reading, and effective speaking depend on their being natural. Readers should endeavour to enter into the spirit of the writer, and, feeling what they have to read, express it—not in an overstrained style, or with exaggerated force, or artificial effect—but in the same natural and easy manner which they would adopt if they were speaking their own words instead of reading those of another.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

LUCY.—It is evident you are not perfect in English pronunciation, or you would not have supposed it possible that viande in French, sounded as if written veaunde, could be pronounced veaundee. Would you sound tune, tunee? In English the final e gives length to the sound, but is itself mute. The French letter u has been discussed already.

G. L.—In general the final consonant is not sounded. Where, by means of the English spelling, we direct you to sound it, rely upon it, it should be pronounced. There are exceptions to every rule. The mark you speak of is a circumflex accent. Like the acute and grave accent it gives the e the sound of a. Example, le dé, the thimble; la mère, the mother; le même, the same.

A READER FROM THE FIRST.—Short words and easy conversations will follow in abundance.

A YORKSHIRE LAD.—A little useful vocabulary may be made of all the words given you in the lessons. You can easily collect these chapters; and as to the sentences, you should learn them by heart.

AN ADMIRER OF CORRECT PRONUNCIATION, AND MIRIAM TAYLOR.—We thank you both for the high opinion you express of the French Lessons. We will endeavour to be still more explicit to you respecting the French sound represented in English by a final g. Certainly, in the word bread, pain (French), pronounced paing, the g is not "in its full force," if by full force you mean the harsh sound as in garden. English people who give this harsh sound to a final g, are guilty of a provincialism. Instead of the soft liquid g, they give it a harsh sound, as in plague.

CHAPTER VI.

"I REALLY begin to like grammar," said Robert, as he sat down to listen to his kind friend's instructions. "I only wish I had mastered all those provoking parts of speech."

"Be patient, and soon you will have done so," replied George. "You acquired a good idea of the article and noun in the last lesson; now we will take another couple into consideration, viz., the pronoun and the verb."

"As grammarians tell you, the pronoun is a word used instead of a noun to avoid the too frequent repetition of the same word. An example will explain to you directly what a pronoun really is, so you shall have an example—Robert is attentive; he recollects all his teacher says. He will soon speak, read, and understand French." Now tell me which is the pronoun in this sentence.

"He, to be sure," answered Robert, after a moment's consideration. "for it stands instead of Robert, a noun. I know myself to be a noun, for you told me every thing is a noun."

"Bravo!" cried George. "And now for the verb. A verb is a word that means to do anything, or to be anything. When I say, 'You write French,' which is the verb in that sentence?"

"Write," answered Robert; "for I know that to write is to do something, so it must be a verb."

"In this sentence, 'I am pleased with you,' can you find out the verb?" asked George.

Robert looked puzzled for a minute.

"Is it am?" said he, anxiously.

"Of course it is," replied George.

"I almost guessed it," said the pupil; "for you will own am and be do not sound at all alike."

"That remark of yours," said the teacher, "leads to a very important point, viz., that verbs (and now you know what a verb is) undergo great changes when they are conjugated. And conjugated means their being variously used—whether in the present, past, or future tense or time; secondly, whether by one person or two, or more, and this difference is called number; thirdly, whether by me, by you, or by your mother. The three persons just mentioned representing the first, second, and third person. And now I have explained to you what boys learn by rote, and understand nothing about; that to verbs belong tense, number, and person. Excellent grammarians enter into more minute divisions. They also talk about mood or manner of the verb. I shall explain all this to you in due time. Even now you must glance at the moods; it would puzzle you just now to do more. The present, past, and future are the tenses we shall consider; and you must learn what are called auxiliary, or helping verbs. As to the moods or manner of the verb, we will only speak of three in this lesson: the infinitive, which expresses the verb in a vague, undetermined manner; the indicative, which simply asserts; and the imperative, which commands. We English people use, with the auxiliary verbs, the imperfect verbs shall and will, as you will soon see in the conjugation of the all-important helping verbs, to have and to be."

"But," said Robert, "I do not see, according to your explanation, that to have is a verb at all. It does not mean to do or to be anything."

"There is some justice in your remark, Robert. But, though to have is not exactly to be or to do, on consideration you will find that it does signify to be in possession of something."

"Yes, so it does," replied Robert.

"And now," said his friend, "you are about to make little sentences out of parts of speech with which you are tolerably familiar, viz., with the pronoun, verb, article, and noun. In the first place, we will conjugate the verb to have."

INFINITIVE MOOD.

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
To have.	Avoir.
INDICATIVE MOOD.
Present Tense.	Le Présent.
Singular.	Singulier.
I have the pen.	J'ai la plume.
Thou hast the ink.	Tu as l'encre.
He, she, or it has the apple.	Il ou elle a la pomme.
Plural.	Pluriel.
We have the pencil.	Nous avons le crayon.
You have the flower.	Vous avez la fleur.
They have the money.	Ils ont l'argent.
Past.	Le Passé (Imparfait).
I had the bread.	J'avais le pain.
Thou hadst the salt.	Tu avais le sel.
He had the water.	Il avait l'eau.
Future.	Le Futur
I shall have the chair.	J'aurai la chaise.
You shall have the carpet.	Tu auras le tapis.
He shall have the table.	Il aura la table.
Imperative Mood.	Présent.
Have the dog.	Aye le chien.
Let him have the cat.	Qu'il ait la chatte.
Have (you) the bird.	Ayez l'oiseau.
Let them have the plate.	Qu'ils aient l'assiette.

"Now, I advise you, Robert," said George, "to learn all these tenses by heart; then make a writing exercise of them. Cover the English, and write it out by consulting the French; then cover the French, and write it by consulting the English."

"I consider you have made good progress in this lesson, although in the first part of it there was hardly a word of French. Everything you learnt was a vehicle for acquiring French, and you will thank me for the directions given as you proceed. It is to-day a little too late for the 'Voyage à Paris,' we will go on with that to-morrow. In the meantime, I must teach you how to say 'yes' and 'no,' and also dictate to you the names of the days in the week, and of the four seasons."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.	SOUND.
Yes, madam.	Oui, madame.	We, maladum.
No, sir.	Non, monsieur.	Nong, mosue.
Days of the week.	Les jours de la semaine.
Sunday	Dimanche
Monday	Lundi
Tuesday	Mardi
Wednesday	Mercredi
Thursday	Jendredi
Friday	Vendredi
Saturday	Samedi.
The seasons.	Les saisons.
Spring	Le printemps *
Summer	L'été
Autumn	L'automne *
Winter.	L'hiver

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON V

ACTION AND REACTION.

101. Suppose the two bodies, A and B, represented in Fig. 3, are both moving in the direction indicated by the arrow, and that A overtakes B, and comes into collision with it, what will be the result?—A will lose a portion of its momentum, and B will gain an equal amount.

Fig. 3

102. How is this generally expressed?—It is said that A acts on B, and B reacts on A; and that the action and reaction are equal, and directly opposed to each other.

103. Is it universally true that whatever force one body exerts upon another, the second body exerts on the first in the opposite direction?—It is; and action and reaction are always equal and directly opposed.

104. Illustrate this important principle by a simple example.—A book lying on a table presses on it by the equal reaction of the table.

105. Mention another familiar illustration.—If we clap our hands, each hand receives the same blow.

106. Suppose a man pulls at one end of a rope that is attached to a post?—The post pulls at the other end just as hard as he does.

107. A magnet attracts a piece of iron that is brought near it: according to the principle of action and reaction, what is also true?—That the iron attracts the magnet with an equal force.

108. Does the same principle hold good in the case of the attraction which the earth exerts upon bodies at its surface?—It does. All bodies react upon the earth with a force equal to the earth's attraction.

109.—Does the earth then move to meet a falling stone?—It does; but, owing to its enormous mass, its motion is exceedingly slow in comparison with that of the stone.

110. Has the principle of the equality of action and reaction anything to do with the voluntary motions of men and animals?—It has; the immediate cause of all such motions is the reaction of something against which the muscular force of the animal is exerted.

111. Illustrate.—When we walk, it is the reaction of the earth to the force we exert that enables us to move.

112. How does a bird fly?—It strikes the air with its wings, and the reaction of the air bears it forward.

113. How does a fish swim?—By the reaction of the water to the pressure which it exerts against it with its fins and tail.

114. Is the principle the same in every other case of motion in which the original source of power is within the moving body?—It is; for example, a steamboat is propelled by the reaction of the water to the pressure of the revolving paddles.

115. If a large ship comes into collision with a small vessel at sea, do they receive the same or a different shock?—The same.

EFFECTS OF COLLISION ON THE MOTION OF BODIES.

116. When two balls, moving on the same line, as in Fig. 3, come into collision, what are the circumstances of their motion after the collision?—If they are inelastic, they keep on together; but if they are elastic, like India-rubber or ivory, they separate, and take different velocities.

* Where there is any great difficulty we still think it advisable to spell the sound; the pupil is, therefore, informed that "printemps" is sounded as if it were written prangtlong; and "automne" as if written oh-tone.

117. Why do elastic balls separate after collision?—Because they are both compressed by the shock, and then recover their form with a certain force, which urges them asunder.

118. How may this effect be illustrated?—The result is the same as if there were a steel spring between the two bodies, that was compressed by the shock, and then recovered itself.

Fig. 4

119. If an elastic ivory ball should come against another of the same size at rest, what would be the effect of the collision?—The moving ball would stop, and its motion would be taken up by the other.

120. Does a blow from a club, given to an India-rubber ball, send it off any faster because the ball is elastic?—It does; nearly twice as fast.

121. If an elastic ball be thrown obliquely against an immovable wall, as shown in Fig. 5, in what direction will it glance off?—If it be thrown in a direction A B, it will bound off in another direction, B C, equally oblique to the wall.

Fig. 5

122. If an India-rubber ball were perfectly elastic, how high would it rebound if dropped on the floor?—To the height from which it fell.

RELATIVE MOTION.

123. What is relative motion?—The motion of one body with respect to another which is also in motion.

124. Give an example.—A man walking on the deck of a ship that is under sail is in motion relative to the bow or stern of the ship, and the whole ship at the same time moves forward and carries him along.

125. Suppose he were to run toward the stern at the same rate that the ship goes forward?—He would keep continually over the same point on the surface of the water. While he would be in motion relatively to the ship, he would be at rest in relation to the water.

126. If, as a steamboat was leaving her wharf, a person standing at the stern should throw an apple directly backward with the same velocity that the vessel is going forward, how would the apple appear to move to a person on shore?—It would be seen to drop directly down into the water.

127. If two trains or carriages on the same railroad were proceeding in opposite directions, at the respective rates of 20 miles and 30 miles per hour, with what velocity would they approach?—Fifty miles per hour.

128. If they were proceeding in the same direction, what would their relative velocity be?—Ten miles per hour. They would approach at this rate if the faster of the two trains were behind the other.

COMPOUND MOTION.

129. Can the same body have two different motions at the same time?—It can; some examples have just been given.

130. What is the actual motion that has at the same time two or more different motions called?—Compound motion.

131. Give an example of compound motion.—The case of a boat rowed across a river at the same time that it is carried down the stream by the current.

132. If the boat should be rowed steadily across the river, in the direction A B, and should be carried down by a uniform current a distance B D, what line would it actually follow?—The straight line A D.

133. Suppose two persons were to kick the same football at the same instant, the one toward B and the other toward C, what direction would it take?—A direction, A D, intermediate between the directions in which the two blows were given.

134. Would either impulse change the velocity in the direction of the other?—It would not.

135. If one impulse would have sent it to B in a second, and the other to C, where would it be from the joint action of the two at the end of a second?—It would be at D.

136. If a boy, while in the act of running along the line E F, should throw a ball from A toward B, would the ball go directly to B?—It would not; it would continue to go forward as fast as the boy does; and so, having two motions, would pursue an intermediate line of direction, as A D.

137. Where must another boy, who wishes to catch the ball, stand?—Somewhere on the line A D; and thus in advance of the line of direction in which it was thrown from A.

138. Suppose a man, riding in a wagon, tosses an apple directly upward, will it come into his hands again?—It will; because it moves along horizontally as fast as the man does.

THE TWO PICTURES.

"How beautiful!" And two men paused before the window of a print-seller.

The picture which had called forth from one of the men this admiring exclamation, was a showy bit of landscape, painted for effect, and well calculated to deceive an unpractised eye.

"I must inquire the price," said the speaker, whose name was Godwyn, and he drew his companion into the shop.

"What do you ask for that landscape in the window?"

"Ten pounds," replied the picture-seller; "and it is worth twenty. But the owner wants money, and must sell, even at so great a sacrifice."

"Who is the artist?"

A name not familiar to either of the men was given. But, as they were only posted up in art news indifferently well, and did not care to make their ignorance known, no further question was asked. The name was accepted as belonging to an artist of celebrity.

"I must have that picture, Martin; it is a gem," Godwyn spoke aside to his friend.

"We have a companion piece by the same artist," said the picture-seller, whose ears, all on the alert, had overheard the remark.

"Indeed! Let us see the two together."

The paintings were placed side by side.

"Charming!—beautiful!—exquisite!" were the exclamations with which their exhibition was greeted.

"I will take one of them," said Godwyn. "And you the other." Looking towards his friend Martin.

"I don't know about that," answered the latter. "The pictures are certainly very tempting. But I am not just sure that I can spare ten pounds to-day for an article of simple luxury."

"They're cheap as dirt," said Godwyn. "Better take one. You'll not have another chance like this soon."

But Martin hesitated, debating the money-question involved, and finally decided to let the companion-piece remain where it was for the present. Godwyn paid down ten pounds, and ordered one of the pictures to be sent home.

The two men left the picture-dealer's and walked on, Godwyn elated by his purchase, and Martin well satisfied at having successfully resisted the temptation to spend the sum of ten pounds for a painting, when he had other use for his money.

"You will regret not having bought that picture," said Godwyn. "It is a gem, and is offered at half its value."

"I love pictures," he answered. "They are to me a source of unalloyed pleasure. But my income is yet too limited to permit an indulgence of this taste. The common wants of life, and the charities which may not be disregarded, keep me without a surplus to expend in the merely ornamental."

"I am no better off than you are," said Godwyn. "But a portion of my income must go in the direction of beauty and ornament. Bare walls are my abhorrence."

At this moment a cry of warning reached the ears of the two men, and, looking forward along the street, they saw a horse, attached to an empty wagon, dashing towards them at a frightful speed. A little in advance stood a cart, backed up to the pavement. Before the owner of this, an Irishman, had time to turn his horse, the runaway was upon him, and, one of the shafts striking his poor beast on the head, killed him on the spot.

"Poor fellow," said Martin, in a tone of pity, as he heard the Irishman bewail his loss.

"Come," said Godwyn, drawing upon the arm of his friend. "It's a mercy for the poor, half-starved beast."

But Martin stood still, and began to ask the Irishman questions. His looks, corroborating his replies, satisfied him that the loss he had just met was the loss of means for getting bread for his children. The man was in deep distress.

"I can't wait here," Godwyn spoke, with some impatience. "Come, or I shall have to leave you. That picture will be home before I get there."

"Go on, then. I must look a little further into this case," said Martin, quite in earnest.

"Humph! You'll have your hands full if you stop to look into every case of this kind," Godwyn spoke a little contemptuously, and then went forward.

"Ah, Martin," said he, as the latter entered his shop about two hours afterwards. "How comes on your Irishman and his dead horse?" There was an amused expression on his face.

"Badly enough at present," he answered. "Poor fellow! the death of his horse is to him indeed a calamity,—like the burning of a mechanic's shop with all his tools, or the sinking of a merchant's ship, wherein was all his fortune. But I think we can put him all right with the world again, and at a very small cost to ourselves. I propose that five individuals contribute two pounds each, and buy him another horse. Here is the list. I have put down my name, and Gregg has followed suit. You will make the third, and I know who to calculate on for the fourth and fifth subscriptions."

Martin only partly unfolded his subscription paper, for a strong negative came instantly into the face of Godwyn.

"In two pence to make two pound subscriptions for the purchase of cart-horses for beggarly Irishmen," he answered. "If I once undertook that business, I should soon have my hands full. Take my advice, and keep your money, your time, and your pleasant feelings, and don't waste either in the thankless task of collecting money to pay for dead horses."

But Martin, though disappointed, was not turned from his good purpose. He succeeded in getting seven pounds subscribed, and then, adding three pounds from his own purse, he went to the humble abode of the poor Irishman, whom he found, half stupid with despondency, amid his sorrowful wife and children.

"Come, come, Jimmy Maguire," he said, cheerfully, "this will never do. Brighten up, man!"

"There's no brightening up for me, yer honour," replied Jimmy, sadly. "Poor Barny is kilt dead," and he drew his hand across his eyes. "The cart's of no use now, and if I was to die for it, I couldn't find money to buy another horse. Och! yer honour, and what is to become of us all?"

The picture that Martin looked upon in that humble abode lay all in deep shadow. There was not upon it a single gleam of sunshine.

"What did Barny cost?"

"I paid seven pounds for him, hard-earned money, and he was chape at that, yer honour."

"Find another horse as good, or even a little better than Barny, and I will buy him for you, Jimmy. Some kind gentlemen have placed money in my hands for that purpose."

Broad dashes of sunlight fell instantly on the living picture, which lay a moment before in deepest shadow.

"Oh, sir! Is it indeed as you say?" Jimmy caught the arm of Mr. Martin, and looked into his face almost wildly.

"Just as I say, Jimmy Maguire. Find the horse, and I will make him yours."

From the valley of grief and despair to the mountain-top of joy, the Irishman's household passed, as by a single stride. They overwhelmed their benefactor with noisy gratitude, and placed him at once high in the calendar of saints.

That evening Mr. Godwyn sat alone in his parlour. The picture was on the wall, but his eyes were already more than half satisfied with its beauty, and ceased to turn themselves towards it for pleasure. A friend had been invited home at tea-time to look at this picture. He had an artist's eye, and knew a good painting from a bad one. Unfortunately for Mr. Godwyn, he detected glaring faults in the landscape, and did not hesitate to pronounce it a fourth rate affair, and dear at the price which had been paid. Mr. Godwyn was unhappy.

On the same evening sat Martin alone, gazing at a picture, the sight of which gave him inexpressible pleasure. It was not hanging upon the parlour walls, inclosed in gilded frame, but grouped in his thought, and vivid as life itself. We need not describe this picture. The reader knows that it represented the poor Irishman and his delighted family. Imagination has painted it in richest colourings, and memory was enshrining it in perennial beauty. There was no power in time to rob that picture of its charming freshness. Its possession could not bring a reproving thought; no critic was skilled enough in art to find a defect, and thus lessen the owner's appreciation. It was worth a thousand such pictures as the one his friend had already ceased to value.

This lesson, reader, is for us all.

If we were as ready to hang the chambers of our minds with beautiful pictures, as we are the walls of our houses, what pleasures would we lay up in store for the time to come. As we grow older, we insensibly fall into the habit of looking inwards. We see more with the eyes of the mind than we do with the eyes of the body—oftener gaze upon the pictures that cluster on memory's walls, than upon those which hang on the walls of our dwellings. Oh! let us then give beauty and happiness to the future by daily acts of kindness—by tender charities—by deeds of human love. These will group themselves into pictures, upon which, as years glide away, and the eyes look more and more inwards, we shall gaze with purest delight; for time cannot deface them, neither will familiarity rob them of a living interest.

THE LIFE OF ENGLISH STUDENTS AT HEIDELBERG.

To the Editor of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER.
Heidelberg, May, 1853.

HERE I am at last, a jolly student of medicine, at the old Karl-Rupert University of Heidelberg. I believe in the old proverb, "When you are among the Turks, do as the Turks do;" so, exactly three months ago, just before matriculation, I bought the longest pair of boots, almost concealing the os femoris, the shortest bob-coat, not quite covering my os pelvis, that I could find. I also purchased two or three pipes, one about a yard long, which Kitchan has to light for me; and a map for the lectures. Add a small, dumpy cap, and my beer-mug, and then allow me to introduce your humble servant—a thorough and thorough German student. The English bull turned German butterfly. I like the rig. It's bold and effective; there is ton about it, and you feel more like a real Teuton in it.

My first four weeks I fear did not smell much of medicine. I went round under the auspices of lusty Burschen beer-drinkers, inducting myself generally into the mysteries of beer and duels. This forms the quintessence of student-life here. Not a traveller passes this place without going to see the duels, or coming home very late from some beer-kneipe, very drunk. Jones comes over from London. He wants to see a duel. Could I introduce him to some one? Oh! certainly. So I introduce Jones to Mr. Saufenheimer, with whom he sees a duel, and gets also an invitation to the kneipe or club that evening. The next day I meet Jones, looking rather seedy. "How are you, Jones? Did you have a good time last night?" "Oh, capital! splendid!" "What did you do?"

"Oh! you see, we—we went up to their room there, and sat down, and drank some beer now and then, and—and—oh! I tell you we had a capital time, I assure you." Now, the real state of the case is, that Jones was brought home by four students, and put to bed; and beyond a cloudy recollection of pipes, beer, and tobacco, dancing, singing, and hugging, smoke, swords, and swearing eternal friendship to everybody—beyond this, his account of things is very indistinct. Saufenheimer likes to put travellers through in this style. There was my friend H—, of Bristol, who will probably remember the very mellow state in which he reached his couch not long ago. You won't forget, shall you, H—, that ornamental painting on the house, not in water colours, which you worked out so handsomely that evening after you got home? You remember the half-sovereign you had to pay to get it removed? Blazes! how the good Frau Stockenhausen raved when she first saw that illustration adorning her clean white front.

We have five corps or fighting clubs here, numbering about one hundred and fifty members altogether; and if you wish for a "muss" or a "row" you can have it at the shortest notice. Generally speaking, we are in a perpetual stew of some kind all the time. From eight to ten duels a day, for at least four days in the week, is about the general average. They begin at eight in the morning, and get through at about one or two o'clock. Of course, the "powers that be" wink at this state of things. It's a vent-hole for hot blood, and, if stopped, might burst out somewhere in the form of a revolution, or something, perhaps, equally dangerous: so they say, we will let them alone so long as they don't kill one another. These duels are of three kinds: first, for a trial of skill simply; second, the half-serious, without cap and breeches; third, the serious, with pistols, rapiers, or the sabre. The first one originates as follows:—One corps sends another a challenge, saying, "We have six men ready to fight six of yours of equal standing." The challenge is of course accepted, and Tom, Dick, Bob, and Harry, without knowing with whom, agree to fight, with the chances of getting a chop in the face, which will disfigure them for life. This kind of duel cannot exceed fifteen minutes. The combatants having been duly beleathered and bandaged by the doctor, are led forth into the hall, looking very much like two overgrown haystacks. An umpire having been selected, and the combatants taken their places, the duel proceeds in this manner:—

UMPIRE.—"Silentium—silentium!"

A dead silence ensues.

FIRST SECOND.—"Auf die mensur fertig, los!" From our position, Ready—fight. (Slap, slap—slush, slash—slap, flash, whack.)

SECOND SEC.—"Halt!"

FIRST SEC.—"Weshalb"—why?

SECOND SEC.—"Klinge ist gesprungen"—your blade is sprung.

FIRST SEC.—(to the Umpire), "Is the blade sprung?"

UMP.—"The blade is sprung."

This constitutes a round. They then fall back, fight the blade, and commence anew.

The second kind, the half-serious, originates in this manner: Two students pass one another on the sidewalk; one accidentally pushes the other off; whereupon the latter turns round, and wants to know if he meant anything by that. No. 1 replies that he did or did not, just as No. 2 likes. No. 2 accordingly calls him a dumme Junge, and says he will fight him, ohne mütze und punkhosen (without cap and breeches).

The third kind I can illustrate by a duel which took place a few days before my arrival.

A Herr von S., for some supposed insult, had knocked down another student, and jumped on his face with the heels of his boots. The next morning there was a sabre duel at the Hirschgasse. On the third round, Von S. received a cut in the forehead which knocked him senseless. He was carried into an adjoining room, where, for two weeks, he lay vibrating between life and death. Soon after he began to recover, and at the expiration of the eighth week was just able to leave the house. I have since learned that he has been shot dead in a pistol duel.

The wounds received in the two first kinds of duels are always on the face, but never dangerous. It seems to me that they rather covet their possession.

Surely a German degree procured at the cost of so much contamination and danger of body and mind is dearly purchased.

THE CUIRASS.

SHE wound her arms lovingly
About his stalwart shoulder,
And she pressed his steel-clad bosom to her own,
And said, "May Heaven's mercy
Through the raging battle nurse ye;
For if you die, you will not die alone!"

He said, "See how thou'rt mirrored
In this stainless, polished cuirass;
Thus, so long as life is left me, shalt thy form
In my heart be brightly painted,
Like an image mild and sainted,
That will shield me through the battle and the storm!"

But when the sun was setting
O'er the black and distant mountains,
From the tower where she sat watching, she beheld
A cavalcade wind slowly
Through the gorges melancholy,
While the death-bell from the convent chapel knelled.

And the stalwart knight lay laxly
On his shield, upheld by bearers,
And the lances of his comrades were reversed;
And she knew by his great pallor
That his mighty heart of valour
Had ceased to hold the image that it nursed.

So she lay upon his bosom,
While the dimmed and bloody cuirass
No more mirrored her pale features; and she died—
And they buried them together
Where the purple-blossomed heather
Waved above them on the lonely mountain-side.

ALCOHOL was first invented and used to stain the cheeks of the ladies of Arabia—950 years ago. It still reddens the human face.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

THE MOST NOBLE THE MARQUIS OF LANSDOWNE, K.G., ETC. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY HERBERT WATKINS.

THE MARQUIS OF LANSDOWNE K.G. P.C., D.C.L.

THERE are some men who seem to belong to two eras, and to connect in their own person a present and a bygone generation. Such a man is the Marquis of Lansdowne. For a longer period than any living statesman, he has taken an active part in political life. Fifty-two years ago he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the administration known as "All the Talents," and which included Granville, Fox, Sheridan, Sidmouth, Erskine, and others of equal renown. One can hardly realise the immense sweep of time over which the public career of the noble marquis extends. We of this age think that the period of Earl Grey and the Reform Bill is somewhat far distant; that Canning is among the classics as to time; that Liverpool and Castlereagh days belong to the mists of history; and as for Pitt and Fox, we regard them with the veneration we offer to any other antiquities. But even in these remote periods, Lansdowne was a distinguished statesman—a cabinet minister, when the whole continent was allied against us.

The Marquis of Lansdowne was born in the year 1780. He was educated at Westminster, was a pupil of Dugald Stewart at Edinburgh, and matriculated at Cambridge. In 1802 he entered Parliament for Calne, and in 1806 he was returned for the University of Cambridge; triumphing over Lord Palmerston, by whom, however, he was defeated in the following year. In 1809 he was called to the upper house, by the death of his half-brother, as Marquis of Laundowne. There he joined the opposition, particularly distinguishing himself in resisting the measures adopted both before and after the Manchester massacre. Gradually, however, the moderate toryism of Canning began to make itself felt, and the opposition of the marquis underwent a proportionate mitigation, so that in 1827 he accepted a seat in the cabinet as Home Secretary. This, however, he only held for a few months, resigning the seals of office on the death of Canning, and being succeeded by the late Sir Robert Peel.

On the retirement of Wellington and Peel, in 1830, the Marquis of Lansdowne took the presidency of the council in the cabinet of Earl Grey, and was one of the most energetic in urging those political and social reforms which were then agitating the public mind. No doubt, with his great wealth, high descent, consistent bearing, and prestige, as a disciple of Fox, he might have guided the helm of state instead of Melbourne. But the marquis was content with the privileges, without the responsibilities, of position. The emoluments of office were to him no object, but a seat at the cabinet council table was agreeable to his taste. Accordingly, we find him filling under Melbourne the same post as under Grey, namely, that of Lord President of the Council; and he occupied the same post of dignified irresponsibility under Russell.

During the premiership of Grey and Melbourne, the presence of these peers in the upper house left the Marquis of Lansdowne leisure to take only such part as he pleased in public affairs; but, on the formation of the Russell cabinet, the conducting of public business in the Lords devolved upon him; and he who had for many a year been a mere holiday participator in parliamentary affairs, suddenly exhibited all the tact, boldness, promptitude, and dexterity befitting one aspiring to lead large bodies of his fellow-men.

On the occasion of his resigning office in 1852—to all appearance for ever—it was universally felt that the glowing eulogium passed on him by his political rival, the Earl of Derby, was something more than a routine courtesy. It was admitted on all hands that the marquis deserved everything that was said of him, and the best proof that he did so was conveyed in the circumstance which soon after followed. When the Derby government was overthrown, the Sovereign, and the leaders of the two parties embraced in the coalition ministry, resorted to the advice of the Marquis of Lansdowne. At his suggestion, all minor differences were merged, and Russell and Aberdeen agreed to meet in a spirit of generous mutual forbearance. The Marquis of Lansdowne himself accepted a seat in the cabinet, and was generally regarded as referee and umpire in every matter of dispute. He continued in office under Palmerston, and rendered good service to his former antagonist, with that pleasant equanimity which is so characteristic of him, and which no opposition can disturb.

The Marquis of Lansdowne is a munificent patron of art and literature. All his feelings are thoroughly English—cordial, generous, earnest. His princely mansion, Lansdowne House, is one of the richest storehouses of virtu. He has been vice-president of the Literary Fund for a great number of years; and in that capacity, as well as by his constant private liberality, he has relieved the wants of many an exhausted son of toil in the profession of letters. His high position, distinguished abilities, and princely resources, have ever ministered to the best interests of society. Leader of the moderate Whigs, he has never been blinded by party zeal, but has preserved that integrity and independence of character which have won for him golden opinions of all men.

CASCADE IN THE ISLAND OF MOBELI.

THE COMOROS.

In the Mozambique channel, between the African continent and Madagascar, is a cluster of small islands called the Comoros. They consist of the Great Comoro, the principal island of the group, Anjouan, Mobeli, Mayotte, and a number of islets around the coasts of each, like satellites attendant on the planets.

These islands are well watered, and produce most of the plants, and all the fruits, peculiar to India, together with those of that part of Africa in the neighbourhood of which the islands are situated.

Anjouan is inhabited by a colony of Arabs. The tradition is that the Prince of Yemen, after many a long and disastrous war, was at last completely vanquished and compelled to take refuge, with his family and a few of his faithful subjects, in the Comoro Islands; that a frightful storm destroyed all but a few of his vessels, and that he and those who were with him were wrecked on the coast of Anjouan, which he henceforward selected as his home, while he exercised lordship over the whole group. There, in barbaric state, a chief or sultan still holds his court; but his authority does not extend to the other islands. Each has its separate sovereignty, and its own individual history of intrigue and usurpation. Not long since a grand fête was given in honour of the arrival of some European visitors, who observed with surprise the magnificent decorations of the palace. Cloth of gold and silver, costly silks and precious stones, troops of richly caparisoned servants, tables spread with every oriental dainty, made up a picture like a scene for the Arabian nights. The same sort of splendour belongs to the potentates of the other islands, although not to the same extent as in Anjouan.

But the natural beauties of Anjouan are equalled, and in some degree surpassed by those of the neighbouring islands. A white little mosque situated to the north-east, and called the American chapel, serves as a beacon to seamen approaching the shore of Mobeli. Below it are coral reefs, which require careful navigation to avoid, especially as this part of the coast is exposed to terrible storms and sudden tempests. The island is watered by several rivers, which abound in fish, particularly carp and eels of extraordinary size and delicacy of flavour. Waterfalls add much to the varied beauty of the landscape, while the luxuriant vegetation by which they are surrounded affords an agreeable retreat during the heat of the day. The cascade represented in our engraving gives the reader an idea of this charming oasis. Verdure and freshness gratify the eye, the ear is pleased with the music of the waterfall, the air is redolent with perfume, and withal there is over all the scene that quietness and solemnity which insensibly fix the attention and elevate the thoughts.

The Great Comoro or Angazija is, as we have before noticed, the largest of the group. It is evidently of volcanic origin and is covered with lava; two lofty mountains, one to the north and the other to the south of the island afford a gentle descent to the sea, and from their summits is commanded a splendid view of the channel. This island boasts five-and-twenty towns. Moroni, the capital, stands on the south-west coast, and is the residence of Sultan Achmet.

The religion of the people is chiefly Mahomedan, and their habits resemble those of the Arabians more than those of any other people. Agriculture is conducted with considerable success, but on strictly conservative principles, while much ingenuity is shown in several of their manufactures. The pasture lands in all the islands are good, and the cattle of first-rate quality. Though most of the people carry formidable sabres, they are a harmless, inoffensive race, and entertain profound respect for the western powers. Although the Comoros are but little known, they are an exceedingly interesting and valuable group; they might indeed be rendered still more valuable were not the inhabitants jealous of any interference in their "good old rules."

RISE IN THE WORLD.—Now that a man may make money, and rise in the world, and associate himself, unrepined, with people once above him, not only is the natural discontentedness of humanity developed to an unheard-of extent, whatever a man's position, but it becomes a veritable shame to him to remain in the state he was born in, and everybody thinks it his duty to try to be a "gentleman." Persons who have any influence in the management of public institutions for charitable education know how common this feeling has become. Hardly a day passes but they receive letters from mothers who want all their six or eight sons to go to college, and make the grand tour in the long vacation, and who think there is something wrong in the foundation of society, because this is not possible. Out of every ten letters of this kind, nine will allege, as the reason of the writers' impotency, their desire to keep their families in such and such a "station of life." There is no real desire for the safety, the discipline, or the moral good of the children—only a horror of the inexpressible, pitiable calamity of their living a step or two lower on the mole-hill of the world—a calamity to be averted at any cost whatever of struggle, anxiety, and shortening of life itself.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,
SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER XL.

If there's a tear so soft and meek,
It would not stain an angel's cheek,
'Tis that that pious fathers shed
Above a duteous daughter's head.

WALTER SCOTT.

Ada had, indeed, now plenty to do.

Her poor father took up several hours of her now useful day.

She devoted a good deal of that time to writing for him, making calculations, reading letters from his tenants, and answering them.

She was getting his affairs into a desirable order. At school she had been the pride and glory of the writing and arithmetic master, and now all her "practice," "fractions," and smattering of algebra came into play.

Her poor father found inexpressible comfort in her sympathy and help were his only solace.

He was a kind-hearted man, and, but for his habitual excess, he would have been a clear-headed one; but his brain was generally clouded in the morning by the fumes of the choice wines he indulged in at night: his nerves were shattered, his brain affected, his whole constitution out of order.

He had always loved Ada; he doted on her now.

True Christianity shining on the human heart seems to have a sun-like power of bringing all the virtues into full bloom.

Ada's attendance at the Ragged School in Green Fields—and nothing ever prevented her attending daily as a voluntary teacher—seemed to have awakened in her heart long-slumbering feelings of filial piety, devotion, and duty.

Lady Pemberton was gone to Brighton, under the pretext that her health required sea air and change of scene, but in reality—at least, so Tarlatan told Pertinette—Sultana was the true cause of her ladyship's visit to the sea-side; "which," added Tarlatan, "as my own nerves require bracing, and Townley is of the party, I make no objection to the change of hair."

It was affecting to see the entire dependence on his young daughter of a man still in the prime of life—once a good scholar, who, but for wine, would have taken high honours; once an M.P., from whose natural eloquence his party expected much; but wine muddled his brain and unheeded his tongue;—a kind landlord, inheriting not merely the estates, but the popularity of his father, who was indeed—

"A fine old English gentleman,
All of the olden time."

But, as his son never went to bed sober, he never rose with a head fit for business.

His steward—a hard man, but an active one—got all the power, for he did all the work, until Ada, under the new influences that she owed (under heaven) to Ellen, Jem Goodman, and the Green Fields Ragged School, just in time, took her father's affairs in hand.

The unjust steward was agast. He had to render an account, and a very strict one, too.

His own system of grinding down the poor, to swell his own hoards, was exposed.

The rents were lowered instead of raised. The poor, old Trotters, who were on the eve of separation and the workhouse, were reinstated in their little farm.

Skinflint, the steward, was dismissed; and, until a suitable person could be found to supply his place, Ada was her father's steward.

And the poor of Pemberton blessed the Christian heart and hand that dealt so wisely and so kindly with them all.

Her father blessed her, Heaven blessed her, her little ragged pupils blessed her.

Ada has plenty to do. Where are the weary hours that seemed so slow and so heavy of wing? where is the listless apathy, the morbid, restless ennui, the fretful impatience, the void, the craving? The happy day begun at six, and glided by the morning sun, freshened by the morning breeze, is too short for the pleasant duties of her Christian life.

Pertinette has given warning. Early rising, ragged schools, book-keeping—all these things are odious to Pertinette. She told Tarlatan, in a letter she wrote to her at Brighton, that "Miss Hada was sunk below contempt. Her hours was the low hours of the kennel"—Pertinette meant the cantille—all elegant pleasures had given way to the lowest pursuits. That "Miss Pemberton was 'and and glove with a sweep; and when she wasn't haddin' hup sums, like a butcher's wife, to please her crackbrained par, she was going about with that methody Miss Ellen St. Ange, to ragged schools and refuges, and at last had got off to Newgate! So," ended Pertinette, "I'm quite thrown away on a mistress of such low tastes. She dresses like a Quaker; nothink comes down to me—there's nothink I'd disfigure myself by wearing. Mr. Skinflint's turned out of his stewardship at Pemberton: a man who did know a fine woman when he saw her, and made the place tolerable at Christmas; and I'm so sick of the whole concern, I've given warning: and Miss P. (as used to be quite hunder my thumb, and do just as I pleased, and not be able to move without me) is so hardened, she don't care a pin. So, as Lady Vacant Stare wants a maid, I shall offer; and as there can't be no impediment in my character, you'll hear of me next from Park-lane.

"With best respects to Mr. Townley, and a good smart pinch to that rampant heathen of a Sultana,

"I remain

"Your friend and wellwisher,

"PERTINETTE PINK."

CHAPTER XLI.

"That which is wanted to hold together the bursting bonds of the different classes of this country, is not kindness, but SYMPATHY."—The words that JUDGE TALFOURD died in uttering.

THE day after their visit to Apple Blossom, and the memorable vencontre of Mrs. Golightly with the publishers, Amy, Ellen, and the champion of her sex, had arranged, after visiting the Green Fields Ragged School as usual, to repair to Newgate.

They wished to see, not only that prison, mixed up as it was in their minds with so many recollections and associations, but the wretched man whose trial was fast approaching at the Central Criminal Court, Ben Darrell.

Mr. St. Ange, Ellen's father, had at her request written to one of the sheriffs for permission to see the prison, and had received a most kind and courteous reply, granting the favour asked.

Jem Goodman was to meet them at the Green Fields Ragged School, and escort them to Newgate.

Ada's hours were indeed become as Pertinette had said, those of the "kennel." Ada was in earnest.

Ever since little Hope had addressed her as "teacher," Ada had by constant and zealous attendance, whenever it were possible without neglecting some duty more sacred and important still, taken her place as voluntary teacher of a class.

Just at this time the young and delicate governess who generally presided at the class in which were Hope Evermore and Merry Blossom, was taken so ill that she actually could not attend, and Ada, owing to her great interest in Hope, was delighted to be asked to fill the vacant chair.

The word "teacher" no longer conveyed a reproach to her heart, no longer sounded as a knell to her ear.

Ada was very gentle, sympathising, and cheerful. She had been highly educated in all but the one thing needful, and that one thing she had now acquired.

The little girls of her class (peculiarly alive, as most children are, to amiability of temper, kindness of heart, and fascination of manner) had grown very fond of Ada.

It was affecting to one, so decidedly of the unemonstrative class (for the higher we go, the colder we get, in the figurative as well as the actual sense), to see hollow eyes brighten at her approach, and a tinge of colour mount to the little thin cheeks, which, in infancy, should have been so round, and were mostly so wan, and the bones looking so high and sharp.

Not that this was the case with Hope, Merry, or even little Ness; and as for blue-eyed baby Ben, so well had he thriven with his kind nurse Apple Blossom, that he would have carried off the prize at a baby-show in America.

On the morning of the projected visit to Newgate, Ada found her little class unusually demure: even "Potato-heels," alias Carrotty Meg, alias Maggie Grimes, did not shuffle her feet, scratch her head, or bite her nails as much as usual.

Little Ness seemed to be an object of especial solicitude. Larky Grigg nodded kindly at her several times, and contrived to give her a bite of an apple which his mother had put in his pocket; Hope stroked her hair, and lifted her on to the bench; and even Merry, wild, thoughtless Merry, spoke gently to her and forbore to tease her.

These little ones knew that "the ladies" were going to Newgate, and that they were sure to see Ness's father there. Her dad in prison—for the murder of her mother, too!

There is no class so sympathising as the very poorest; and, young as they were, they had the feelings of their class, and they pitied Ben Darrell's little daughter—and they showed their pity, too, in a manner which, when Ada fully understood their conduct, surprised and touched her.

Just before Ada prepared to leave her class—in answer to a message from Ellen, saying it was time to go—little Hope came up to her, with a blush that suffused her cherub face and neck; and, raising her large blue eyes, moist with tears, she said—

"Teacher, you be going to see Ness's dad, beant' you?"

"Yes, my dear," said Ada.

Hope made a sign to Larky, who, as his class was over, came at her call, with a book wrapped up carefully in paper.

"We've put all our money together, teacher," said Hope, taking the book from Larky, "to buy Ness's dad this Testament. Little Ness have put a sixpence out of the shilling the lady gave her, and the master, Mr. Stephen, his very self, have writ all our names. See, teacher, how beautiful it's wrote:—"

"To Ben Darrell, in his great trouble.

From NESSY DARRELL,

HOPE EVERMORE.

MERRY BLOSSOM, and

GREGORY BLOSSOM;

"Hoping he'll seek and find comfort in this book, and our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for sinners."

"Will you give it him, please teacher, with our love; and this too, please teacher," said Hope, taking out of her pocket a paper-bag of sweets. "These is sure to cheer him up a bit—there's bull's-eyes, and toffy, and barley-sugar drops, and elicampane, and all-sorts. He can't be off liking 'em."

"Do give 'em to him, ma'am," said Larky; "and tell him, be it how it may, Ness and baby Ben sha'n't ever want for a friend while Larky Grigg lives," the brave, kind boy colouring scarlet, and the water sparkling in his dark eyes, drew himself up, and his broad chest heaved; and as he clenched his well-made, hard-working hand, it did not seem an idle boast, boy as he was.

"And I'll take care of them, too," said Hope, quietly, but earnestly.

"And so will I," said Merry, who meant it at the time, but was far too volatile to mean anything long.

Hope then led Ness up to Ada, just as a mother might have done, and said—

"Little Ness wants to send a kiss and a message to her daddy." Whispering to her the words, "My love and duty to poor dad, and tell him to put his trust in the Lord, and he will save him," which Ness repeated after her, and then lifted her up, with her arms round her waist from behind, as children do, that she might kiss Ada, as proxy for her father.

This affecting little scene over, Ada joined Ellen St. Ange, Mrs. Golightly, and Jem Goodman.

At the entrance of the street, they found their carriage waiting, and drove towards Newgate; and as Jem went on foot, they were some time at the prison gate before he joined them; but Ada and Ellen found food for thought and observation as they stood at that dread entrance, and Mrs. Golightly took out of her large black bag the MS. of her "Rights and Wrongs of Woman," and began to con over some choice, pet bits to herself; intending, if an opportunity occurred, and she found it practicable, to read them to the governor.

It was with a feeling of deep awe that Ada and Ellen found themselves before the dark, frowning, and massive gateway of the prison of Newgate. That gateway has in itself something dread, solemn, and imposing; and countless associations increase this impression.

On the handsome granite blocks of which it is composed, the smoke and soot of the great city have thrown a dark veil which make it seem a Niobe sitting in stone, and shrouded in black, at the entrance of the dread abode of bold Crime, pallid Fear, weeping Penitence, and wailing Woe.

The ladies did not choose to drive up in a gay carriage, with powdered footmen in dashing liveries, all tags, sticks, and plush, to that solemn retreat of trouble and terror, or that their well-fed, rosy, gaily-dressed, and smiling lacqueys should insult by their insouciance and careless ease the group of anxious, pale, shame-bowed, tear-stained, terror-stricken friends of the prisoners within, who had assembled without, waiting for admittance.

Very, very shabby was the garb of some of these "winter friends." But there they were; for the poor are hardly ever known to forsake a friend in trouble. What a noble example do they set in this to the "summer friends" of the fashionable world.

They made way for the ladies, poor, dear souls, though many of them were in tears and ashamed to look up, since their nearest and dearest had brought disgrace on their honest names.

Mrs. Golightly was giving herself a few airs, for she thought she recognised among some of the younger women, wives whose husbands had been committed to Newgate for attempting to murder them; and she was very severe on what she called "the spaniel temper" of her sex.

But Ellen and Ada tried to quiet her, lest she should hurt the feelings of any to whom a harsh word might be the overflowing drop of that cup of sorrow, just then filled to the brim.

As usual whenever they went among their poorer brothers and sisters, they found an instinctive courtesy, a true spirit of politeness, and a wish to pay a delicate deference (which they would never have dreamt of requiring or expecting) to their rank, sex, and station.

"I hope, young lady," said a poor, bent, old widow to Ada, seeing her cheek grow white and her eyes fill with tears, as she gazed at the grated archway, and the strong iron spikes, "I hope you haven't the sick-pain at your young heart that's heavy at my old one. I hope no one very dear to you is inside."

"No," said Ada, gently; "I am going to see the prison, but there is a man inside in whom I take an interest. He killed his wife, it is true, but not intentionally, I am certain. He was drunk, and she tried to pull him away from the public-house; but he didn't know what he did, and never meant to kill her."

"His name, miss?" faltered the old widow.

"Ben Darrell," said Ada.

"And you think he didn't mean to kill her?" cried the old woman, eagerly.

"I know he did not—I saw the blow struck."

"Bless you, bless you, for those words—Heaven bless you, miss!" said the poor old widow, falling on her knees on the pavement, and clasping Ada's hand. "Forgive me, miss, for making so free; but I'm his mother. The bad news found me in bed, very bad. But, though he's not been much of a son to me, since he took to drink, though he wor a good son afore, his trouble makes me feel I'm a mother still, miss: I can't think of by-gones, and he in Newgate."

"Poor creature!" said Ada; "where have you come from?"

"I've walked from Stratford-le-Bow, miss. I'm in the union there, but they let me out to come and see him. If they hadn't, I'd have gone wild. Oh, miss, he was as fine a boy onst as you'd see in a summer's day. He'd his poor father's eyes, miss, as black as a sloe, and such curly brown hair, and such features, and skin—he beat the waxwork, he did; and, lor, his heart wor tender then as a gal's; and his smile, it felt like sunshine in the dear old cottage by the brook. How he loved his poor mother then: every penny he got at work he brought me. He couldn't bear to see me drudge. I wor always a poor sickly body, arter I became a lone widder; and, when he'd had a hard day's work, he'd tidy up the place, and wait on me, as if I'd been a lady. Oh, my—Oh, my—and now he's here. Oh, miss," she added, "up to seventeen he wor my pride and comfort; and then, as he could sing a good song, he was axed out, where drink wor given him; and he, as had never dranked nothink but water, or a cup o' tea, took to it kindly; but, for a time, love kept him mostly sober, for the prettiest girl in the village, his master's daughter, fell in love with my boy, and well she might, there warn't such another far or near. But arter they got married, he took to drink reg'lar, and here's the end of it."

"Are you not very tired?" said Ada.

"I'm fit to die, miss. I'm a poor, broken-hearted cripple, that's what I am; and this will just bring me to the grave; and no matter, I'm no use to no one now; and he've got babbies, too."

"They are cared for," said Ada. "Would you like to see them?"

"I should and I shouldn't, miss. I can't do nothink for 'em. All I can do is to creep back to the union and die. Ah, I little thought onst I'd die in a union, and be buried by the parish. I wor the prettiest gal, and the tidiest, far or near. My father wor sexton and parish clerk o' Stoneleigh, and, when I married Ben Darrell, feather to my poor lad inside, I had two hundred pounds o' my own; but Ben set up a small chandler's shop, and matters went wrong, and he died broken-hearted, and I'm sure to do the same. I as wor—"

Ada, seeing there would be no end to her regrets, gave the poor, afflicted widow half-a-sovereign, and with it words so kind and gentle, that they outweighed the welcome gift.

At this moment Jem Goodman came up; the massive, spiked gate opened, and our party entered Newgate.

It felt cool, and seemed dark to those who came out of the sunny streets and breezy, morning air.

The first impression on the minds of the ladies was the hopelessness, the impossibility of escape to those committed as prisoners. Everything seemed so strong, so solid, so immovable, as if no Samson could uproot those pillars, or remove a stone; as if, indeed, it all must last until the elements should melt with fervent heat, and the heavens be as a scroll.

And yet human will, human ingenuity, human craft, and almost superhuman perseverance, have more than once contrived and effected escape even from Newgate!

But the first impression of every one entering that dread court is that those gates, like Dante's, shut out hope in this world for ever.

Our party had to inscribe their names in a book kept for the purpose; and, while they were doing so, the governor, to whom they had sent their introduction, came himself to receive them. They were very pale, and almost trembling, with a deep sense of all that had been suffered in times past and present, within those dark, strong walls.

It was cheering to them to see in the governor not, as they expected, a stern, austere man—a personification rather of justice than mercy—but one on whose broad brow benevolence sat as on a throne; and who, whilst his bearing and countenance denoted an indomitable will, and a firmness that nothing could shake, had that sympathetic expression in his eyes and smile which showed that justice in him would always be tempered by mercy; and that if he was a rock to guard the miserable beings under his keeping, he was also one to protect them;—there could be no escape from his dominion, but whatever rights, privileges, and indulgences the discipline of the prison allowed, one felt sure he would take care the prisoners should enjoy.

He was a very tall and very handsome man, with a military air, which showed that he had served his queen. Our party found him extremely courteous and well-informed, and with that dash of humour which brightens up and helps on the solemn drama of life, even where—as in Newgate—it is one long tragedy.

Mrs. Golightly—although by profession and practice a man-hater—was, in spite of herself, impressed in favour of one so polite and kind; and who, out of regard to her sex and age, perhaps, more than to herself, answered all her questions, and escorted her and her young charges all over the prison, giving them the most interesting and graphic account of everything that excited their curiosity, or awakened their sympathy; and to heads that could think and hearts that could feel, what was there that did not excite their liveliest curiosity, and awaken their deepest sympathy?

At the very onset, Jem Goodman put to Mrs. Golightly a question as to whether his services were required, since he wished, if not, to have a long talk with Ben Darrell, and to introduce his poor mother to him?

Mrs. Golightly—glancing at the commanding and stalwart form of the governor, and seeing plenty of turnkeys in attendance, who looked very like policemen—expressed herself satisfied to dispense with Jem's presence, remarking, "She was no coward."

There, in a small room, the walls of which were all of glass, like a conservatory, a pale young man was in earnest conference with a gentleman, who, on account of the peculiarity of the case, had been summoned by the prisoner's solicitor to a personal interview with Ben Darrell, and in whom Ada recognised the celebrated counsel——. She had seen him at gay dinner-parties, and danced with him at gayer balls; but she had no idea of the earnestness, the fervour of his nature, till she saw him in close consultation with a man whose life would probably depend on his defence.

He did not see Ada—he saw nothing but the pale, anxious face of the wretched culprit before him.

The governor explained to the ladies that the prisoners were only permitted to receive their counsel in that glazed room, in order that all that passed might be distinctly seen by an officer in attendance.

Indeed, next to the impossibility of escape—which was the first idea which the interior of Newgate conveyed to the mind—came the ever-haunting sense of an eye upon you night and day.

Ah, if they had but remembered that the eye of the Creator is ever upon them, they need not have been thus haunted by that of the creature! Of course this watchfulness is necessary, especially after condemnation, and most especially in cases where the probability of a sentence of death drives the wretched culprit to despair.

There were holes in the wall communicating from the staircase with the prisoner's pallet.

He could never, even in the dead of the night, sleeping or waking, feel sure that he was not watched; but he could not know for certain that he was.

The governor led them through the kitchen, where a much better dinner than most of them deserved was being prepared for the prisoners (would that the poor in our unions fared like our prisoners). And Ada's heart grew sick and faint, when she heard that on their way to execution the prisoners always passed through that kitchen.

With that great power of realising the sufferings of others which is the secret of all human sympathy, Ada felt her steps falter, and her strength fail, as her small foot, in its delicate gray kid boot, stepped where tread so slowly and heavily the cold feet of those who know that in a few moments, before assembled multitudes, they, the instant before alive, and as far as the body goes, well; conscious, breathing, hearts beating, heads thinking, and pulses throbbing, will be strangled by a rope, while their eyes are blinded, their necks broken, and their bodies in the rude air swinging. No wonder that at these thoughts, Ada's cheeks and lips grew white, and her tears fell like rain.

Our party went into all the cells, a turnkey preceding them, who caused the prisoner or prisoners to draw up like soldiers being drilled.

The governor always kindly said, on entering, "Well, my man," or, "My man, have you anything to say to me?" and several times the question elicited a request for paper, and permission to write to a wife or a mother. It was always granted kindly and readily.

The cells did not at all realise Ada's "Ann Radcliffe" ideas of cells. They were more like dormitories in continental colleges—large, lofty, airy, very clean, and, to minds at ease, almost comfortable.

The governor asked each prisoner for what he had been sent there, and by far the greater number answered for "passing," that is for passing bad money.

They all looked healthy, and, though a blush of shame crossed the faces of some, especially one or two who had been gentlemen and were in for forgery, they generally did not look very unhappy or discontented.

They answered the question as to the crime they were accused of with great alacrity, and some almost cheerfully, perhaps fearing the visitors might imagine they had committed murder, or done something compared to which "passing," in their opinion, was a peccadillo. It was evident the governor was very popular, and any little grievance was told him with a trust and confidence, that spoke volumes for the kindness of his heart and gentleness of his temper.

They visited all the wards, the female as well as the male.

There were but few female prisoners, and even these few were not in for great crimes, and seemed, for the most part, plain, homely women of the lowest orders. But there was one, a pretty young woman, who was apart, alone, and in tears. The matron, a very kind and lady-like person, said, "She heard yesterday that her child was dangerously ill."

"Oh, if it should die!" sobbed the young mother. "You have not heard of it to-day?" said the governor, kindly.

"No, no, governor!" said the girl. "Oh, I dread to hear!"

"We are expecting every moment to hear," said the sympathising matron.

"What are you in for?" asked the governor.

The girl blushed crimson.

"I was drunk, sir, when I done it."

"Did what?"

"I bit off the ear of the policeman that took me in charge. Oh, my child, my child!"

"See what drink has brought you to," said the governor.

At this moment a message came to the matron: "The child was better—it was out of danger."

"Thank God!" said the young mother, falling on her knees. "Oh, governor, oh, matron, and you ladies, hear me swear, as soon as I get out, I will not touch drink again."

Ada and Ellen then spoke to the governor of Ben Darrell, and heard, with a shudder, that the governor thought he would be found guilty, and sentenced to death.

Ada told him all she had seen.

He said he thought the evidence that he had threatened to do for them both (brother and sister), would be looked upon as constituting evidence of "malice prepense, and intent to do murder," and would probably hang him. "The legislature is so resolved to put down wife-beating, leading as it so often does to wife-murder," he said, "that I fear he has no chance."

"And serve him right too," said Mrs. Golightly.

"I only wish a few more examples could be made. Pray, governor," she added, "how does he conduct himself?"

"Sometimes he is docile enough, and tries to read his bible and prays fervently," said the governor; "at others his despair is frightful to behold, and his violence is such we are obliged to handcuff him. Indeed, when you go into his cell, you will see the fire-place is grated; this has been done since, in a paroxysm of mental agony, possibly maddening to his brain, he threw himself suddenly on the fire, and before he could be removed, had severely burnt his head and face."

Just at this moment Jem Goodman, who was well known to the governor, who had a great regard for him, came up, and taking the governor aside, spoke earnestly with him for a few minutes.

On his return to the ladies, the governor said—"He has just had an interview with his mother. Poor old soul! she, it seems, fainted, and he was much moved. Our kind matron has taken her into her room to give her some refreshment. She had better visit him again in a day or two," he said; "they were both too agitated, I hear, for the interview to be prolonged with safety."

In one court the ladies saw numbers of men walking round and round rapidly, earnestly, silently, heads stooping forwards, their eyes bent on the ground. In another a young, handsome man, of elegant exterior, paced the court by himself with downcast looks and folded arms. He had been junior partner in a merchant's firm, and he had forged acceptances. Although he did not raise his eyes, a sudden crimson blush betrayed his consciousness that visitors saw him in his shame and agony.

"A lovely young wife visits him whenever the rules permit. She is awaiting him now," said the governor.

"Alas!" cried Mrs. Golightly, "what misery these wretches entail on their poor wives!"

"From what I hear," said the governor, "it was mistaken love for her led him to sin. He married above him. She is of a noble family. Her friends looked down on the young merchant. He, knowing how all classes in England revere wealth and what is often falsely supposed to be its evidence—lavish expenditure, launched out, lived like a prince, gave parties to dukes and duchesses, forged the names of some great correspondents of his house, and is here! But his wife does not forsake him, though all the world beside does!"

"I am now going to take you into the most interesting cell of all," said the governor, leading the way to one where three boys, two of them small and young children, were confined.

On the table were books and slates. Juvenile prisoners are taught in Newgate; some, perhaps, who have never been taught before.

To the usual question, one who looked cunning and hardened, answered, "For passing;" the next, "For stealing a neck of mutton."

"First offence?"

"No, sir."

"What was the first?"

"I took a bit o' bacon, sir."

"And being let off for that, you thought you'd escape with a neck of mutton."

The boy hung his head.

"And you, boy?" asked the governor, of a pretty, rather innocent-looking boy; "what are you in for?"

"I took six apples, sir."

A painful silence followed.

The ladies did not know whether it would be right to comment on the sad system of juvenile imprisonment before the governor of the prison, all kind and discriminating as he was.

But all felt that it was a cruel error in judges, for a fault which in a school or nursery would be punished as boys' faults are, to doom a child to Newgate, and brand him for ever as a felon; or, in the language of his class, a gaol-bird.

Reformatories are the places for juvenile offenders; and Ada thought, had he been at a ragged school, he would never have stolen those apples at all.

They then visited the chapel, which in Newgate had so many solemn and harrowing associations; since there, those on the brink of eternity first, perhaps, had felt a ray of hope lighten the despair of their hearts, and had first given a serious thought to their Saviour and their souls; had first felt their sins were indeed as scarlet, and resolved to dip them in that blood of the Lamb which would make them white as wool.

On leaving the chapel, Ada asked to see Ben Darrell, and told the governor of the children's message and presents, showing him the book, the comfits, and briefly sketching Hope, Larky, Merry, little Ness, and blue-eyed Ben.

Jem Goodman had returned to the wretched man, whose eternal salvation he hoped might be secured, even if his wretched, wasted body were doomed to perish on the scaffold.

The governor—who had listened with great interest to Ada, as she told him of the children, and showed him their presents—consented to their visiting Ben Darrell; and, after showing them a curious collection (interesting to all, but especially so to phrenologists) of the heads of all the notorious criminals that had been confined in Newgate, and taking them into the kitchens and places where the irons, handcuffs, &c., were kept—he sent to summon Jem Goodman to escort them to Ben Darrell's presence.

Before they left the place where the irons shone so bright and looked so terrible, they saw those of sterner times—massive, heavy, torturing they must have been—those of the present day looking like bracelets and linklets in comparison. And yet Dick Turpin had escaped in spite of those very identical irons, and so had Jack Sheppard.

"How much more merciful is the system now!" said Ellen St. Ange.

"Yes," replied the governor; "what used to be done by irons and coercion, we do now by discipline, moral power, and constant watchfulness. But we have still one great want—one that will be supplied ere long—a separate cell for each prisoner. While we are obliged to put them together, they corrupt each other. Solitude is the nurse of thought, and thought of penitence. Bad as people are, they would be much worse if they were never alone; and such companionship as that of criminals can lead to no good, and must do much harm. But in all things we are doing away as much as possible with brute force, and substituting moral and mental discipline."

"Mind against matter any day," said Mrs. Golightly, about to take out her MS.; but just at this moment Jem Goodman came to escort them to Ben Darrell's cell.

The prisoners generally saw their friends through a grating; but as the wretched Ben Darrell was too ill, from the effects of his burns, to leave his pallet, he was allowed to see them in his cell.

The governor himself, who took a lively interest in Ben, led the way.

(To be continued.)

PLEASURE BORN OF PAIN.

THERE is a pleasure born of pain
When all its outward signs depart,
A triumph, when the steadfast brain
Floats calmly o'er the struggling heart.

By slow degrees this pleasure came;
Just as a little rill of rain
Flows slowly o'er a level plain
Before it earns itself a name.

When Hope had folded up her wings,
And Sorrow had me by the hand
To lead me to the Tearful Land
Where Memory in secret stings,—

When Pain had license to bestow
Her malison upon my heart,
And I had borne my bitter part,
And tasted of the fruit of wo,—

When suffering with sore defeat,
And wounded by the shafts of Shame,
I sought to hide my guilty name,
And gathered ashes round my feet,—

Then, then it was, just when the night
Was darkest, that there came to me
The first wave of that endless sea
Whose waters give a calm delight.

There was a pleasure for my pain,
There was a triumph in defeat,
The bitter slowly changed to sweet;
And reason was enthroned again.

Above the breakers of my heart
A calmness floated, such as gives
A strength to him who truly lives,
And firmly acts his little part.

The pain—the struggle—were not long;
I heeded not their transient power,
For in that short and bitter hour
I learned to "suffer and be strong."

MARRIAGE.—A bachelor was saying, "Next to no wife, a good wife is best." "Nay," said a gentlewoman, "next to a good wife, no wife is the best." We wish to all married people the outward happiness which (anno 1605) happened to a couple in the city of Delph, in Holland, living most lovingly together seventy-five years in wedlock, till the man being one hundred and three, and the woman ninety-nine years of age, died within three hours of each other, and were buried in the same grave.

CYRUS AND ASTYAGES.

PICTURES FROM HISTORY.

THE CHILD'S REPROOF; OR, CYRUS AND ASTYAGES.

In a former number of this journal, in speaking of the wealthy King Croesus, mention was made of Cyrus, the conqueror of that unfortunate rich man. We have here a picture from the life of Cyrus himself—one of those instructive glimpses into the manners and customs of antiquity which history affords us here and there, among much that is apocryphal and of doubtful authenticity.

Six hundred years before the birth of our Saviour, Persia was the most powerful empire in the world. When Greece consisted but of a few struggling republics, and Rome was only a small city of half-civilised warriors, the Persian monarchy was a large and flourishing state, maintaining large armies, practising all the arts of civilisation, and giving laws to a great number of provinces. In the year B.C. 559 was born the greatest king who ever sat on the Persian throne—the man who put an end to the Babylonian empire, and to the long, dreary Jewish captivity of seventy years—whose fame will live in history when the remembrance of other conquerors and kings has vanished from the face of the earth—for his name is chronicled in the imperishable pages of the Bible. This man was Cyrus, justly called the Great.

In the time of Cyrus the Persian government was entirely of an absolute nature. The king possessed supreme and uncontrolled authority over all his subjects. Life and death hung upon the word of his mouth; the wealth or poverty of every man in his dominions depended entirely upon his sovereign will. Thus, it became a matter of grave import that the future possessor of such unbridled sway should be properly prepared for the duties of sovereignty; and from each Persian prince's fifth year his education began. The royal children were committed to the care of the magi, or priests, for the improvement of their minds, and the formation of their moral character. They were at the same time trained to the use of arms, and accustomed to witness the administration of justice, that they might learn to respect the laws.

On such principles had the education of the young prince Cyrus been conducted, until he reached his twelfth year; and then he was sent to live for a time at the family of his grandfather—Astyages, king of the Medes—that he might learn something of the ways and customs of that monarch's court.

Accustomed as the boy-prince had been to habits of temperance and moderation, he was not a little surprised at the strange customs he saw practised in his grandfather's palace. Each day concluded with a festival, and the young guest was first surprised and then shocked to see the courtiers, and even their royal master himself, act as if they were deprived of reason before the conclusion of the banquet. They shouted, danced, and sang—spoke words of idle import, and behaved more like riotous madmen than a company of sage and highborn personages.

For a few days the young prince looked on in silence; but after a week had elapsed he came forward, and, to the astonishment of Astyages, desired to be invested with the dignity of cupbearer to the king.

"I shall fulfil the duties of my office better than Saccas, your present cupbearer," he alleged.

Amused at the fancy of the young lad, Astyages granted his request.

"Ho, Saccas," he cried, "thou art a lost man! Cyrus hath taken away thine office."

The custom of the court required that the cupbearer should fill the king's goblet from a great golden vessel; that he should then pour a few drops from the goblet into his left hand and drink them, before presenting the cup to the king.

Cyrus rose from the table with a serious face. He seized the cup and wiped it with a silken napkin, as he had observed Saccas, his predecessor, had done; then he filled it with wine, and, taking the goblet between his thumb and forefinger, handed it at once to his grandfather.

"Thou hast not learnt thine office," said Astyages, laughing; "for thou hast omitted the most important point. I must see thee taste the wine."

"I forgot nothing," said the boy, quietly.

"Wouldst thou then change the custom of the Medes, my fair grandson? Why didst thou not taste the wine, as Saccas hath always done?"

"I feared," replied Cyrus, "that Saccas had poisoned it."

Astyages began to laugh anew.

"How!" he cried, with feigned anger; "wouldst thou poison me, Saccas?"

"He hath done so already," interrupted Cyrus.

Now the king laughed yet more loudly. "So Saccas, the friend of my heart, hath poisoned me!" he shouted. "But tell me, Cyrus, how did it occur?"

There was no answering smile on the boy's handsome face as the king looked smilingly at him. Stretching forth his hand, he gravely replied, "I have watched the poison day by day. These seven days hath Saccas poured out wine for thee, O king, and for these thy guests; and when ye had drunk of the cup, your senses departed. Ye shouted, and sprang, and spake words of foolishness—yea, a child would not have gone unproved had he uttered in his folly the words ye spake. Thy guests forgot that they were thy servants, and thou, O Astyages, that thou wert a king. How shall I say, then, that the wine hath not been poisoned that can thus turn to foolishness the words of grave and aged men?"

Astyages laughed no more. That reproof, uttered by the lips of a child, had sunk deep into his heart, and into the heart of each gray-bearded toper at his table. The wine-cup no longer circled that night at the Median monarch's feast. He and his guests sat abashed before the heroic boy, of whose later years we read in the unchangeable page of Holy Writ, that "The Lord stirred up the heart of Cyrus, king of Persia, that the same king Cyrus made a decree to build up again the house of God."

A GRECIAN sage being asked why philosophers always ran after rich men, while rich men never courted philosophers, replied, "Because the latter know they want money, while the former haven't sense enough to know they want wisdom."

The Matron.

NO. XXIII.

I HAVE recently been speaking of evils from without, but inward or mental shocks will sometimes produce apparent death by what is called a concussion of the brain; and a person who had never seen such an attack might believe it had really proved fatal. Strange to say, these shocks may be occasioned by joy as well as grief. So bear this in mind, that if you have any very important news to tell your friend or neighbour you should prepare him for it by degrees; for all sudden and violent emotions of the heart endanger life. But here I must beg my readers not to suppose, from rules given in the last chapter, and a few added here (before I resume the subject of cheap cookery), that I recommend doing without medical aid in alarming cases. Far from it. The sooner a doctor can be procured the better. My directions are only given to enable you to make the most of every moment that passes, ere a doctor arrives.

A little knowledge will prevent your being so scared that you are incapable of action. Perhaps some of you have read how a young country girl applied the knowledge she had picked up somehow or other to the saving the life of a fellow creature? She was in the field with a labouring man, who accidentally cut an artery in his arm. He would very soon have bled to death, as the arteries communicate immediately with the heart, but the young girl slipped off her garter, and with it tightly bound the bleeding arm above the wound. Thus she checked the bleeding until further aid could be procured, and saved the poor man's life. But had she been quite ignorant, she would not have known in the least what to do.

We were speaking of violent shocks producing unconsciousness. First, untie strings of every description, in order that nothing may interfere with the breathing; and here remark particularly, that this should be done in fits of every description, whether faintings, hysterics, apoplexy, or insensibility from drunkenness—in fact, in any case of apparent death, or in what the doctors call suspended animation.

In unconsciousness from a shock, raise the head gently; ascertain if there is bleeding from any part, and, having put hot bottles to the feet, apply smelling salts to the nose. Should any one near you fall down in a fit of apoplexy, and you may be sure it is apoplexy if the following symptoms show themselves, viz.—if the breathing is slow and snorting, the pupils enlarged; and if, on tickling the feet, no sensation is evidently produced—while you are waiting for the surgeon, and after you have loosened every string, &c., see that the head is raised. Put mustard and hot water to the feet, and, if you have them at hand, put leeches to the temples; if not, bathe them with cold water. I cannot leave this painful subject without alluding to another equally painful, perhaps more so—suspended animation, caused not by accident or illness, but by the intention of some rash spirit, bewildered, perhaps maddened, by suffering.

Dreadful as is the idea of suicide, there is no one who reads this paper who does not know it is a reality.

Supposing water to have been the element sought by the deluded youth or maiden seeking an end (alas! the beginning) to her sorrows, on extricating the body the rules given respecting the apparently drowned should of course be followed; but, if hanging has been selected, you must in the first instance loose the cord, or whatever suspended the person, and, in addition to the means used for suspended animation in water, apply eight or ten leeches to the temples.

We now turn to the less serious but very important subject of cheap living. According to request, I shall endeavour to assist families living on incomes varying from nine to thirteen shillings a week; and I shall apply the experience I have gained at home and abroad in furnishing them with bills of fare that shall comprise nice, wholesome food, while at the same time it shall be suited to their straitened circumstances. However, before I advise them about cookery, I should like to give them a few hints on making and saving as much as possible.

I first address myself to mothers. I take it for granted that you and your husband are industrious people, and are ever on the look-out for honest gain; but is this the case with your children? Even little children may be made very useful, if parents really endeavour to make them so. This remark applies especially to children in the country. They may be trained to find real pleasure in collecting, from hedges and fields, what, but for their industrious little fingers, might be left quite unappropriated.

Violets, primroses, cowslips, watercresses—all these "wildlings of nature" are by common consent free to the children of the poor, and the rich are often pleased to purchase them. Thus, while idle, ill-trained boys and girls are fighting, or tormenting dumb animals, sensible children are finding much more real pleasure in making their little collections, which they turn into money that is actually made to contribute to the improvement of their food and clothing. Always make your children feel pleased and happy in thus helping their parents and themselves. Praise them for so doing, and you will soon find they take a real delight in becoming thus early the "architects of their own fortune."

On this subject, and others connected with the all-important subject of living comfortably on a very small income, I shall enlarge in the next chapter of the MATRON.

PIN-MONEY AND NEEDLE-MONEY.

My lovely friend, Clara Ronderton, has received, in lieu of the balance of pin-money to which she was entitled from her generous father, "a few trifles" from Tiffany's. £50 a month is the bagatelle on which this economical young lady contrives to dress herself, and supply herself with gloves, pomades, and extraits Lubin; and to her credit be it observed that she is rarely seen in rags. Such is the fruit of good training and early habits of moderation and self-denial.

Strange vicissitudes of fortune! Thirty years ago, Josiah Ronderton was a porter in the house of Stiggs & Co., Grocers. Everybody remembers the great house of Stiggs, whose operations could change the face of the market in a day. Josiah was a steady, hard-working young man, who was thoroughly trusted by his employers, and who employed his evenings in acquiring a knowledge of book-keeping and commerce. After working as a porter for several years, Josiah one day accosted the head of the house, old Dave Stiggs—

"Sir, I'm not satisfied with my position; I wish you would take me into the office, and let me do some of the writing and accounts. I don't care about salary, but I want to rise."

Old Dave fell back with amazement, and made his porter repeat his request.

"Joe, my boy," said he at length, "you're a fool! It's all nonsense talking about rising. Stay where you are; you've got a good berth, and I'll give you an extra £5 note for turkeys at Christmas. Roll casks, Joe, roll casks; that's your vocation."

"Very good, Mr. Stiggs," said Joe, who was too wise to make a scene.

Young Stiggs, who had had a hearty laugh over the story of poor Joe's request, and whose beautiful wife, and splendid house, and fast horses, and magnificent career generally, were the delight of the town—young Stiggs, I say, trampled on Joe's toes pretty roughly. He was a gentleman of a pretty humour, and would chaff poor Joe; as—"I say, Joe, it strikes me you're not so active as you used to be! you don't roll the casks fast enough. Has anybody been setting you above your trade, Joe?" or, "Joe, my boy, we're losing money fast; ah! how devilish lucky you are to be a porter, and sure of your pay every Saturday!"

To all of which Joe only answered, "True, Mr. Stiggs, very true. But we'll do better."

One day, it was some few years ago, a foolish and insane idea possessed the people of this country. They would not believe that the Royal British Bank was the most useful, and the safest, and the best institution in the country. David Stiggs was one of the few who opposed this delusion. He maintained that the Eastern and especially the Royal British Bank were impregnable, and when any sold their stock, Dave Stiggs bought. He and Nick Biddle, he said, could fight the rest of the merchants. The fight was long and tough; but it ended—alas for the vanity of human triumphs!—in the victory of an insane public, and in the overthrow of the Royal British Bank and the Eastern, and that of Nick Biddle and old Dave Stiggs.

A few weeks thereafter, soon after Dave had blown out his brains in his despair at being ruined, the shop which he had occupied was refitted, and a new announcement hung out. It bore the name of "Josiah Ronderton, Commission Merchant."

Young Livingston Stiggs swore it was the best joke he had ever heard; "Egad, the fella was our porter!" For his own part, the failure of the house concerned him little. He had been well trained to business, and was remarkably industrious and shrewd. He would work his way out of his embarrassments, and then build up a new fortune; and he bestirred himself manfully. It was, however, no easy task; the bankrupt court was the only refuge for Livingston Stiggs—who took the benefit of it, got whitewashed, and started afresh.

But the taint of the old house hung round him. The enemies whom the prosperity of the father had created avenged themselves on the son. He met obstacles—unexpected, unaccountable obstacles—on every side. The best of the business of the old house of Stiggs and Co. had descended lineally to Josiah Ronderton. New business proved unprofitable; and so, after a long struggle, Livingston Stiggs failed again.

This time the breakdown was final. The man's energy had been wasted. He sank, and, disease supervening, he became dependent on his wife—the beautiful, dashing creature who had been the belle of the city—for support. She died, heart-broken; and, at last, the only livelihood of the son and heir of Livingston Stiggs was obtained from the needle-money of his daughter. She had been born in finest linen, cradled in richest lace, decked out in child's-clothes of silk and satin: she burns her candle to the socket every night now, working—to support her father—for the family of her grandfather's porter, Josiah Ronderton.

Strange contrast!—pin-money and needle-money. But, take the world as a whole, and there's but a generation between them. The father, rich: the son, poor; the children of the nabob dying in garrets or hospitals provided by the munificence of the children of the nabob's servants; the daughter of Cæsar intriguing to secure for her daughter the gracious smile of the son of Cæsar's stable-boy: such is our history—in this money-getting and scheming country. Scheme we never so wisely, we never can contrive to do more than the law allows to testators; namely, to provide for two generations of our posterity; the third generation, the great-grandchildren, are beyond our reach and our power; and, in nine instances out of ten, the great-grandchildren of every rich man will be poor, and of every poor man rich. There is hope as well as sorrow in the thought.

THE WIFE'S LAMENT.

The grave hath won thee, best beloved,
Thou beautiful and bright!
And death hath marbled o'er thy brow,
And quenched the glorious light
From out the brightly flashing eye,
That e'er was turned on me
With love and tenderness—O, who Might dream that this would be?

What mean these glittering forms of wealth,
This hollow pomp and pride?
A cold, dark void is in my heart—
Thou'rt absent from my side.
'Tis mockery to a spirit crushed,
Their worth's for ever fled;
Alas, I only feel that thou
Art numbered with the dead!

And can I live and see thee thus,
So pale, and calm, and still?
O, take me to thy breast, beloved,
My heart is faint and chill!
Thou canst not—e'en love's anguished cry
Fails to unlock thine ear;
And ne'er may sorrow's pleading voice
Call forth one answering tear.

Look up, beloved and cherished one,
Gaze once upon my brow;
Mark well the furrows grief hath wrought,
Look once upon my woe.
Art silent still? O, agony,
To plead my cause in vain,
And know that ne'er on earth thy voice
Will soothe my grief again!

Then take me from this world, beloved!
I plead—I wildly crave
But this one blessing, since all light
And joy are in the grave.
O, hear'st thou not this last wild prayer?
Thou dost not—all is vain:
And naught but hollow agony
And grief's despair remain.

MISTAKES ABOUT INDEPENDENCE.—How great the mistakes of parents who labour all their lives to render their children independent, and either neglect their moral and intellectual training, or commit it entirely to others. Keep children in their proper place. Stimulate them to exertion. Keep them sparingly in pocket money. Deny yourselves many social pleasures for their sake. Enter with them into amusements which minister to physical and intellectual health; and welcome associates who will enlighten their minds and improve their morals. Let no engagement whatever interfere with school preparations. Regard their teachers as the noblest of men, and set a higher value upon the progress which they make, under their tuition, than upon silver and gold.

Small Change.

WHY is the letter S like a sewing machine?—Because it is makes needles needless!

THE book-keeper who fell from a column of figures is still in a critical state.

A POOR excuse is said to be better than none. An inebriate recently excused himself on the ground that it wasn't he, but his health that had been drunk.

IN the hearing of an Irish case for an assault and battery, a counsel, while cross-examining one of the witnesses, asked him what they had at the first place they stopped at. "Four glasses of ale." "What next?" "Two glasses of whisky." "What next?" "One glass of brandy." "What next?" "A fight."

WE have heard a woman of the world say, "The state of widowhood is inconvenient—for one must assume all the modesty of a young girl, without being able to feign her ignorance."

HAS a finer thought ever been penned than that Knowles put into the mouth of Virginius?—

"I hear a voice so soft that nothing comes Twixt it and silence!"

THE man who did not think it respectable to bring up his children to work, has just heard from his three sons. One of them was a driver on a canal, another had been taken up as a vagrant, and the third had gone to a public institution to learn the shoe business under a keeper.

A TEACHER had been explaining to his class the points of the compass, and all were drawn up in front, toward the north.—"Now, what's before you, John?"—"The north, sir."—"And what behind you, Tommy?"—"My coat-tail, sir," said he, trying at the same time to get a glimpse of it.

THE Maréchal d'Étrées, aged one hundred and three, heard of the death of the Duke de Treame at the age of ninety-three. "I am very sorry for it," said the Maréchal, "but not surprised; he was a poor worn-out creature; I always said that man would never live long."

A VERDANT Yankee expectant for office was advised the other day to apply for the consulship at the Lobos Islands, vice Guano removed. He had his letter written before he discovered the joke.

"IN my fertile country," said a Leicestershire man, "you could turn a horse into a field new-mown, and the next morning the grass would be grown above his hoofs." "Pooh! that's nothing," cried a Yorkshireman; "you may turn a horse into a field in Yorkshire, and not be able to find him next morning."

HOW TO CONQUER HABITS.—Infinite toil would not enable you to sweep away a mist; but by ascending a little you may often look over it altogether. So it is with our moral improvement; we wrestle fiercely with a vicious habit, which would have no hold of us if we ascended into a higher moral atmosphere.

A PERSON complaining of the smallness of some chops brought to table, an incorrigible wag observed, "Probably the sheep was fed on short commons."

BOSWELL observing to Johnson that there was no instance of a beggar dying for want in the streets of Scotland. "I believe, sir, you are very right," says Johnson; "but this does not arise from the want of beggars, but the impossibility of starving a Scotchman."

IT is better to have a clear conscience and be censured, than to have a bad one and be flattered.

MANY have been ruined by their fortunes; many have escaped ruin by the want of fortunes. To obtain it, the great have become little, and the little great.

MOTHER! What comfort there is in the name which gives assurance of a love that can neither change nor fail!

AN Irishman received a challenge to fight a duel, but declined. On being asked the reason, "Och," said Pat, "would you have me leave his mother an orphan?"

A LAZY fellow once declared in public company that he could not find bread for his family. "Nor I," replied an industrious mechanic; "I am obliged to work for it."

"I AM thy father's spirit," as the bottle said to the boy when he found it hid in the wood-pile, and wondered what it was.

A CONTEMPORARY inquires if the young ladies of the present day are fitted for wives? We think it a much more important inquiry whether they are fitted for husbands.

A MACHINE for "pumping" witnesses is among the hydraulics patented last week. The inventor is first cousin to the old man who made leather spikes.

A BACHELOR friend of ours, says a correspondent, returning the other evening from an assembly, in a crowded coach, declared with a groan, that he had not the slightest objection to "rings on his fingers," but had a most unequivocal aversion to "belles on his toes."

ONE poor man told another that his new coat was too short for him. "True," answered he of the short skirts: "I assure you, however, it will be long enough before I get another."

WHEN it rains hardest, people catch most soft water. AN old lady combated the idea of the moon being inhabited by remarking, with emphasis, that the idea was incredible—"For," said she, "what becomes of the people in the moon when there is nothing left of it but a little streak?"

AN acquaintance of ours last week succeeded in picking a lock that had defied the skill of all the experts of the country. He picked it for himself from among a dozen other kinds without a moment's hesitation.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE MERCENARY.—Before you marry a lady for her money, consider what an encumbrance you will find your wife, in the event of having lost or spent all she was worth.

Puzzles for the Ingenious.

According to request we offer our readers a few riddles for solution. We trust they will contribute to their amusement, and agreeably exercise their ingenuity. The answers will be given in a subsequent number. We place promiscuously charades, enigmas, and conundrums, as we consider them all equally worthy of attention.

- (1) By my first a true friend must a true friend address,
Since their intercourse no other form will admit;
And the vows of affection that lovers profess,
On my second too often are found to be writ.
My whole is the number that all have assigned,
To the charms that thou hast both in person and mind.
- (2) To make out my first the great Chitty would try,
And endeavour my second to make it;
Of my whole I am sensible when you are by,
And I heartily wish you'd partake it.
- (3) A word of three letters, easy and short,
Spells backwards and forwards the same;
It expresses the sentiments warm from the heart,
And to beauty lays principal claim.
- (4) What fine English animal first checked the crowing of the French cock?
- (5) By my first I must own ladies judge of a beau,
And if this is not good they think him but so so;
My next ladies do when they give a whole heart
For one that is pierced through in every part;
In my whole the romantic and lovers will sit,
Till aroused by the pangs of a rheumatic fit.
- (6) Two sisters at a birth were born,
Rosy and dewy as the morn;
True as the sailor to his lass,
Yet words between them often pass.
At morn they part, but then at night,
They meet again and all is right;
And, what in nymphs you ne'er discover,
They are contented with each other.
- (7) My elevation to the stocks I owe,
Nor bulls nor bears I fear, yet won't dissemble;
A run upon the bank would make me tremble.
Frank, free, and generous, I yet engage
In the injurious passions of the age;
Give balls and routs, but, though I may be rough,
My company would cheer you—that's enough.
- (8) A word there is of plural number,
A foe to peace and tranquil slumber;
Now any word you choose to take,
By adding s you plural make;
But if you add an s to this,
Strange is the metamorphosis.
Plural is plural then no more,
And sweet what bitter was before.
- (9) My fetid first will charm your eyes,
My second lurks in shelves and pies,
My whole's whole fame in lying lies.
- (10) If you go as far as the railway carriage will take you, what heathen deity do you behold?
- (11) Why, in looking at you, do I increase the difficulty of crossing Ludgate-hill on a wet day in November?
- (12) What's worn on the head, and what makes a good pudding,
Comes into the mind and goes out of a sudden?
When careless cook my first has broken,
And of it has her mistress spoken,
My second will ensue;
My whole is frugal fare, at best—
I shall not tell you how 'tis dressed—
That task remains for you.
- (14) If the god of shepherds fell into the river Thames, what cooking utensil would he resemble when he was taken out?
- (15) What two letters in the alphabet has the Leviathan most reason to dread?
- (16) If spectacles could speak, what learned man of antiquity would they name?
- (17) Why is a telescope like a man who sends a shabby gift?

Chess.

Problem No. 45. By W. HOLT, Esq.
BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in four moves.

Problem No. 46. For the Juveniles. By T. P. COURTENAY, Esq. (Dunkinly).

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in three moves.

Solution of Problem No. 39.

- | WHITE. | BLACK. |
|------------------|-------------|
| 1. P moves | 1. P moves |
| 2. B to K 2 | 2. K to K 5 |
| 3. B to K Kt 7 | 3. K to K 5 |
| 4. B to K 5 (ch) | 4. K to K 5 |
| 5. Kt mates | |

Solution of Problem No. 40.

- | WHITE. | BLACK. |
|------------------|---------------------|
| 1. Q to K B 3 | 1. Q takes Q (best) |
| 2. Kt to Q 5 | 2. Any move |
| 3. B or Kt mates | |

Solution of Problem No. 41.

- | WHITE. | BLACK. |
|------------------|-------------|
| 1. Q to Q R 4 | 1. Any move |
| 2. Q or Kt mates | |

Solution of Problem No. 42.

- | WHITE. | BLACK. |
|------------------|-------------------|
| 1. B to K 5 | 1. Q takes Q |
| 2. P to K B 6 | 2. Q or B takes P |
| 3. B to K B 5 | 3. Any move |
| 4. B or Kt mates | |

M. A. R.—If in the Problem to which you refer, Black's Q P were to take the Bishop, mate would ensue next move; B takes K P; mate would also be given in two moves if Black were to take R with Q, as the Pawn would go to Queen and mate.

RICHARD MARKHAM.—The fact of your King having been checked does not prevent him from Castling if neither he nor the Rook with which he Castles has not been moved. A NOVICE.—A piece or pawn touched must be played, unless at the moment of touching it the player says, "J'adoube," or words to that effect.

A RUSTIC.—We believe the subscription to the St. Georges' Chess Club is £1 1s. to those members who reside more than five miles from London. We do not think that the fact of your being in London daily makes any difference.

Our Editorial Table.

NOTICE. COMPLETION OF VOL. I.

Now Ready, handsomely bound in cloth gilt, price 4s. 6d., the First Volume of the New Series of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER, containing upwards of One Hundred beautifully-executed Engravings, which include Twenty-six Portraits of Living Celebrities. The volume may also be obtained in paper covers, price 3s.

Title, Frontispiece, and Index to Vol. I.

Now ready, the Title, Frontispiece, and Index of Contents to Vol. I. of CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER, New Series, price One Penny.

Cases for Binding.

Handsome cloth gilt cases for binding Vol. I. may be obtained of any bookseller in town or country, price 1s. 6d.

NOTICE.—The Portrait of John Frederick Smith, Esq., author of "Smiles and Tears," "Dick Tarleton," "Phases of Life," &c., in No. 25, is from a photograph by Mayall, of 224-226, Regent-street.

O. H. C.—What is meant by the double government of India, is the authority vested in the East India Company and the Board of Control. Previous to the establishment of the Board of Control in 1784, the government of British India was exercised exclusively by the directors of the East India Company. The immense extent of the territorial possessions of the company, together with their financial embarrassments, to say nothing of the abuses which had crept into their government, justified the ministry in interfering and establishing, by Pitt's famous India Bill, a Board of Control, which should take the oversight, and act as a check on the proceedings of the company. The board consists of six members of the privy council appointed by the Sovereign, two of the principal secretaries of state being always members. The president of the board is, in fact, Secretary of State for India. The authority of the board extends over all the civil and military affairs of British India. All letters or despatches sent out by the Court of Directors are submitted to the board, which may also require certain despatches to be forwarded by the directors, and may, on its own authority, forward despatches without the consent, or without consulting the company. The supreme authority is vested in the governor-general of India, who is nominated by the directors, subject to the approval of the sovereign. The governor-general in council is privileged to make laws for British India, which can only be annulled by higher authority—namely, the Board of Control or the Court of Directors, either of which may approve or disapprove, annul or ratify his acts. India has thus a double government, and it is the maintenance, modification, or discontinuance of this complex rule, which now engages the attention of the legislature.

P. GUSTAVUS.—Montenegro is the country inhabited by the Montenegrins. It lies to the east of the Austrian territory. It consists of several high valleys, sloping to the south-east, the waters of which flow into Turkish Albania by two streams, supplying the gulf of Scutari. The inhabitants of Montenegro are Slavonians; that is, they are of the same origin as the Russians; and their language is a dialect of the Russian language. They are Christians, belonging to the Greek Church. They are governed by a bishop, assisted by a council of the chief families. But, in spite of the religious nature of their government, the Montenegrins are a very warlike people. They are much given to plunder, and have been, as they now are, constantly at war with Turkey. In the last century they greatly distinguished themselves against the French, who had taken forcible possession of the neighbouring republic of Ragusa. The Montenegrins rushed down from the mountains, and a desperate battle ensued; but they were at length driven back to their mountains. They derive the name of Montenegrins from the two words monte and negro; the former signifying "mountain;" the latter, "black."

QUEERIST.—The late Helene Louise Elizabeth, Duchess of Orleans, was the daughter of Frederick Louis, Grand Duke of Mecklenburgh-Schwerin, a small German state. She was born in 1814, and was, therefore, only in her forty-fourth year at the date of her death. She was bred a Protestant, and maintained, through all the trials and temptations of her chequered career, a high character for piety, probity, and feminine purity. She has left two sons, the Comte de Paris and the Duc de Chartres, of whom the former is the heir of the Louis Philippe or Orleans dynasty.

L. MASON.—Unfortunately, there is good ground for accusing the great French philosopher, Laplace, of scepticism; but we must inform you that not long before his death he expressed to our countryman, Professor Sedgwick, a great change of opinion. His words, as nearly as the translation will render them, were as follows:—"I have lived long enough to know, what at one time I did not believe, that no society can be upheld in happiness and honour without the sentiments of religion."

ANNIE DADSON.—Nemesis, called also Adrastia, was the fabled goddess of revenge. In painting, she is generally represented as following closely after some guilty individual in the darkness of night, with a flaming sword. When it is said of any individual that he has his Nemesis, it means that he is in constant dread of punishment overtaking him, on account of some real or supposed fault or crime.

ARGUS, ANNIE PARISH, SILLY SALLY, T. C.—"Argus:" Napoleon the First did really bequeath a legacy to Cantillon for attempting to assassinate the Duke of Wellington. Tennyson is at present poet-laureate.—"Annie Parish:" The word "architect" is pronounced as if written arkitekt. It comes to us from the French language.—"Silly Sally:" A bishop is addressed as "My Lord;" so is also a law baron. In speaking to majors and captains, it is not elegant to repeat their military titles very often.—"T. C.:" The "Arabian Nights" are translated from the Arabic.

R. S.—If you refer to history, you will find that ladies were not always excluded from Parliament. In the reigns of Henry III. and Edward I. four abbesses were summoned to Parliament, and in the reign of Edward III. a great many countesses were represented in Parliament by their proxies.

A. B.—In the reign of Queen Elizabeth an act of parliament was passed to prevent the exportation of wool; and, to keep in mind that wool was the great source of our national wealth, woollucks for the judges were placed in the House of Lords.

EFFIE.—We quite understand the wonder you experience in listening to the noise produced by placing a sea-shell to your ear. Fancy likens this noise to the roar of the sea, and poetical minds have compared the sound to the wail of the shell for its native ocean. The fact is, the noise is caused by the hollow form of the shell, its polished surface enabling it to receive and give back the beatings of all sounds that chance to be trembling in the air around the shell.

VERGILIUS.—You would first have to lay down one hundred guineas caution money, afterwards used in paying the expenses of the call; next, about £45 admission fees. The yearly expenses vary according to the lun at which the student enters. It is usual to read the first year with a conveyancer, the second with an equity draughtsman, and the third with a special pleader. The fees to each are one hundred guineas. The whole expense would be about £500.

A LOVER OF FLOWERS.—Faded flowers may generally be restored by immersing them half way up their stems in very hot water, and allowing them to remain in it till it cools, or till they have recovered. They must then be removed, the coddled portion of the stems cut off, and placed in clean, cold water. This plan will succeed, except as to some of the most valuable flowers.

C. MATHEWS, alias TOM PIGGOT, alias J. BECKET.—The first stone of St. Paul's Cathedral was laid June 21, 1675; the choir was opened for Divine worship, December 2, 1696; the whole edifice was completed in 1710, with the exception of some decorations. The New Royal Exchange, commenced in 1840, was opened by the Queen in state, October 28, 1844. We do not keep a racing calendar.

J. J. (SCHOOLBOY).—Columbus was born in the territories of Genoa, in 1442. He first saw the main land of America during a third voyage, commenced in 1498; but Amerigo Vesputius had visited that continent before him, and from him it took its name—America. Columbus died at Valladolid, May 20, 1506.

A MOTHER.—Abstain from salted or dried meats, use a good proportion of green vegetable food, and use lemonade as a beverage.

C. DUBOIS.—It is impossible for us to say how much taller you will grow. By the use of proper aliments and exercise, you will probably gain a few inches by the time you are twenty-one.

ANTIQUITY.—We cannot state why a horseshoe was considered fortunate. The practice of nailing one on a house or barn to keep away evil is an exploded folly.

CARACTACUS, as a railway clerk, must fulfil the duties which belong to the department which he undertakes. It is impossible to define what he might have to do while we are ignorant of the position he is likely to hold.

C. L.—We regret that we cannot trace the fate of the Eastern Queen, which, as you state, "set sail from Liverpool for New Orleans, May 7, 1851." Perhaps some correspondent can inform us.

H. S. Y.—The national debt is about nine hundred millions sterling.

AN EARNEST INQUIRER.—As you are evidently advanced in your education, there is little doubt that, by stating your qualifications, and proposing to teach the younger pupils in a ladies' seminary for the advantage of following the classes of the elder pupils, you might, according to your own expressed desire, obtain such an education in the higher branches of instruction as would fit you for a governess in a gentleman's or nobleman's family.

ALEXANDRINA SALTER, TAMERLANE, HAR, SNOWBIRD.—"Alexandrina" writes to us in great perplexity, but she must take courage. Despair is never excusable; but to give up hoping at twenty years of age is perfectly absurd. We do not perceive from her letter that she is "no scholar." We deduce from it that she is very well suited for a situation in a fashionable warehouse, and that she might, soon fit herself for the duties of a nursery governess.—"Tamerlane" must not indulge in jealousy and suspicion. As a lover, he is likely to give way to both. Probably the elder of the kirk merely felt a fatherly regard for the young lady.—"Har" is quite justified in resigning the correspondence, but not in doing so without mentioning the cause. Let him act openly and like a man, and tell the young lady that her breaking her promise is the cause of the cessation of his letters.—"Snowbird" must persevere in the remedy. Air and exercise are the best means of procuring a healthy complexion. His third question should be put to a tax-gatherer.

AN INQUIRER.—Your first question should have been addressed to some eminent medical practitioner. As to the second, if the Bible does not give you the information you wish, it is in vain for you to seek it elsewhere.

S. C. B.—We know nothing of the intention of the Sultan of Turkey to bestow medals on the Crimean soldiers beyond newspaper report.

A CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER, W. B.—We commend you, as a youth of fourteen, for not wishing longer to burden your parents. Your writing is very good, and as you say you can also cipher well, we think you need not fear obtaining a good situation.

DELTA, F. JOHNSTONE, R. F. P.—"Delta:" We doubt whether any hair dyes are perfectly safe; but in a recent number you will find the subject treated of at length.—"F. Johnstone" is in good health, he will find his hair much improved by pouring cold water over it every morning, and rubbing it dry with a coarse towel.—"The lines of R. F. P." have both power and promise; but here and there they are so indistinctly written, we had difficulty in making out his meaning.

H. J. W.—The Windsor uniform consists of a blue coat with red collar and cuffs.

DAWLISH.—Cases to contain twenty-six numbers, or one volume of our ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER, may be obtained through any bookseller, or of Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage-yard, at 1s. 6d. each, gilt lettered on the side and back.

J. C. Y.—You do not require the assistance of an attorney in binding your son apprentice.

QUESTIONER.—We certainly have never endeavoured to increase the circulation of our Paper by affording subscribers a chance of gaining a watch by lottery.

RODERICK.—The "Art Treasures Exhibition" will be completed in sixty-five numbers. The volume will be ready June 1, price 8s., in handsome cloth boards.

J. MACDONALD.—You must be content to let the stains in your skin wear out.

SING SONG POLLY.—Persian sherbet is made various ways. The most simple is composed of water, lemon-juice, and sugar, with some perfumed cakes dissolved in it, and an infusion of rose-water. Another kind is made with violets, honey, juice of raisins, &c. Another is made thus:—Boil in three pints of water, six or eight stalks of green rhubarb, and a quarter of a pound of good raisins or figs, sliced. When the water has boiled about half an hour, strain it, and stir into it a small quantity of rose-water, and orange or lemon syrup to the taste. Another:—Crush a pound of picked strawberries in a mortar; add to them a quart of water, and pour into a basin, with a lemon sliced, and a tea-spoonful of orange flower water, and let it remain for two or three hours. Put one pound of refined sugar into another basin, cover it with muslin, through which pour the strawberry juice. After as much has run out as will, squeeze out the remainder. When the sugar is all dissolved, strain again, and set the vessel containing it in a very cold place, or on ice. The Persian sherbet of the shops, generally sold in powder, is mostly made of cream of tartar and powdered lump sugar in equal quantities, with a few drops of essence of orange and lemons, and, sometimes, some slight perfume.

H. YATES.—The following ointment is good for removing sunburns and freckles:—Into half a pint of new milk put two table-spoonfuls of fresh cream; add to this a table-spoonful of eau-de-cologne, the juice of a lemon, a tea-spoonful of powdered loaf-sugar, and a bit of alum about half the size of a nut. Boil these ingredients, skim them well, and, when cool, the mixture is fit for use. Anoint the face with a little of it before going to bed.

AYR, MACBETH, SALMON, COLLEEN ASTHORE.—"Ayr:" The marriages of which you speak are legal in Scotland.—"Macbeth:" You would find the training for the stage quite as dull and less profitable than your present avocation.—"Salmon:" The convenience of the lady, and not the relation in which she stands to you, must decide on the propriety of offering the right or the left arm. The noises you make in sleep, viz., speaking loud, &c., indicate indigestion. Never go to bed directly after supper.—"Colleen Asthore:" We will give you our opinion on any manuscript you choose to submit to us.

RAMORNY.—The salaries of attorneys' clerks vary from £100 to £150 per annum; those of copying clerks are about £50.

LAURA.—We cannot undertake furnishing receipts for brewing any description of beer. With regard to imparting a whiteness to the keys of a pianoforte, we can only furnish you with a process for bleaching ivory. It should be exposed to the sun, under glasses, having been first brushed with pumice-stone (burnt and made into a paste with water).

KATE EASTWOOD, SILVIA, COSMO.—We decline assisting "Kate Eastwood" in writing letters to officers, or enlightening her on the subject of their uniforms, or outward adornments; but we strongly advise her not to present her portrait to any gentlemen to whom she is not engaged.—"Silvia," we advise her to select a handsome desk as a present for the gentleman in question.—"Cosmo" need not use black-edged paper in writing to his intended bride, although the lady has lost a near relative. An engagement constitutes no relationship, although it is to be hoped it will lead to one.

ADELA.—"Adela" wishes to know how to cultivate a pair of eyebrows. We advise her to try castor oil pomatum, and to arrange her hair so as to prevent the bands or curls from touching the eyebrows, for it is supposed that, if they come constantly in contact with the hair of the head, their growth is checked.

J. M'LEAN.—Captain Maryatt has been dead between three and four years.

LEXIUS.—Apply the lotion to the part affected two or three times a day.

DARKIE.—Your application should have been made to the proprietors, or the secretary, of the "Great Leviathan."

QUALIFICATIONS, &c., FOR SITUATIONS in the Army, Navy, various branches of the Civil Service, counting-house clerks, shopmen, assistants, &c.—Applications of this class have been received from H. W. Bowen, J. S. Cooper, A. Celt, En Avant, Salt, Express, Caractacus, W. Harris, C. E. M., Vertus Taurus, Edward of Ella, a Yorkshireman, R. C. Lisle, J. Dexter, W. Willies, Godfrey, A Tipperary Boy, &c. &c. With the sincerest desire to serve these correspondents, we regret our inability to give them satisfactory directions. In most instances, it would be better for them to make direct application to the principals, or the secretaries or actuaries of the establishments with which they wish to be connected, stating age, qualifications, &c. Some of the above, we are sorry to say, would be at once rejected, on account of deficient scholarship.

* We cannot guarantee the return of rejected manuscripts.

All Letters and Communications for the Editor to be addressed to JOHN CASSELL, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

London: Printed and Published for JOHN CASSELL by PETTER and GALPIN, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

[THE RIGHT OF TRANSLATION AND REPUBLICATION IS RESERVED.]

NEW SERIES. VOL. II.—No. 29.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 19, 1858.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER LVII.

A prison is a house of care.
A place where none can thrive;
A touchstone true to try a friend—
A grave for one alive.
Sometimes a place of right;
Sometimes a place of wrong;
Sometimes a place of rogues and thieves,
And honest men among.

INSCRIPTION ON EDINBURGH TOLBOOTH.

BEFORE relating the circumstances under which Sanderson became a private in the same regiment with Mark Rayner, we must leave India for awhile, and request our readers to return with us to England; promising that the voyage shall not be a very tedious one.

"Presto," as the charlatan says, and it is accomplished. We are no longer in the city of palaces on the banks of the Hooghly, but in Kent, at the gate of one of the vast naval arsenals in which the true power and greatness of the British empire are centred; where we shall find two characters in our tale, not yet forgotten, we trust, by our readers.

When Fiddler Dick became an inmate of the dockyard at Chatham, like most convicts on their arrival, he displayed great insubordination and violence; but the iron discipline of the establishment very soon brought him to another state of mind, and taught him that a different line of conduct was necessary, if he wished to pass his seven years pleasantly, or obtain a mitigation.

Gradually, therefore, he cooled down, and began to show a disposition to listen to the advice and exhortations of the chaplain, who, flattering himself that he had at last succeeded in producing an impression upon his dissolute nature, felt an interest in him.

It was something like the pride which the keeper of a menagerie feels in displaying his powers over the ferocious animal he has tamed.

We need not inform our readers that it was all pretence on the part of the convict: neither penitence nor remorse had ever touched his stubborn nature—but calculation had. Seven years was a long period of time to look forward to, to bear the burning desire of vengeance which he entertained against his faithless partner Bet, and writhe beneath the impotence of gratifying it. He could have stood four, but seven was too much; the number haunted him, and he determined, if possible, to abridge it.

It was just as he had made up his mind to this new line of conduct, that his former companion in misfortune—as he was pleased to term his previous detection and condemnation—joined him.

One of the wits of the place—for even amongst the miserable slaves of the Dockyard there are such persons—parodied, on the arrival of Mike, the well-known epitaph, "They were beautiful in their lives, and in death they were not separated," by chalking on the wall, "They were pals in youth, and lagged together in their age."

THE UNWELCOME VISITOR.

It was not long before Mr. Fiddler Dick began to experience the benefit of the change in his conduct; for no sooner was it known by the keepers and guardians that his was a case in which the chaplain felt an interest, than they grew somewhat indulgent—treated him much less harshly.

They too were wise in their generation. Any report a refractory convict might make of their ill-usage of him, they well knew would meet with but little attention; from a reformed one, who frequently required the advice and consolation of the chaplain, whom the governor had spoken to in a tone of encouragement, it was a very different thing.

Amongst the fraternity of which Dick and his friend Mike were not undistinguished members, the means by which the rigour of imprisonment may be mitigated, and the period of penal servitude shortened, are as well known, calculated, and discussed, as the chances which may arise in any other profession.

As a matter of course, the intimacy between the two convicts was renewed. There being no false delicacy or shame on either side, the hours of meals and relaxation, and Sundays especially, were devoted to private and confidential conversation on their affairs.

One thing seriously annoyed Dick, and put his friendship to a severe test: Mike either could not, or would not, become pious; but frequently in chapel, whilst his companion sang vociferously, or groaned, which he frequently did at certain parts of the sermon, the old sinner would sit watching him, with a broad grin upon his features.

The cynical rascal had evidently a keen sense of the ridiculous.

"I'll tell you what it is, old feller," said the youngest of the two convicts as they paced up and down the large, vaulted apartment, in which they were allowed to take exercise in wet weather, "I shall be obliged to cut your acquaintance."

"Why so?"

"The parson says you are a reprobate. Why won't you be converted? It ain't so very hard after the fast. You'd find yer advantage in it."

"Have you found any?"

Dick replied by a knowing wink.

"Well, I dare say yer has," continued the speaker; "and it ain't by no means the wust dodge I ha' knowed on; but it 'ud be no use to me; they'll never let me out."

"Why not?"

"Case there's too many great uns in the world as has an interest in a-keepin' me in," replied the convict, with an air of importance. There is a pride even in crime. Your housebreaker looks with contempt on a poor petty-larceny rogue. "I ain't sent here for anything I have done; for, as you know, I was always partikler not to run any great risks."

"What wor yer sent here for?"

"For fear of what I might say; and what makes it mor' aggravating, my own brother sent me here."

"Something like my Bet," muttered his hearer, with a fearful expression. "But I never knew you had a brother."

"Oh yes, a twin."

"I shouldn't be at all surprised now," observed Dick, "if that affair of Lilly's warn't at the bottom on it."

"You are right."

"Well, you may as well tell me all about it. Poor gal, I've no doubt Bet 'as done for her afore this."

"No, she ain't."

"You don't know her."

"I tell you she ain't," repeated Mike; "and I ought to know, seeing as she came to me the day after your misfortune, to ask for the share of the money I promised you, and I pumped it all out on her."

"You didn't give it her!" exclaimed the convict, with an expression of hatred so ferocious that even the speaker, accustomed as he was to his violence and temper, could not refrain from shuddering.

"Give it her," he repeated; "wot do yer take me for?"

"But you got it."

"Well, perhaps I did."

"All right," said Fiddler Dick, "cut on."

"Well," answered Mike, "it was this brother of mine I was speakin' on as brought the kid to me—I wish I'd never seen her."

"So do I," interrupted his friend.

"Jack found out for me where he lived. Would you believe it, the unnatural villain is rich, has a farm, servants, land—in short, lives like a gentleman.

But that has nothing to do with it; only he is very respectable."

"Was the child his'n?"

"No."

"Whose, then?"

"Can't exactly make out," answered the former gaoler of Lillian, who did not choose to impart more than was necessary for elucidating his position, and the hopelessness he felt of any remission of the sentence he had been sent back to the hulks to serve; "all I know is, there was a lady, a real born lady in the case."

"And she paid the money?"

"Well, she did," answered Mike, hesitatingly; "but not till after you were in quod, or you'd ha' heard from me."

The mountebank drew down the corners of his mouth in that peculiar manner we have before described.

"Of course I should," he said, pointing with the thumb of his right hand over the left shoulder.

"You don't doubt me?" exclaimed his partner in iniquity.

"It's of little use if I did, seeing that the counters are all gone by this time, I'll be bound."

"No, they ain't," whispered the old convict.

Fiddler Dick pricked up his ears at this piece of intelligence, which to him was exceedingly interesting, for he naturally considered that he had a moral, if not a legal, claim to a part of it.

"Why, yer ain't got it with yer?" he exclaimed, at the same time slapping Mike familiarly on the back. "Well, you are a downy one. Only to think of doin' the searchers!"

"But it ain't here," quietly observed the old man; "do you think if it wor I'd be such a fool to allude to it?"

His pal looked disappointed. The reasoning was too conclusive in his own mind for him to doubt it.

"Not so green as that," continued the speaker. "No; I concealed it in a place known only to myself, and where only myself can find it, and where it will remain, unless I get out of this cursed place."

"Mike! Mike!" exclaimed his respectable friend, in a tone of tender reproachfulness, "you'd never be so unnatural as to rob a true pal of his share?"

"I'll take care he never robs me of mine," replied the old man; "so it's no use a-trying that on. If we get out together, maybe I should not mind a-division."

"How much is it?"

"More than enough to take us both to Amerikey, and leave us something to begin life on," answered Mike, evasively, for he did not think proper to name the exact sum to him. Like a prudent man, he always calculated on the eventualities that might arise.

"It was over fifty, then!" exclaimed Fiddler Dick.

"Over two fifties," whispered his pal.

"I thought so," muttered the former, bitterly.

"Well, that was business," observed the old convict. "Of course, I won't a-going to let you share, and I take all the risk; and a pretty risk it has turned out! What good is the tin to me, and I here?"

"Why won't you be converted?" demanded the ex-mountebank, in a persuasive tone; "it's the easiest thing in the world: only to—"

"I know all about it," interrupted his hearer, impatiently; "and would a tried it, as well as you; only, as I told you afore, I knowd it would be no use."

"Can't see it."

"But I can. Why else am I here, and my ticket-of-leave called in? I ain't done nothing fresh. Let me explain it all. You'll never see the rights on it unless I do."

"Explain away, old snake."

After receiving this gracious permission, his respected friend resumed his narrative.

"As I told you," he said, "Jack discovered where my precious brother, my twin wor a livin', and feeling quite lonely like—for the boy had gone to sea—I thought I'd just visit him. Well, I did, and a pretty visit I made of it, for he and his housekeeper nearly pised me with musherons."

"Cleverly done."

"Very. Whilst staying with him I learnt something—what that something was I ain't agoin' to tell you, so it's no use a-prickin' up your ears; but it was a curious secret."

"About Lilly?" hastily demanded Fiddler Dick.

"About Lilly."

"And I here," muttered the husband of Bet, in a tone of bitterness between his teeth. "She shall pay for it if ever I get free."

"No doubt of that," observed Mike, quietly. "In fact, I told her as much—but that is your affair, and nothin' to my pint. Well, I natterally thought I might just as well turn an honest penny by the secret I had gained, and I told Andrew so."

"Who is Andrew?"

"My beautiful twin brother."

"All right; go on."

"He promised to meet me in London at the 'Keys' in the Mint. I had given him eight days; if I'd known all I might have given him longer. Well, what do you think he does?"

"No idea."

"He goes to my lord mayor, or some other lord, who is one of the queen's ministers, and related to the lady I told yer on, and gets me sent here to sarve out the rest of my time."

"Why that is for life!" exclaimed his companion.

"Exactly."

Fiddler Dick gave an expressive whistle. It might be intended to convey his admiration of the tact of Andrew, or an indication of surprise at the extraordinary account he had just listened to.

"And now," added the convict, "you see why I don't think it worth while to be converted; yours is a different case. I should think they'd let you out in another year or so, for yer does it exceedingly well; and groans and turns up the whites of yer eyes as natterally as life. But it would be no use to me, mine is a settled pint; there's a black mark against my name. I am here for life."

"Well, I 'spose yer are," philosophically observed his friend.

"Unless—"

Here the old man hesitated.

"Unless what?"

"When you get out, you help me to escape," whispered Mike. "In that case we would share the money between us."

It was some time before Fiddler Dick could be brought to entertain the project. In the first place, he did not like the risk of the undertaking; in the second, he felt far from assured that Mike really had the money he spoke of, and that the tale he had told had any other foundation than his own fertile imagination. On the latter point he soon had an opportunity of coming to a correct conclusion. In conversing with one of the prison authorities, who, since the chaplain had become interested in him, had been more than usually indulgent, he observed that the government would have no very great bargain with Mike.

"Why not?" inquired the official.

"He is so old."

"We don't care for his labour," was the reply.

"Then I suppose you will soon let him out."

The man shook his head mysteriously.

"Can't make it out," added the mountebank. "He says he ain't done nothing fresh—but then we all says that," he added, with a hypocritical grimace, "afore we is converted, specially on our trials."

"But he has not been tried."

Here was confirmation at least of one portion of Mike's statement, and his friend began to think the rest of it might possibly be equally true.

"Why, you don't mean to say," he exclaimed, "that they sent him back on the old affair?"

"But I do though."

"That's 'ard."

"It is not quite usual," replied the man. "Perhaps I ought not to allude to these things; but I don't mind telling you. The Secretary of State, Lord Carlington, cancelled his ticket-of-leave."

"What for?"

"Because he had done something either to offend or excite suspicion, I suppose," replied his informant; "but if ain't my place to make observations on the conduct of my betters. Still, I must say it does appear hard. Our orders are to guard him very strictly."

"Why, there is no danger of his escape."

"Not much," said the official: "he is so old. Were he an active young fellow like you, there might be some risk, now."

"Not in the least," answered Fiddler Dick: "I have only three more years to serve; and I ain't in a hurry to leave the place afore my principles is confirmed. The world is so full of temptations."

"Very true."

"And we are none of us perfect."

The keeper agreed with him.

"I might fall into the horror of my ways again."

"That's what the governor said," replied the man, "when the chaplain spoke to him the other day about recommending you to government for a ticket-of-leave."

The eyes of the mountebank sparkled with an expression of intense ferocity at hearing how the above-named functionary had interfered to deprive him of the good offices of the clergyman. The ruffian felt as if he could have strangled him.

"And what said the parson?" he asked, with some difficulty mastering his rage.

"That he considered your reformation complete."
 "Ah, he is a good man," exclaimed the convict, "and has a searching spirit: he can read the 'art.' I am sure he has squeezed all the bitterness and blackness out of mine, for it was once very black."

His hearer looked as if he believed him.
 "I am content to remain my time," he added, turning up the white of his eyes, "if he thinks it best."

"Are you?"

"Or to go," added Dick.
 "Well, that I can believe," observed the man, who seemed but little edified by the speaker's pretended resignation. "It's an awfully dull place; I am heartily tired of it, for one."

"You!" repeated the convict; "why you have an excellent berth."

"Pretty well."

"Good wages."

"Things are very dear in Chatham."

"Chance of promotion."

"A very slow one," answered the keeper. "When I first accepted the situation, I was fool enough to let them know that I did not intend to remain in it long, and so they pass others over my head. Do you know how I came to get it?"

"Ain't the least idea."

"Well, as you appear a better sort of fellow than most who are here, I don't care if I tell you."

Fiddler Dick expressed himself highly flattered at the confidence, and piously expressed a hope that he was not altogether undeserving of it.

"Father and uncle were two of the independent electors of my native town."

"And where may that be?" inquired his hearer.

"Swill Thorpe, in Somersetshire."

"Don't know it."

"Well, it ain't a very large place," observed the keeper, "though it does send two members to parliament. I wish it never had sent them, for it has been my ruin."

The party whom the speaker was thus gradually admitting into his confidence, looked as if he should very much like to be informed how the fact of the borough of Swill Thorpe returning two members to the legislature, could have acted so injuriously on the prospects and career of the speaker.

"I'll tell you how," continued the man. "When I was a boy, our member—the Honourable Sloper Seedy—always promised father and uncle that he would procure me a place under government. The consequence was, that instead of being brought up to a trade, like the rest of my brothers, I was looked upon as the gentleman of the family—indulged when the others were punished, or kept to work."

"And that turned out badly?"

"Right there—very badly; for after father and uncle's death, the Honourable Sloper Seedy forgot his promise; and the gentleman of the family became the beggar. Thinking I was provided for, father left everything to my two brothers, who are now well to do in the world—one as a master builder, and the other as a respectable baker."

"Hadm't you their interest?"

"Not a bit of it; they always voted against the member, which so exasperated him that he forgot his promise, and I shouldn't now have got this beggarly place but for the last election."

"I see. Held off till you had it."

"I have no vote."

"How did you get it, then?"

"Why you see, three days before the election took place, I waited on the gentleman. I was in—in short, I wasn't half so well dressed as I am now. I told him that he had ruined me by his promises, and threatened, unless he did something for me there and then, to go down to Swill Thorpe and expose him and myself too upon the hustings."

"And no fool neither," ejaculated Fiddler Dick.

"I never had no notion of your parliament men. I—that is, a friend of mine who got into trouble in the pick-pocketing line, told me in confidence that he never found anything worth taking in a member's pocket."

"I can believe him," observed the man. "Well, the result was that the Hon. Sloper Seedy—seedy enough to me—got me this place, where I have been now going on for two years. I have saved nearly enough to pay my passage out to America, where I intend to settle as soon as I can make out the rest of the passage money."

"That's where I intend to go when my time's up," said the convict.

"Indeed!"

"How curious if we should meet there."

"Very curious indeed."

"But you'll not own the likes of me then," observed Fiddler Dick.

"I ain't proud," was the reply.

"I should be glad to see you, and no mistake!" exclaimed the former, his feelings highly gratified by the admission. "Bless you, you wouldn't know me, this place does disfigure a man so; nature has no chance here."

This was an allusion to his cherished locks, which ere now had fallen before the ruthless scissors of the authorities, and whose loss had grieved him more than even his imprisonment.

"Well," said the man, with a smile, at the same time regarding the closely-shorn bullet-head of the speaker, "a little hair might be an improvement."

"Improvement!" repeated the convict, bitterly; "I tell yer, yer wouldn't know me with my 'air, especially when it was fresh 'iled."

The bell, the signal for the prisoners to retire for the night, soon afterwards rang, and the conversation ended, but Dick did not forget the acquaintance he had thus unexpectedly made. Something whispered it might one day prove useful to him, for events had already cast their shadow before them.

CHAPTER LVIII.

Oh, the fairy form is ne'er forgot
 That first love traced;
 It lingers haunts the greenest spot
 In memory's waste.—MOORE.

It is now time that we return to two characters in our tale who, although they have not occupied a very prominent position, have, we doubt not, secured a niche in the recollections of our readers. We allude to William Thornton and Alice Boothroyd, who had not met since the day of the boat race at Eton; doubtless, to the great satisfaction of the managing mother, who had other and far more ambitious views for her daughter—views in which her husband, Sir Norman, fully shared.

William's career at the university had been a most honourable one—to the intense disgust of his old schoolfellow, Viscount Illston, who, as a matter of course, cut his former protector at Cambridge. The parvenu had carried off the honours of his year; stood for a fellowship; and, what was more to the purpose, had the good fortune to obtain it.

When we say the good fortune, we allude, of course, to the distinction. The wealth of his father rendered the income attached to it a matter of very secondary importance to William.

The gratification which his success gave amply repaid the young man for the year's really hard labour—for reading is labour—which he had devoted to the achievement of his success. But, still something was wanting to crown his triumph, and to make him feel that it really was a success. We scarce need to say it was the smile of Alice.

Frequently, when seated in his room at college, poring over his mathematics by the midnight lamp, the figures would disappear, or become so confused that it was impossible longer to recognise them; or, in other words, the problem would change to a still more difficult one—the features of a fair young girl, which imagination had substituted in their place.

And now that the victory was won, his toil rewarded, it did seem rather hard that the smile, whose light would have been his sweetest recompense, should be wanting; but nothing is perfect in this world—not even a senior wrangler's triumph.

Lord Illston had taken his degree as a matter of right; being the son of a peer he was intitled to it—an honorary one.

Alice was no longer a child. In thought and feeling, even more than in years, she was now a woman. Nature had been liberal, not only in the endowments of person, but in those mental gifts which add a charm to beauty, and lend a lasting grace when mere personal ones have vanished. Lady Boothroyd—who, since the establishment of the family in London, had completely established her sway over the weak vacillating mind of her husband—did not know what to make of her. She appeared to be without ambition—a peculiarity her mother could by no means comprehend. In her disappointment she pronounced her an exceedingly odd girl.

Those who knew her best considered her a right-thinking one.

To her father, whose weakness she saw and pitied, the fair girl was affectionate and submissive as a child should be: to her mother, respectful; but it was evident that the mercenary woman was far from possessing that hold upon her affections which the tie of nature would seem to warrant.

One morning, when chatting with her ladyship upon the future prospects of their heiress, the butler entered the room with a card.

"For me?" inquired his mistress.

"For Sir Norman, my lady."

The man presented it to the baronet, who took it listlessly, and read the name, "Major Hawley, Punjab Horse."

"Do you know him?" asked the gentleman, handing it to his wife. "I have not the slightest recollection of such a person."

"Nor I," was the reply.

"Not at home," said the master of the house.

An idea suddenly struck Lady Boothroyd; that it was the name of the regiment in which her brother-in-law, the unfortunate Allan, had served; and with that restlessness which invariably accompanies the consciousness of guilty actions, she decided on seeing him.

"You had better receive him," she said; "I believe he is from India."

Her husband coloured at the word.

"At home," she added.

The butler quitted the room.

"What is it you suspect?" faltered the baronet.

"That it is some friend of your brother Allan's," replied his wife; "and there is much respecting him that I wish to learn. Show no surprise," she added, "at any statement he may make, no matter how strange or improbable it may appear to you."

"I do not comprehend you."

"It is not necessary that you should," was the dry rejoinder; "and I have not time now to explain my motives. You shall know them hereafter. I have spared you no inconsiderable annoyance, by keeping from you a secret, which, after the visit of this man, I suspect will be no longer a secret."

"One word," she added, as she heard approaching steps in the antechamber; "not a word of Barry Gee."

The baronet felt uneasy at the name: for it brought painful and unpleasant recollections to his mind.

The next instant the visitor was announced.

Major Hawley proved to be a true specimen of the Indian officer—most of whom have to fight their way to rank and distinction. He was rather rough and soldierlike in his appearance, with great shrewdness in his features mingled with manliness and kindness.

"I have to apologise, Sir Norman," said the gentleman, "for what I fear must appear rather a singular visit; for my name, I doubt not, is that of a stranger to you."

The baronet bowed, and admitted that he certainly never had heard of him; then paused, evidently in expectation that his visitor would proceed.

"You perceive," continued the major, pointing to his card, which was still lying on the salver, "that I served in the Punjab Horse."

The master of the house stiffly intimated that he was aware of that fact.

"In which your late brother served."

"Indeed," said the baronet, dryly.

"We were friends, great friends," resumed the gentleman; "in fact, poor Allan had few secrets from me. I am aware that he had not the happiness of being on—what shall I say—happy terms with his family."

"Was it to inform Sir Norman of that circumstance," inquired her ladyship, in a sarcastic tone, "that we are honoured by Major Hawley's visit?"

"A clever woman," thought the old soldier, eyeing her critically. "I can understand why poor Allan was an outcast from his home—his sister-in-law did not like him."

Speaking aloud, he said, "Certainly not, Lady Boothroyd; for no doubt the death of my gallant friend buried all unkind feelings in the hearts of his surviving relatives."

"Of course it did!" exclaimed the baronet.

"Although I had many reasons to complain of Allan in his lifetime, I forgave him when I heard of his death. His family acted as was proper on the occasion; the whole establishment were put in mourning."

"And a tablet recording his death erected in the chancel of St. Faith's Church," added her ladyship.

"He asked for bread, and they gave him a stone," mentally ejaculated the officer.

"We, of course, have nothing to reproach ourselves with," continued the artful woman; "neither do we wish to dwell upon the follies, obstinacy, and errors which drove Allan from England; it would be painful."

"For me to hear," interrupted their visitor, who knew how heartlessly the outcast brother had been treated. "I will therefore spare you what I have no doubt would be equally painful—the task of repeating them. I am aware of everything; for, as I said before, we were fast friends. I was present at his marriage."

"Marriage!" exclaimed Sir Norman, half starting from his chair, for it was the first time he had heard of such an event.

A look from his wife warned him to be cautious.

"You seem surprised."

"I—really—you—"

"Major Hawley cannot wonder if the subject is rather a distasteful one. Amongst military men I am aware a mésalliance is looked upon with indulgence; but we cannot forget what Allan owed to his family."

"And to his brother as the head of it," observed Sir Norman, proudly.

"You seem to be labouring under a singular error," said the gentleman, "respecting the wife of my friend. In point of family, the lady was every way unexceptionable—the sister of a distinguished officer, who quitted the service with the respect and regret of all who knew him."

"And may I inquire the name?" asked her ladyship.

"Is it possible you are not acquainted with it?"

"Were I, my question would be unnecessary."

"True, very true," answered the major. "Pardon me the observation. The name of the lady was Lillian Marsh. But I will at once proceed to the purport of my visit."

"If you please."

"My wife accompanied me to England."

Sir Norman mentally wondered how Mrs. Major Hawley's visit to England could possibly interest him.

"She is naturally anxious to see her goddaughter."

"He must be mad," thought the baronet, who began to feel rather alarmed.

Not so her ladyship—she perfectly understood him.

"Perhaps," said the gentleman, "you will permit Miss Boothroyd to visit us."

"Are we playing at a game of cross purposes, major?" demanded the astonished master of the house. "You send up your card, avow yourself a perfect stranger, and coolly ask whether I will permit my daughter to visit you. What am I to understand from this?"

"You are in error, Sir Norman; I spoke of your niece, Lillian Boothroyd, the daughter of my deceased friend, Allan."

The surprise of the uncle was too genuine, and that of her ladyship too well acted, to permit their visitor to doubt for an instant the assurance that it was the first time they had ever heard either of Allan's marriage, or of his having left a daughter.

"What!" exclaimed the major, "did not his old servant, Barny Gee, bring her to England to you?"

"Certainly not," replied both husband and wife.

"Did he not arrive himself?"

This was a delicate question, and a vulgar criminal would have boldly denied it, but Lady Boothroyd, with the tactics of superior iniquity, met the danger boldly.

"He did arrive at St. Faith's, but was shot an hour after his arrival, in a poaching affray, at Meldown Park. It was a shocking affair," she added. "Springthorp, one of Sir Norman's keepers, was murdered that same night."

"Poor fellow!" ejaculated the major. "And did he come alone?"

"I believe he brought a child with him."

"That child, Lady Boothroyd, was your niece."

"Is it possible?"

"My niece?" faltered the baronet.

"Yes. Have you never seen her?"

"Never," replied the affectionate uncle.

"Or heard of her claim upon you?"

"How can you suppose such a dreadful thing?" exclaimed Lady Boothroyd. "Although justly offended with Allan, neither my husband nor myself would have permitted his daughter to remain a dependent on the brother of this Barny Gee you spoke of. I saw the child once, and offered to place her in my school at St. Faith's, little dreaming that it was the child of Allan."

Her visitor regarded her doubtfully.

"But my offer was refused," she added. "A few days afterwards the health of Sir Norman rendered a visit to London necessary; and since then we have let Meldown Park."

"Were no papers found upon the body of Barny?" asked the gentleman, after a pause, during which he had vainly tried to collect his thoughts.

"Never that I heard of."

"And the child?"

"Is still, for anything I can tell to the contrary, at St. Faith's with her supposed or real relatives," replied the artful woman.

"And what do you intend to do?"

"Nothing."

"I thought so," muttered the officer, dryly.

"What can we do?" demanded the lady. "Prove that the child is really the daughter of Allan, and you will find my husband and myself are not only ready, but anxious to acknowledge her; but you cannot expect that either of us will undertake the responsibility of introducing into society, as our niece, a young person who may ultimately prove to be the daughter of a common soldier."

There was something so exceedingly plausible in all this, that Major Hawley suspended his judgment until he had consulted his wife, whose opinion he had long been accustomed to look up to; for, like most women, she possessed, not only a quick perception of character, but was a keen judge of motives as well as actions.

"I must cause inquiries to be made," he observed. "In which we shall be most happy to assist you," replied her ladyship. "Sir Norman will give you a letter to his steward and solicitor—both very excellent persons."

"Why not accompany me?"

The baronet shook his head at the proposal, and looked to his clever wife to make a reply to it.

"My dear major, you forget the peculiar position in which we are placed. It is not the mere acknowledgment of our niece, but the providing for her," said Lady Boothroyd, "that we must undertake; but first her claims must be proved. There ought to be no doubt on that point."

"Certainly not."

"All we demand are the proofs; produce them, and then judge us by our conduct."

"Nothing can be fairer."

With this observation, Major Hawley took his leave, certainly more favourably impressed than he had expected, both with the baronet and his lady.

"So," observed Sir Norman, as soon as they were alone, "Allan married after all, on purpose to dis-appoint me."

His wife smiled. "And this girl," added her husband, "who in the event of my death without an heir male, comes in for half the estate,—do you imagine I will acknowledge her?"

"When I do."

"Never."

"Norman," said his wife, "it is now time that I explained the steps I have taken. I have long been in possession of this dreadful secret."

"And kept it from me?"

"From all the world. But you in particular; I wished to guard your peace of mind."

"You were wrong!" exclaimed the baronet, angrily. "I should have taken steps which now I fear it will be too late to take. You have robbed, by your weakness, Alice of half her fortune. Illston will never marry her," he added, "without Meldown for her dowry."

"It will be hers."

"What mean you?"

"That if I have been secret I have not been idle. Let the major produce the girl, if he can, bring forth his proofs, we may laugh at his malice, for the day before we quitted home the child disappeared."

"Disappeared," repeated Sir Norman, slowly.

"Was stolen."

"And has never since been heard of," added his wife, in a whisper.

"She may be found."

"They must seek her in the grave, then," exclaimed the woman, in a triumphant tone, "for I possess the certificate of her death. She died beneath the roof of the party in whose hands I placed her."

Her husband breathed again.

"You ran a great risk," he observed.

"The stake was a great one," replied his wife.

"Think you, I would see the fruit of so many years' toil and manœuvring snatched from me? No; I acted even before I had proofs that Lillian was the daughter of your brother. Sillex, who saw her first, suspected it from the extraordinary likeness. He imparted his suspicions to me, and now you know all. We may defy detection."

Shortly after the visit of Major Hawley, Viscount Illston arrived to pay his usual morning visit to his aunt and Sir Norman, on which occasions Alice was always expected to make her appearance in the drawing-room; a terrible annoyance, but one the poor girl found herself compelled to submit to by her manœuvring mother, whose intention of sacrificing her to her cousin she already suspected.

If there is one display more certain than another to create disgust in the mind of a refined and delicate girl, it is the vulgar confidence of success. Illston treated the heiress of Meldown Park as if she ought to feel herself highly honoured, even by the distant prospect of his alliance; made no effort to conceal the utter heartlessness of his character; but, on the contrary, appeared to take an insane delight in painting himself in the worst of colours. Perhaps it was in the hope of annoying her—for he half divined the childish attachment which existed between Alice and William Thornton, whom he hated.

"You have had a visitor, I perceive, this morning," observed his lordship, as he threw himself upon a chaise longue near the window.

"How can he have known of Hawley's visit?" thought the baronet.

"Not a creature," replied her ladyship, coolly.

Her nephew regarded her doubtfully.

"You are the first who has called," added his cousin, who had not been informed of the major's visit. Illston felt satisfied: he could believe her.

"It was a very natural supposition," he observed;

"for, as I drove into the square, I met that puppy, Thornton, crossing it."

"How could you suppose such a person would visit here?" demanded the baronet, in a tone of great disdain.

"So very improbable," added her ladyship.

Alice remained silent.

"I thought you were friends in the country," said the viscount with a smile, for he saw that he had annoyed his cousin, and rejoiced in the unmanly triumph.

"In the country, nephew," exclaimed Lady Boothroyd, "one is expected—nay, almost compelled, to know all kinds of disagreeable persons; there are interests and political connections to keep up; but in London it is quite a different affair."

"You thought Thornton disagreeable, then?"

"Extremely."

"A puppy," muttered Sir Norman.

"And you, coz," added his lordship, fixing his eyes upon those of Alice, in the hope of embarrassing her, "may I ask your opinion of him?"

"I have not seen him since he was a boy," replied the young lady.

"But as a boy?" urged the visitor, perseveringly.

"That he was one of the noblest, finest-hearted beings I ever knew," answered the heiress, with a firmness which startled her parents and the puppy who felt a dastardly pleasure in persecuting her;

"brave, generous, and talented. But I need not repeat his merits to Viscount Illston," she added, warmly—"his bravery he must recollect, seeing how frequently it was exerted to protect him at Eton; or his generosity, for he never condescended to remind him of it. As for his talents, William Thornton's success at the university places them beyond dispute. Being a parvenu—I think that is the word, is it not, cousin?—his honours were not merely honorary."

"Alice!" exclaimed her mother, angrily, "how can you make such unfeminine observations? What can you possibly know about the university?"

"Or William Thornton?" added her father, indignantly.

The viscount felt deeply mortified. It was not the first time his attacks upon his former protector and schoolfellow had met with a similar reproof.

"Illston," observed his aunt, as the young nobleman took his leave, "you are playing a foolish game; instead of reminding Alice on every occasion of her old playfellow, why not suffer her to forget him?"

"She can't forget him," muttered her nephew; "she loves him."

"Ridiculous," answered her ladyship.

"I tell you that she does; the fellow walks through the square a dozen times in the course of the day."

"Possibly."

"And Alice meets him."

"Illston," said the ambitious woman, without betraying the slightest symptom either of anger or surprise, "your last assertion is false, and you know that it is so. You heard what Alice said just now in the drawing-room, that she had never seen William Thornton since he was a boy. I would stake my existence upon her truth—she is incapable of descending to a lie."

"But they might meet," observed the gentleman, sullenly.

"That is a very different affair," answered Lady Boothroyd, "and worthy of consideration. I will take efficient steps to guard against such a contre-temps. And now for a piece of friendly advice," she continued: "trouble yourself about this Thornton less, and occupy yourself with Alice more. She is a singular girl and possesses a will, which even I cannot always succeed in bending."

"I shall never attempt it," observed the young man, with affected indifference.

"Meldown is worth the trial," said his aunt, dryly. "In the hands of an active, popular possessor, it would carry the county."

"I'd rather break it," muttered the viscount to himself, as he drove to his club; "and I will break it if ever I become her husband, for I feel inclined to hate her already. As my wife," he philosophically added, "doubtless, I should detest her."

The hint her nephew had given of William's frequent promenades in the square was not lost upon Lady Boothroyd, who took her measures accordingly.

Every servant in the house was bribed; and the consequence was that a letter, in which, disappointed in his repeated attempts at meeting with Alice, her former playfellow had written to declare his passion, fell into the hands of her mother.

It was answered in a friendly, not unkind spirit, apparently by the heiress herself, rejecting his suit, but expressing a hope that they might still continue friends, and requesting him not to write again.

We need scarcely say that the reply was a forgery; and for some time William himself felt disposed to doubt its authenticity, till he read in the Morning Post the announcement of an engagement between the only daughter and heiress of Sir Norman and Lady Boothroyd, and Viscount Illston; then he doubted no longer.

"Sold!" he murmured; "faith, happiness, and love bartered for a coronet. Poor Alice! may she never live to repent her choice, or regret the heart she has rejected."

Little did he imagine, while he thus blamed her, how wholly and devotedly that heart was his.

(To be continued.)

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

GOOD READING.

In our last article we pointed out some of the principal varieties of bad reading. We proceed to notice some of the essential qualities requisite for accuracy of pronunciation and agreeable and correct reading.

Let your voice be neither too loud nor too low. Consider to which of these defects you are most liable. If your voice be too low, converse with those who experience a difficulty in hearing, and this will necessitate your speaking loudly and clearly. If your voice is too loud, accustom yourself to talk with those whose voices are low, and the contrast afforded by your voice with theirs will naturally tend to correct it.

Pronounce all your words clearly and distinctly. Attend diligently to the meaning, weight, and propriety of every sentence. Mark by your voice every emphatic word in it. This will not only be an advantage to yourself, but a double one to your hearers, for it will give them time to do the same, and excite their attention when they see yours is fixed. Read so that every one of your hearers may understand the sense of what you are reading. Some may be of readier apprehension than others; but you must not be guided by these, but read so as to be understood by those who are slow to comprehend.

To read gracefully and emphatically, you must fully enter into the meaning of your author, and endeavour to convey precisely those thoughts and feelings which were in his mind when the work was composed. By the style in which the composition is read, an author may be either enlightened or obscured, or an entirely different idea conveyed from that which was originally intended. The art of good reading is simply to convey the exact meaning of the author; and hence we should adopt nothing but a natural, easy, and graceful variation of the voice, suitable to the subject.

Some are more ready than others in apprehending the sense of an author, and expressing that sense by the graceful modulation of the voice; but all are capable of doing so to a certain extent. Accuracy, if not brilliancy, is within the reach of all.

That which requires our first attention is the right sound of words. For this purpose principles of pronunciation should be studied, and a pronouncing dictionary often consulted. The utility of such a practice will be felt, not only by those who are liable to fall into gross and palpable error, but by those who have never sufficiently considered those minute variations in sound and accent which do not betray any direct impropriety, but leave a bad impression on the ear of a well educated individual. While English orthography and pronunciation remain as they are, it is not enough that we should study analogy, or adopt any fixed rule; it is necessary that we should rather adopt the custom of the best educated classes.

The next subject which demands attention is punctuation. The sense of any written composition depends on what we commonly call the stops—commas, semi-colons, colons, and periods. Misplace these, and the meaning of an author may be entirely reversed. Carelessness with regard to punctuation is a common fault, but none the less reprehensible. But the loose mode in which these points are now employed may be some excuse for the little attention they receive. An intelligent reader will mark the sense of his author, and if it be possible—as it often is—to render the sense by a change in the punctuation, have no hesitation in doing so.

The next and most important thing to be regarded is a just emphasis. What accent is to a word, emphasis is to a sentence. They are to be distinguished by a fuller, stronger sound of voice wherever they are found. The sense will always discover where they should be placed. But it requires care and attention, as a wrong emphasis, like incorrect punctuation, may completely reverse or utterly destroy the author's meaning.

Cadence is the direct opposite of emphasis. The voice is raised in emphasis but lowered in cadence, and when rightly managed, has an exceedingly agreeable and musical effect. Besides cadence of voice there is cadence of style; such cadence usually occurs at the end of a sentence, unless it closes with an emphatic word.

In poetry, as well as in prose, the same rules should be observed, and the sense and spirit of the author be considered beyond everything else. In reading verse, for instance, some unthinking readers favour the measure or rhyme instead of the sense. This, it is scarcely necessary to observe, is a gross error. The reader should concern himself to bring out the meaning of the poet, not to display the musical jingle of his rhymes. If you read prose or verse, with proper pause, emphasis, and cadence, with a pronunciation varied and governed by the sense, and it be not harmonious and beautiful, the fault is not in the reader, but in the author.

FRENCH LESSONS.

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF ACQUIRING THE FRENCH LANGUAGE.

AU REVOIR, A LEARNER, HOBSON'S CHOICE, GARGON.—Some of our correspondents (mentioned above) will have found their questions answered in the preceding chapter; but we must again endeavour to impress on the minds of students that in spelling the French sounds, it is intended that the learner should give the written syllable exactly the same sound it would have in English. Consequently, in any syllable intended to imitate the French, the final e must be mute, because it is so in English; and the final consonant must be sounded for the same reason. In reply to those who complain that some of the sounds furnished are not exactly those of French words, we answer, that we are aware of this fact, and that the sounds are merely offered as assistances, and great assistances they will prove to the intelligent, industrious scholar; and it is in justice to such scholars that we must decline to fill up the short space allowed us in answering too many questions. Let students go on with the "French Lessons," and go on with confidence and hope. They will find every succeeding rule answer some doubt. If all our readers required us to explain our explanations, the whole paper would be filled with our French lessons.

BISKERLITH.—We think a dictionary is not yet necessary for you.

JOHN H. TAIT.—We thank you for your suggestion.

CHAPTER VII.

WHEN next the friends met, Robert told George what a pleasant, improving exercise his last suggestions had procured for him. "I mean," added he, "the writing out and translating from French into English, and from English into French, the lesson I learn by heart."

"Have a copybook both for the English and French translation," replied George, "and make it a kind of record of your progress, by leaving all the corrections (made by comparing it with the original), and by remarking particularly if they become less and less frequent as you proceed. When, in the 'Voyage à Paris,' the dialogue is too long for one exercise, you can divide the translation of it into two or even more parts, according to your leisure and convenience. But I hope you have not forgotten the auxiliary verb avoir," added George.

Robert replied by repeating the tenses of the verb.

After expressing his satisfaction, George begged Robert to have his pen and ink in readiness, "but," said he, "before you begin the verb to be, I should like to explain to you the nature of an adjective and an adverb. Unlike some grammarians, I have thought it best to put them together, because they are like each other, inasmuch as they both point out a quality. The adjective shows the nature or quality of the noun, and the adverb, the quality or manner of the verb. I shall soon see if you have understood me, by asking you to find out the adjective and the adverb in the following sentence, 'Robert writes a good style, and he speaks correctly.'"

"Good is the adjective, and correctly is the adverb," replied Robert. "This time I'm sure I'm right, for your explanation was so clear, it would have been next to impossible to misunderstand you."

"Then now, Robert," said George, "since you understand the nature of an adjective and an adverb, in addition to that of the article, noun, pronoun, and verb, I hope all your fears of being conquered by the ten parts of speech have vanished."

"Indeed they have," said the pupil; "and I now long to set about the verb to be."

"Well then, begin with the infinitive. In the other moods an adjective shall follow the verb."

INFINITIVE MOOD.

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
To be.	Etre.

INDICATIVE MOOD.

Present.	Le Présent.
I am contented.	Je suis satisfait.
Thou art rich.	Tu es riche.
He is obedient.	Il est obéissant.
We are faithful.	Nous sommes fidèles.
You are unfaithful.	Vous êtes infidèles.
They are poor.	Ils sont pauvres.
Past.	Le Passé (Imparfait).
I was grateful.	J'étais reconnaissant.
Thou wast glad.	Tu étais content.
He was weak.	Il était faible.
We were learned.	Nous étions savants.
You were strong.	Vous étiez forts.
They were idle.	Ils étaient paresseux.
Future.	Le Futur.
I shall or will be proud.	Je serai fier.
Thou shalt or wilt be sad.	Tu seras triste.
He shall or will be sincere.	Il sera sincère.
We shall or will be timid.	Nous serons timides.
You shall or will be pious.	Vous serez pieux.
They shall or will be active.	Ils seront actifs.

IMPERATIVE MOOD.

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
Be thou alone.	Sois seul.
Let him be amiable.	Qu'il soit aimable.
Be you or do you be kind.	Soyez bienveillant.
Let them be laborious.	Qu'ils soient laborieux.

"I wish you now to remark, Robert," said George, "that in my plan I endeavour not only to furnish you with rules sufficient to give you a fair knowledge of French grammar, but also to supply you with plenty of useful words in the vocabulary, and with sentences in the 'Voyage, &c.' Now for the vocabulary; but first repeat to me the days of the week and the seasons of the year."

"Very well remembered," said George, when Robert had complied with his request. "You can now proceed to the months."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
The Months.	Les Mois.
January	Janvier
February	Février
March	Mars
April	Avril
May	Mai
June	Juin
July	Juillet
August	Août
September	Septembre
October	Octobre
November	Novembre
December	Décembre

"I hope we shall go on with preparations for our journey to-day," said the pupil, anxiously.

"We shall actually start," replied the teacher, with a smile. "If you recollect, you had just had a good breakfast, and the next consideration was about your luggage."

CONTINUATION OF LE VOYAGE À PARIS.

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
You must soon set off.	Il faut bientôt partir.
Have you packed your trunks?	Avez-vous fait vos malles?
Yes, but I do not take much luggage; it is so inconvenient.	Oui, mais je ne prends pas beaucoup de bagage; c'est fort embarrassant.
You ought to have a padlock for your carpet-bag, and a lock for your portmanteau.	Il vous faut un cadenas pour votre sac de nuit, et une serrure pour votre valise.
Now embrace your mother, and tell her you'll bring her something very pretty from Paris, and that you will be back in a month from the present time.	Embrassez votre mère, et dites lui que vous lui apporterez de Paris quelque chose de joli, et que vous serez de retour d'ici à un mois.
Come, here's the cab. Mary, see that all our things are put in.	Venez, voici le cabriolet. Marie, voyez qu'on y mette toutes nos affaires.

* Etaient is sounded as if written ettay.

† Solent is sounded sola, giving the wa the same sound as it has in water. In étaient and solent the final t is sounded before a vowel.

‡ On.—Difficulties have been found in the pronunciation of this word. To assist learners, the sound has been thus written ong; but they must beware of giving the sound of the o as in our word song. The o is that used in the exclamation, oh! and perhaps the sound would be more correctly written ohng, but it is sounded oh if immediately followed by a vowel; and when pronounced ohng before a consonant, students must particularly observe that the g is the final liquid g, as in our word spring, not the harsh g, as in got and garden.

Coachman, take us to the Dover railway station.
Wait a minute; see if you have forgotten anything.
Have you your money, your keys, and your passport?
I have everything.
That's right.
Coachman, go rather quickly. Here we are.
At what o'clock does the train start?
At ten o'clock.
If we go from Dover to Boulogne, how long will the passage be?
Don't think about that yet. Let us secure tickets for Dover, for the bell is ringing.

Cocher, conduisez nous au chemin de fer de Douvres. Attendez un instant; n'avez-vous rien oublié.
Avez-vous votre argent, vos clefs, et votre passe-port?
J'ai tout.
C'est bon.
Cocher, menez un peu vite. Nous voici.
A quelle heure part le convoi?
A dix heures.
Si nous allons de Douvres à Boulogne, combien durera le trajet?
N'y pensez pas encore. Procurons les billets pour Douvres, car l'horloge sonne.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON VI. MOTION IN A CURVED LINE.

139. Does a ball fired from a gun pursue a straight line through the air?—It follows a curved line.

140. Why does it not proceed in the direction in which it was fired?—Because its weight continually draws it downward into a new direction.

141. How far could a cannon ball be fired if it were not retarded by the resistance of the air?—More than 30 miles.

142. What is the greatest distance that a cannon ball has actually been projected?—Only about three and a half miles; so great is the effect of the resistance of the air.

143. If a bullet pursues a curved line through the air, how is it that a marksman, in firing a rifle, aims at the mark he wishes to hit?—The line of fire is somewhat inclined to the line of aim, and intersects it.

144. Illustrate by Fig. 6.— $a b$ is the line of aim, and $c d$ is the line in which the bullet leaves the gun. The bullet follows the curved line, and is on the line of aim at the points m and n .

Fig. 6.

145. To what height could a cannon ball be fired vertically upward, if it were not for the resistance of the air?—Sixteen miles.

146. With what velocity and force would it return to the earth?—With the same that it leaves the gun.

Fig. 7.

147. With what velocity should a cannon ball be projected horizontally from the top of a mountain, to go entirely around the earth, supposing that it did not encounter the air?—About five miles per second.

148. Mention other instances of motion in a curved line.—The drops of water in a fountain rise and fall in beautiful curves. Brooks and rivers often flow through verdant valleys in graceful serpentine lines.

149. What kind of motion has the moon in space?—The moon moves in a vast circle around the earth.

150. What force is it that continually draws the moon out of its direction of motion into a circle?—The attraction of the earth.

151. How much less is this force at the distance of the moon than at the earth's surface?—About 3,600 times less.

CENTRIFUGAL FORCE.

152. When a stone is whirled round in a sling held in the hand, it is perceived that it pulls outward upon the hand; what is this force that acts along the string from the centre outward called?—The Centrifugal Force.

153. What name is given to the force which draws the stone inward and keeps it in the circle?—Centripetal Force.

154. How are these two forces related to each other?—They are of equal intensity, and pull in opposite directions at the two ends of the string.

155. Explain more particularly.—The centripetal force pulls inward at the inner end, and the centrifugal force pulls outward at the outer end.

156. What keeps the cord stretched?—These two forces pulling at its two ends; just as a rope is stretched by two men pulling at the ends.

157. Suppose the stone should be whirled more rapidly, what would be the consequence?—The opposing centripetal and centrifugal forces would be increased, and the string might break.

158. If the string should be suddenly released from the hand, or should break, what would be the result?—The stone would fly off in a tangent, as Fig. 8 shows.

Fig. 8.

159. How does that appear?—As soon as the string gives way, there is no longer any force operating to change its direction, and it continues on, by virtue of its inertia, in the direction in which it is moving at that instant.

160. Does the centrifugal force have any effect after the string gives way?—It does not; it instantly ceases to act.

161. Are the same two forces in operation in other cases of circular motion, as in the revolution of the moon around the earth, and of the earth around the sun?—They are; the centripetal force in these cases is the attraction of the central body around which the revolution is performed.

Fig. 9.

162. Suppose a round body turns about an axis, like a top?—All its parts will be animated by a centrifugal force pulling directly outward from the axis, as represented in Fig. 9.

163. What parts of the rotating body will be urged outward by the greatest force?—Those which are most remote from the axis. This is indicated in the figure by the comparative size of the arrows.

164. How may the action of the centrifugal force, in the case of a rotating body, be illustrated experimentally?—By an apparatus consisting of two circular iron or brass hoops, so thin as to be flexible, and an arrangement for setting them in rapid rotation around an upright rod to which they are attached.

LITTLE THINGS.

KATY CLEVELAND had been married only a single month. What ails the sweet young bride? Her eyes look as if she had been weeping. That curve upon her lips is not the arching beauty of a smile. Has Edward spoken unkindly? or refused some darling request? Has he left her to be gone a week? or failed to return at the appointed time after a few days' absence? No, none of these. Then why has grief visited her gentle bosom?—for grieving she is, as she sits there by the window, still as an eglis.

Do not smile at the answer we give you—

“Edward has only forgotten the expected kiss at parting, and gone forth to his daily business, leaving a shadow upon the spirit of his young wife.”

You smile in the face of our caution! It is such a little thing. And you say, if Katy Cleveland is going to make a bracket to hang troubles upon out of every trifle like this, she will soon have her whole house tapestried with gloom.

But it was no trifle to Katy. The young husband's kiss may be nothing to you—not even held to the value of a pepper-corn—but it was of priceless value to the bride. She had even come to look forward to the daily partings and meetings with a pleasant anticipation of the unfailing kiss—that sweet token of love.

But the token had been withheld at last; and on the closing day of their “honeymoon.” How ominous! Was the husband's shadow already thrown across the threshold of their home?

Acts we all instinctively regard as the representatives of thoughts or feelings. The kiss, with Katy, was an expression of love; its denial an evidence of failing warmth on the part of her idolised young husband. She had no other interpretation. No wonder, therefore, that tears dimmed her eyes; no wonder that a veil was on her countenance. It was the bride's first sorrow.

Away to his warehouse Edward Cleveland had gone, wholly unconscious of the shadow he had left behind him. He did not even remember that, in parting, he had withheld the usual kiss. Thoughts of business had intruded themselves even into his home, and claimed to share the hours sacred to domestic tranquillity. The merchant had risen for the time superior to the husband.

When Edward met his wife at the falling of twilight, it was with a lover's ardour. Not only one kiss was bestowed, but many. In the warm sunshine of his presence the clouds which had veiled her spirit for hours were scattered into nothingness.

And yet the memory of that forgotten kiss remained as an unwelcome guest. On the next day, and the next, and every day for a week, the expected kiss was given; yet, ever and ever, in her hours of loneliness, would thought go wandering back to the hour when her husband left her without this token of his love, and trouble the crystal waters of her soul.

At the end of a week the kiss was forgotten again; nor was this all: Edward had shown on one occasion a spirit of impatience, and spoken words that smote upon her feelings with a sharp pain. He had not meant to speak unkindly—had not even felt so; but Katy had seemed unusually obtuse in some matters about which Edward sought to interest her, and her dulness provoked him.

“You are a little simpleton!” He spoke half in sport, half in earnest, his brows slightly contracting. “Why, a girl fourteen years of age could see through it all!”

He observed that the colour on her cheeks deepened, that the expression of her eyes changed, and that she turned her face partly away from him; but he never imagined the degree of pain his lightly spoken censure had occasioned. It never entered into his heart to conceive of the darkness of the veil which suddenly came between her spirit and the sunlight.

And so Edward felt a degree of contempt for the quality of her understanding. “A little simpleton!” Ah! if the words were half-playfully spoken, they had a meaning. He would not have said them if he had not discovered a feebleness of comprehension below what he had believed to exist. Could the young wife's thoughts reach to any other conclusion? No!

These were little things—trifles compared with the great troubles of life that come to all, and that were in store for Katy Cleveland as surely as for the rest. But they need not have been, and would not have been, if Edward had not concealed his thoughts, and had felt towards Katy as tenderly as in the beginning. How very guarded was the lover in all his words and actions. He never forgot the parting kiss; never was betrayed into a lightly spoken word, that carried with it a sting for the heart of his betrothed. Oh, no! had he deceived Katy as to his real character and feelings? We cannot give a freely-spoken yea or nay to this. He had not meant to deceive her; and yet certain semblances were put on, and the lover appeared to have more perfections than really existed in the man.

“Ah, well, is not this ever so?” Perhaps it is. With certain qualifications to the sentiment, the lover is always a dissembler. If not, when he assumes the husband he thinks it no longer needful to give voice to the tender sentiments that pervade his bosom. It is enough for his wife to know that he loves her. But she looks for signs and tokens as of old, and these failing, she sits often athirst by the dried-up fountains from which once gushed out refreshing waters.

Almost timidly did Katy look into her husband's face when he returned home. Every hour during his absence, and almost every minute of every hour, had she thought of his depreciating words; and she felt that he too must be thinking of them all the time, and with something of disappointment, if not alienation. But she was in error here. Edward had forgotten them almost as soon as uttered; and nothing would have surprised him more than the fact that Katy was grieving over them. He met her with the most ardent of kisses, the sweetest of smiles, and the tenderness of words; and she was happy again.

But the evening did not pass wholly free from shadows. Edward was developing by degrees the peculiarities of his character, which had many aspects not yet seen by his wife. He had selfish qualities—as all men have—and peculiarities, that, to some, would show themselves as offences. One fault was impatience. This he had repressed, though often under strong temptation to let his feelings leap into unseemly words. He was, moreover, a man disposed to musing in silence. His business fully occupied his thoughts during business hours, and intruded itself even into the times and seasons that should have been sacred to domestic peace. A thorough mercantile education had given him habits of order and punctuality. He was one of your minute men—orderly, punctual, a little sarcastic, and impatient! Ah, Katy Cleveland! you have a trial before you with this husband of yours, who is far from being the perfect man your girlish imagination pictured. And yet he loves you as the apple of his eye, and would on no account give you pain.

"There it is again!" Edward had gone to the bookcase which stood in their sitting-room, to get a volume. Vexation was apparent in his tones.

"What's the matter?" inquired Katy, whose heart began to beat quicker.

"Who is it that disarranges these books so shockingly?"

"No one, dear. Nobody touches them but myself," replied Katy.

"Then it is time you had learned a little order. Just look here! Do you see this volume of Byron upside down, and out of its place in the series? And here are two books laid on the tops of others, instead of being set in upon the shelf; and here is another with the front, instead of the back, turned outward. Such disorder annoys me terribly! Of all things, I like to see order; and most of all in a woman. I hardly expected to find it so seriously lacking in my wife."

Edward was annoyed, and did not very carefully modulate his tones. They struck very harshly, and with an angry intonation, upon the ears of Katy, whose heart was too full to permit her to make an answer.

"The fact is," continued Edward, "I am a little disappointed in you."

Ah! This was too bad! The blow given, with not a thought of its force, reached instantly the fountain of tears, and they gushed in a flood over the cheeks of Katy.

Now, what had Edward said to occasion such a burst of grief! He was not conscious of cruel words. Only lightly had he laid his hand upon her—lightly, if not lovingly—and this was the effect! Must he never speak out when he saw affairs go wrong? Must he let all things fall into disorder, and yet hold his peace? This was asking too much. It was unreasonable.

"Katy," he spoke rather sternly, "I thought you a reasonable woman. But, all this is very unreasonable!"

Now, Katy, for all her sensitiveness, had some spirit; and there was sufficient pride in her heart to cause it, even in pain, to lift itself indignantly against the one who thrust at her too sharply—even if that one were her husband. Her tears ceased to flow, and she made answer—

"And I thought you a kind and reasonable man!"

People who utter harsh words usually evince surprise—often indignation—when coin of like quality is returned to them in exchange. Edward Cleveland was for a moment or two half confounded at this unlooked-for response. He had, in as mild a way as possible (?), pointed out a disorderly habit that was exceedingly annoying, and lo! his wife assumed an air of injured innocence!

"And pray, madam, in what respect have I shown myself lacking in kindness and reason?"

Edward turned full upon his wife as he made this interrogation, and looked with knit brows into her face.

"In making the position of two or three books on a library shelf of more importance than a kind and gentle demeanour towards your wife, who has no thought or wish but to please you."

Well and timely spoken, Katy Cleveland. There are always two sides to every question—two aspects in which to view all misunderstandings between individuals—husband and wife not excepted. Far better it was to give Edward this revelation of your thoughts than to hide them away from his perceptions, and leave him under the wayward influence of his own partial views. It was a statement of the case altogether unexpected; yet so forcibly put that the young husband found himself shamed by an irresistible conviction of wrong.

"Right, Katy, dear!"

It took a few moments for common sense and kind feelings to overcome the young man's pride. But the closing sentence of his wife had dispelled his trifling anger, and left but small resistance. He spoke cheerfully, even tenderly—shutting the bookcase door at the same moment—and drawing an arm around her waist, pressed her closely to his side.

"Yes; you are right, darling!" he said. "The position of a book is a small matter compared to words and tones that make the heart bound with pleasure or flutter in pain. These little things annoy me sometimes. It is a weakness. But I will overcome it, and never speak to you in unkindness again, though every book in the house be scattered on the floors."

Katy smiled lovingly into his face, through eyes that swam in tears.

"I did not dream that such things annoyed you, Edward," she made answer. "Father never seemed to notice them; though mother has scolded a great deal about my want of order."

"Men are different in this respect. Anything in disorder is sure to disturb me. I have many times wished it were otherwise. But habits are strong."

"Bear with me a little while," Katy made answer, "and I will endeavour to reform my bad habits. Want of order is, I believe, one of my most serious failings; but it shall not stand between me and my good husband, as an originator of strife. Only Edward!"

The young wife paused. A slight unsteadiness of voice betrayed itself on the last word.

"Say on, love. Only what?"

"Have patience with me. New lessons are not learned in a day. I shall often forget—often act but imperfectly."

"And will you have patience with me also, Katy?"

"With you! In what?"

"Patience with my impatience. One of my besetting sins lies here. I feel quickly and speak quickly. When things are not just to my mind, anger stirs in my heart."

"It will be very hard for me to bear with your displeasure," said Katy, growing more serious. "If you speak to me harshly or unkindly, I shall not be able to keep back the tears. Will you have patience with them, dear?"

"Yes, yes; and kiss them away, or smile them into rainbows," replied the husband with lover-like ardour.

Here was a good beginning. Katy's reaction upon Edward—a reaction that surprised herself almost as much as it surprised him—had brought him back to reason. She had held up a mirror before his eyes, and rather startled him with his own distorted image.

But the world was not made in a day, as the old adage has it, and habits of mind are too real things to be overcome and set aside on the first earnest effort. Katy's want of order and punctuality, and Edward's impatience, came into rather strong conflict ere the week had passed; and there were frowns and anger on the one side, and tears upon the other. After a brief estrangement, good sense and right feeling brought back the discordant strings of their life into harmony again.

One of the little things that annoyed Edward Cleveland, was his wife's habit of lingering in conversation with friends, when she knew that he was waiting for her. As for instance—they were at a social party, and the hour for returning had come. They left the parlour together, he going to the gentleman's dressing-room for his hat and overcoat, and she to one of the chambers for her bonnet and furs. Of course, he was ready first. It did not take him two minutes to draw on his coat, and take up his hat. At the end of the fourth minute, he began to think it time for Katy to make her appearance. But Katy and an old friend were in earnest conversation about some matter in which both had an interest, and she had not at the end of five minutes even taken her bonnet from the bed. At the end of ten minutes, she said, "I must be going. Edward is waiting for me."

And she drew on her bonnet and tied the strings.

"How becoming!" said the friend, referring to the bonnet. "I never saw you look so well in anything."

This turned their talk into a new channel, and five minutes more were consumed; at the end of which period, Katy said, as she took up hastily her furs—

"I'm forgetting myself! Edward is waiting."

But the friend started a new subject, and five minutes more were consumed. When Katy came, at last, with slow steps, talking still to her friend, and her husband met her on the stairs, she saw that his face was clouded. To him, the time he had been walking impatiently the dressing-room floor seemed full an hour; to her, the time she had been chatting with a friend, not over five minutes.

Edward was able to keep back from his tongue an indignant rebuke only long enough to get fairly out of the house. Then he said—

"Katy! This is insufferable! And if you treat me so again, I'll leave you to get home as best you can!"

Upon the pleasant state of feeling left by the evening's social recreations, what a chilling pall was this to fling! Katy had drawn her hand within his arm, and was leaning toward him; but, the pressure of her hand relaxed instantly.

"More than half an hour have you kept me waiting, with my heavy coat on, momentarily expecting you to appear!"

"No, Edward; it was not ten minutes," replied Katy, in a husky voice.

"Beg your pardon! It was three times ten minutes! But, one ten would have been more than twice too long. I never saw such a thoughtless creature!"

Katy had done wrong, and she saw it: but, not to an extent that warranted such an angry state of feeling in her husband. The time she had talked with her friend passed so quickly, that she could not believe more than ten minutes had flown away—but even to keep her husband waiting, under the circumstances, for ten minutes, she felt to be wrong; and had he not spoken so angrily, she would have acknowledged her error, and promised never again to offend in a similar way. As it was, she simply remained silent, while he, in the excitement of his unhappy state, added other words of rebuke no more carefully chosen.

It was very, very hard, under the circumstances, for Katy, suffering as she was from the indignant rebuke of her husband, to think clearly and feel rightly. The punishment was, in her view, altogether beyond the offence. He talked on, but she remained silent.

At last he began to feel that he was saying too much. Katy had not meant to offend him. Hers was only a thoughtless act, which his impatience had magnified into a crime, and which he had punished as if it had been a crime. Had his young wife given way to her feelings, she would have wept herself to sleep that night, refusing to be comforted. But there was common sense, right feeling, and a great deal of true perception in that thoughtless little brain of hers. She knew that her husband loved her; and she knew that she had done wrong in trespassing on his naturally impatient disposition. So, as soon as they were home, she gave vent to all the feelings of her heart in a passionate appeal to her husband's affection.

Edward Cleveland caught his young wife to his heart, and while he held her there tightly, covered her lips with kisses.

"Oh, these little things!—these little things!" he said; "how like foxes do they spoil our tender grapes! But, dear Katy, it must no longer be. Do not try my faulty patience over much, and I will hold my hand hard against the weaknesses of character which have, already, troubled our peace."

"Speak freely and frankly, Edward," was the reply—"only speak kindly. I will never of set purpose give you pain or annoyance. The dearest wish of my heart is to make you happy; the light of my life is in your loving smiles."

It was far better thus to understand each other. A world of unhappiness in the future Katy saved herself and husband. A true word, firmly spoken, will bring a man to reason quicker than a gallon of tears. Calm, firm remonstrance is always better in a wife than weeping or poodly silence. The first a husband can understand; to the latter he has no key of interpretation.

Many trials had Katy with her order-loving, impatient husband; but she knew his heart to be full of love for her, and the little things that some wives would have magnified into barriers of separation she swept aside with a gentle hand, and set herself to the work of preventing their future interposition. She had her reward.

SONG OF THE SUN.

"O, I am a painter," the Sun he cried,
As he drove his steeds in a cloudless sky;
"I crimson the rose, and the lily is dyed
With the colours that fall from my burning eye—
I picture the shadows that sleep in the vale—
On the mountain's crest, and the quiet stream—
I sketch on the ocean the snowy sail,
And the earth grows golden beneath my beam.

"The world is a picture, when I awake
And gather the curtains of night away;
The world is a blank, when slumber I take,
And lives but in dreams of the coming day;
I give to the spring a mantle green,
And a violet wreath to the budding May;
I give to the Summer a golden sheen,
To the roystering autumn his red and gray!

"I paint the earth in its wintry shroud;
I paint the earth in its gayest gear;
From a palette of mist I draw the cloud,
And I place a pearl on a falling tear:
O, I am a painter, and but for me—
Over the earth, and the sea and sky—
There never a picture was, or would be,
To thrill the heart or gladden the eye."

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

SIR BENJAMIN BRODIE, BART., D.C.L. V.P.R.S., ETC. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAULL AND POLYBLANK.

SIR B. C. BRODIE, BART., D.C.L., V.P.R.S., &c.

HAPPY is the nation that has no history, is a remark frequently made; and if history is but the record of battles, triumphs, and defeats, there is much truth in the observation. The glory of arms, the intrigues of cabinets, the quarrels and reconciliations of royal houses form the bulk, and, in common estimation, the most interesting part of national chronicles. And the story of a man's life, the career of one individual, is thought to be most attractive when filled with remarkable alternations of fortune, of dashing enterprise, and hair-breadth 'scape. But such elements as these have no place in the biography of those who have really rendered the best service to the world. The life of a quiet worker possesses no such features. This is especially the case with a medical practitioner. His consulting-rooms may be crowded with patients, hundreds of students may be instructed by him, his reputation may extend far and wide, and for years he may render incalculable benefit to the afflicted—but what, after all, is there to tell of such a man?—what but a slight variation of the Persian epitome of universal biography: he was born—he was useful—he died.

No name is better known than that of Sir B. C. Brodie; no man has been more useful, no man is more generally esteemed, and no man has risen higher in the profession which he adorns. But in furnishing a biographical notice of this gentleman there is but little to relate.

He is the descendant of an old Scottish family. His grandfather in the middle of the last century settled in London. His father was a clergyman, Rector of Winterslow, Wilts, where the subject of our memoir was born, June 9th, 1788.

He received a private education at home; and subsequently attended the Anatomy lectures delivered at the Hunterian School in Great Windmill-street. At twenty years of age he became a pupil of Sir Everard Home, at St. George's Hospital. For seven years he employed his time in teaching anatomy in the old rooms where he had previously studied. He was afterwards appointed surgeon to St. George's Hospital, where he gave a course of lectures on Surgery, which were so popular, and so well attended, that he continued to deliver them down to 1830. In that year he began his clinical lectures, which he addressed gratuitously to the hospital students. He was appointed Anatomical Professor to the Royal College of Surgeons in 1819, and there he delivered four courses of lectures on Comparative Anatomy. In 1823 he received the appointment of Surgeon-in-Ordinary to his Majesty King George IV.; and on the death of Sir Everard Home, in 1832, succeeded that distinguished man as Sergeant-Surgeon to King William IV.—a position he still holds under her present Majesty. A baronetcy was conferred upon him in 1834. In 1837 he delivered the annual oration at the Royal College of Surgeons on the anniversary of the birthday of the late Sir John Hunter; and that oration fully deserved all the commendations which were so freely bestowed on it.

Sir Benjamin Brodie can wield the pen as well as handle the lancet, and, notwithstanding his numerous engagements and the scant leisure which such a man can find, he has managed to compose several works of immense utility to the profession. Among these may be mentioned his "Physiological Papers," originally published in the Transactions of the Royal Society, chiefly relating to animal heat and the physiological action of poisons; and a series of essays, entitled "Psychological Inquiries," intended to illustrate the relation of the mental faculties and the physical organisation. He is a member of various learned societies, and received from the university of Oxford, in 1851, the honorary degree of D.C.L.

Such is a brief summary of the life of Sir Benjamin Brodie; but these facts and dates convey but a very inadequate notion of the amount of toil, the extent of influence, the deserved popularity of this great man. He possesses in an eminent degree those essential qualities for a successful surgeon—the eagle eye, the lion's heart, the lady's hand. He has conferred in his own practice incalculable benefit on society; while as a demonstrator and lecturer he has trained some of the best and cleverest men in the profession.

It is with much satisfaction we present the portrait of so eminent a "living celebrity"—a man who, in a quiet, unobtrusive way, has done the state good service.

SOUTH AMERICA: THE GUANACO

BETWEEN the physical characteristics of the old and of the new world there exists an immense difference. A vigorous vegetation, abundant rather than delicate, extensive forests, wide plains of magnificent verdure, a soil everywhere irrigated and everywhere productive,—these are the wealth of America. Nature has lavished upon her with a liberal hand those gifts which are the most useful to a rising people. With its vegetable treasures still waiting for the hand of man to cultivate and employ, every year adds to the preciousness of its inexhaustible fertility. The Indian—the primitive owner of these vast territories—shows himself unconscious of the value of his possessions, or incapable of turning them to account. He drives no ploughshare through the soil: hunting is his livelihood, and war his holiday; the land which is sufficient to support millions, serves only as a hunting ground for a few scattered inhabitants, while the old world is exhausted by long cultivation, and overloaded with an increasing population.

HUNTING THE GUANACO.

The most peculiar and striking features of South America are those flat regions—oceans of rich vegetation—distinguished as Llanos, Selvas, and Pampas. Since the discovery of the new continent, says Humboldt, in his "Pictures of Nature," its plains have become habitable to man. Here and there, towns have sprung up on the shores of the Steppe rivers, built to facilitate the intercourse between the coasts and the Orinoco district. Everywhere, throughout these vast districts, the inhabitants have begun to rear cattle. At distances of a day's journey from each other, we see detached huts, woven together with reeds and thongs, and covered with ox-hides. Innumerable herds of oxen, horses, and mules, estimated at a million and a half, roam over the steppe in a state of wildness. This spectacle involuntarily reminds the contemplative observer of the adaptability granted by an all-provident nature to certain plants and animals. Like the farinaceous fruits of Ceres, the ox and horse have followed man over the whole surface of the earth—from the Ganges to the Rio de la Plata, and from the sea-coast of Africa to the mountainous plains of Antisana, which lie higher than the Peak of Teneriffe.

But, although those plants and animals most serviceable to man readily multiply in the new world, that great continent has its own distinguishing features, and the animal and vegetable life of its lofty heights, and its primeval forests, are especially serviceable to man in that particular part of the globe. There is a special adaptability of certain animals, for instance, to certain localities. What the camel is to the sandy plains of Africa and Asia, is the llama to the table lands and mountain chains of America. When alive it serves as a beast of burden; and when killed, its flesh furnishes a wholesome and excellent food; while its hair is readily converted into a useful and comfortable fabric, which forms the principal clothing of the Indians. Herds of llamas are kept with very little difficulty. They are allowed to graze in the mountain during the day, and are shut up in an inclosure for the night.

Of the llama there are several varieties. That from which the common llama is derived is the guanaco, an animal found in all parts of the Andes, from the straits of Magellan to the north of Peru. They live together in herds, sometimes of considerable extent; at others, including not more than seven. They are light and graceful in form, of a pale brown in colour, but their hair is not so long as that of the domesticated species. Although less important in actual value than the tame llama, the guanacos are very frequently chased by the Chilian hunters. When thus pursued they exhibit some courage, and great strength and speed. Occasionally they will turn upon the dogs and hunters and show fight; but their real safety is in flight, for, if they can once gain the rocky precipices, they may defy the best trained hound and most practised hunter. When the guanaco finds itself pursued, it will stand as if uncertain how to act; till, pressed by the close proximity of its pursuers, it takes to flight, and speeds over the plain like the wind.

If taken when young the guanaco is capable of being domesticated, although it never loses its inclination for a wild life; but to tame a full-grown guanaco is beyond all the ability of man: it will not be charmed, charm he never so wisely.

The hunting of the guanaco is said to afford excellent sport, and Indians and Spaniards engage in it with considerable ardour. On the plains it is chased by the hounds, and with considerable adroitness the hunters cast their lassos or looped cords, as buffaloes are captured on the prairies, but if the animal is pursued to its mountain fastnesses, the sport partakes of all the excitement and danger of the chamois-hunt in Switzerland, and is rarely attended with success.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER XLII.

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage;
Minds innocent and quiet take
That for a hermitage.
For, though men keep my outward man
Within their locks and bars,
Yet, in the faith of Christ, I can
Mount higher than the stars.

It was a long, large, lofty room, with a paved floor, a deal table, a clean, narrow bed, and a good fire, protected by strong projecting, semicircular bars of iron. The light coming in from the windows, set high up in the thick walls, admitted the rays from above with that effect so dear to painters of high lights and deep shadows, which always gives a something picturesque and impressive to the commonest scene of every-day life. What, then, was their effect in that dread cell, where so many had groaned and wept through the night that preceded an ignominious death?

This room, which had often been used as the condemned cell, had witnessed many a strong man's agony—many a wrestle between despair and hope. What distracted forms had paced up and down that well-worn pavement! what bitter tears of remorse and unutterable regret had dropped on that table—that pallet!

Oh! with what an agony of mortal dread had the condemned seen the gray light of their last day on earth steal through those high, deeply ensconced windows!

There were writing materials on the table, and many good books—a Bible, a Prayer-book, Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Living and Dying," "The Christian Year," with its sweet strains, so full of faith, hope, charity, penitence, and pardon; and a well-worn volume which Ben's poor mother had brought with her—her own constant companion, but gladly resigned to her miserable son—"The Golden Treasury" (Bogatzsky's excellent little collection of texts, exhortations, and hymns for every day in the year).

As the turnkey entered, Jem Goodman started to his feet: he had been kneeling by the narrow pallet, praying with Ben, who, after a paroxysm of mental agony dreadful to witness, had fallen into a heavy sleep.

He did not wake, even when our party entered; and the Governor would not have him aroused.

Jem said, "I think, sir, the doctor's stuff has something sleepy in it. I fancied he rather feared poor Ben's head wouldn't stand so much troubling all day, and getting no sleep at night—he hasn't slept for a week!"

"I think he is under the influence of opium," said Ellen; "he is so still."

There he lay, that strong-built, muscular, and handsome young man, the light coming in on his crisp, close, curling locks of rich brown hair—those locks of which his poor mother had so fond a memory. His face was partly turned to the wall; but something might be seen of a bold, handsome, regular profile, generally sunburnt, weather-beaten, and, alas! latterly, blotched and blurred by intemperance, but pale enough now!

He breathed gently, poor, poor wretch! And as all present gazed on his muscular throat, broad shoulders, and powerful frame, the idea would force itself on every mind—"What will even the bodily agony be, when that strong, muscular being, in the prime of his existence, is suddenly hurled from fulness of health and life into a violent death?"

Tears were in Ellen's and Ada's eyes; and even Mrs. Golightly, who had on her spectacles, muttered something about dust, and took them off to wipe them: a very suspicious-looking mist dimmed those refulgent magnifiers!

Suddenly Ben Darrell spoke in his sleep. He was dreaming one of those pleasant, vivid dreams the sedative he had taken was sure to cause. In that dream, Ben Darrell was a young, an innocent, a happy lad once more, and courting that very Esther whom he had since slain, and who now lay alone in her coffin.

"Here's the first v'lets I've found, Esther," he said. "Take 'em quick, my own love, for I think Natt's on the watch. It's full moon to-night, darling; will ye meet me down by the barley-mow, when Natt's asleep? The brook's so clear, you can see your sweet face in it, Esther; and the meadows is so green and soft to tread on, like velvet, lassie; and, oh, the may's a'most as sweet as thee—there's the white, like thy bosom, and the pink, like thy cheek; and so fresh and nutty it do smell. Say thee'll come out at the back gate when Natt's getting his nap. I'll not join thee till thee gets behind the barley-mow, out o' sight; but I'll creep along t'other side o' the hedge to watch over thee."

And then, in that fine, natural tenor, to which his mother attributed his ruin, making him, as it did, popular at drinking-parties, he sang, in his sleep,

"From the white blossomed sloe, my dear Chloe requested
A sprig, her fair breast to adorn;
'No, by Heaven,' I exclaimed, 'may I perish, if ever
I plant in that bosom a thorn.'"

Bless your sweet face and your kind heart, Esther; I'll leave thee now for fear of Natt. One kiss, dear; and you'll be true, tho' I be beneath ye, lass, and only a poor laboring-man. I'll love ye so, gin ye'll be mine, ye shall never, never rue the day ye said 'Yes'."

"Poor fellow!" said Jem; but at this moment, with a wild cry, Ben Darrell woke, woke from that sweet dream of early love, to the consciousness that he had killed that dearly loved and loving Esther, who had trusted him so tenderly, and that, instead of the sweet hawthorn hedge, the babbling brook, the velvet sod, and the barley-mow, he was in his cell in Newgate on a charge of murder—her murder—wife murder!

With an agony like his, strangers could not cope.

Ada gently put the testament on the table, and the sweets beside it, telling him, as well as her voice, husky with emotion, would allow, the little story connected with the gifts. At each word she spoke, Ben Darrell's agony increased; but he sobbed forth "Bless them! bless you, young lady! I can't thank you as I ought; speak for me, Jem."

Thinking their presence only increased his distress, the ladies took their leave, and the Governor kindly allowed Jem Goodman to remain a little longer with the wretched Ben.

Mrs. Golightly, who had intended introducing the subject of her pamphlet, was herself too much affected by Ben Darrell's agony to think of anything else; and, with sorrowing hearts, and many reflections on the horrors and evils of drunkenness, our party, thanking the kind and courteous governor, left the dark and cloister-like prison, and came out almost surprised—after that heavy stillness, that dread hush, those stern impassable walls, those iron gratings, and fierce spikes, and that sense of coercion and restraint inseparable from a prison—to find the world without so careless, so noisy, so bustling, and so gay; all hurrying on their errands of business and pleasure, not merely as if earth contained no tomb, but as if it had no prisons, no scaffolds.

Yes, there in the crowded city, the bees of trade were busy intent only on gain, and the pleasure-seekers were fluttering in the spring breeze, and basking in the sunshine, like butterflies who have but a brief life here, and no hereafter.

CHAPTER XLIII.

There's a good time coming, boys,
Wait a little longer.

CHARLES MACKAY.

THE ladies regained their carriage in silence. They were all much impressed, much affected, with what they had seen and heard. Even Mrs. Golightly had forgotten her pamphlet, and "Woman's Rights and Wrongs," in the sense of Ben Darrell's dreadful despair.

At the corner of that street, which led to the ragged schools, a little group, drawn up at the corner, and waiting patiently, as they had waited for more than an hour, caught Ada's eye, and caused her instantly to pull the check-string.

This group consisted of Hope Evermore, Merry Blossom, Nessy Darrell, and Larky Grigg, as usual, shouldering blue-eyed baby Ben.

They were on their way home to dinner, when it struck Hope (thoughtful, gentle, motherly little Hope) that the ladies would pass that corner on their way from Newgate; and that if they watched for the carriage they might hear how poor Ben Darrell was, and how he liked his Testament and bag of sweets.

Hope mentioned her thought to Larky (her privy counsellor), who at once decided on staying at the corner till the ladies passed in their carriage.

Merry was delighted; and as there was a little bit of waste ground round that corner, she proposed that baby Ben should be put to sit down; and that they should have a game at chuck-farthing, or push-pin; and Potato-heels coming up at this moment, ready, as she always was, for "a spree," Merry began her arrangements; but it was not to be, for Hope stopped all by saying—

"You be getting on too fast, Larky and Merry; you don't see what I means for ye to do. Larky, good lad! afore we settles here at all, you must run over to mammy's stall and ax her leaf; and if she gives leaf, it'll only be for we to wait here quiet—not to be a-playing in the street, like bad, idle boys and gals."

"Then what be I to do, Hopy?" said Larky, docile as the great, brave, strong boy always was with little Hope.

"Thee be to run off to mammy's stall, Larky, at onst, lad, and ax might we stand quiet here to watch for the ladies, and ax about Ben Darrell; and more nor that, baby Ben mustn't be put to sit on the damp ground, noways. Give him here while you, Larky, runs off to mammy. I'll hold un."

"No, that thee sha'n't, Hopy," said Larky; "he's too big and heavy now, bless un! Here, you Meg," he added, in a voice of authority, "take baby Ben, and mind you don't put un down, d'ye hear? and talk to un, and let un play with them carrots o' thine. Don't let me find un dull or a-cryin' when I comes back, or I'll call thee Potato-heels for a month to come, and pitch into thee, too."

"I am willin' to hold baby Ben, Larky," said Meg. "I never said no other."

"Meg is always kind to baby Ben," said Hope. "Then why didn't she offer to take un off my hands, Hopy? But there, I'se off; I'll be back like winky."

And so he was, with Apple Blossom's permission for the little group to wait till the ladies passed.

How patiently those children wait! How patiently the poor always wait! Trained from the cradle, all have had a long apprenticeship in waiting "for the good time coming." But it will come. It is coming, and its first steps are towards ragged schools and temperance halls.

When all the parents keep out of the public-houses, the children out of the streets, and in the ragged schools,—then, oh! then, the good time will indeed be come.

The ladies ordered the coachman to draw up to the corner, where that patient little group awaited them.

The children, with natural discrimination and delicacy (amounting to tact), did not all press forward; they even hung back—Larky Grigg pulling his forelock, and the little girls curtseying—until Ada made a sign to Hope and Larky to come and speak to her.

Larky, putting baby Ben into Meg's arms, took Hope by the hand and brought her to the carriage door.

"Lift the little girl into the carriage," said Ada to the tall footman.

The man appeared not to hear.

"Lift the little girl into the carriage, Puff," said Ada, in a voice slightly raised, and with a colour considerably heightened.

Puff's was a very good place, or he would have rebelled; as it was, he obeyed, but blew the tips of his white gloves after, as he turned aside, just as if he had been ordered to lift in a dusty dog; yet little Hope was bright with cleanliness; but she was of what Puff—who copied Pertinette—called also "the kennel," "the lower horders," "the working classes." Puff himself did no work.

He told Pertinette at supper, that when "Miss Hader ordered him to lift a beggarly brat out of the 'kennel' hinto the carriage, you might have knocked him down with a stick."

"And I wouldn't have done it," said Pertinette, "if I'd been knocked down with a stick; but there's no proper spirit left in the servants' all."

"There's no lack of it in the softer sex," said Puff, hoping to conciliate Pertinette.

"Softer sex!" said the angry damsel: "if we judge by hearts, that epitaph may apply to females; if by heads, it's better suited to the lords of the creation."

Mr. Puff was not a match for Pertinette in repartee, so he stole off to his club.

"How be poor Ben Darrell, teacher?" asked motherly little Hope.

"He's not been well, my dear," said Ada.

"Wor he glad of them sweets, teacher," asked the child, "and of the Testament?"

"He will be when he's a little better, I dare say."

"What did he say, ma'am?"

"He sent his blessing to you all."

"Oh, that be a comfort, that be!" said Hope: "that be somebunt to tell Nessy. Nessy often cry and fret arter her poor mother, especial o' nights; but she don't seem to care much for her dad: but I've telled her her mother's better off—most like in heaven. It's her father she ought to pray for, ain't it, teacher? She don't never think about him, except just when she says her reglar prayers at night; but her poor mother's always in her mind."

"Love begets love," thought Ada, kissing the golden-haired, seraphic little Hope, and ordering Puff to lift her out of the carriage, in the same irresistible voice with which she had ordered him to lift her in.

Hope looked up with her large blue eyes full of wonder at the height and splendour of the great, rosy, powdered giant, who, having no feeling for anything but himself, and no fancy for anything but high life and Pertinette, never relaxed one showy feature as Hope smiled in his face.

Larky gladly received back his little foster-sister, and with a quick sense of Puff's contempt of one so dear and sacred in his eyes, wished he'd been a few years older, and a good many inches taller, and then he thought if he could but meet Mr. Puff, out of a presence he revered (that of Ada), he should like of all things to make the powder fly out of that primly curled hair, and to see Mr. Puff measure his gaudy length in the gutter.

Let us hope that before Larky has acquired the strength to do this, he will also have acquired that far greater requisite—the control of the inclination.

Ada looked from the carriage window and saw the little group trotting merrily home to their mammy's; Larky with baby Ben on his shoulder, and leading Hope by one hand, while she held little Nessy by the other.

Potato-heels and Merry Blossom were behind, indulging in a few pranks, which Hope observing by suddenly turning round, she got Larky to order, Meg on before.

And Meg, who loved and feared Larky, obeyed at once. Merry had no pleasure by herself, so she ran on before, too, and Ada saw them all turn into the blind alley, where was their little humble Christian home, and their poor dinner, or rather tea, ready for them.

CHAPTER XLIV.

The course of true love never did run smooth.
SHAKESPEARE.

WHEN Ada reached home and crossed the hall on her way to her father's room, she saw on a table, among many other cards, one of very small dimensions, but (to judge by the blush that suffused her face) of greater importance than any other.

This card was edged with black, and the name engraved upon it was "The Hon. Gerald St. Maur."

Among the notes was one directed to herself; the envelope was a mourning one, the seal was black. Ada carried both the note and the card up with her into her dressing-room, having altered her intention of going at once to her father's room.

Gerald St. Maur was the second son of the Earl of Arncliffe, whose estate adjoined that of the Pembertons. As children they had been very intimate; and, when he was a young man, home from Oxford for the vacations, and Ada was beginning to think herself a woman, he was very much smitten with her, and she preferred him to any other gentleman of her acquaintance.

As a partner for a dance he was unexceptionable; and at that time dancing was one of the chief delights of Ada's young and glad life.

There was no engagement between them; but he was so devoted to his attentions, and so jealous of her slightest notice of any other man, that Ada felt sure he only waited his coming of age (when he would inherit a handsome independence in right of his mother) to offer her his hand.

At present, as she was only sixteen and he not twenty, both knew their friends would laugh at an engagement, and forbid a correspondence.

Gerald, to please Ada, who revered intellectual eminence in man, had read occasionally very hard at college. We say occasionally, for he belonged to a college where he was constantly thrown with a set of gay men of his own rank in life; and sometimes wine and boating parties, hunting, and other amusements, drew him from his books, and then the influence of Ada waned.

There was a great peculiarity in Gerald St. Maur. Whatever occupied his attention for the time, engrossed all the power of his mind and feelings of his heart.

He loved Ada; and, while occupied in endeavouring to prove his affection and win hers, he had not a thought or a glance for any other person; but if, even in the midst of an occupation so entrancing to most young lovers, Ada succeeded in interesting him in a piece of music (he was very musical), a drawing (he drew well), or a book, she was for a time forgotten.

Once, when walking by her side, with her and her governess, at Pemberton, she awakened his attention to the rare beauty of a butterfly on the wing. He darted off in search of it, got interested in the chase, and, forgetting that the ladies were left alone on the wild heath far from home, he darted off, pursued the "winged gem" over hill and dale, hedge and ditch, garden and grove, brake and briar,—lost his way, missed the butterfly, and returned homelate and quite knocked up, to find Ada not a little piqued at having had to return without him, and to receive a good scolding from Lady Pemberton.

To this absorption in whatever he engaged in, he owed his success at his examinations, and his estrangement from Ada.

However, he was gifted with remarkable powers, and no little ambition.

As he was a second son, he knew, if he were ever to be great and distinguished, it must be by the cultivation and energy of his mind; and he read so hard a few months before he went up, that a first class (the highest honour the university could confer) was the reward.

Ada, who had not yet been introduced, was at Pemberton when his name appeared in the Times, in the class list as a first.

She said nothing while in the company of others; but, when she found an excuse to escape to her own room, she fell on her knees, and her tears gushed forth as she said, "Dear, dear Gerald! Heaven bless him! How hard he must have worked; and it was to please me he did so!"

She was all day in an inward tumult, and expected he would rush down by the express to tell her of his success and receive her congratulations.

She was dressed betimes in the style which she knew he preferred. Her hair was arranged in the long ringlets he loved so well. She watched, and watched, and started at every sound, and two days passed, and he did not come.

The fact was, he had left Oxford for London with a set of gay friends, glorying in a "pass," very proud of Gerald and his honours, which they considered were reflected on their order, their college, and themselves.

Sir Cecil Charleville, his greatest intimate, persuaded him to come and lunch with him at his father's house, before starting for Pemberton. It was a pleasant house. Cecil had many beautiful sisters and merry brothers. They were in a state of great excitement, getting up private theatricals, painting scenes, deciding on dresses, learning parts.

Gerald St. Maur was fond of acting; he had a great talent for genteel comedy. While he was helping Miss Charleville to paint a drop scene (his whole soul in the task, and Ada for the time forgotten) a message came to announce that the gentleman who was to play Charles Surface in the "School for Scandal," was laid up with the measles! Gerald knew the part; he had played it. He was soon enlisted, and—until the play was over, a week from that time—nothing else occupied his thoughts, or even occurred to his mind.

Yes; it was a week after he had taken his first class at Oxford, that, the excitement being over, and the reaction set in, conscience reproached Gerald with letting the paltry pleasures, connected with these private theatricals, make him forgetful of Ada; and, slyly giving his gay friends the slip at a brilliant déjeuner at Lady Roseville's, the morning after the performance, he set off by train for Pemberton. Ada had been deeply wounded, and seriously hurt at his long delay. When he did come she received him with a coldness and hauteur which he well deserved, and very ill brooked. It contrasted so forcibly and so disagreeably with the encouragement he had received from all the lovely sisters of his friend Sir Cecil, and the almost maternal kindness of their handsome, "downy" mamma.

And yet, in Ada's presence, beautiful and dignified as she was, he was himself amazed that he could have let anything induce him to offer her the slight, as a delay, at such a time, certainly was.

The occupation and engagement which had seemed so potent in town, appeared even to himself too paltry to be even pleaded.

He spoke of indisposition as the cause of his delay; and Ada, pointing to the Court Journal, said, "How distressing it must have been to you, Mr. St. Maur, to have figured at these private theatricals, as I see here you did, if you were indeed so indisposed. You are quite a martyr to your new friends!"

Mr. St. Maur! he who had always been "Gerald," since "in infancy they played." A martyr to his new friends he was indeed, if they had made Ada despise him. He began, in truth, rather to despise himself. He tried all he could to reinstate himself in her favour. In vain! she would not see him a moment alone; she would not grant him a tête-à-tête. She treated him with cold and rather haughty politeness, and seemed even glad to get rid of him.

It was but seeming. Gerald thought it real. He went back to town; and the contrast of his reception there, with that which he had met with at Pemberton consoled and exhilarated him. It reinstated him in his own opinion.

So he allowed Sir Cecil to propose him at his clubs, and introduce him wherever the gayest people met, in the best houses in town, to dance or dine. Mothers and daughters welcomed him into the garden of roses—artificial ones, perhaps, but looking so real, Gerald was quite "taken in"—but not "done for." Ada was still enshrined in his inner heart. He never dreamt of any other woman as a partner for life. A polka or a waltz was another matter.

He drowned thought in iced champagne. He suffered his gay friends to lead him into every kind of gaiety, and, alas, even dissipation.

He was very handsome, tall, and of an elegant figure, not naturally vain, but soon rendered a Lothario by the ladies, and a coxcomb by the tailors, who named a coat after him, the "St. Maur."

He soon belonged to all the most fashionable clubs, where his wit made him popular. He patronised the ballet; and St. Maur's throwing a bouquet made the fortune of a dansusee.

Insensibly he acquired that rather disdainful, jeering insouciance of manner of a man about town; and with talents to make him great, and originally much that was noble and good in his nature, he was nothing but "a fast man."

It was in this character Ada met him again and again, when first she was introduced into the world of fashion.

In her own heart there was still a deep, unconfessed interest in Gerald St. Maur. And that heart fluttered at his approach, and felt desolate as he passed her in the gay crowd, with a distant bow, or formal recognition.

She heard of his dissipation, his extravagance, his excesses; she saw his coxcombry and affectation, and she did not pause to consider that, perhaps, had she been less implacable, he might have been more worthy.

Perhaps to this unacknowledged but real and disappointed love, the dejection of her spirit, to which we alluded at the opening of this tale, was in some degree owing.

Certain it is, that when an affair of honour, or rather dishonour (connected with some bold ballerina, whose pirouettes had turned the brains of several young coxcombs), drove Gerald St. Maur abroad, in doubt whether he would not have the brand of Cain on his brow, Ada grew more than ever weary of the world, and sunk into the despondency of which we spoke in our first chapters.

And now, after an absence of two years, spent in travelling in the East and on the Continent, Gerald St. Maur is again in London. The Earl, his father, is dead, and his brother (crippled and sickly) has succeeded to the title.

There is every probability that Gerald will one day be himself Earl of Arncliffe, for his brother is very unlikely to marry, and not very likely to live long.

But Ada attaches no importance to this probability, but old memories, feelings, and associations, are very busy at her heart, and she sobs as she holds in her hand the unopened note.

What can have made him call?

What can he have to write to her about?

She has only to break that seal in order to ascertain, and yet she hesitates.

Pertinette is hovering about, throwing a wrapper over her young lady's shoulders, and preparing to dress her hair; hoping, as she had often done before, and as Abigail so often do, to read the mysterious note over her shoulder. But Ada, telling her she will dress her hair herself, dismisses her. Pertinette peeped through the keyhole, after Ada had bolted the door, "Which," she said to Puff, "I thought it was my duty to know what was going on, as I can't think her quite right in her mind, with all her low tastes and pursuits, so unlike mine, and so contrary to the fine young lady she was when I entered her service; which, to wait on a teetotaler, or teacher in a ragged school, never came into my calculation." And so, while Pertinette watched through the keyhole, she saw her young mistress weep.

Pertinette had an active search in all Ada's haunts while she was at dinner, hoping to see the contents of the black-edged note; but it was safe in Ada's bosom, and Pertinette was unsatisfied.

There was nothing in the note itself to make Ada weep; but what associations and regrets it may have conjured up who can tell? Its contents were as follows:—

"Gerald St. Maur is again in London, after two years of exile.

"During that exile his thoughts, saddened by anxieties (now removed) connected with the necessity for banishment, often strayed to Pemberton, its dear shades, green meadows, bright hearths, and the sweet welcome that used to await him—that of his early friend, Ada Pemberton.

"He made a vow, when straying among the pyramids, ever haunted by a memory; and again, when stretched on a sick bed in the south of France, and when, neglected and deserted, he recalled his illness as a boy at Pemberton, with Ada for his little angel nurse—yes, he made a vow that the first visit he paid on his return to London should be to that 'fair spirit' to whom he owes the little all of good he ever achieved, and who, if she knew how he has regretted his ingratitude, would forgive and welcome her friend of the long ago."

"GERALD ST. MAUR.

"Unless formally forbidden, G. St. M. will call on Miss Pemberton at twelve to-morrow."

Ada smiled to see that, had she been inclined to forbid the visit, it would not have been possible: Gerald St. Maur had given no address.

"I must see him," she said, "and I will receive him kindly. We may still be friends—why not? but nothing more. His interests are not my interests; his views are not my views. What does the exquisite, who gives his name to coats and carriages, care for the ragged schools, that interest me so deeply, and occupy so much of my heart and my time? What can the Sybarite, remarkable even among his frivolous and sensual fellows for his power of imbibing iced champagne, care for that temperance movement which it is one of the great objects of my life to promote?"

CHAPTER XLV.

We have been friends together, in sunshine and in shade;
Since first beneath the linden trees in infancy we played.
OLD SONG.

I remember, I remember, how my little lovers came,
With a flower, or a cherry, or a new-invented game.
Now I've you, love—now I've you, love, and you bow before me there,
But you know you're not so true, love, as those little lovers were.

We have said that Ada was become one of the working classes, and she worked hard, too. In the Lord's vineyard few were more zealous.

Mr. Stephen and Jem Goodman laid out her work for her, and helped her with advice, and cheered her with encouragement.

Ellen toiled side by side with her, amazed at the perseverance, the untiring energy of one hitherto so listless and so languid—astonished at the mine she herself had sprung.

Ada was a woman of singular powers of mind and body. Not one in thousands, perhaps, could have done all and endured all that she did; but all could do something in so great and good a cause, and if all did that something—if every young lady of fashion and more humble daughter of man contributed some little share of time, trouble, money, clothes, help, and, above all, sympathy, to the great cause of the ragged schools, the cause of those little ones of whom our Saviour speaks so tenderly—there would not be a ragged outcast left to say, "No one careth for my soul!"—there would not be a listless, languid victim of ennui, pining for want of something to do.

Ada spent the evening with her poor father, who was confined to his room by a severe attack of torturing gout, born of "fruity port."

Ada was become her father's greatest solace and most efficient help. She was installed as his private secretary, amanuensis, and accountant; opened and answered all his letters, and decided for him on all points. With her clear young head she had soon got all his accounts in order, and set all his affairs to rights.

The dismissal of Skinflint gave Ada an opportunity of repairing the evil he had done. She knew every tenant on the Pemberton estate, and she advised Sir Augustus according to her intimate knowledge of the circumstances of each. All the tenants had their rents lowered, as we stated, and some of the very poor had their cottages granted them rent-free.

The income did not suffer; there was a blessing on every good deed. Sir Augustus no longer dreaded letters that had the Pemberton postmark; they were now generally letters breathing blessings and thanks, rather than groans and expostulations. There was another curious compensation soon to be made to Sir Augustus for any diminution his mercy might have caused in his receipts.

Sir Augustus Pemberton was first cousin to the Earl of Glenlonely, and—before the earl married, late in life, and had a son and daughter—he was next heir to his title and estates; which, being Scotch, descended, as so many Scotch titles do, to heirs general. So that had the son died, the daughter, at the earl's death, would have been in her own right Countess of Glenlonely. Of course, Sir Augustus's chance of succeeding to the title and estates was very small and remote, when to the hale old man, the Earl of Glenlonely, with his strong Scotch constitution, a son and daughter were born, who inherited his iron frame and robust health.

What, then, was Ada's surprise when, on the very morning on which Gerald had proposed to call, and before she had recovered from the excitement attendant on his return, she received a letter addressed to her father, with a foreign post-mark (Genoa) and a black wafer. She opened it, as by Sir Augustus's desire she did all his letters, and, with a beating heart and changing colour, found it was from Lord Glenlonely's valet at Genoa, to say that a storm having arisen when his master, the earl, with his son, Lord Eaglescliffe, and his daughter, Lady Alberta Pemberton, were imprudently sailing in the Gulf of Genoa in a pleasure boat, they had all been drowned; and the valet thought it his duty at once to apprise the next heir, and to recommend himself to his favourable notice.

Ada did not shriek, or faint, or go into hysterics, or rush into her father's room to startle him, perhaps, into a fit. She sat down, a little pale, but quite collected, to consider what she had best do. It was a great change, a great accession of wealth, rank, influence; "and," she added, bowing her head, "therefore of responsibility. My father at this moment is Earl of Glenlonely, my mother is a countess, my beloved brother is Lord Eaglescliffe, and I am Lady Ada Pemberton. To-morrow, perhaps this very evening the papers will announce the frightful accident that has sent three souls so suddenly to their last account, and so increases at once our power and our responsibility. Mamma will hurry back to town—poor mamma! she has so often wished she were a peeress, so often even regretted that she had rejected old Lord Ogle, so envied every one entitled to wear a coronet and a peeress's robes, and now she can take her place where she has so vainly pined to be. As for poor papa, it will make no great difference to him, unless some happy change in his health enables him to enjoy these new honours.

"My brother! It is a great thing for him; I hope it will bring him back at once. Alas! I speak as if I were certain he was alive and well, and it is a year since we heard from him. As for myself, I do not see that it makes any difference to me: in the gay world it might do so; but I have done with the gay world. It won't matter much to my little pupils in Green Fields whether their teacher is 'miss,' or 'my lady.' I shall go there, all the same, this very morning. I shall not disturb papa until he sends for me, as usual; and I shall not even mention it to Gerald St. Maur. He will hear it when the papers get hold of it, and, perhaps, come to tell me of it.

"I shall smile when I answer, 'I had heard it when last I saw you.'

"Thank Heaven! no bitter personal regret is mixed with this surprise. I never saw those cousins but once, and scarcely remember their features."

(To be continued.)

THE KING IN CHECK.

AN EPISODE FROM THE HISTORY OF FRANCE.

"WHERE are the soldiers?" is the question asked by almost every Frenchman who visits England for the first time. "Where do you English hide your military?" asks the German who has traversed our London streets for hours without meeting with any sign of our warlike strength beyond an occasional grenadier, striding along with the Crimean medal displayed on his breast, or a big life-guardsmen, resplendent in shining helmet and jackboots. Happily for us, every Englishman is able to give a very plain answer to a question of this kind. With the exception of one or two "crack" regiments, our soldiers are kept for use and not for show. They are distributed over the country, and kept in barracks as much as possible; and our system of voluntary enlistment gives us the double advantage of securing stronger and healthier men than the swarms of blue or gray-coated conscripts who coerce the populace of Paris, swagger through the streets of Berlin, or beg "a coopek to buy tobacco" from the stranger in Warsaw or St. Petersburg.

Sitting by our firesides grumbling over high taxes and low wages, we Englishmen would sometimes do well to look a little more closely than we do at the other side of the question, and to be thankful for the privileges we enjoy; and as one of the chief of these we must reckon the absence at all times of anything like military despotism among us. The soldier's profession, honourable as it undoubtedly is when its duties are conscientiously discharged, has always been looked upon in England as the result of an unavoidable necessity; and thus our standing army is numerically small, and justifies the wondering inquiry of the foreigner, "Where are the soldiers?"

That men are not wanting when occasion calls for them, let the experience of the late Russian and of the present Indian war testify. Our army was never in a more efficient state than when the labours of the Paris congress terminated in the re-establishment of peace; and in the Indian struggle—now, we trust, almost terminated—the scheme for a volunteer corps was never carried out, simply because the required number of men could be obtained without difficulty in the ordinary way of enlistment. We seem tacitly to have agreed that government should be carried on—except on extraordinary occasions—by the civil power; that man was not intended to go through life with a musket on his shoulder, but rather with a spade, or a trowel, or a pen in his hand; and that, if it is necessary to take men from their natural avocations to perform what are called military duties, the fewer we thus devote to a number of years of busy idleness, the better it will be for the community at large.

In France the case has been widely different. There we have seen a military power, in the service of the government, gradually growing up, until the army has become a grievous burden upon the people, and an instrument of oppression and wrong. From the time when Louis, called Capet, from the great size of his head, founded, in 987, the third or Capetian dynasty of French monarchs, until that dark February morning, eight hundred and five years later, when the head of the sixteenth Louis fell from the scaffold, there had been a continual struggle between the governing classes and the governed; and it was the army, raised by injustice and maintained by extortion, that became the chief instrument, first of the tyranny of the French kings, and then of their punishment.

Six hundred years ago the governments of France and England were very much on the same footing. Philip Augustus ruled in France on principles similar to those on which the lion-hearted Richard based his government in England. Does it not seem strange, therefore, that the English should have gone on gaining more and more liberty, while the French people lost the privileges they once possessed, and sunk deeper and deeper into difficulty and bondage, until the whole fabric of the Capetian monarchy was carried away in the wild hurricane of the great revolution of 1789?

The answer is simple enough. The English continually managed to keep their kings in check by retaining the power of taxation. The king could not maintain an army without money. Without an army he could not overawe the people; and the people, as represented by the parliament, would not give him the money unless he employed it in the way they chose. Thus, during all the reigns of the Tudors, the parliament kept an ascendancy over the kings—held them, as it were, in check; and those monarchs, although they were sufficiently inclined to tyrannise, had sense enough to see that the people would not be trifled with; and managed, by well-timed concessions, to maintain their sway.

The Stuarts were not so well advised. The unhappy Charles I. tried the experiment of maintaining an army without the consent of parliament; and we all know the result. The people triumphed, and since that time the king has been held more in check than ever; so that a witty writer has not unaptly defined our constitutional monarchy of the present day as one where the sovereign "reigns very little, and hardly governs at all."

The French were not so fortunate. They fell at one period of their history into such a state of serfdom that slavery itself, if it were not foreign triumph, appeared to them a state of happiness and glory; and in congratulating themselves on their escape from a foreign dominion, they forgot that their own kings were gradually reducing them to a state of bondage, for want of some wholesome check on the exercise of their power.

Henry V. of England, the hero of Harfleur and of Agincourt, was crowned king in the French capital. He died; and under the guidance of the heroic Joan of Arc, the French drove the English back across the channel. Charles VII. was crowned by the Maid of Orleans; and in a fatal hour, the French allowed their victorious monarch to establish a military force, and allotted a perpetual tax, unchecked by the will of any representative assembly, for the support of the army.

There was the great and fatal blunder. The principle had been conceded, that the king might keep troops around him in time of peace; and as might have been expected, the king employed the mighty engine which had been placed in his hand, first to putting down the nobles, and then to suppressing any murmur of discontent that might struggle forth from the townspeople and peasantry.

If there existed any hope that the liberty of France might yet be regained, it vanished like a morning mist under the dominion of Louis XI., the son and successor of Charles the victorious. Charles had chastised the French with whips—Louis chastised them with scorpions. Charles had been invested, by the uncalculating enthusiasm of his people, with a power he scarce knew how to wield—Louis, astute and cunning, turned this power to the very best advantage. Like a skilful player at chess, he used his various pieces, and foremost among them the army, with such good effect, that his enemies were successively cleared from the political chessboard, until at last not one remained to cry "Check to the king."

Certain opponents he had, however, whom it was no light matter to clear from the board, either by hidden artifice or open force; and foremost among these was Charles, Duke of Burgundy.

THE KING IN CHECK.

Charles the Bold, or as he might have been more accurately designated, the Headstrong, was the very opposite of the man to whom as king of France he owed fealty, but who was in truth his most bitter and dangerous enemy. Charles was a tall, strong soldier, ever ready to appeal to arms, and governing his court of Burgundy by the loudness of his stentorian voice, and not unfrequently by the weight of his heavy hand, applied unsparingly to the head or shoulders of a retainer who displeased him. Louis was small and spare, caustic and severe in speech, but with a certain dignity of manner. Charles tried to intimidate his foes by a display of strength; Louis, fully conscious of the extent of his powers, fawned on his adversary until he had lulled suspicion, and then pounced upon him suddenly, with a cat-like spring. Charles, with the laxity of a robber-knight in all religious matters, had still some general notions of right and wrong; Louis, a slave to the most abject superstition, was yet thoroughly unscrupulous, and relentlessly cruel in his vengeance.

Craft triumphed over brute strength, and Louis came off victorious in the contest with Charles. Once, and once only, did the duke manage to put the king thoroughly in check. It occurred thus.

Louis, who knew the bluff hearty character of the duke, conceived the bold and politic idea of visiting Charles in the impregnable Burgundian fortress of Peronne, there to negotiate a treaty. He foresaw that Charles, flattered by the trust reposed in him, would grant easier terms than could be obtained under ordinary circumstances. Therefore, attended by only a few friends, the King of France left his army, and set forth to visit his turbulent and powerful vassal.

At first, everything went well. Louis was met at the gate of Peronne by Charles, and entered the town, leaning his hand on the duke's shoulder, with every appearance of intimacy and confidence. A costly banquet had been prepared to do him honour, and everything promised well for the future amity of the two rivals.

But suddenly a terrible change came over the aspect of affairs. Louis had been intriguing with the duke's vassals, to seduce them from their allegiance; and in the midst of their hilarity Charles of Burgundy and his court received the astounding intelligence that the citizens of Liege, aided by the king's troops and money, had revolted, and had killed their bishop, a friend and close ally of the house of Burgundy. The treachery of Louis was but too apparent, and in a moment his position changed from that of a successful intriguer, who had practised on the good-nature and flattered the vanity of a rival, to the condition of a convicted traitor, thoroughly in the power of the man he had wronged. Never was a king more completely in check.

That night was a time of sore temptation to the Duke of Burgundy. He had been wronged, outraged, duped, and the man who had compassed his ruin, while he presented the smiling face of friendship, was in his power. Again and again he paced his chamber, with hurried strides, meditating on the fearful question, "Should he take the king's life, and thus by a single blow avenge the injuries of the past, and avert the dangers that menaced him in the future?"

The struggle was long, but humanity triumphed at last. Intelligence came, moreover, which showed that the report of the bishop's death was incorrect; and Charles saw, as his fury abated, that he had not even the excuse to be found in the stern law of "blood for blood" if he became a regicide. He was not a man to forego altogether the thoughts of vengeance. Therefore, the next morning, he waited on his royal captive, at the head of some of his chief courtiers, and in the Tower of Peronne was Louis XI. compelled to sign a treaty of a very different nature from the one he had meditated. With head depressed, and a heart full of bitterness, he was compelled to ride forth with the duke to witness the punishment of the rebellious citizens of Liege. His schemes of evil had recoiled on himself: he had dug a pit, and had himself fallen therein.

There is not in all history a more striking picture of retribution than is presented in the artless narrative of the historian Philip de Comines, when he speaks of the latter days of Louis XI., the successful, moody tyrant. Successful in his intrigues, unresisted in his oppressions, with nothing to apprehend from foes abroad, the king was at length admonished of the frailty of all earthly grandeur, by a terrible and ominous warning. A first, and then a second fit of epilepsy seized him—an attack so violent, that he lay without sense or motion, and his attendants thought he was dead. He regained his consciousness, but the pleasure of existence had fled—the horror of death was upon him. "He came back to Tours," says Comines, "where he kept himself so close that very few were admitted to see him; for he was grown jealous of all his courtiers, and afraid that they would either depose or deprive him of some part of his royal authority. He did many odd things, which made some believe that his senses were impaired; but they knew not his humours. As to his jealousy, all princes are prone to it, especially those who are wise, have many enemies, and have oppressed many people, as our master had done. Besides, he found that he was not beloved by the nobility of the kingdom, nor by many of the commons—for he had taxed them more than any of his predecessors, though he now had some thoughts of easing them, as I said before; but he should have begun sooner. Nobody was admitted into the place in which he kept himself, but his domestic servants and his archers, which were four hundred, some of whom kept constant guard at the gate, while others walked continually about to prevent his being surprised. Round about the castle he caused a lattice or iron gate to be set up, spikes of iron planted in the wall, and a kind of crow's feet with several points to be placed along the ditch, wherever there was a possibility for any person to enter. Besides which, he caused watch-houses to be made, all of thick iron and full of holes, out of which they might shoot at their pleasure, in which he placed forty of his crossbows, who were to be on their guard night and day. He left no person of whom he had any suspicion, either in town or country, but he sent orders not only to warn, but to conduct them away. To look upon him, one would have thought him to be rather a dead than a living man. No person durst ask a favour, or scarce speak to him about anything. He inflicted very severe punishments, removed officers, disbanded soldiers."

He tried every art to prolong his life. He sent for a celebrated physician, and fell abjectly on his knees, begging the learned man, for pity's sake, to lengthen his days. He sent agents into all parts of the world to purchase rarities on which he gazed with lacklustre eye, for his relish for such things had departed. Suspicious of every one about him, and a torment to himself, he died at last, a memorable example of the horrors that attend even successful guilt.

The Matron.

NO. XXIV.

I SPOKE in the last chapter of the various things children can collect and turn to profit. There are many other ways in which the young members of a family may add to the income. How often people are delighted to meet with an intelligent little boy, to go on an errand, or to take a parcel. Many a sixpence may be earned in this way; and here I must earnestly warn mothers never to allow foolish pride to stand in the way of their children's advancement. Perhaps you were brought up in comfort, and have lost some social advantages by marriage. Then, if you can't give your children a fortune, don't do anything that will prevent their making one for themselves.

Useful, handy children often secure friends who enable them to rise in the world. But your young ones will take no pride nor pleasure in usefulness, if your conversation consists of idle boasts of former times, or if they see you ashamed of their "turning an honest penny."

Think it no disgrace to profit by the kindness of neighbours, whether rich or poor. Supposing the gentry have coal clubs, or clothing clubs, to assist families with small means during the long trials of winter, do not reject the help of these clubs, though you may remember the time when you helped others, instead of requiring help yourself.

Poverty is no disgrace. The ancients, in their philosophical, poetical mythology, made a divinity of poverty. They considered her the mother of industry and arts. The majority of men who have distinguished themselves in science or art, have been born poor. George Stephenson, who, as the inventor of the railway carriage, was the greatest promoter of civilisation, first saw the light in a mud-hovel. He lived to see himself courted by the wealthy and the noble; but in his early days he was a poor, industrious lad, glad of every help held out to him,—perhaps gleaned in the fields of those whose property was afterwards doubled in value by his inventive powers.

We should receive help as willingly as we would give it. Mutual assistance is more than the law of our nature, it is the law of God. As one of our best writers observes, "The beast retires to his shelter, and the bird flies to its nest; but helpless man can only find refuge from his fellow-creature. The greatest stranger in this world was He that came to save it. He never had a house, as if to see what hospitality was left amongst us."

With such an example as this before us, how unbecoming would it be in us, poor, sinful mortals, to be above accepting any assistance we can procure honourably. But there are little helps that people give with the greatest pleasure, because they lose nothing by what they impart. For instance, orderly children are allowed to pick up sticks on large estates. As to turnip-tops, if you engage to gather them without injuring the roots, you may generally have leave to do so. Cheese whey and fresh buttermilk are wholesome, nourishing drinks. Some dairy-keepers freely give them to those who ask for them; others sell them at a very cheap rate. In the Netherlands, the peasantry make of rice and buttermilk (boiled into a kind of pap) a very important part of their food; and in this buttermilk pap there is more real nourishment than in many of the soups and jellies served up at the tables of the great.

To prove the excellence of oatmeal as diet, I need only point to the hardy sons of Scotland. That long-lived, clear-sighted race make it their food as we do bread. Probably it will never become so generally used here as it is in North Briton, but I strongly recommend oatmeal porridge as cheap and excellent food for children, and grown people will find a basin of porridge make a very nice supper. I advise you to prepare it in the following manner: Mix in cold water as much meal as will make a smooth paste; drop this into boiling water, which should be constantly stirred till it boils fast and thickens. If you are not in a hurry to partake of it, you will do well to let it stand aside for twenty minutes, where it may just keep boiling, but mind it does not burn. It is a good plan to put the oatmeal, you intend to use at breakfast, into a little water over night, in order to let it soak. The object of this is to enable the oatmeal to expand, for then a smaller quantity thickens the porridge than if it were boiled without soaking. Manage it as I have directed you, and you will find one ounce of oatmeal make one quart of porridge.

The "strabout" of the northern counties and the Scotch "brose" are much the same as the porridge for which I have just given a receipt. The principal difference consists in the extra boiling which the porridge receives, and which, I think, makes it more digestible for English constitutions.

I am now addressing myself chiefly to country people, although the inhabitants of towns may also take good hints from these remarks, but some future observations will be intended for their especial benefit. The art of living comfortably on very little is so all-important, that I do not mean to slight it, or in any degree to hurry over so interesting a subject.

I mean to give a good variety of receipts for economical and savoury meals, and hints for good cheap fuel, clothes, and lodging. Afterwards I intend drawing out a table of necessary expenses, for the assistance of those who now find it difficult "to make both ends meet."

UNCLE JOE IN COURT.

JOE BASSET was a queer genius—"Uncle Joe" everybody called him—and, though possessing but very few of the goods of this world, yet he was one of the most useful men in town. If any one wanted an odd job done, he was the man to do it. In short, he was a sort of universal "Man Friday," and for a consideration he would perform any work which might be called for. He was a happy old fellow; as full of fun as an egg is full of meat, and he could crack some very hard jokes without hurting anybody. He owned a little hut at the back of the village, to which was attached a few acres of good land; and besides this he had a cow, and some other items of stock. He lived quite comfortably, and the impression had gone abroad that he had managed to lay up some money.

Captain Daniel Lober, who had recently settled in the town, owned a fine piece of land adjoining Uncle Joe's lot, and he was not long in making himself very disagreeable to our good Man Friday. He was a proud, selfish person, and a little mean withal. Uncle Joe had some geese and they ran upon Lober's land; upon which the indignant captain threatened to shoot them if he caught them there again.

"Ef ye'd make yer fence tighter my geese wouldn't git through," meekly suggested poor Joe.

"My fence is as tight as the law requires," answered the doughty captain; and with this he walked away.

So Uncle Joe had to go to work and tighten the fence, and put larger yokes upon his geese.

Lober's next move was against Joe's hens. He swore that he would shoot them if they were not kept out of his lot. Joe built a hen-house, and placed his feathered bipeds therein; but it was a sore trial to him, and people sympathised with him, though they could not help him.

One season Captain Lober ploughed up his land—some ten acres of it—and sowed it with wheat. The grain came on finely, and the owner used to take men out there to show them his field. It was acknowledged to be the best piece of wheat in town. But the captain was destined to a piece of ill-fortune which he had not thought of. This land was at some distance from his dwelling, and when busy at other points a week or two might pass without his visiting it. One afternoon he came to see his wheat, and when he reached the edge of the field he stood aghast at the sight which met his gaze. The tall stout grain was trodden and trampled down over half of the lot, presenting a scene of havoc and destruction truly horrible to behold; and the astounded owner was at no loss to account for the desolation, for near the centre of the lot he saw a horse. It was a gaunt, heavy-built animal, of a dingy white colour; and though evidently well stricken with years, yet he capered and frisked about with marvellous spirit—now cropping a few of the well filled wheat-heads, and anon trampling away upon the devoted grain, as though he were treading the wine-vat.

I should not dare to tell all the oaths which Captain Lober then and there poured forth; but they were terrible ones, and the white foam stood upon his lips as he raved. As soon as he could collect his thoughts, he started for Uncle Joe's. He knew that Joe must have seen the horse in there—for the animal could not have been less than three or four days at the work—and perhaps the depredator might belong to Joe. Just as the captain reached the road, he met Sam Warner. Sam was not a temperance man, nor did he belong to the church, but he was a particular friend of Uncle Joe, and didn't think much of Daniel Lober.

"Mr. Warner," cried the captain, trembling all over with rage, "does Joe Basset own a horse?"

"Yaas; b'lieve he does, squire," returned Sam.

"Is it a white one?"

"Kind o' whitish."

"How old is it?"

"Wal—'tain't very old nor very young; but it's kind o' shaky raound the knees."

Captain Lober posted off to Uncle Joe's cot, and found the old fellow at work about the premises.

"Mr. Basset," he said, with awful meaning, "do you own a horse?"

"Wal—I rather calkilate as how't I dew, squire," answered the old fellow.

"And did you know that your horse has destroyed more than half of my wheat?"

"Je-rew-salem! Yeou doan't say so, squire!" exclaimed Joe, in terror.

"It is a fact, sir; and now you may settle it, or suffer the consequences."

"But, squire—rally—I can't believe it. My hoss is sich a quiet critter."

"Are you willing to settle it?" cried the captain, madly.

"But, squire—rally—I couldn't pay ye noth'n—sartin I couldn't."

"Then you'll pay somebody else. You know that your horse has been in my field."

"I couldn't swar 'at he hadn't, that's a fact."

"That's enough!" and with this the captain went off. He went to one of the assessors, from whom he learned that Joe owned some £50 worth of property; and then he went to a lawyer's, and had Joe Basset sued, setting the damages at £20. The lawyer sent Joe a letter; but the old fellow refused to take any notice of it, and the case was carried into court, Captain Lober having sworn that he would push Uncle Joe to the last extremity.

The court was in session, and the day for the trial arrived. The room was crowded, for a whisper had gone abroad that Uncle Joe would get the best of it. Finally the case was called on, and Lober's counsel made a statement of the cause which had led to the suit, enlarging upon the damage which had been done to his client's property, and explaining how little the transgressor had seemed to care for it.

"What is the defence?"

Nobody seemed to know.

"Is the defendant in court?"

All eyes were turned upon Uncle Joe, and he arose.

"Are you the defendant in this case?" asked the court.

"Me?" returned Joe, with a vacant stare.

"Yes—you."

"He is, your honour," said Lober's lawyer.

"Have you got counsel, sir?" the judge resumed.

"Not I knows on," replied Joe, with a half foolish, half wicked look.

"You are probably aware of the reason why you have been called here," pursued the court, seeming to pity the man's foolishness.

"I s'pose it's for some kind o' complaint Capt'n Lober's been a makin'."

"Exactly," said Lober's counsel. "Your horse has destroyed much property belonging to my client."

"Guess not, 'squire," returned Joe, "cause that's onpossible. My hoss couldn't do no sich thing."

"What do you mean by that?"

"Why I haint got no hoss as is capable of doin' so much mischief."

"We'll leave that for others to decide," said the council, with a very significant nod of the head.

"You own a horse?"

"Why—"

"We want none of your why's! You own a horse?"

"But I want to 'xplain. Capt'n Lober, he come to me, a bilin' over with wrath, and axed me did I own a hoss, and I told him yes. Then he biled over more—made lots o' threats—and went off in a heap o' passion afore I could 'xplain."

"But do you deny that your hoss was in my client's field?"

"It couldn't a' been thar unless somebody put it thar."

"That's not the thing. Do you deny that your horse did this damage?"

"Sartin, I do."

"Your's is a white horse?"

"Rathe of a yallerish cast, 'squire."

"And poor, and old?"

"A leetle shaky, I think."

"Then how do you know that it was not your horse that did this damage?"

"That's jest the pint I wanted to 'plain, 'squire," answered Uncle Joe, very earnestly, and with imperious gravity. "Ef anybody'd axed me this afore I come up here, I should a' told 'em all about it. The fact is, 'squire, I never owned but one hoss in the world, and I don't never expect to—an' that ere is a—saw-hoss!"

The court smiled, and hid its face behind a book. The captain's counsel looked very blank, while the captain himself turned very red and very pale by turns. In the meantime the spectators came nigh splitting with laughter. Some attempt was made to reprimand Uncle Joe for this result; but he was so simple and honest on the occasion that all blame fell where it righteously belonged—upon the man who had brought the suit. It was very easily proved that Joe never owned a "live hoss," and he was sent about his business.

It was a small affair, perhaps, but it made a great noise; and so hot and heavy were the various remarks that came showering down upon Daniel Lober, that in less than a month he was glad to sell out and move. After this Uncle Joe's geese and hens wandered about without the fear of being shot; but his "old hoss" never went away, save when it rode upon its owner's shoulder.

Small Change.

"Who is he?" said a passer-by to a policeman, endeavouring to raise an intoxicated individual who had fallen into the gutter. "Can't say, sir—he can't give an account of himself." "Of course not. How can you expect an account from a man who has lost his balance?"

LOLA Montez says it is strange to see what pains men and women take to catch each other, and how very little pains they take to hold on to them.

"I SHOULD'N'T care much about the bugs," said a thin, pale lodger to his landlady, "but the fact is, ma'am, I hain't got the blood to spare—you see that yourself?"

"You have only yourself to please," said a married friend to an old bachelor. "Yes, but you don't know what a difficult task I find it."

WHEN you hear the phrase, "I may say without vanity," you may be sure some characteristic vanity will follow in the same breath.

"WOULDN'T you know this youth to be my son?" "Oh, yes, the maker's name is stamped on the blade."

THE attention of young farmers has been called to the fact that the most effectual way to destroy weeds is to marry a widow.

"MR. LEMON has come over to our party," said a politician, exultingly, to an opponent. "Well, if your party has nothing stronger than Lemon-aid to recruit with, it must be in a bad way."

No one, says Dean Loker, will ever shine in conversation who thinks of saying fine things. To please, one must say many things indifferent, and many very bad. This last rule of the dean's is rarely violated in society.

WHAT is the best key for a Christmas-box?—A tur-key.

A SAILOR dropped out of the rigging of a ship of war, some fifteen or twenty feet, and fell plump on the head of the first lieutenant.—"Wretch!" said the officer, after he had gathered himself up, "where the devil did you come from?"—"An' sure, I came from the north of Ireland, yer honour."

Those people who turn up their noses at the world, might do well to reflect that it is as good a world as they were ever in, and a much better one than they are likely ever to get into again.

An ambitious politician, in a published speech, prays that at least a piece of the mantle of Henry Clay may fall upon him. We wonder if Mr. Clay's mantle-piece wouldn't answer as well as a piece of his mantle.

A CERTAIN editor, who has had a controversy with us, suggests that he and we look each other in the face; but he would have the advantage of us. He would have much the better prospect.

A GOOD action is never thrown away, and perhaps that is the reason why we find so few of them.

A TIPPLER who had his load on "fetched up" against the side of a house which had been newly-painted. Shoving himself clear by a vigorous effort, he took a glimpse at his shoulder, another at the house, a third at his hand, and exclaimed, "Well, that is a careless trick in whoever painted that house, to leave it standing out all night for people to run against."

"How do you and your friends feel now?" said an exultant politician in one of our western counties, to a rather irritable member of the defeated party. "I suppose," said the latter, "we feel just as Lazarus did when he was licked by the dogs."

OIL and truth will get uppermost at last.

"I'm afloat! I'm afloat!" screamed a young lady of powerful lungs, and fingers to match, as she exercised both at the piano. "I should think you were," growled an old bachelor, "judging from the squall you raise."

HANDSOME features alone are incapable of expressing real beauty, as speech alone is incapable of expressing wit.

THE nerve which never relaxes, the eye which never blanches, the thought which never wanders—these are the masters of victory.

HOPE.—A sentiment exhibited in the wag of a dog's tail, when he's waiting for a bone.

A WELL-KNOWN political economist says:—"We pay best—1st, those who destroy us—generals; 2nd, those who cheat us—politicians and quacks; 3rd, those who amuse us—singers and musicians; and least of all, those who instruct us—ministers, authors, schoolmasters, and editors."

MOTTO FOR A SUB-EDITOR.—Aut scissors, aut nullus.

A LADY being about to marry a small man was told that he was a very bad fellow. "Well," says she, "if he's bad, there's one comfort—there is very little of him."

PLUMPNESS AND ENVY.—One of the worst things to fatten on is envy. In our opinion, it is as difficult for a grudging man to raise a double chin, as it is for a bankrupt to raise a loan. Plumpness comes not from roast beef, but from a good heart and cheerful disposition.

Two weasels found an egg. "Let us not fight for it," said the elder weasel, "but enter into partnership." "Very good," said weasel the younger. So taking the egg between them, each sucks the other end. "My children," said Redtapes, the attorney, "though you have but one client between you, make the most of him."

Puzzles for the Ingenious.

QUESTION I. by NEMO, in No. 24, page 383.

Answer:—2 Bars of Gold, 40lbs. each, sold for £3,730.
1 Bar 40 x 12 x 480 ozs. at £3 17s. 10½d. per oz. £1,869
1 Bar 40 x 12 x 480 ozs. at £3 17s. 6½d. per oz. £1,861
2 Bars £3,730

3 Bars of Gold, 40lbs. each, sold for £5,697.
1 Bar 40lbs. or 480 ozs. at £3 17s. 8½d. per oz. £1,865
1 Bar 40lbs. or 480 ozs. at £3 17s. 10½d. per oz. £1,869
1 Bar 40lbs. or 480 ozs. at £3 18s. 0½d. per oz. £1,878
3 Bars £5,697

OLD HICKORY.

Similar answers have been received from Lucy Cram, Montbar, Marco, D. F. G., W. P., David, J. E. Watson, Leoni, Mark, Q. Marison, D. R. P., and J. Simpson. Answers, with slight fractional differences from the above, from H. B. (Stockport), A. Miner, K. H., R. L. (Salford), H. J. N., N. J. Hill, Puer, Euclid, P. George, H. Brookhouse, J. R. Furneaux, and Juvenis.

QUESTION II. as to 150 Nuts, &c. By F. GILDER.

Answer:—The class contained four boys and seven girls. Each boy received 13 nuts, and each girl 14 nuts, total 150. Then two of the elder children agreed to give both their portions to be equally divided between the rest.

There were nine scholars remaining, and the two eldest children's (boy and girl) share of the nuts amounted to 13 and 14 or 27 nuts; then, if nine scholars have 27 nuts equally divided between them, they will receive three nuts each.

R. W. JAMSON.

Correct answers have been received also from G. H. Hills, J. T. Last, W. Shearer, Ivanhoe, Stella, The Irish Lad, M. H. Charles, H. J. N., Adolescents, Euclid, J. R. Furneaux, Lucy Cram, and D. R. P.

Incorrect: Belzoni and Thomas H.

FOR SOLUTION.

1. What is that which lives upon its own substance, and dies when it has devoured itself?
2. Two men went to a fair to buy sheep. When they came to the fair they were ascertaining how much money they had got. B said to A, "If you give me one half of your money I shall have £200." "But," said A, "If you give me one third of your money, along with what I have, I shall have £100." Question: How much money had each of them?

NEMO'S (Nans).

Further answers to the Arithmetical Question in No. 10, have been received from Elliot, Tom Whittington, H. Wynn, A. Sendall, W. S. Marshall, A. G. D. R., D. Bacon, S. Mee, E. G. L. H., Kate Martin, W. Rayner, W. Reed, T. Calvert, J. Driscoll, J. R. Furneaux, J. C. Grace, Lansdown, H. C. P. W., and Henderson Dixon.

Further answers to the Historical Enigma in No. 19, have been received from J. B. P., Mary B., C. Lettison, L. P. (Peter), Nemo, and Erigena.

Chess.

Problem No. 47. By ALPHA.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in four moves.

Problem No. 48. E. D. C. (Islington).

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in three moves.

Solution of Problem No. 43.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. Kt to Kt 2	1. P takes Kt
2. P to K B 4	2. P takes P (en pass.)
3. R to Q B 5 (ch)	3. B takes K
4. P to K 4 (mate)

X. Y. Z.—You are incorrect in your observations on Problem No. 28 and 29.

QUEEN'S KNIGHT.—There was no legal objection to your casting under the circumstances to which you refer.

GRAPES.—Your observations on Problem No. 27 are correct; we misread your solution, which we find to be quite sound.

C. AUSTIN.—The Rook in Castling cannot check as it passes; it can only do so when you quit your hold of the piece.

A NOVICE.—If a player play out of his turn, his adversary may choose whether the move shall remain or be repeated.

T. SIMPSON.—We are much obliged by your explanation. We had overlooked the result of removing the Pawns in the Problem to which you refer; it shall appear shortly.

K. FILLING.—Your solution does not indicate the Problem to which you refer, nor is it applicable to any that we have published.

Solutions of Problems by Mona, Nos. 34 and 35; D. W. O. (Sligo), Nos. 34, 35, and 38; J. P. (Nos. 39 and 41); W. McKenzie, Nos. 34, 35, 36, 37, and 38; H. (Nos. 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100); F. G. Rainger, Nos. 38, 39, 40; T. Martin, jun., Nos. 39 and 40; R. T. (Southport), No. 39; Oxon, Nos. 39 and 40; W. Helt, Nos. 38, 39, and 40; E. Grant, Nos. 38, 39, and 40; Caise Amicus, Nos. 39 and 40; C. Austin, Nos. 38, 39, and 40; Queen's Knight, Nos. 37, 38, 39, and 40; and W. D. T., Nos. 40 and 41 correct.

* Owing to the great increase in the number of our Chess correspondents, it is sometimes difficult to find room for answers to all their communications, but they may rest assured that each will receive attention in due course.

Our Editorial Table.

R. R. CATO, AND MANY OTHERS.—The First Volume of the New Series of the Paper may be obtained, post free, for 3s. 8d. in paper covers, and 5s. 4d. in extra cloth gilt. Address, inclosing stamps or post-office order, to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

J. A. C.—The Chinese "sensitive leaves and figures" are not, as you suppose, cut from the leaf of any tree, but from "goldbeater's skin." The figures curl up or remain flat, according to the degree of warmth in the person upon whose hand they are laid; and this, it is pretended by some, is indicative of the temperament of such person.

KITTY.—Fuller's-earth is found in Kent, Surrey, and Sussex; but the finest and most plentiful at Waneden, near Woburn, Bedfordshire.

BOOKSHELVES.—Boil a portion of alkanet root in linseed oil; apply it, while warm, to the wood, once or more, according to the depth of the colour required: when dry, polish with a piece of woollen cloth, upon which beeswax has been rubbed.—"Cassell's History of England" will be completed in four volumes.—You can obtain lists by inclosing a stamp to Messrs. Petter and Galpin.

NEPUS has again amused himself by sending us four letters, bearing as many different signatures, male and female. Can he not find better employment?

A SUNDAY SCHOLAR.—We believe that the number of children in the day-schools of England and Wales is about 1,500,000.

RUSTICS.—To cook asparagus, cut the white stalks off about six inches from the head; soak them in cold water, tie them in small bundles, and boil them rather quick. Be careful not to overdo them, or the heads will be broken. Toast a slice of bread brown on both sides, dip it in the water, and lay it on a dish. When the asparagus is done, lay it upon the toast, leaving the white ends outwards each way. Pour melted butter over the toast and green parts. To cook artichokes, trim a few of the outside leaves off, and cut the stalks even. If young, boil for half an hour. Serve with melted butter, in as many small cups as there are artichokes to help with each, having clipped off the sharp points of the leaves. Seakale may be cooked as asparagus; only, before boiling, cut out the black parts of the roots; wash well, and tie it together.

W. S. P. D.—The moulds for composition ornaments are usually made of wood—box or pear-tree. If they be merely mouldings, they may be run with planes; if flowers, or other elaborate designs, they must be cut in the wood by an experienced wood-carver. For some purposes, moulds made of plaster of Paris may suffice.

IGNORAMUS.—Allopathy is opposed to homœopathy. Allopathy is that method of medical practice in which there is an attempt to cure disease by the production of a condition of the system either different from, opposite to, or incompatible with, the condition essential to the disease to be cured. Homœopathy is a mode of treating diseases, which consists in the administration of a medicine capable of exciting in healthy persons symptoms closely similar to those of the disease it is desired to cure.

ALPHA.—For a freezing mixture, take one pound of muriate of ammonia and one pound of nitrate of potash. When required for use, add to them rather more than double the weight of water.

A BOY TWELVE YEARS OLD will find a receipt for copying ink, and directions for using it, in No. 23, page 368.

FRANCIS DESPORTES.—You had better submit a specimen of your drawing (an Academy figure) to the keeper of the Royal Academy; he will then give you directions how to proceed. "The Art Treasures Exhibition" is now completed. You can obtain an elegant cloth gilt cover for binding, post free, from Messrs. Petter and Galpin for 1s. 8d. Similar cases for the first Volume of our New Series may be had, post free, for 1s. 10d.

RICHARD MARKHAM.—The following is an excellent formula for making ginger-beer for sale: Four pounds of lump sugar; bruised ginger, from which the dust has been sifted, a quarter of a pound; cream of tartar, a quarter of a pound; three or four lemons, sliced. Pour on these four gallons of boiling-water; cover up, to keep the steam from escaping, until it is just lukewarm; then strain, and add eight ounces of yeast. Let it work for three or four days, according to the weather. Skim, strain through clean flannel, bottle, and fasten down the corks. This may be used in two or three days; but it will be better if kept longer. You may use moist sugar, instead of lump, if you think proper.—You can send a letter to a private soldier in India by affixing to it one penny postage-stamp.

THESPIA.—The first Royal license for theatres was that granted to Shakespeare, &c., in 1603, to act plays at the Globe, Bankside, or in any part of England. Long before that period, however, what were called "Mysteries" were represented in open fields. Plays were suspended from 1633 till 1660, when Charles II. licensed two companies, Killigrew's and Davenant's. Tragedies, it is said, were first acted at Athens, by Thespis, B.C. 535; comedies, at the same place, B.C. 562.

A SAILOR-BOY.—The Chinese claim the invention of the mariner's compass. They ascribe it to their Emperor Hong-Ti, who, they say, was a grandson of Noah. Some of their historians refer the invention of it to a later date, 1115 B.C. The flour-de-lis was made the ornament of the northern radius of the compass in honour of Charles of Anjou, whose device it was, and who was the reigning King of Sicily at the time of this great discovery.

A TRAVELLER.—An excellent anti-attrition mixture may be made by working one pound of plumbago (black lead) into four pounds of hog's-lard or tallow. This applied to wheels, spindles, or machinery will greatly prevent friction.

T. GURNEY.—Very fine lemonade may be made by slicing four good lemons, adding four ounces of lump sugar, and pouring upon them one quart of boiling water. Cover up close till cold. A cheaper form is the following:—one ounce of cream of tartar, two lemons sliced, six ounces of moist sugar, two quarts of boiling water.

W. J. TUCK.—A toxophilite is a lover of archery. The term is derived from two Greek words, signifying a bow or arrow, and a lover.

KATE.—See the foregoing.

TOXOPHILITE (2).—You certainly have no ground of complaint against your master. Your own inadvertence in giving a receipt before you obtained the money, placed you in the difficulty of which you complain.

E. W. A. J. D., H. E. H., ROSE BUD, M. M. C., FUTITIA, VOLO-MILES-ESSE, W. H. G. L., R. E., EVANGELINE HAMILTON, FRANCES.—It is against the laws of decorum to "redeem a forfeit" in the manner you mention.—In addressing a person, neither stare nor cast down your eyes; adopt the medium.—An improving book is the present we recommend.—Lovers should clear up misunderstandings as soon as possible. If the gentleman will not take the first step the lady should do so.—A lady should not accept a gentleman's portrait if he is not her suitor, unless on very intimate terms with the family.—A gentleman engaged to one sister, need not make the other a present on her wedding; but if he is disposed to give the bride anything, let it be a pretty work-box.—Let the lady enter church first. After the service, do not look about to recognise friends till you have left the sacred edifice.—"M. M. C." should avoid the gentlemen of whom she speaks, and advertise for a place where a good penwoman would be required.—"Evangeline" must improve herself before she undertakes the situation of a governess. A moderate knowledge of French and music suffices where the pupils are very young.

S. P. and W. G., JEMIMA, LARKY GRIGG, CLEVELAND, MISS S. ROVER.—We advise you on no account to leave home yet. Consult us some time hence, when by your letter you can show some advancement in education.—"Jemima" must write the word thus—"Bridesmaid." The other question should be addressed to Mr. J. F. Smith.—Those who have tender feet may harden them by washing them in salt and water.—We have no confidence in the sincerity or firmness of the attachments of young gentlemen and ladies of ten years old.—"Miss S. Rover's" hair is of a light pretty brown.

AN IGNORANT GIRL may become learned in French by studying the "French Lessons" published in this paper. Sir Frederic Thesiger was raised to the rank of Lord Chancellor by the title of Baron Chelmsford. The gordin knot which excites your curiosity was so named from the following incident in ancient history. Gordius, of Phrygia Major, being raised from the plough to the throne, placed the harness or furniture of his wain and oxen in the temple of Apollo, tied in such a knot that the monarchy of the world was promised to him that could untie it. Alexander tried in vain to do so. At length he cut it with his sword.

X. Y.—If you can settle the affair in any other manner, avoid a law-suit. Take warning by the law-suit between Talbot and Lisle v. Berkely. This law-suit was continued by the heirs of the parties concerned, and lasted one hundred and twenty years. Only look at a house in Chancery, and learn prudence. Law-suits are good things for lawyers, seldom so for their clients:

"A shell to each I do decree,
The oyster is the lawyer's fee."

EMMA.—We can quite understand your anxiety respecting your bird. Are you sure there are no insects in the cage or the drawers? Evidently your parrot is ill. For sick birds, generally, bread and milk with canary seed boiled in it is recommended. A little refined liquorice in the water is also thought advisable; and to keep away vermin put a little bag of sulphur inside the cage.

IDA MAY, T. M. C., LILLIAN, C. DASHWOOD.—It is not necessary to introduce to each other those ladies who meet at your house in a morning call. You must wait till the lady bows to you; when she has done so, your duty is to make the first move towards a meeting.—At the altar the lady stands at the gentleman's left side. Under other circumstances, she may stand at his right or left indiscriminately, and take his right or left arm with equal propriety.—You must make this distinction—with some prefixed, the word is cheese; with a number before it, cheeses.

A GERMAN.—Yes, we do think we are still improving. The progress of national intelligence—particularly that of the female population—is instanced by recent reports of the Postmaster-General, showing an immense increase in the circulation of letters. Now, as ladies are so fond of letter-writing, we repeat that this fact shows an increase of female intelligence, and is indicative of the progress of female intelligence. It seems that the number of letters delivered during the last year in England, Scotland, and Ireland, is about 504 millions, showing an increase of 428 millions over the year previous to the introduction of the penny postage. It is a curious fact, that the total number of letters posted in the gigantic Russian empire in the year 1855, was about equal to the number posted during the same period in the single town of Manchester and its suburbs.

DAISY.—We attribute the habit you complain of—namely, that of unintentionally talking to yourself—to absence and listlessness of mind. Arouse your thoughts by reading interesting books, and peruse attentively the "Hopes and Helps for the Young" published in this paper.

LOVE AND TRIALS.—You may certainly consider yourself free, if you can prove that indifference has caused the gentleman's protracted silence.

ALISON GREIG.—For an offensive breath, take of the concentrated solution of chloride of soda from two to five drops in a wine-glassful of pure spring water. Swallow the mixture every morning.

M. A. T. G.—As the gentleman has not fulfilled his engagement, you are free from yours; but we advise you to give your lover a few months' grace, that you may ascertain the cause of his non-appearance.

ANXIOUS.—"Anxious" should take the first opportunity of showing her cold-hearted suitor that she is as indifferent to him as he is to her.

AN INVALID.—We advise you to avoid new cheese; it is much less wholesome than old cheese; a little of which, say a tea-spoonful, is rather beneficial than otherwise, supposing you take it scraped.

T. M. B.—It is said that the first Christian church erected in England was at Glastonbury, about A.D. 60. The first Sunday-school was founded by Ludwig Hacker, between the years 1740 and 1747, at Ephrata, Lancaster county, Pennsylvania. The first Sunday-school in England was instituted at Gloucester, by Robert Raikes, about 1782. Of the opening of the first day-school in England we have no record.

JACOBUS.—A cheerful circle of young people may derive much entertainment from any of the three following games:—Musical Magnetism; How, When, and Where? or Proverbs. Musical Magnetism is simple enough. One of the company takes her seat at the piano, another leaves the room, in the meantime some small object is hidden with the knowledge of all the company, excepting the absent individual, who, on his return to the room, is directed to the discovery of the hidden object by the sound of the music; the tones becoming louder and louder as he approaches what he seeks. In How, When, and Where, each member of the company leaves the room; during his absence a word is fixed on, and when he comes back he is to discover what this word is by the answers he receives to the question (put to every one present in succession), How do you like it? When do you like it? Where do you like it? Proverbs also render the departure of one of the company necessary. Of course, each goes in his turn, while the company fix on a well-known proverb. It should be rather a short one. The absentee on returning may, in order to find out the proverb, ask any question he likes of the members of the company, who should sit in a semi-circle, and be questioned in rotation. It is incumbent in answering, that each individual should give successively one word of the proverb chosen, but this word may be mixed up with other subjects in the funniest manner possible in order to puzzle the questioner.

CARUS.—We are not surprised at your getting into so many scrapes for lying in bed so late. Take the advice of the great Duke of Wellington, and "Let the first turn in the morning be a turn out."

MERRY.—Since you only contracted your present marriage after seven years had elapsed without your hearing anything of your first husband, you cannot (should he chance to return) be indicted for bigamy.

PHILOMUND.—A twelvemonths' courtship is a bad thing for the lady if it leads to nothing satisfactory. We think under the circumstances you might be sued.

ONE WHO IS ANXIOUS TO GET ON.—1. Mix more with society and you will gradually grow out of your habit of blushing. 2. We are much obliged for your good wishes.

NELLY G.—The use of vinegar would, probably, reduce your size; but it would, no doubt, seriously injure your health, and possibly abridge your life. A spare diet, simple fluids, regular and constant exercise, however painful it may be at first, are the safest and best rules with which we are acquainted.

A YOUNG BANKER'S CLERK.—The discoverer of the gold-fields in Australia was Mr. E. H. Hargraves, a man of extraordinary energy of character, the son of a lieutenant in the Sussex Militia. Having previously visited San Francisco, he had reason to believe, from circumstances, that gold might be found in Australia. He made trial, and found some. This was in 1851. He communicated his discovery; and the results are now pretty well known.

D. D. DUNCE.—To cut off the entail is to prevent the property from coming into the possession of those for whom it was intended by the original donor. This can only be done by the tenant in tail, and not by the tenant for life. The tenant for life has no power of alienating the property without the consent of the tenant in tail, who, to give that consent, must be of full age. Illegitimate children can take property bequeathed to them; they are neither the heirs-at-law, nor the personal representatives of any who preceded them.

R. W. had better apply to a philosophical instrument maker.

MARY B.—You may impart a fine orange yellow colour to your silks, and in a lesser degree, by the use of the following preparation:—Cut some roll annatto into small pieces, and boil it with an equal weight of pearlash; then dilute it with water to the strength you wish. Immerse the articles, previously rinsed in clean water, in the dye, and give them a good boil; then drain them out, and rinse them well in clean water.

CIUDAD RODRIGO.—We can only account for the illusions in colour by supposing some defect in your organs of vision.

F. P. R. X.—We fear you will not be able to recover a farthing. We know of no such lecturer or dispensary.

A SCHOOL-GIRL.—Your suggestion will not be lost sight of.

A HARD-UP AND ILL-USED PAIR.—You will find plenty of receipts for nice, cheap, and nourishing food in the "Matron"—a chapter on domestic economy—which appears weekly in this paper.

A. M. A. M. C.—If you arranged the affair for ten pounds you can make no further claim. Of a child not born in wedlock the mother is the sole guardian.

MARIA MATHEWS.—You must prove a will within the year to avoid penalties; but your having neglected to do so does not invalidate the document.

SAM.—Lucifer matches are so named on account of lucifer being derived from the two Latin words, lux, light, and fero, I bear.

FIRST LOVE.—You cannot sue a gentleman for a breach of promise on account of an offer made when he was a minor.

J. WILLIAMS.—We cannot say who would be willing to publish your poems.

PADMAM.—Ambulant means walking about.

JUNIOR.—The salary of the Lord Chancellor is £10,000, with a retiring pension of £4,000.

* * We cannot guarantee the return of rejected manuscripts.

All Letters and Communications for the Editor to be addressed to JOHN CASSELL, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

London: Printed and Published for JOHN CASSELL by PETTER and GALPIN, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

[THE RIGHT OF TRANSLATION AND REPUBLICATION IS RESERVED.]

NEW SERIES. VOL. II.—No. 30.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 26, 1858.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER LIX.

It often falls in course of common life,
That right long time is overborne by wrong,
Through avarice, or power, or guile, or strife,
That weakens her, and makes her party strong;
But justice, though her doom she do prolong,
Yet at the last will her own cause right.

SPENCER.

THERE are many crimes frequently committed in the world, which justice either cannot or will not reach; but in neither case is it to be supposed that the perpetrator escapes scot free—far from it. When human justice fails to strike the blow, the hand of Providence supplies its place; and reaches the criminal through the workings of his conscience, the disappointment of the hopes for which he sinned, or the indifference which follows the realisation of them; proving how worthless is the thing to attain which he has paid the price of self-respect, untroubled sleep, and the world's good opinion.

Although Andrew Silex had, as we have seen, succeeded in ridding himself both of his brother and nephew—for no better reason than that the one was troublesome, and the second likely to become so—he was far from feeling happy. Age pressed upon him; he began to count his years, and the probability of living to enjoy the promised recompense, for which he had plunged into crime, and violated the tie of nature. The affair of Jack gave him the deepest concern; the threat of the poor boy frequently rang in his ears—that he should live to return and thank him.

He frequently heard it in the lone hour of the night, when his head pressed an uneasy pillow. In the old oak parlour where he loved to sit and count his hoards, a voice would sometimes echo it.

Decidedly, Andrew Silex was not a happy man: he had so long been prosperous in his career of villainy, that even success began to be indifferent to him.

A few days after the interview described in the preceding chapter, just as he was about to quit the Home Farm on his weekly visit to Tiverton, a chaise and pair drove up to the door, and a gentleman and lady alighted.

The old man felt surprised, for he received few visitors.

"Can we see the steward of Sir Norman Boothroyd?" demanded Major Hawley, for it was no other than the comrade of poor Allan.

"I am Mr. Silex," answered Andrew.

The inquirer placed a letter in his hand.

Whilst he is reading it, we will describe the persons of his visitors.

The major was a tall, military-looking man, of about five-and-forty years of age. Long years of service under an Indian sun had bronzed his features to a hue which imparted additional sternness to their naturally stern expression. There was great decision both in his eyes and lips: the former were gray and piercing, the latter thin, and closely compressed.

ANDREW SILEX AND HIS VISITORS.

Mrs. Major Hawley was a very little woman, with a wasp-like figure, and a countenance so full of life and animation, that it was only by a great stretch of imagination those who beheld her could imagine she ever indulged in sleep. Her eyes (a woman's character may generally be read in her eyes) were small, but so black and piercing that at times their glance became positively painful, and would have been embarrassing but for the strong expression of benevolence and good nature which every one might read in them,—that is to say, when the feelings of their owner were not excited by scorn, indignation, or suspicion of unworthiness; then, as we before observed, their glance became really embarrassing and insupportable.

Whilst Andrew Sillex was reading the letter of Sir Norman, which, we scarcely need state, her ladyship had dictated, the aforesaid eyes were fixed upon him with a very peculiar expression.

The lady was summing him up, and the result did not appear to be very favourable.

Avaling ourselves of our privilege as an author, we shall read the letter at the same time as the steward.

It ran thus:—

"Mr. Sillex,—The bearer of this, Major Hawley, a friend of my deceased brother, Allan Boothroyd, late of the Punjab Horse, has very much surprised me by informing me that my poor brother was married in India."

The old man had got thus far when he cast a dissatisfied glance under his spectacles at the bearer of the missive.

"A witness," he mentally ejaculated.

"The gentleman further states that the child which the unfortunate man, Barney Gee, brought to St. Faith's with him, and which my lady informs me his brother, Simon Gee, and Hester, his wife, took charge of, is my niece."

"He must be mad," mentally ejaculated the steward, "to write thus."

"Unfortunately he has no proofs of this."

The reader breathed more freely.

"You will assist him by every means in your power to discover whether Barney Gee left any papers in the hands of his family, or any other person. Should legal assistance be necessary, send for my lawyer, Marshall, from Exeter. Although it will prove an expense to provide for, and establish my niece, in the event of her proving to be such—for Allan died, as he lived, exceedingly poor—still, Lady Boothroyd and myself are both anxious and willing to do our duty."

"As the major appears a very excellent person, although a little brusque in his manner, you will pay him every attention; and, the hall being let, offer him the hospitality of the Home Farm."

"Well," said the gentleman, in a tone of impatience, as the reader, after twice perusing the letter, folded it carefully, and placed it in his huge black leather pocket-book, "what do you say?"

"That I don't believe a word of it," replied Andrew. "The girl was no more Allan Boothroyd's daughter than she was mine."

"How do you know?"

"Simon Gee and Hester, his wife, both acknowledged and adopted her as their niece; and they are poor."

"Well?"

"Would they have done so without proof?"

"That remains to be seen," observed Mrs. Major Hawley, for the first time breaking silence; "I can set the doubt at rest in a few minutes. Take me to their cottage; show me the girl. I was present at her birth; if she is my Lillian, she has a mark under her right ear—a ruby spot no larger than the blossom of a poppy flower."

"Well, that is singular," said the steward, "and unfortunate at the same time, for that would have decided the question."

"What is unfortunate?" demanded the major.

"That the child should have been stolen from the cottage of Barney and his wife, by gipsies, it is supposed, only a few weeks after her arrival."

"Stolen!" repeated Mrs. Hawley.

"And has never since been heard of."

"Don't believe a word of it!" exclaimed the lady, in a tone of disappointment. "If Lillian has been stolen, it has not been by gipsies."

"By whom, then?" said Mr. Sillex, with provoking calmness.

"Those who had an interest in making away with her."

"And who might they be? I know of no such persons. The child of Allan Boothroyd," he added, deliberately, "would have been dependent on the charity of her uncle and aunt; and persons of their rank don't generally involve themselves in crime to get rid of relations who are beggars. They must have some interest."

"Pride," pronounced the lady.

Mr. Sillex only smiled.

"Besides," she continued, "I am far from being convinced that the daughter of Allan would have been so poor as you describe. His brother has no male heir."

"But he has a daughter," observed the steward.

"The estates are large."

"They go with the title."

"That would depend upon the will of the late baronet."

At this home-thrust Mr. Sillex felt that it would be advisable to change his tactics. Evidently the speaker was not a person to be put off lightly. He did not half like her tone and manner whilst addressing him, and still less the glance of her very peculiar dark eyes.

"All this, madam," he said, "is no concern of mine. I have only to carry out the instructions of Sir Norman, which are to afford you every assistance in your inquiries, and offer you the hospitality of the Home Farm."

"Assistance!" repeated the lady, disdainfully, "after sending us down here upon a fool's errand!"

"That was not my master's fault."

"How do you make that out?"

"He never heard, I dare be bound, that there was such a person as the child of Barney Gee—for so I must still call her—in the place, for he was ill at the time."

"But his wife knew it," replied the major.

"Oh, yes. Her ladyship offered to send her to her own school, but Simon and Hester refused to part with her; which makes me think they had good reasons for knowing the truth of her being their niece or not."

"And you believe Lady Boothroyd never heard of Lillian's being stolen?"

"I feel certain that she never did," answered the man. "I never thought it worth while to trouble her about such a trivial circumstance, and she has no correspondents at St. Faith's."

"Trivial circumstance!" repeated his visitors.

"Supposing that the girl is not their niece."

"And supposing that she is?"

"Why, then it would be a widely different affair," answered the steward, "for they would be obliged to take charge of her, educate, and provide for her. They could not, for the sake of the family name, suffer her to live upon the charity of a poor weaver; and what is more, they would not, little love as there was between the two brothers."

"I can believe in your master's pride," observed Mrs. Major Hawley, with a certain amount of bitterness, for she recollected the story poor Allan had frequently related to her of his unnatural treatment of him.

"But not his generosity," observed the steward.

"No."

It was no wonder that with this opinion, neither husband nor wife condescended to accept the hospitality of the Home Farm, which Mr. Sillex was not very anxious to press upon them. He had a natural dislike to visitors, and only offered it in compliance with the express directions of Sir Norman.

So, instead of becoming his guests, the worthy couple directed the postboys to drive to the village, to the "King's Arms," where they ultimately installed themselves for a few days; and almost immediately after their arrival sent for Simon Gee and his wife Hester to visit them.

"I wish Marshall were here," muttered the steward, as he saw them depart. "They are likely to prove troublesome customers, and it will require a lawyer to deal with them. I must send off one of the men with a note to him, and give up my own journey to Tiverton; it won't do for me to be out of the way whilst they remain."

With this intention he returned to the house, and seated himself in his sanctum to write the note proposed. Just as he was about to seal it there was a gentle tap at the door of the room.

"Come in," cried the old man, impatiently.

The housekeeper made her appearance.

"Well, what is it?" demanded her master, in no very amiable mood; for when out of temper, even Margaret felt it.

"You are writing to Marshall?" she replied.

"I have written to him."

"Uselessly."

"How do you know?"

"Because he has just alighted at the door."

Andrew Sillex started from his chair at the intelligence, and, after looking carefully round, to see that no private papers were lying about—for he knew the prying disposition of the lawyer—directed the woman to show him into the oak parlour, saying that he would see him there.

The woman looked surprised: it was the first time, since she had resided at the farm, she had ever known Andrew Sillex receive any one in that particular room.

In a few minutes Mr. Marshall made his appearance. He was a tall, gentlemanly-looking man, about fifty years of age, with an air of well-to-doishness in the world which a mere casual observer might very naturally mistake for great respectability. After the usual compliments had passed between them, the new-comer took a seat, for he felt tired with his ride.

"You were about to send for me," he observed.

"How did you know that?" demanded the master of the Home Farm, eyeing him suspiciously.

"Your housekeeper told me so."

"She had better have minded her own business," was the ungracious rejoinder; "I don't like any one to interfere with mine. But I was about to send for you."

"And may I ask the reason?—to make your will, perhaps. You are right, my dear sir, decidedly right. No one can tell what may happen; not that I wish to alarm you, but you are not looking so well, that is to say, quite so well as your friends—and I include myself in the list of them—could wish."

"My will has been made already," answered the steward, dryly, "and I have not the slightest intention of changing the disposition I have made of my property; not that I have much to leave, for I am a poor man, Mr. Marshall, a very poor one, whatever the world may say to the contrary."

The lawyer smiled, and although the possessor of a very excellent practice, mentally wished that he was half as rich.

"I say that I am poor!" added the old man, vehemently. "You ought not to be weak enough to believe the stories which the fools of St. Faith's tell respecting my supposed wealth."

"No doubt greatly exaggerated by them," observed his visitor.

"I should think it was."

"But still considerable, my dear sir, very considerable; for you have always been a careful man."

"Well, there is no crime in that."

"Decidedly not," replied the lawyer; "but since I cannot be useful to you in the making of your will, perhaps you will be kind enough to inform me on what point I can offer my services."

"It's on Sir Norman's account."

"Indeed! he generally instructs me himself," observed the lawyer, not altogether pleased at receiving the orders of his wealthy client through another channel than the original one.

"And now you must be content to receive them through me," observed the old man, with a broad grin, which displayed his shark-like teeth; "not that the affair is very important."

"You must leave me to judge of that. The law, my dear sir, beautiful and simple as it is in principle, has certain complexities and difficulties in practice which none but an experienced hand can disentangle. I have known many a man's property placed in jeopardy from the neglect of what he considered, and what perhaps at first was a mere trifle."

"But Sir Norman's property," answered Andrew Sillex, who loved to play with the impatience of the speaker, "is not in jeopardy."

"Difficult to say, very."

The old man handed him the letter. Mr. Marshall read it carefully over, and then perused it again; but the second time he made only a pretence of reading it, for his keen, ferret-like eyes, instead of resting on the page, glanced over his spectacles, and scrutinised the countenance of the steward: not that he could read much there; his features were quite as impassible as his own.

"I wish I could read all that is passing in the brain of that old dissembler," thought the man of law. "It would offer me a clue to a mystery I have long sought; but it's no use trying to pump him: he is as impenetrable as the granite and suspicious as a fox."

The gentleman came to this conclusion after long experience. He had frequently made the attempt to pump the occupant of the Home Farm, and failed.

"What is to be done in this affair?" he asked.

"I thought you were to advise me," replied Andrew.

"Hem! Certainly—yes, but to advise, I must be in possession of all the particulars of the case."

"Haven't you read them?"
"I have read the letter," was the reply of the man of law: "but you, no doubt have private instructions for me?"

"Not one."
 "That is singular."
 "No, it is not," said the steward, with a broad grin, "and for the simple reason that there is no mystery to conceal, and consequently no instructions to give. If the child in question should prove the daughter of Allan Boothroyd, we are quite ready to recognise her."

"We," repeated the lawyer, with a marked accent on the plural pronoun.
 "When I say we, I mean Sir Norman and his lady."

"Exactly so!"
 Andrew took up the county paper and pretended to read it; he was tired of being cross-examined by his visitor.

"And where is this girl?" inquired Mr. Marshall.
 "How can I tell?"
 "That is singular."

"Not in the least, seeing that the gipsies stole her a few days after her arrival in St. Faith's, from the cottage of Simon Gee, the weaver."
 "Gipsies stole her!" repeated Marshall, emphatically.

"I told you so."
 "And upon what proof do you assert that they were gipsies?"
 "Common report."

"Is seldom correct," observed the lawyer, dryly.
 "Perhaps not," replied the old man, impatiently.
 "But I question if it is more liable to err than that restless, meddling suspicion which discovers a mystery in a mouse trap—crime in the simplest actions of life. I begin to tire of this. Why don't you speak out plainly, instead of beating about the bushes, and ask me at once whether we (I use the plural advisedly this time) have anything to fear from the inquiries of this Major Hawley and the prying curiosity of his wife, who appears ten times more curious than her husband?"

"Because—"
 "You think I am not prepared to answer it?"
 "Perhaps so."
 "Well, then, I am prepared. We have nothing either to conceal or fear; but we have the possibility of an imposition to guard against, and that is why I was about to send for you. If you find the proofs of the girl's identity sufficiently clear, we are prepared at once to acknowledge her, that is, when she is found."

"Hem!" said the lawyer, clearing his throat by a preliminary cough. "At last I clearly understand yours and Sir Norman's wishes."

"It took a deuced long time to make you comprehend them," growled the angry Mr. Sillex; "but it's like you lawyers: if you perceive a mole-hill at a distance, you are sure to magnify it into a mountain."

"Sometimes, Mr. Steward, sometimes," replied Marshall, good humouredly. "Don't be too hard upon the profession. It has done your master good service, especially in the affair of the entails."

"In what!" exclaimed the old man, turning exceedingly pale.

"The affair of the entails."

"Why, you don't mean that he has—"
 "Suffered fine and recovery; and consequently cut off the entails upon Meldown Park and the adjoining estate. Bless me," he added, "were you not aware of the circumstance?"

Mr. Sillex was not aware of it.
 "True," continued the speaker, "Sir Norman recommended secrecy; but how could I suppose for an instant that the caution was intended to apply to you?"

"How, indeed!" muttered the steward, bitterly.
 "You will not betray me?"

"Why should I?" demanded the occupant of the Home Farm, who suppressed his feelings of resentment and mortification by a violent effort. "What can it possibly signify to me that Sir Norman has cut off the entail of my old master's estate? I am not one of the heirs. I have no interest, either in future expectation or present—certainly not. No doubt," he added, "but he acted by the advice of my lady."

"No doubt," repeated the lawyer. "Rather a remarkable person, Lady Boothroyd; in fact, I might say, very remarkable."

"You might."

"Do you know that I once formed a very different opinion of her—thought her a quiet, soulless creature without an opinion, energy, or will of her own; but I was greatly deceived."

"Greatly," groaned Andrew Sillex.

"She is a master spirit."
 "She is an ungrateful, manœuvring woman," exclaimed the steward, bitterly; "and has laboured to deprive me of the confidence of her husband. But she will fail, as others have failed before. I tell you, Marshall," he added, "that the disentailing process you have described, is worthless, absolutely worthless; and you will have to go through the entire proceedings again."

"Why so, my dear sir?"
 "Because my consent is first necessary, and will not be given till—"

He hesitated, unwilling to complete the phrase.
 "He is first settled with," thought the lawyer. "I imagined as much."

"Let us start for the village," added Mr. Sillex. "Do your best in this affair, sift the evidence to the utmost; and that done, we will speak further—perhaps on the affair of the entail."

"As you please, my dear sir, as you please," answered Mr. Marshall. "I shall feel only too happy to serve you. Never do anything without the advice of your lawyer," he added, "never."

"For the future I will not."

CHAPTER LX.

But truth shall yet be heard—no human power
 Can stifle or corrupt her purposes.—CRÆON.

No sooner was it rumoured in St. Faith's that a gentleman and lady had arrived at the King's Arms, and were making inquiries respecting the lost Lillian, than an unusual degree of excitement took place. The village, since the departure of the family from the hall, had enjoyed several years of such profound quiet, that the change was welcomed with pleasure.

"Truth will out," observed one.
 "I always thought the mystery would be cleared up," added a second.

A third pointed towards the hall, and shook his head knowingly.

Meanwhile, Simon Gee and his wife, who had been sent for by the major, were both seated in the parlour of the "King's Arms." The old weaver was a little nervous at first, but the kind tone in which the questions were put to him, to say nothing of the presence of his strong-minded helpmate, soon placed him at his ease.

"You say that your late brother arrived on New Year's eve," began the major, "now four years since."

"That is the time exactly, sir."

"At what hour did he arrive?"

"Midnight. I was waiting for my comrades to ring the old year out and the new one in. I am sure," he added, "that I shall never forget the surprise poor Barny's sudden appearance gave me."

"Had he the child with him?"

"Wrapped in his cloak, sir."

"Did he state whose child it was?" demanded Mrs. Major Hawley.

"His own, of course."

"In express words?"

"Well," replied the old man, "I couldn't swear that he said so in express words, but of course it must have been his—whose else could it have been? Besides, it was so very like him; was it not, Hester?"

The honest woman, put upon her veracity, could not confirm the opinion of her husband, much as she would like to have done so.

"I can't say that," she replied; "the pretty creature had not Barny's nose or eyes. In fact, I always supposed that she resembled her mother, who, no doubt, was some foreign lady."

"And why do you suppose her to have been a lady?" demanded the major's wife, seizing with ready tact upon the word.

"Because Lilly was such a singular child."

"And do none but ladies have singular children?"

"Ay, but she had been so accustomed to be waited upon. Whenever she desired anything, she looked surprised if it was not brought to her; and when brought, took it as a matter of course. Poor people's children don't do that—at least, not in St. Faith's."

The major and his lady exchanged glances. Probably they recognised in the peculiarity some trait of their lost god-daughter.

At this moment Mr. Thornton, farmer Minter, Marshall, the lawyer, and Andrew Sillex, were announced; and the inquiry, from the presence of the magistrate, assumed almost a legal form.

"Did Sir Norman Boothroyd ever see the child?" continued the gentleman.

"Never, sir," answered Simon; "he was ill at the time."

"But Mr. Sillex and her ladyship did," added Hester, "and he will tell you what a pretty creature she was. Poor Lilly! every one loved her—she was the pet of the village."

"That she was," exclaimed farmer Minter, bluntly. "My dame grieved for her as if she had been one of her own. A curse upon the bad, heartless wretches who stole her!"

A deep "Amen!" broke from all present.

"And what said her ladyship?"

"Oh! she was very kind and affable, as she always is to the poor," answered the wife of Simon Gee. "Every one knows that if my lady had her way things would have been very different at St. Faith's; but, poor thing, she hadn't a spirit of her own—Sir Norman ruled her in everything."

Here the steward and the lawyer smiled.

"She offered to place Lilly in her school," continued the speaker; "but we didn't like to let her go there."

"Why not?"

"Simon and I didn't want to part with her."

"Would it not have been for her advantage?"

"We loved her, sir."

This was the only answer which could be wrung from Hester Gee. The fact was, she had no other motives to assign for having declined the patronising offer of the lady of the manor.

"And did she appear offended at your refusal?"

"No, sir."

Here Simon coughed, to remind his wife of a little circumstance which she seemed to have forgotten. The quick ear of Mrs. Hawley detected the peculiar note; probably she had frequently uttered it herself, for she, too, was a great tactician in household management, which, as a matter of course, includes every species of conjugal telegraphing.

"Do speak out, my good man," she exclaimed, "if you have anything to say. You need not look at your wife so earnestly."

"I wanted to remind her," said the weaver, "that after my lady quitted our poor cottage, we both thought she had been a little out of temper."

"That's true," said Hester; "but not at our refusal to part with Lilly—it was at a foolish observation of mine."

"Will you repeat that observation?" asked Mr. Thornton, for the first time breaking silence. "You will excuse my interference, sir," he added, addressing himself to the major, "but, at the time of the child's disappearance, I felt great interest in the affair, and did my best to unravel it."

"That you did," exclaimed all present.

The gentlemen shook hands, and exchanged cards. "Well, gentlemen, having no children of my own, it was only natural that I should feel proud and fond of Lilly," resumed Hester Gee, wiping her eyes with the corner of her apron. "I am sure, the cottage has been lonely enough without her. In my pride I observed that Lilly's eyes and hair were the exact colour of Miss Alice's."

"And who is Miss Alice?" demanded the major, quickly.

"The daughter of Sir Norman and Lady Boothroyd."

Andrew Sillex bit his lips with vexation, and the lawyer began to think that the affair was not quite so clear as the old man had led him to suppose.

"This is important," said Mrs. Hawley, emphatically, "for the girl whom you supposed the daughter of the soldier, Barny Gee—who, to my certain knowledge, never was married—was in reality the child of Lieutenant Allan Boothroyd."

There was a general exclamation of surprise from all present.

"I was her god-mother," added the speaker.

"And Barny, who served in my regiment," added her husband, "on the death of Allan, with whom he lived several years as servant, was intrusted with Lillian, to bring her to England."

"This explains much," observed the magistrate, "which has hitherto been left in darkness—a motive for the abduction."

"Pardon me," observed the lawyer, blandly, "but it explains nothing of the kind. I see no proof of the gentleman's assertion that the lieutenant ever had either a wife or child."

"I was present at his marriage," said the major.

"And I at the birth of Lilly," added his wife.

"Supposing such to have been the case," resumed Mr. Marshall, "where is the proof that the child Barny brought over was the daughter?"

"I can't think it, gentlemen," muttered Simon Gee; "it must have been my brother's child."

Hester was of the same opinion. It pained her to think that any other had a superior claim to the love of the fair young creature who had succeeded in winding herself so closely round her heart, and whose loss was still so deeply mourned.

"All these are points which a judicial investigation—which, I plainly perceive, must follow this discovery—alone can clear up. The arrival of Major Hawley and his lady, and the statement they have made, give a new complexion to the affair, by supplying a motive for the abduction."

"You are wrong there," observed Mr. Marshall; "for it would be affectation to affect ignorance of the party at whom your suspicions glance. The daughter of the late Allan Boothroyd, supposing—I say supposing—he left one, would be entirely dependent on the charity of her relatives."

"Is the inheritance of a name nothing?" demanded the major, sternly.

The lawyer shrugged his shoulders. That was not his affair, he said; he was only present to watch the investigation on the part of Sir Norman Boothroyd, whose instructions had been most liberal.

"Have you any objection to produce them?" demanded Mr. Thornton.

"None whatever."

The baronet's letter to Sillex was publicly read.

"You hear," said Andrew Sillex; "Sir Norman only waits to be convinced that the girl is really his niece, to acknowledge her."

"I don't believe a word of it," replied farmer Minter; "you may remember, sir, at the time the child was stolen, I expressed my suspicion of him."

This was addressed to Mr. Thornton.

"You did," said the worthy magistrate, "and had I known what has this day been stated, my conduct would have been different; I should have directed the searches of the police in another direction."

This observation was received with a loud cheer, and assertions that Mr. Thornton was ever ready to prove himself the poor man's friend.

"You will please to recollect," observed the lawyer, who by this time had lost all confidence in the moral innocence of his client, "that this is not a judicial investigation, and with all due respect to the gentleman who spoke last, I must consider his remarks as extremely out of place and uncalled for."

There was a general call upon the speaker to explain himself.

"Nothing more easy. Mr. Thornton could not act in the affair," answered the man of law, in a tone of confidence.

"Not act!" repeated the major.

"Ridiculous!" said his wife.

"He is a magistrate," cried farmer Minter.

"And a good one," added Simon Gee.

"These are all facts which I am not disposed to deny," continued the legal adviser of Sir Norman, as soon as he could obtain a hearing. "But this is my position, and I defy all the gentlemen of the long robe in Westminster Hall to shake it."

"State it, sir," exclaimed Mrs. Major Hawley. "Pray let us hear your famous position. I should like to have an explanation, vastly."

"In the first place, supposing Lillian to be the child of the deceased Barney Gee—"

"But she was not Barney Gee's child," interrupted the more impatient amongst the crowd, who had gradually assembled in the parlour of the village inn.

"I said supposed," answered the speaker. "There would be no motive; to which I might add, the character of my respected client ought to place him above suspicion. In the next—"

"Aye, let us hear the next!" shouted several.

"If Lillian is the daughter of his late brother, Lieutenant Allan Boothroyd, Sir Norman, as her uncle, is her only legal guardian, and, consequently, would be perfectly justified in removing her from the care of these, no doubt, very excellent persons, who could have no legal rights over her."

The proposition was so clear, that even the most violent opponents of the baronet were reluctantly compelled to admit it; and a general feeling of disappointment might be traced on the features of all present.

Andrew Sillex began to consider the speaker more favourably than he had hitherto done.

"Evidently a clever fellow," he thought, as he looked round him with an air of triumph.

"As Mr. Marshall has stated, this is neither a magisterial nor a judicial investigation," observed Mr. Thornton; "it will be useless, therefore, to discuss it further. But if your client is not legally responsible for his conduct in this affair to the inhabitants of St. Faith's, he is morally responsible; and I, for one, shall feel most delighted at seeing him come free from imputation."

"He can't," said farmer Minter, in a tone of bitterness.

"That remains to be seen," returned the lawyer. "I am sorry to observe," he continued, "the feeling which still prevails against your landlord. I should have thought, after the generosity of his conduct in the affair of his manorial rights over the common, a better state of things might have been expected; but I will not touch upon that subject further."

"He had not a leg to stand upon," shouted several of the tenants.

"Forced to give them up," added others.

"This is the case: in the first place, produce the girl whom you state to be the niece of Sir Norman."

"You know he can't," replied the major's lady, bitterly.

"In the next, prove her to be the daughter of the deceased Lieutenant Allan Boothroyd."

"And what then?"

"My client will not only acknowledge but receive her into his family, and act by her as the tie between them calls upon him to act," answered the lawyer. "If, after this plain statement, you persist in your ill-opinion, I shall only observe that you have made up your minds from prejudice and not from proof."

"You have hit it rightly," observed the steward; "but they were always an evil-minded, dissatisfied race. You know," he added, appealing to those present, "that when Sir Norman was in the wrong, I blamed him as freely as any one could; but now that I know him to be in the right, I feel it is my duty to stand up for him."

"It is evident," said Major Hawley, "that the affair cannot end here. On my return to London, I shall take counsel's opinion upon the subject. In the meantime, I have one more question to ask."

There was instantly silence in the room.

"Did Barney Gee leave any papers behind him?"

"Only his discharge from the army," replied Simon, "which I have kept by me ever since. His enemies said he had deserted."

"And no others were found?"

"None."

The major sat down with an air of disappointment. "Oh, that I could only recollect the last words of poor Barney," thought the farmer. "But it be no use trying."

The next day the major and his lady, sadly disappointed in the result of their visit, left St. Faith's and returned to London.

CHAPTER LXI.

Sincerity, thou first of virtues, let
No mortal leave thy onward path.

ADDISON.

GREATLY as Major Hawley and his wife felt mortified by the result of their visit to St. Faith's, neither of them were persons to sit quietly down under their disappointment; on the contrary, it stimulated them to increased exertion. They both suspected foul play had been used to conceal from the eyes of the world the daughter of Allan Boothroyd, and determined to take legal advice.

By a singular coincidence, the lawyer, whom the major's agent recommended, proved to be no other than our reader's old acquaintance, Mr. Morton.

"The statement you have made has greatly interested me," he observed, "for I know something of the Boothroyd family, although I have never been professionally concerned for them; but my predecessor—the gentleman to whose business I succeeded—made the will of the late baronet."

"Which left his younger nephew with no other dependence than his sword," observed the lady, indignantly; "an unnatural old—but then, he was a bachelor," she added, as if in that word all human iniquities were comprised.

"The estates, I know, went with the title," answered the lawyer, with a smile. "But if I remember rightly there was a codicil."

"Cannot the fact be ascertained?" demanded the major.

"I should think it might; the party who drew it is still living. I will see him—that shall be my first step; as in the event of any bequest, contingency, or reversion in favour of Allan or his descendants, a motive would be supplied; at present I can discover none."

"You must be very blind then," said Mrs. Major Hawley, dryly. "Pride!"

"Selfishness," added her husband.

"I mean tangible motives, such as the law would recognise," said Mr. Morton. "Our next proceeding must be to issue advertisements, offering a reward for any clue to the lost child."

"In the Devonshire papers?" suggested his new client.

"I have more faith in the London ones," replied the lawyer; "for although the actual abduction took place in the country, rely upon it the child was brought to London to be disposed of. Consider the facilities which our overgrown metropolis presents either for crime or its concealment."

At the word crime, Mrs. Major Hawley turned pale. Childless herself, her heart clung with fond affection to the memory of her god-daughter.

"They could never have been so heartless," she exclaimed, indignantly, "as to harm her!"

"Imprudent, you mean," observed her husband. "Neither Sir Norman or his lady appears troubled with much heart."

Mr. Morton mentally thought that the speaker was right.

Every day during the next week the following advertisement appeared in most of the morning and evening papers:—

"One hundred guineas reward will be paid to any person or persons who can afford information respecting the fate of a female child, named Lillian, who was stolen in the year 1847 from the parties with whom she resided at St. Faith's, a village in Devonshire; and an equal sum is hereby offered for the detection of the perpetrator or perpetrators of the crime. The child in question has dark hair and eyes, was rather tall of her age, and at the time of her abduction spoke English imperfectly, having been born in India, from which country she had only lately arrived.—Apply," &c. &c.

Sir Norman and Lady Boothroyd were seated at the breakfast-table, when Alice, struck by the singularity of the advertisement, read it aloud.

Neither of her parents could conceal the confusion and annoyance it caused them.

"Lillian!" repeated the young lady; "surely I must have heard that name before. I recollect, it was the name of the poor soldier's child who—"

Here she suddenly paused, unwilling to pain her father by reminding him of the death of Barney Gee.

"Was shot poaching on the lands of Meldown," said her mother, finishing the sentence for her; "and by his death defeated public justice, for there is little doubt but he murdered the keeper Springthorp."

Alice shuddered, and remained for several minutes absorbed in thought.

"Mamma! mamma!" she suddenly exclaimed, "in what year did we quit Meldown Park?"

"In —," replied her father, who looked upon his departure from his ancestral home as an historical event.

"The very year that—"

"Silence, Alice!" said her ladyship, in an imperative tone; for she felt annoyed that her daughter had not forgotten the adventure in the pavilion at Meldown Park. "Neither Sir Norman nor myself feel sufficient interest in the affair to dwell upon it any further."

Alice obeyed, and alluded to the subject no more. But thought is independent of the will, and she could not help reflecting on the subject seriously and painfully, for the description of Lillian in the advertisement, the foreign words she had heard the prisoner utter, and which the rector had pronounced to be Hindostani, convinced her the child of Barney Gee and the gipsy girl, as her mother had designated her, were the same; and consequently, that her ladyship was a sharer in the crime of her abduction.

Just as Mr. Morton almost despaired of any satisfactory result from the advertisements, he was met one morning on his way to Westminster by a stout, coarse-looking woman, who inquired his name.

The gentleman gave it.

"But are you the lawyer who put the 'tisement in the papers 'bout Lilly?" she demanded.

Mr. Morton eagerly assured her that he was, and requested her to return with him to his office.

"No, no," replied Bet, for the female was no other than the faithless partner of Fiddler Dick, "you don't catch me within four walls. What I have got to say, you must listen to in the street. You want to find Lilly!"

"And will pay for any information, that is to say, authentic information, regarding her," said the lawyer.

"I must have something in hand," observed the woman; then, seeing that Mr. Morton hesitated, she added, "If I hadn't a knowed her, how should I ha' knowed that they called her Lilly?"

"Right," said the gentleman, placing five sovereigns in her hand; "there is an earnest of what you may expect should your information prove of importance."

"Well," said Bet, pocketing the money, "this looks like business. You must find a man named Dexter."

"What is he?"

"A rascal who cheated me out of my bizziness," replied the angry woman, "after my husband met with his misfortune. Lilly was 'prenticed to us to learn the tumbling trade."

Mr. Morton shuddered.

"He said he hadn't got her," she continued; "but I never believed him. Find him; and then, may be, I can tell you more."

"But where am I to seek him?"

"Oh, he is always about, either with a gaff or at the fairs."

"And where, when he is found," added the lawyer, "am I to seek you?"

"I shall turn up," answered Bet.

"Had you not better give me your address?"

"My what?"

"Tell me where you live?"

The woman shuddered; and, drawing her ragged cloak around her, regarded him with an expression of mistrust.

"No, Mr. Lawyer. I ain't such a fool as that! For years I ain't let any living creature know where my home is—if it can be called a home. A dog wouldn't take up its quarters there. But no matter for that; it's safe! He will soon be out," she added, in a low tone.

"He! Of whom are you speaking?"

"My husband—Fiddler Dick!"

"It ought to have been for life," she murmured. "The police deceived me. It ought to have been for life. But I ain't a-goin' to trouble you with that. When you have found Dexter, put another 'tisement in the papers, and I'll come forwards agin."

Finding that threats and persuasions were alike powerless to induce the woman to alter her determination, Mr. Morton suffered her to depart; for it was quite evident that she would only give her evidence in her own way.

It was not the first time he had met with such a witness.

(To be continued.)

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

PUBLIC SPEAKING.

THE ability to express their thoughts in public with clearness and accuracy is exceedingly important to young men. There are many occasions on which they may be under the necessity of speaking in public, and it is highly desirable that they should be prepared for such an event. A few suggestions may, therefore, be usefully introduced here—suggestions of a plain, practical character, on a plain, practical topic.

In public speaking be natural. Study your own disposition, your own capability, the extent of your own physical and mental resources. Attempt nothing that is beyond your reach. Do that which you can do, and beware of exhibiting ignorance or affectation in a vain effort to be profound or eloquent.

Study the disposition of those whom you address. That which may affect, convince, or delight one description of audience, may produce an entirely different effect on another. Consider the capacity of your hearers. That which may be novel and interesting to one class, may be stale and wearisome to another. Above all, consider what is most likely to tell on your audience. An orator, it has been said, should be acquainted with all the avenues to the human heart. It is necessary that he should pursue that avenue which leads most directly to the citadel, and to do so he must take into account the condition of the fortress.

Study to be natural in your voice and manner. Nothing is more offensive to good taste than affectation. Never use art unless you have art enough to conceal it. Be frank, open, and sincere in your manner of delivery, appealing in a manly way to the good sense and good feeling of your audience.

Endeavour to preserve your own composure. The discomfiture of a speaker is distressing to his hearers. A flutter and timidity of spirit—the common weakness of young and inexperienced persons—is a great hindrance both to their pronunciation and invention. No trouble should be accounted too great if it result in overcoming this failing. Assurance and self-command may be attained, and the following hints have been suggested as calculated to superinduce a proper degree of both.

1. To be entire master of your subject, and a consciousness that you deliver to your audience nothing but what is well worth their hearing, will give you a good degree of courage.

2. Endeavour to be wholly engaged in your subject; and when the mind is intent upon, and warmed with it, it will forget that awful deference it before paid to the audience, which was so apt to disconcert it.

3. If the sight of your hearers, or any of them, discomposes you, keep your eyes from them.

Let your pronunciation be exact, and your intonation of voice appropriate to your subject. The best method of attaining both is frequently to listen to those who excel in them. At the same time, guard against adopting the mannerism of any great orator. What is perfectly natural in him must, if it be adopted by imitation, be singularly unnatural in you.

Under the word Pronunciation, the ancient masters of oratory comprehended action as well as speech. A natural and graceful movement renders elocution impressive; but to be really impressive it must be appropriate. No action is as bad as no emphasis. An affected vehemence of action is as bad as an affected vehemence of voice.

With respect to what really constitutes appropriate action, ancient and modern writers are agreed that the parts of the body to be principally employed are the head, the face, the eyes, the hands, and the upper part of the whole person. There are some actions which require to be avoided, such as a frequent movement of the left hand, extending the hands violently above the head, or, indeed, anything that touches extravagance. But the best plan to be adopted, better than any rule of art, is to eschew the rules of art altogether, and endeavour to be so thoroughly impressed with that which you are uttering as to feel every passion you indicate, witness every scene you describe, firmly believe all you utter,—then your action will become natural and appropriate, and have its due influence on your audience.

Follow the instructions which Hamlet gives to the players, when he cautions them against "mouthing a speech." Says he—"Let your own discretion be your tutor. Suit the action to the word, the word to the action; with this special observance, that you o'erstep not the modesty of nature."

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH. CHAPTER VIII.

"TO-DAY, Robert," said George, "I shall explain to you the meaning of a participle and a preposition. A participle has its name from its participating in the nature of a verb and an adjective. If I ask you to parse, that is, to tell the parts of speech of this sentence, 'A kind relation is loved,' you would at once recollect that loved must be a verb. With a pronoun immediately before it, it would be a verb, but after any tense of either of the auxiliary verbs it is a participle. Strange to say, if placed before a noun, loved becomes an adjective. Thus, you see that, according to its position, the same word can be an adjective, a verb, or a participle."

"I quite understand that, George," answered Robert; "I only hope that the preposition will not offer any greater difficulty."

"I think it offers less," replied the instructor. "Prepositions are almost all short words, serving to show the relation that things and persons bear to each other. Before you have time to puzzle yourself about prepositions, I'll give you an example of one—'I am near you.'"

"Near is the preposition," said Robert, after a moment's reflection.

"To be sure it is," said George, "and you shall have half-a-dozen more prepositions, with the corresponding French word—"

"Of, de; for, pour; after, après; among, parmi; upon, sur; against, contre."

"Now take your pen and add to your stock of useful words. Begin with the lord of creation."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
A man	Un homme*
A woman	Une femme†
A boy	Un garçon
A girl	Une fille
A child	Un enfant
A bachelor	Un célibataire
A married man	Un homme marié
A married woman	Une femme mariée
A widower	Un veuf
A widow	Une veuve
A father	Un père
A mother	Une mère
The son	Le fils
The daughter	La fille
The sister	La sœur
The brother	Le frère
The elder brother	L'aîné
The younger brother	Le cadet
The twins	Les jumeaux
The grandfather	Le grand-père
The grandmother	La grand-mère
The aunt	La tante
The uncle	L'oncle
The nephew	Le neveu
The cousin (male and female).	{ Le cousin (masculine) La cousine (feminine).

"How I do wish I knew the French of every English word!" exclaimed Robert.

"I wish you did," replied George; "but this knowledge would not suffice to make you a good French scholar, although it would be very useful in its way. When you know French, you will not only adopt French words, but French construction. Some of our commonest sentences would be perfectly ridiculous if literally translated into French. A Frenchman would smile if you said to him, 'Comment faites vous faites?' for 'How do you do?' We in our turn should be disposed to laugh if he said to us, 'How you carry you?' yet this is the literal translation of 'Comment vous portez-vous?' the correct manner of saying 'How do you do?' in French.

"Good construction, by which I mean placing the words in the right place, belongs properly to syntax, but I mean to give you an inkling of it even before you are out of etymology. And another thing that will amuse you, and that I shall direct you to do, is to compare the idioms, or peculiarities, of the two languages. The sentences that you learn by heart in the 'Voyage à Paris' will greatly assist you in French construction, because by habit you will acquire some knowledge of the position of words before rules give the reason for such positions. Have you quite understood all that?"

"Yes, perfectly," said Robert; "but I must tell you I do not comprehend what is the use of the circumflex accent. I have not forgotten that, like the acute and the grave, it always gives the sound of our a to the French e; but as you tell me sometimes to put it on other vowels besides e, I own it puzzles me a little."

"I am glad you have not forgotten what I did tell you about accents," answered the teacher. "I will now enter a little more into detail, and I will begin with the puzzler, the circumflex accent. Not only does it give the French e the sound of our a, but on what vowel soever it is placed, it gives great fullness to the sound of that vowel, because it is used to supply the place of the s that was thought necessary by old French writers. If you were to meet with a book written in the time of Louis XIV., you would find le même (the same) written le mesme, and tôt (soon) written tost. I should like you now to write down words showing the circumflex accent on every one of the five vowels. Begin with pâté (pie); tête (head); dîner (dinner); côte (rib); brûlure (burn). So much for the circumflex. The acute accent, or little stroke from right to left (´), and the grave accent, or stroke from left to right (`), have rather different influences. The acute not only renders the e—a, but also gives it a sharp, short sound. The grave accent also renders the e—a, but it gives a long, protracted sound. The e in été (summer) is short and sharp; in mère (mother) it is long. The grave accent is applied to a when it is used as a preposition; but you must never put it on an a used as a verb, thus, il a (he has).

"The French use some signs and marks in much the same manner as we do, viz., they apply the note of interrogation (?) to ask a question, and the note of admiration (!) to express surprise, or any sudden emotion of the mind, but the apostrophe (') has with them quite a different office to that to which we chiefly apply it. They do not make it mark possession thus: 'Robert's pen,' 'Your mother's dress.' In French the apostrophe stands in the place of a vowel, and in order that you may very soon see this explained by an example, remark the following, l'âme, the soul, instead of la âme. The apostrophe is introduced to avoid what in learned language is called a hiatus, a harsh pronunciation produced by the sound of one vowel after another."

"We dislike the hiatus as much as the French do, and to avoid it we change a into an before a vowel; we do not say a angel, but an angel."

"As to the hyphen (-) it serves, as with us, to form a compound word, thus 'dois-je?' (ought I?) Strange to say, the French sometimes compound a word with two hyphens, in the following manner, 'a-t-il?' (has he?) In the compound a-t-il, the t admits of no translation, it is merely introduced to avoid the hiatus. The diæresis (¨) in French gives a distinct sound to any vowel over which you may find it placed."

"Now, Robert, we have done with discussions on all those little marks, which puzzled you a good deal when you did not know how they influenced the words. I shall not dictate anything more this morning, for I never wish to overload your memory, and you have ample subject for study till we meet again."

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON VII.

CENTRIFUGAL FORCE (continued).

165. If the hoops (see 164) are made to turn rapidly, what will be the result? They will be flattened at the top and bottom, and bulge out at the middle.

166. If a ball of moist clay, or other yielding material, should be set whirling about an axis, what

* Homme is sounded as omme would be in English.

† Femme, as if written fahm.

* The French for hyphen is trait-d'union.

† For diæresis diérèse or tréma.

would happen? It would be more or less flattened, in a similar manner.

167. Might it be brought to the form of a flat disc? It might, if the material should be sufficiently tenacious, by making it turn rapidly.

168. How does the potter make use of the centrifugal force to aid him in his useful handicraft?—A piece of clay is placed on a rapidly moving flat wheel, and the clay flattens out in endeavouring to move from the centre; with the aid of his fingers and a little tool, he, with great dexterity, turns cup after cup, and saucer after saucer.

169. How is our common window glass manufactured into sheets?—A mass of molten glass, on an iron rod, is made to turn rapidly round; it spreads out on the table into a thin round plate, from which afterwards are cut different sized panes.

170. It has been ascertained that the earth is somewhat flattened at its poles—what is the explanation of this curious fact?—The earth rotates about an axis, and it took that form under the influence of the centrifugal force, ages ago, when its entire mass was in a fluid state.

171. It is well known that large grindstones, turned rapidly by machinery, are occasionally broken into fragments that fly in every direction—what force is it that produces these violent effects? The centrifugal force. This pulls outward with such energy as to overcome the cohesion between the particles of the stone, and the fragments fly off in a tangent.

172. Why can we not turn a sharp corner when running fast? Because the effort we make is opposed by an energetic centrifugal force.

173. What is the reason that a train of railway carriages, in passing rapidly around a curve on a railroad, is liable to be thrown off the track? The centrifugal force in operation causes the flanges on the outside wheels to press against the outer rails.

174. Why do the circus rider and his horse lean toward the centre of the ring?—To counteract the effect of the centrifugal force. A skater, for the same reason, leans to the inside, when he is describing a curve on the ice.

CENTRE OF GRAVITY.

175. If a rod or cane be placed on the edge of a stationary body, by sliding it along we may find a point about which the weights of the two parts will balance each other; what is this point called?—The centre of gravity of the rod. Every body has its centre of gravity, or point about which, if supported, the body will balance itself in any position.

176. Why has the name centre of gravity been given to this point?—Because the entire weight of the body may be considered as collected, and taking effect there.

177. Illustrate.—The body is drawn down by its weight, just as if a man were pulling downward with a certain force upon a cord attached to its centre of gravity.

STABILITY OF HEAVY BODIES.

178. When is a heavy body said to be STABLE, or to have STABILITY?—When it is so supported that if disturbed from its position, it will fall back again.

179. Give an example.—The pendulum of a clock, or a plumb-line.

180. How is it with a body of any form suspended from a point directly over its centre of gravity, or with bodies standing on their bases?—They are all stable.

181. When is a body said to be UNSTABLE?—When it is poised on a point or edge directly under its centre of gravity; so that if disturbed from its position it will upset.

182. Give another example.—A pole standing on one end; if it be displaced, in the least, from that position, it will upset.

183. How may an upright pole be balanced on the finger, and kept from falling for some time?—By shifting the position of the finger from one side to the other, so as to counteract the tendency to fall.

184. What is the general rule with regard to the movements of a heavy body disturbed from its position of rest?—Its centre of gravity tends to the lowest possible position, and finally settles there.

185. Mention one or two illustrations of this tendency.—The oscillations, to and fro, of the pendulum of a clock, or the similar movements of a swing.

186. In order that a body standing on the level ground may have stability, what is necessary?—That the centre of gravity should be directly over some point of the base of contact.

187. Suppose the centre of gravity overhangs the base?—The body will upset.

188. Does the stability of a body depend on the breadth of its base?—It does; the broader the base the greater the stability.

189. Mention a familiar case in which this principle is applied.—The legs of chairs are commonly spread out below the seat to give them greater firmness and security.

190. Mention other instances of the application of the same principle.—Candlesticks, table lamps, goblets, wine-glasses, and many other articles of household furniture, have stability given to them by a broad foundation.

SALT LAKE CITY AND ITS ENVIRONS.

THIS may not be an inappropriate time to place on record, for future reference, a few memoranda of the curious people whose final extinction the Mormon expedition is likely to achieve. In the year 1830, one Joseph Smith, an idle person, who had lived upon the credulity of his acquaintance, associated himself with other knaves, and pretended to have discovered, through the aid of Divine revelation, the "Book of Mormon," which was a sort of supplement to the Bible. Joseph Smith, like other impostors, found dupes, and planted his new sect at Kirtland, Ohio. From thence they removed to Jackson county, Missouri, where they proposed to remain. Meanwhile, however, their religious tenets had gained wind, and excited strenuous opposition on the part of the religious people residing in that part of the country. The most offensive of the Mormon principles was that which tolerated, if it did not enjoin, polygamy. It would appear, from very fair evidence, that this doctrine was ingrafted upon the Mormon theology in subservience to the licentiousness of its founder. Mistress Joseph Smith was guardian of a family of girls, orphans, who lived in her house. Two of these fell victims to the wickedness of Smith, who, smarting under the just indignation of his wife, adopted polygamy that he might violate the laws of God and man without risk of domestic brawls. The bulk of his followers accepted the demoralising doctrine without demur.

Not so the people of Missouri, who were neighbours of the Mormons. They rebelled against Joe Smith's profanity and licentiousness; and, after a brief struggle, he resolved to remove further west. Nauvoo, in Illinois, was their chosen home. Here the Mormon community lived in prosperity for many years. They built themselves a magnificent temple, and laid out a fair city. Joe Smith was mayor, and, in fact, irresponsible despot. He exercised a power which was inconsistent with the State authority, and carried out doctrines which were abhorrent to the Christians of his neighbourhood. A feud sprung up between the Mormons and the people of the adjacent counties. It culminated in 1844, when both parties came to open warfare, and the chief of the Mormons, Joe Smith, was shot dead by an enraged mob, while in the jail of Carthage.

The sect continued for a brief period to inhabit their home at Nauvoo; but, the animosity of the neighbours being by no means quenched, but rather gaining ground each successive month, the Mormons at last resolved, under the guidance of Brigham Young, Smith's successor, to seek a new home, beyond the authority of the States. In the early part of 1846 the bulk of the Mormon community left Nauvoo. Their first stopping-place was just without the western boundary of the United States, on the borders of the Missouri. Here they inclosed land, planted crops, and spent twelve months in no enviable condition.

In the spring of 1847 Brigham Young dispatched a party to discover a new home, far from the Gentiles, and on the other side of the Rocky Mountains. In July of that year, President Young, with the remainder of the sect, set foot in the Valley of Salt Lake. The site was singularly favourable. It was landlocked on all sides. In winter it was perfectly inaccessible, the passes in the mountain ranges being completely blocked with snow. Though the land was not very fertile, nor the climate as genial as might have been wished, the site was not unfavourable for agricultural operations, or permanent settlement. It possessed the singular advantage of being one thousand miles distant—by a hard and dangerous route—from any civilised establishments.

At a glance Brigham Young detected the advantages of the locality. He had a pretended vision straightway, directing him to build a temple of the Latter-day Saints to the Lord, in a favourable position, on the border of the Wahsatch range. His people, with astonishing credulity, accepted the revelation, and fell to work at once.

That autumn the ground adjacent to the temple was laid out and surveyed. Streets and squares were traced for a large city. Six thousand acres were fenced in, ploughed, and sown. Still, during the winter of that year, the Mormons so narrowly escaped starvation that they were obliged to tear from the roofs of their huts the skins of wild beasts, with which they had been covered, and to eat them. In the spring, Brigham Young brought reinforcements, and supplies of cattle and provisions; and, by dint of great exertions, the little colony found itself, at the end of a few months, in a self-supporting condition. Grist and saw-mills had been erected; and considerable quantities of grain, melons, potatoes, and corn had been raised. Other settlements had been made, at some little distance from the main city, with every prospect of prosperity. A council house had been erected, and the temple was in a fair way of completion.

Finding himself at length undisputed sovereign of a fine territory, the false prophet now resolved to inaugurate his political régime. He erected the settlement over which he presided, together with the adjacent territory, into an independent commonwealth, by the name of the State of Deseret. He applied to the Congress of the United States for admission to the Union on an equal footing with the other states; and, at the same time, he dispatched trusty emissaries to almost every populous country in the world, to enlist recruits for the cause of Mormonism. He was more successful in the latter than in the former design. He obtained immense accessions of numerical strength for his sect. Hundreds and thousands of dissatisfied persons of both sexes, in the United States, and in almost every country of Europe, professed Mormonism, and sent delegations to Salt Lake City. The stream of emigration was incessant. Men, women, cattle, machinery, stores of every kind, flowed freely into Salt Lake City, and the settlement thrived accordingly. To do Brigham Young justice, the government of the settlement was administered in such a manner as to develop its resources and increase its wealth.

But the State of Deseret was not admitted into the Union. Instead, the Mormon settlement was duly erected into a territory, and a territorial government established. Collisions had already taken place between United States officers and the local authorities. To avoid the recurrence of such accidents, the President appointed the Mormon magistrates United States officers. Brigham Young was commissioned as United States Territorial Governor and Indian Agent. It was a timid avoidance of an ultimately unavoidable collision.

That collision has now come. The Mormons are resolutely determined not to submit to any authorities save those elected by themselves. They have rebelled against the magistrates set over them by the United States; they have expelled the judges, and destroyed the records of their courts. It is said that they have been accessory to the murder of United States citizens. Certain it is that neither life nor property are secure in the territory which they inhabit, and that no redress for injuries perpetrated upon United States citizens can be obtained from the Mormon courts. It is equally certain that, at the present time, the followers of Brigham Young are in open rebellion against the United States, and that by this time they have either surrendered as prisoners of war, or a terrible conflict has ensued between them and the force of United States troops under the orders of General Johnston.

The Salt Lake City covers twelve square miles of ground, being four miles in length by three in breadth. The streets are all at right angles to each other; they are 122 feet wide, with sidewalks of 20 feet on each side. Each block is 40 rods square, and is divided into eight lots, of an acre and a quarter each. A city ordinance requires each house to be planted at a distance of twenty feet from the street, and the intervening space to be shaded with trees. At first sight, it seems a city at least as large as New York, with a million or so of inhabitants. The size of the lots and the diffusion of the buildings will at once account for the extent of ground covered by the city.

Travellers who have crossed the plains describe the site and distribution of the city as singularly prepossessing. The traveller comes upon it after a long and weary march over arid plains almost destitute of vegetation, and wholly devoid of every pleasing object. On descending the slope of the Wahsatch range, his eye suddenly embraces the valley in which the city rests. On the west flows the Jordan, which unites Great Salt and Utah lakes. On the south, for a distance of twenty-five miles, stretches an unbroken plain, intersected by several little streams. On the east and north the mountain-range slopes downward, in a series of steps. One of these gives birth to a miniature torrent, which comes gushing out of the rock. Another is the source of a hot spring, which the Mormons have ingeniously turned to excellent account for the construction of warm-baths.

The houses are mostly constructed of adobe, or burnt bricks; and, with few exceptions, are—like the dwellings in Central America and Mexico—long, low, straggling edifices. They are well thatched, and generally comfortable. A few of the public buildings possess higher claims to architectural eminence; but carriage is so dear, that they must remain few and far between. The most striking feature in Salt Lake City is the admirable system of internal water-works. It is a miniature Venice. A stream, which originally flowed through the site covered by the city, has been diverted into a number of channels running through each street. Every resident thus has a never-failing supply of good water at his own door, and is enabled to raise trees and flowers, which, in that climate, never could be grown without this artificial irrigation.

Such is the city which is by this time, we hope, in the possession of the United States troops. It is understood that, if there be any fighting, it will take place in the mountain-passes behind which the city nestles. The city itself is indefensible against an enemy who has crossed the mountains. A few weeks more will enable us to judge with more accuracy of the intentions of the Mormons.

RAGGED SCHOOLS:

THEIR RISE, PROGRESS, AND RESULTS.

THE tale of "Hope Evermore; or, Something to Do," published weekly in this journal—and in which the interest of a romance is combined with the realities of the ragged school (of which the heroine is a pupil)—has awakened in many of our readers a great desire to know more of the origin and history of these schools. This knowledge cannot be fully conveyed in the course of the tale itself without impeding its action; but yet we are eager to meet this demand, for we are ourselves among the warmest admirers and most earnest advocates of these schools,—and we are so well convinced that the closer the scrutiny to which they are subjected, the more beneficial will they be found to have proved to society at large, and to the Destitute in particular, that we are glad to be called upon to furnish some details of their origin, rise, and progress; and, by laying bare their workings, and tracing out their results, to be able to give a "reason for the faith that is in us."

That faith is, that it is through the ragged schools that the worse than heathen darkness of the City Arabs—the English Kaffirs—the dangerous, the perishing classes—the "human vermin," as they have long been most inhumanly called by those who have never studied to raise, but only to crush them—will give way to the Gospel light; and the most brutish ignorance and swinish sensuality yield to the patient, persevering teaching of God's word in those schools where none are too ragged and wretched to be admitted.

Nay, the most destitute of the children of the poor are the most welcome to those Christian teachers, who know that to protect Poverty from leaguings with Crime, Education must awaken the mind to the deformity of Vice—the beauty of Virtue, and lovely Religion must sit at the door of each young heart.

Nor does she disdain to do so, even though that little heart beat beneath a patched fustian jacket or a tattered pinafore.

Those who are in the habit of visiting ragged schools, must have been amazed at the wonderful amount of knowledge rapidly and accurately acquired by the little pupils, and that not parrot-like, by rote, but well-digested, thoroughly understood. There are no schools for the higher classes where a better system is pursued, or where more pains is taken, or more zeal evinced, by teachers and pupils.

"The one thing needful" is ever kept in view: whatever they do is "done unto the Lord." We have heard answers from little ragged ones, that would not have disgraced divines; and yet, till they were enticed, led, driven, or dragged into these schools, they knew not that they had a soul or a Saviour—and, perhaps, had seldom had their faces washed, or their hair combed, till they were admitted to a ragged school.

Cleanliness, which, as the old saying has it, is next to godliness, is rigidly enforced; and the humanising influence of gentleness and courtesy in the teachers soon works an important change in the imitative and emulative mind, and the plastic limbs and manners of the little outcast boys and girls.

Who that remembers what the streets of the metropolis were, before the establishment of ragged schools, can doubt the immense benefit to all classes of these heaven-suggested institutions?

At one time the whole juvenile population of The Ragged, infested the streets; dabbling in the gutter, wallowing in the mire, gambling with farthings (or even pins), on the pavement; uncombed, unwashed, untaught, too ragged to be admitted to any decent school, the streets were to them school and home. Schools where they became adepts in foul, filthy language, cursing, swearing, thieving, lying; home, because there they ate their wretched meals, loathsome, almost poisonous, in some instances, as authentic records prove; offal of the vilest kind, stale dog's meat, and vegetable refuse, being greedily devoured by English children born and bred in the metropolis of the world—the Christian City, the Temple of Charity;—yes it was home, for here they indulged in their demoralising amusements, carried on their small peculations by day, and at night slept under some archway, on some doorstep, or in the cellars of some unfinished or deserted house.

Now, by the grace of God on the efforts of man, the greater part of these miserable little outcasts are gathered under the roofs of the hundred and fifty-seven ragged school institutions—which are so many folds of the true Shepherd, where his lambs (and many of his sheep too) are brought to him,—saved from the roaring lions, the wily serpents, the hungry wolves, that lie in wait for the unwary,—and fitted to pass through this world so that they may come to inherit the kingdom of Christ.

It is now thirteen years since the "Ragged School Union" was established. At that time there were thirty thousand children growing up in the streets in idleness, ignorance, and vice—literally without God in the world; and who, if they had been aware that they possessed immortal spirits, might well have exclaimed, "No man careth for our souls!"

One hundred and fifty-seven ragged schools are now established, by means of the Ragged School Union, for the support of free schools for the destitute poor of London and its suburbs.

The name—the truly great and noble name—of the Earl of Shaftesbury, as president, gains and lends lustre at the head of this the most important of all charitable institutions. Yes, that name in such places—

"Comes like the south wind over a bank of violets, Stealing and giving odour."

Zealous, competent, and pious teachers in these ragged schools care, not merely for the immortal souls, but for the perishing bodies of these little outcasts. There are two thousand four hundred and sixty-one voluntary teachers; one hundred and sixty paid teachers in day schools; one hundred and thirty-six paid teachers in week-night schools; fifty-nine paid refuge and industrial masters and mistresses. And all these teachers, paid and voluntary, work together heart and soul.

The ragged have not only everything to learn, but much to unlearn. But the teachers have the faith that can remove mountains; and mountains there are to remove in the shape of vagrant habits, evil communications that corrupt good manners, and still more good thoughts; foul memories, lazy, inert temperaments, the result of hereditary corruption—bad air, wretched, insufficient food, exposure, and debasing influences of all kinds. But faith does remove these mountains for those who are not weary of well-doing.

"The principles inculcated are unsectarian, and wholly based upon the Bible."

The object of the Ragged School Union is to provide free education for destitute, neglected children in London and its suburbs. The education it designs to afford the objects of its care, who are numbered by tens of thousands, is secular, moral, and religious. While it seeks to educate the ignorant, it also endeavours to induce habits of industry, and to provide a refuge for the friendless and fallen, and such as might be a prey to the vigilant seducer.

Those who have given evidence of their desire to reform, it aids by granting a free passage to the colonies, and seeks to benefit not only the child, but the parents for time and eternity.

Connected with ragged schools, there are fifteen refuges, where five hundred inmates are fed, lodged, clothed, and educated.

Upwards of 500 boys and girls have emigrated to the colonies.

In March 1857, 402 boys and girls received prizes for having remained in their situations upwards of twelve months, with good characters.

Who can ponder on that simple statement so unostentatiously put forth, without experiencing the sensations of David—

"When Israel's crowned mourner felt
The dull cold stone within him melt."

And what dull cold stones must those hearts be that could allow beings with such capabilities of good as these 402 boys and girls have revealed, to perish in this world and the next.

We shudder to think of the reproach that attaches to those times when there were no ragged schools, and to those who are still indifferent or opposed to this great and holy union for propagating the Gospel and its civilising influences among our own heathens! our own savages!

How can those "who read their Bible and believe it true" say with their lips—"Woe unto you if one of these little ones perish!" and then, without an effort to save, calmly look upon them, talk of and even legislate for them, as the "Perishing Classes?"

"Ragged schools," says the report, "are like missionary stations in low neighbourhoods; having in many cases connected with them industrial classes, clothing clubs, penny banks, mothers' meetings, libraries, reading rooms, places of worship for the extremely poor, now diffusing light, health, and peace amidst a benighted, far too long neglected population."

We are not surprised to hear that the expenditure of these schools, open to all that are ragged, wretched, and destitute, has of late exceeded their income, and that by £4,600. To meet this surplus outlay, the committee of the Ragged School Union has been obliged to render special aid.

But for this, some of these schools and refuges must have been closed, the efficacy of others lessened, and the number of scholars considerably reduced.

We own we look with terror at the possibility of such a result. To close a ragged school is to shut the little ones out of the fold of the true Shepherd—to leave them to the wolves—to exclude them from the presence of him who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

This article is not written with any view of making an appeal to public charity on behalf of ragged schools; but if it should lead people to ponder on the vital importance of these institutions, the natural wish of all good Christian hearts will be to aid in the greatest of Christian works.

Many people would gladly give—either of their abundance or cast in their mite—for the good of the poor, but are deterred from the exercise of benevolence by the fear of imposition, and of encouraging idleness or vice, while they are themselves practising the greatest of virtues—charity. To such the ragged schools afford an opportunity of giving wisely, each according to his means.

Contributions are received by the secretary, Mr. Joseph G. Gent, 1, Exeter-hall, Strand, London.

Some of these schools are in great need of help. There is one held where formerly a thieves' public-house existed, in Pear-street and Duck-lane, Westminster (hon. secretary, Mr. Gustard, 40, Stanley-street, Pimlico). Its funds greatly require assistance. The neighbourhood is a very poor, low, and densely crowded one. This school is invaluable to all classes, and the teacher most zealous, clever, loving, and beloved. It is a small matter compared to that first established, and foremost in all respects, the Field-lane Ragged School; the Lamb and Flag, and others, may be as well conducted, and are more ably supported; but, considering its locality, and its proximity to the Courts of Law and the Houses of Lords and Commons, it is important, and a little help would make it very efficient. But there is not one school in the union that is not a blessing to society, and that does not deserve the support and the gratitude of all thinking people.

That interesting institution, the Shoe Black Brigade, is an offshoot of ragged schools. Those picturesque, willing boys, with their beaming faces,—red, blue, yellow, and royal purple jackets, who enliven the metropolis, are contributed in great numbers by ragged schools, boys being appointed as a reward for merit. In the year 1846 they earned £2,981, and cleaned 708,990 pairs of boots; and, doubtless, by this time the amount is greatly increased.

The great object of ragged schools is to fit their scholars to earn an honest livelihood, and to do their duty to God and man; and the practical result proves the wisdom of the system.

THE DANGER OF AN UNKNOWN TONGUE.—The love of fun is not unknown among the serious-looking Chinamen, who are thickly collected in some parts of the Australian colonies. A storekeeper wishing to advertise his articles in the Chinese language, engaged a celestial to paint him a sign, expecting, of course that it would be a very enticing one. It did not answer his expectations, however, for the only perceptible effect it had on the relations of the sun and moon was to excite a grin of the broadest dimensions. By a considerable bribe he obtained a translation in English of the advertisement, and found it to be as follows:—"Don't buy anything here—storekeeper a rogue."

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

J. C. EWART, ESQ., M.P. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

J. C. EWART, ESQ., M.P. FOR LIVERPOOL.

As the greatest emporium of British commerce next to London, Liverpool assumes a highly important position, and one which is rapidly on the increase, and has been fairly and honourably earned. Liverpool merchants are men of mark. They have helped to extend our commercial relations with every other part of the world; and to their intelligence and enterprise many of our mercantile advantages are solely attributable. Their warehouses are stored with the world's wealth. Their ships are riding on all waters. Their influence is felt at the furthest extremity of the globe; and, after London, Liverpool is better known than any other port in the trading countries of the earth.

But Liverpool is not so exclusively occupied with her commercial enterprise as to be insensible to the advantages of educational progress, nor sordid enough to disregard her higher obligations to the nation in the way of accomplishing something for her literature, science, and art. Several valuable institutions for the promotion of education and the advancement of knowledge owe their existence to the liberality of the merchants of Liverpool. The example of the celebrated Mr. Roscoe, projector of the Liverpool Royal Institution, has exercised a wonderful influence in creating and diffusing a taste for literature among the people. For schools and charitable societies Liverpool also holds a high place; and her townsmen have never forgotten the responsibility which rests upon them, in connection with that mixed multitude which trade and commerce have there collected.

And there are distinguished men of Liverpool whose name have cast a lustre on the history of our country. The name of Ewart is amongst this number. As Liverpool merchants the Ewart family acquired opulence and position. In their commercial dealings they set an excellent example of intelligence, diligence, and integrity. The scions of that house have figured before the public as public men; and in that capacity have laboured long and arduously for what they have considered to be the public benefit. To Mr. William Ewart, M.P. for Dumfries, we are indebted for many noble efforts to abolish capital punishment, and for the actual erasure from our statutes of capital punishment for offences less than murder. His name, also, is intimately associated with the agitation for free public libraries; and for this alone he is entitled to the warmest thanks of all who value the means of obtaining for the masses a sound and liberal acquaintance with general literature.

Mr. Joseph Christopher Ewart, whose portrait we have much pleasure in presenting to our readers, is the third son of the late William Ewart, and brother of the present M.P. for Dumfries. He was born in the year 1799, and was educated at Eton. His inclination led him to engage in trade and commerce, and, while his brother was reading for the bar, he was devoting his attention to the business of the firm, to quay and counting house. After some years of active employment, he retired from trade, and applied himself, more fully than he had hitherto done, to the business of public life. As a liberal, in favour of national education, and a "further extension of the suffrage suited to the advancing spirit of the age," he entered the political arena. Popular education and the extension of the suffrage are, in his opinion, indissolubly connected. He holds, we believe, in common with many other clear-headed, far-seeing men, that education must prepare the way for the suffrage, and must thus fit men both to appreciate its advantages, and rightly to exercise its privileges.

Mr. Ewart unsuccessfully contested Liverpool in 1852; he was returned in March, 1855. He is also Deputy-Lieutenant of the county.

As an enterprising capitalist Mr. Ewart is well known. When it had been successfully proved by Lieutenant Waghorn that the overland route to India was the shortest and the best, Mr. Ewart, with other merchants, readily embarked in the project; and, in 1836, established the Peninsular and Oriental Company. The first steamer on this line was started in 1838; and since that period its successes have been steadily increasing. The Peninsular and Oriental Company have built some of the finest vessels, and, with the exception of the Leviathan, the largest in the world.

Mr. Ewart has also been connected with the London and North-Western Railway, and still holds office as director, both on the board of that railway, and on that of the Peninsular and Oriental Company.

THE Spaniards have a truthful saying: "When it is past noon with a favourite, night comes on apace."

LANDSCAPE ON THE BANKS OF THE GARGILLESSE.

GARGILLESSE, IN CENTRAL FRANCE.

THANKS to a better tone of public feeling than formerly prevailed (we mean in the days when Bull and Frog were "natural enemies"), artists and poets are willing to acknowledge that France is in reality La Belle; and that it is not essential to cross the Alps in search of enchanting scenery and soft blue skies. France is not "all barren." On the contrary, it abounds in all that is best calculated to gratify the searcher after the picturesque, as well as the Dryasdust antiquarian. Its mountains and valleys, cities and villages, delicious oases in sterile deserts, are all exceedingly attractive; there is a charming variety about its landscapes which few countries can equal. Although it has been the fashion for tourists to complain of the dull uniformity of France, there have been certain districts which have disarmed prejudice and even captivated the captious. The swelling hills and cornfields of Normandy, its winding rivers, tempting orchards, and rich pastures; the hard, dull, frowning scenery of Brittany, its barren moors and storm-beaten coasts; the undulating country, hill, dale, lake, and streamlet of the Pyrenees, the mountains crowned with crystal, and the valleys clothed with sheen; the sun-burnt, dusty roads and bleached fields of Provence; the laughing gardens of Touraine; the luxuriant vegetation and umbrageous foliage of Dauphiny; all these are well known to English tourists, and by pen and pencil to English stay-at-homes.

But the best parts of France are still unexplored.

The central districts are almost entirely neglected. We drive by post within sight of some of the loveliest scenery in the whole country, and are careless of the beauties which thus lie in our path. The steam-horse dashes over fertile plains, and beautiful green valleys, and we remain all insensible to their charms; in our search after novelty we overlook those scenes which are most novel. Even the French know little and care little about the midland parts of their empire—Auvergne, Berry, and Dauphiny.

Bourges, the central city of French nationality, is now nothing but a dull town, with little trade, and less manufacture going on within its circuit. Yet, in the days of Charles VII., Bourges rivalled Paris in importance. There are still some interesting monuments there to be seen, but the place itself has sunk into a stagnant state, that nothing seems capable of moving—dull and flat as the plains by which it is surrounded.

But if man has forgotten to be progressive and industrious, nature has not forgotten to be bountiful and beautiful, and in the neighbourhood of Bourges there is some of the most delightful scenery to which France can lay claim. After leaving the railway at Argentin, a carriage drive, of about six miles on the banks of the Creuse, brings the tourist to that part of lower Berry from which the journey must be continued either on foot or on one of the sturdy donkeys of the province; the walk is decidedly the most agreeable, and the character of the scenery amply repays for the additional fatigue.

The country is like Switzerland in miniature; the hills and valleys, the rocky passes here and there, the winding river—all remind the traveller of the land of Tell and Höfer. At the bottom of a romantic gorge, wild and impetuous in the winter, but as calm as a lake in the summer, is a tributary of the Creuse. It is commonly known as the Gargillesse—a little torrent, singing its wild music amongst the rocks and ravines, which answer its song with their own long echoing melody.

Gargillesse is agreeably situated near the confluence of the stream, and for tranquil beauty is not to be surpassed. It is a nest hidden among verdure, protected from the cold winds by masses of rock, and watered by the silver stream. A few humble cottages cluster round the old castle, and the church, an ancient structure, has been recently repaired, and adds much to the picturesque aspect of the scene. The country round Gargillesse is extremely fertile, and furnishes some of the richest pasture land in the province. Dotted with herds of cattle and flocks of sheep, it encircles the village with a green zone.

That so attractive a spot should be so little known appears singular. The French themselves are only beginning to find out the beauties of the central parts of France, and of Gargillesse in particular. That tourists should overlook it is no matter of surprise, for tourists are invariably gregarious, and must travel in multitudes. However, we may hope that when Gargillesse is better known, it will be the more appreciated, and grow betimes into one of the most celebrated haunts, as it is one of the prettiest, of our pilgrim tourists.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,
SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER XLVI.

Not all the pomp and pride of state
Can make man truly good or great.

ANON.

THE first surprise over, at this unexpected freak of fortune, Ada repaired, as usual, to the Green Fields Ragged School, and taught her little class as patiently and as lovingly as if she had been still Miss Pemberton, and had not been raised to a height, that, at one time, would have made her giddy.

She heard from little Hope that her mammy (Apple Blossom) continued very poorly. Hope was the only one present of the Blossom family, except Nussy. Blue-eyed Ben was in the infant refuge.

"Mammy've got a bad pain here," said the little girl, laying her tiny, rosy-tipped fingers on her fair, fat, open chest, "and Merry's obliged to mind mammy's stall again to-day. Mammy turns sick, like, when she stands up. Larky's stayed to take care of mammy this morning, and I've to be with her this afternoon. Larky's a good, handy, willing lad, teacher," she said; "and I've told him not to let the fire out, mammy's so chilly, she's got the shivers; and he've promised to have water biling, and not to stay on his arrands. I think, teacher, we'll make somehut of Larky yet—don't you?"

"And where's Meggie Grimes?" asked Ada. "She's away without leave. Where is she? Do you know, Hope?"

"I do know, but I mustn't tell," said Hope, blushing all over celestial, rosy red, with one little finger on her coral lips.

"But I may," said precocious black-eyed Nussy, "and I will tell you, teacher."

"Don'tee, don'tee," whispered Hope; "Meg'll get anger."

"And sarve her right," said Nussy, showing a black-and-blue pinch on her arm; "that's her doing. I hope she'll get well served out by Stunning Steenie, and Prigging Peter, and the Fox, that I do—a spiteful cure!"

"Stunning Steenie," said Ada, "why, he's in prison, and so are the others."

"Yes, teacher, but this is the day they're let to see their friends; and Potato-heels, as you call Meggie, sold a sight of lucifers last night, and got two shillings, and she've spent it all in pudden, and trotters, and tripe, an' she's off to Coldbath-fields with this grand trate for them boys. But I thinks, as it's all a-owing to her they got nabbed, she'd better not go a-nigh. I'm sure if they can get at her they'll pitch into her; and 'tain't pudden, and tripe, and trotters as'll save her bacon; though I dare say, if they ain't perverted, they'll not be long eating all Meg's trate up. She'll catch it there, and she'll catch it here—for she never axed no leaf. Oh, she's a owdacious, mischievous cure!—that's what she is, teacher."

"It wor very kind of Meg, teacher," said little Hope, "to spend all her money in buying things for them bad boys; and, though she wor cruel hungry herself, she wouldn't touch a crumb of pudden (such a temptations pudden it wor, teacher,—such a many plumbs!) but she wouldn't trust herself to look at it; no, nor even to think of the trotters, or to have a bite of the tripe herself. She often do fret about Stunning Steenie, a-saying it wor all her peaching got him nabbed; but when I asks her if she'd rather have had Larky in for a fault he didn't do, than Stunning Steenie for what he done, she can't say she would; only she cries, and says Larky's no uge to she, though she likes him a sight best; but Stunning Steenie will go along with her—if she trates him—to the gaff and the penny dances, and Larky won't, on no account—not with roast taters and butter into the bargain, teacher!"

Ada was much amused by the simplicity of little Hope's account of Meg's views and feelings; and surprised that Ellen St. Ange (generally so regular and punctual) had not appeared at the ragged school that day. She resolved to hurry to her house, calling in on her way back to see how poor Apple Blossom was, for she did not like the symptoms little Hope had described.

Mr. Stephen, who had seen Apple Blossom late the evening before, and who took a very great interest in her—good, humble, model wife of a working man that she was—told her he felt sure that something serious ailed the usually buxom, rosy Apple Blossom.

"I cannot cross-examine her on the subject," he said; "but you might do so, perhaps, Miss Pemberton. It's my opinion Bob Blossom has given her an unlucky blow. I fear she's hurt, though she won't own it."

Ada grew pale at the thought, and, thanking Mr. Stephen for his advice, she, in company with another lady visitor, left the ragged school, told her footman, who waited for her at some little distance, where to order the carriage to meet her, and took her way to the blind alley where Apple Blossom lived.

The little room was very tidy, the hearth was swept, the grate blacked, the stone bath-bricked, the water was boiling, the humble dinner tea set out, and Larky was making a bit of toast, to try to tempt his mother to eat.

"Mother's so bad," said the affectionate boy, with tears in his fine black eyes, "so bad, teacher. She's as white as a curd, and turns sick and giddy, and seems so low. I had thought now I'm so big and strong, and, as Mr. Stephen says, fit to earn my own living, of trying to get work; but if I does, what'll poor mammy do? Hope has all the will, but she hasn't the strength, and Merry's so wild, there's no dependence to be placed on she no more nor on a eel, teacher. I'm making mother a cup o' tea and a bit o' butter toast; she've not broke her fast this blessed day."

"And where's your father?" asked Ada.

"Feather's out at work. He started at six, and I've cooked his meals, and took 'em to him, and he ain't a-coming home till late; he's a-going to work over hours at a bricklaying job."

"Is he quite well, Larky Grigg?" said Ada.

"No, teacher, that he ain't, and he's quite down in the mouth. But 'tain't no wonder considering, arter all, dad wor overtooked. Mother's lying in, there on the bed, teacher—she ain't asleep; she'll be right glad to see you, I know she will."

Upon this Ada went in. Apple Blossom was low, and looked pale and anxious, but would not own that there was anything serious the matter with her. She would not hear of having any advice from Ada's doctor, and said if she wanted doctor's stuff, she knew of a doctor who came from her own native place, that she'd rather go to than to the Queen's physician; but that she'd get well without any doctors. All she wanted was peace of mind, and to see Bob take the pledge; and then, poor soul, she cried bitterly.

Ada tried to comfort her, and just at this moment the children came home from the ragged school, and little Hope, stealing in on tiptoe, glided up to Apple Blossom, and laid her rosy cheek on the hard, pale face of her foster-mother, and Apple Blossom said—

"Here is one of my best earthly comforts, miss; she's an angel in our home, is this darling little Hope of our'n. See what a lad she've made of our Larky Grigg. It's all her doing—leastways, with the blessing of God and the ragged schools. But for Hope he might have turned out like Stunning Steenie, a bad, idle street boy, and then my heart would have been broke outright. Bless thee, Hope, dear, dear child."

Ada took a kind leave of Apple Blossom and her little golden-haired, blue-eyed, rose-lipped girl, and reaching her carriage, drove to Ellen's home in Grosvenor-square.

Ada heard that Miss St. Ange was in Jermyn-street, at Mrs. Golightly's, and thither she accordingly drove.

The secret of Ellen's non-appearance at the Green Fields Ragged School was at once explained.

Mrs. Golightly was in bed very ill.

"I hope there is no danger," said Ada, earnestly, seeing Ellen looking pale and anxious.

"Not now, I trust," said Ellen, bursting into tears, for she was warmly attached to her old friend and chaperone. "Since she has been bled, her senses have returned."

"What has been the matter?" asked Ada.

"It was an accident," replied Ellen; "but in consequence of the excited state of her brain, from dwelling on 'The Rights and Wrongs of Woman,' and the exertion and fatigue of writing night and day at this pamphlet, its effects have been more serious than they would otherwise have been."

"How did it happen?"

"Why, it seems yesterday afternoon, while writing a very exciting part of her pamphlet, it suddenly struck my poor friend that Sneer and Bluster, in — Lane, — Road, were enterprising publishers, of liberal sentiments, and that they would probably, if not purchase her MS., at least bring it out on half profits, or at worst on commission. She instantly ordered a cab, and without paying that attention to her dress which she would have done had she been less excited, and while her maid was gone into her room to get her bonnet, scarf, &c. &c. &c., she darted into the passage, opened the door herself, stepped into the cab, and ordered the man to drive her to the office of Sneer and Bluster, — Lane, — Road. Now, poor dear! she was so full of her pamphlet, and so engrossed by the subject, that it never struck her, that she was in no state to go out and present herself to a publisher, or indeed to any one."

"How was she dressed?" asked Ada, trying not to smile.

"I grieve to say she was in her writing costume," said Ellen.

"Not her short flannel gown with the high gigot sleeves, and her fur boots?"

"Yes."

"And the wet tablecloth round her head?"

"Alas, yes!"

"What a shame of the cabman to take her in that state."

"It seems he was half tipsy, and enjoyed the joke. Well, nothing happened till they got to Messrs. Sneer and Bluster's. She had been there before, and knew that Sneer's room was right through the office. As it was dusk, and rather late, no one seems to have seen her until, in answer to her sharp knock at the door, some one said, 'Come in.' And the next moment she found herself in a blaze of light from several gas-burners, and in the presence of Sneer and Bluster, who were squaring accounts and drinking brandy and water together."

"What did they say and do? Of course they thought her mad!"

"I dare say they did. It seems she went in with her MS., and, placing it before Sneer, she said—

"'This is my work! It is a pamphlet on the 'Rights and Wrongs of Woman; Rights that have yet to be Recognised, and Wrongs that shall yet be Redressed.' Are you man enough to publish it?"

"Sneer, it seems, imagining she was an escaped lunatic, thought it best and safest to humour her; giving a look to Bluster to suggest that he should step out and procure assistance. My poor friend, much pleased by the artful, terror-prompted courtesy of Sneer's manner, who actually agreed to pay her fifty pounds for the copyright of the first edition, sat down, and proceeded to read her favourite opening aloud, when, suddenly looking up, she saw in a large looking-glass that fronted her, Bluster, on tip-toe, letting in two men, who seemed to her armed with ropes and a strait waistcoat."

"That glance was enough."

"This room, which at one time had formed part of the office, had, as you may have seen in some large mercer's, a small flight of mahogany stairs, leading to a kind of little writing closet, with a table, a stool, a large ink horn, and several huge volumes of account books."

"My poor friend's idea was, that, dreading the result of her work in the emancipation of her sex, these men had determined to finesse until they could seize, gag, imprison, and perhaps murder her. But before Bluster, who, it seems, is an arrant coward, could touch her, she had darted up these stairs, having first, with wonderful presence of mind, thrust her MS. in her bosom."

"From this height, she exclaimed—

"'Cowards, artful cowards, the first who attempts to climb these stairs shall receive one of these books on his head and this ink in his face. I am, by my mother's side, a Macgregor. Do you remember how Helen Macgregor, wife of Rob Roy, defended the mountain pass? I am another Helen Macgregor. Ah! you may well turn pale and tremble, pitiful poltroons, base deceivers. It was, then, a trick—you only pretended to bargain, that you might destroy me; and while deceiving me into an idea that you meant to purchase and publish my 'Rights and Wrongs of Woman,' all you aimed at was burking them and silencing me."

"At this moment two of the clerks, urged by Sneer, made an effort to ascend the stairs with the intention of bringing my poor friend down by force. But she felt the advantage of her position, and being, as I said before, in a highly excited state and under a wrong impression altogether, she seized the large account books, and hurled them one at one clerk and one at another, aimed a third at Sneer, who was trying to get out of the room, and who fell to the ground, his spectacles smashed and his nose bleeding, and then seizing the ink-horn she threw it at the bald head of Bluster; it cut the smooth surface, that shone like the bowl of a silver soup ladle, and the ink streamed over his face and clothes."

"By this time the row and the cries of the wounded brought in the police. My poor friend's stock of missiles was exhausted, and a few resolute policemen succeeded in capturing her; but not till, to avoid them, she had attempted to spring from the height where she stood, and, in so doing, met with a fall which stunned her completely."

"The publishers refusing to give her in charge, she was brought home in a state of insensibility by the cabman, who, beginning to clamour for his fare, recognised her; a policeman bearing her company, and every one believing her to be a mad woman broken loose from her keeper. I was immediately sent for, and so was a doctor, who at first seemed to apprehend congestion of the brain. However, after bleeding her copiously, she opened her eyes, recognised me, asked for her MS., which luckily was safe, murmured something about artful cowards, base, sordid tricksters, miserable bullies, and rights and wrongs, and composed herself to sleep. The doctor, it seems, had administered a strong sedative, and he has assured me that all danger is averted, and that, in all probability, she will be almost herself to-morrow; while, perhaps, this accident, by compelling her to submit to leeching, bleeding, and other remedies, may have saved her from a brain fever."

Ada, finding Ellen resolved to watch by her poor friend till she woke, took her leave, and had only just had time to change her dress and descend to the drawing-room, when the door was thrown open, and Mr. Puff announced—

"Mr. Gerald St. Maur!"

CHAPTER XLVII.

Oh! there's nothing half so sweet in life
As love's young dream.—IRISH MELODIES.

Grace was in all her steps, heaven in her eyes;
In all her gestures dignity and love.—MILTON.

I love the upward path that leads to heaven.—ANON.

ADA rose to receive her early friend and playfellow with a flutter at the heart, and a blush of most pleasurable emotion.

She was herself a little surprised to find she cared so much about one of whom she had latterly thought so little; but there are often feelings, and strong feelings, too, lying in the depths of our hearts of which we are ourselves unconscious until something occurs to wake them from their long repose.

As for Gerald himself, his delight at so cordial and animated a greeting was quite unmistakable.

He held Ada's hand, and seeing the almost tearful welcome in her eyes, he pressed it to his lips.

"Come, none of your foreign gallantry here," said Ada, blushing more deeply still as she snatched her hand away.

"Why, I am going to kiss the Queen's fair hand to-morrow, Ada—Miss Pemberton, I mean; and surely—"

"Surely," said Ada, "as I am not a queen, I have no right to the homage due to one."

"You are the queen of beauty," said Gerald.

Ada laughed.

"Oh, Mr. St. Maur," she said, "have you not learnt the art of flattery better than to use a trite old commonplace, fit only for a valentine?"

"I never was a flatterer," said Gerald. "I only said what I thought. You were always in my eyes 'beautiful exceedingly'; but either I had forgotten how beautiful, or you have gained many charms I never saw in you before."

And it was true. Early hours, an approving conscience, a deep, strong, wholesome interest in life—in short, "something to do," had restored the peach-like bloom of Ada's cheek, the roundness of her fine form, the sunny light of her soft, brilliant eyes, the clearness of her complexion, and the ruby of her lip; but, more than this, it had completely removed the dreary expression of discontent and ennui, and chased from her fine brow the lines that vexation of spirit had begun to trace.

Her dress was no longer the costly, overwhelming dress of a vain woman, with money at her command to gratify every whim of her own, and every interested dream of her modish milliner's. It was the sort of dress evidently adopted by a Christian lady in earnest about higher matters than those that pertain to beauty and display.

And yet Gerald thought nothing could have been devised by a Parisian coquette to set off that great beauty of form and face which Ada certainly possessed, to such advantage.

Her long and abundant hair, with its golden ripples glittering in the morning sun, was not as he had often seen it before, elaborately plaited and expanded by Pertinette, and its beauty hidden by ribbons and laces, but was simply braided round her oval face; one long thick tress of what the initiated call the "back hair" was plaited and brought like a coronet round the small Grecian head, while a rich coil of similar plaits formed a scroll behind and fell in loops on the shoulders.

A simple lilac batiste, very ample, and embroidered richly with white, fitted her fine form, while all her adornment consisted in a collar and sleeves of fine lace, a gold chain round her long white throat, merely to secure the watch hidden in her bosom, and which was now become no idle ornament or fine lady appendage, but a faithful monitor, marking those hours, every one of which had its appointed duty. A miniature, richly set, of her brother formed her brooch, and those of her father and mother clasped two thick cables of gold round her wrists. She had a little black silk apron with pockets full of ragged school reports, lists of the wants of children in her own little class, practical directions from Ellen St. Ange and Jem Goodman, a note-book, a pencil, her charity purse, and several prospectuses connected with different temperance and ragged school meetings.

What a contrast to the contents of the pockets of her fine flounced silks, before that memorable evening of her first visit to the Green Fields Ragged School.

When Gerald St. Maur was announced, she was working, not at any fine, useless, ornamental work, but at a little lilac gingham frock for her favourite, Hope Evermore.

Gerald felt that a great change had come over Ada—a great change for the better—but he could not tell what it was. It pervaded not merely her person but her manners, her expression, her voice. She was as cheerful as ever, but there was nothing sarcastic or bitter in her mirth.

She was kinder—at least, there seemed more earnestness in her kindness.

She no longer resented, as she had formerly done, his neglect in not coming down at once to Pemberton.

At that time Ada only felt for herself; now others occupied all her thoughts.

She was a truly Christian woman now, and what more amiable character can there be?

"And are you as gay as ever?" asked Gerald. "Fandango, ball, and rout; opera, park, play; still living in a world of gaiety—turning night into day? You have a wonderful constitution to live such a life, and look more blooming than ever."

"But I do not live that frivolous and profitless life now," said Ada. "I go very little into society."

"What do you do, then, to fill up your time?"

"My father's health is, alas! become so bad that he needs a great deal of attendance, added to which I am, for the time being, his steward, and manage all his affairs."

"And that cruel rogue Skinflint?"

"Is dismissed."

"Bravo! I knew you had a head fit for a chancellor of the exchequer. But your evenings?"

"They are not the long evenings or restless nights of the fine lady. I rise at six, and therefore I am glad to retire as soon as I have read to my father, and done all I can for him."

"But still, accounts and nursing cannot fill up the long day, that begins at six a.m. and ends at ten or eleven p.m. Ah! you have some new interest in life, and you will not own it to your oldest, truest, warmest friend."

Gerald St. Maur felt jealous.

"You are right, Gerald, I have a new interest in life, an inspiring, an engrossing interest. It fills my heart, my mind, my soul. It has renewed my spirit, driven away ennui, dejection, discontent. It makes me independent of the vain world. For the first time I seem to live."

"Stop, Ada!" said Gerald, very pale. "You do not know the pain you are causing me. You have formed some new intimacy?"

"I have."

"What is the name of the man who has wrought this mighty change?"

"Two men are concerned in it!" said Ada, smiling.

"Two!"

"Yes, two, Gerald."

"And their names are?"

"Jem Goodman and Mr. Stephen."

Gerald looked at her as if he thought she was becoming insane.

"What are they? Who are they? I never heard of them before. I never met them," he said, bitterly.

"So much the worse for you," she replied. "All I am, I owe to them; this change in my life and heart is all their doing."

"For pity's sake, Ada, do not mystify me thus; tell me, at once, what and who they are—Jem Goodman and Mr. Stephen—what can they be?"

"Jem Goodman is a sweep—a master sweep, though."

"A master sweep!" exclaimed Gerald, really uneasy about the state of her mind. "What can it matter whether he is a master sweep or not, if he is a sweep at all; what can he be to you, except in his vocation of a sweep?"

"You shall hear that, presently," said Ada, very quietly.

"And Mr. Stephen?"

"He is the honorary master of a ragged school—Jem Goodman is a voluntary teacher in that school. Mr. Stephen is a man of great intellect, large sympathies, and noble heart, who devotes his life to the service of his Great Master, and the poorest of his fellow-creatures—the ragged—those of whom you have heard as 'City Arabs,' 'English Kaffirs,' 'human vermin,' 'the dangerous,' the 'perishing classes.' Through him, and those like him, they are rescued on earth, and fitted for heaven; and Jem Goodman unites to his devotion to ragged schools, that to the temperance movement, on which he believes, as I do, too, that the welfare of the poor depends. Now, do you begin to understand, O Gerald, that it is no love for man as an individual that has wrought this change in me, but love for my Saviour, and the creatures for whom he died?"

"I am very glad, at any rate," said Gerald, "that it is no earthly lover that so engrosses your time and thoughts, Ada. The feelings you describe do not necessarily exclude all interest and affection for some one of your own rank of life, deserving (if any one could be deserving) of the rose of the world, and the dearest, loveliest, and best of her sex!"

"They exclude, Gerald," said Ada, firmly, and almost solemnly, "all interest of the kind you glance at, in any man who could not enter warmly into my views—who would not be a co-worker with me in the great cause of temperance and ragged schools. I cannot stoop from the heights I have reached to return to the petty interests, pleasures, and occupations of vanity and ambition. My heart is in my work, and I could only give my affection to one who loved that work as much as I do."

"You were ever an enthusiast, Ada," said Gerald, eager to turn the conversation. For, though he felt every moment more and more interested in, and captivated by, the glowing, animated, and lovely girl before him, he was not at all prepared to bind himself to be a co-worker with her in causes at which he, in common with other thoughtless, uninvestigating idlers, had always sneered—temperance and ragged schools! No, no! Ada must give up her exclusive devotion to them, or she must give up Gerald St. Maur!

He little dreamed how much dearer to her was the great work she had in hand, than even his aristocratic, handsome self.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

The million flit as gay,

As if created only like the fly,
That spreads his motley wings in the eye of noon—
To sport their season, and be seen no more.—COWPER.

A SHORT silence ensued, and then Ada said—

"And now, in my turn, let me ask you a few questions. What are you doing? what are you going to do?"

"Oh, nothing particular. I shall hang about town till the season is over. I have my clubs, and London parties will be a novelty to me now. I shall do my best to get you to let me ride in the park with you every day, and dance with you, or attend you to the opera, every night. I mean thoroughly to enjoy myself, which I cannot do without your sweet company, Ada."

"Then there is but one way of obtaining my sweet company, Gerald. You must rise to my level—I cannot sink to yours."

"Bend to the level of a sweep—I beg pardon, a master sweep!" said Gerald.

"Ah, you never could rise to his level, as you will own if you ever know that great and good man. Oh, Gerald! that a being of your capabilities, talents, energies, position, and prospects should be nothing but a lounge in club windows, and a very bad dancer at London balls!"

"Why, what would you have me to do, Ada?"

"Do! why, could you not easily get into parliament?"

"Oh, yes; I could easily get returned for one of Arncliffe's boroughs; but what good would it do me, Ada?"

"Gerald, the question is, not what good it would do you, but, what good it would enable you to do to others. The number on your banner should not be No. 1, but No. 1,000,000. If you were in parliament, with the eloquence which I know you have, and the heart I hope you have, you might bring in and carry out measures that would make you a blessing to your poor and suffering brethren. And now I must go to my father. I have an important matter to communicate, and fear the effect of any surprise in his weak state."

*Ada then rapidly told Gerald of the great change in their rank and fortunes, which had so unexpectedly taken place.

"How calmly you talk of what would drive most young ladies of fashion wild with joy," he said. "I am not a lady of fashion," she replied. "I am rejoiced if increased wealth and higher rank enable me to do more in the great causes I have so much at heart; but at present I dread the effect on both my parents: my father is so ill, and my mother is at Brighton, also an invalid. I can break it to my father, but I dread the effect on my mother, either of a letter, or of hearing it suddenly from a stranger, or reading it in the paper. You do not know how much poor mamma has coveted a coronet."

"Let me go down to Brighton, Ada, and break it to her," said Gerald. "I was always a favourite with Lady Pemberton, and I will do it as gently as if she were my own mother. Do not refuse me the delight of being of some little use to you, Ada. Sit down and write a line for me to take to your mother, and trust the rest to me. I shall set off at once, and it will be a charity to employ me, for I have nothing to do."

Ada was glad to be relieved of so great a responsibility connected with such a sudden and wondrous accession of importance, rank, wealth, and station to a mother who so greatly overvalued these pomps and vanities, and who had impaired a fine constitution by late hours, enervating habits, a selfish, fretful temper, an aimless life, and a succession of fashionable physicians for imaginary diseases.

It was a great comfort to Ada, that news which, suddenly imparted, might almost cause a fit (for joy, like grief, has killed weak people before now) should be unfolded by one so full of tact and tenderness, and whom her mother so liked and respected.

To Gerald it was delightful to do anything for Ada—to be employed by her, associated with her mother, mixed up in her affairs.

The note was soon written, and then they shook hands and parted; Gerald St. Maur saying to himself, "She is ten times lovelier than ever, and, as she has formed no other attachment, I shall formally propose; and I think, as I feel pretty sure she loved me once, and does so still, the old love will drive these new crochets out of her head. If I'd proposed two years ago they'd never have taken hold of her fancy. I'll talk to Lady Pemberton about it."

Ada, as she remained a few minutes musing alone before she went to her father, said to herself, "Travel has improved his manners, and there is certainly something manly and endearing about him. He seems to be more in earnest than of yore. There is an unmistakable affection in his eyes and manner. I think he will propose. More than once he was on the point of doing so. Ah! what ecstasy would that conviction have caused me once: now it is mixed with pain—for if he does I shall refuse him, and that is a result I would fain avoid, as equally torturing to both of us. But could I swear to love, honour, and obey a man who takes no interest in the great objects of my life, who is even now disposed to ridicule and disparage those great causes to which I have devoted myself, and who, if once invested with the power, would probably interdict my teaching in ragged schools, and associating myself with the temperance movement? No, no. If I ever do give myself a master, it shall be one whose heart is in my work, and whose hand shall help and support me on my upward way, not drag me back into the wastes of vanity and Slough of Despond!"

(To be continued.)

HOME TREASURES.

You bid me leave the land I love,
The land that gave me birth,
To search for hidden treasures, which Lie buried in the earth.
You bid me leave the friends of youth,
In other climes to roam,
But to return and find at last
Those treasures safe at home.

You say that in that favoured land
Are mines of wealth untold;
That they who wander gather fast
A store of precious gold.
But what are riches, I would ask,
When broken down in health?
Useless and vain in sorrow's hour
Is all earth's boasted wealth.

Then ask me not to leave the land,
The land which gave me birth,
To search for treasures which lie hid
Within the caves of earth.
No, no, these treasures I can find,
And have not far to roam;
I'll find them midst the happiness
Of my beloved home.

The Matron.

NO. XXV.

In this chapter I am tempted to speak of a preparation of oats, that furnishes nice cooling food in hot weather. It is called Budram. A great deal of it is eaten by working men in the principality of Wales. Some of my readers might like to try it, just for a change. Put in an earthen pan two gallons of oats to four gallons of cold water—stir them well together—cover the pan with a coarse cloth, and let it stand in a warm place—the chimney-corner for instance—mind you stir it occasionally. It becomes slightly acid in four or five days, and then you should use it. You must strain off all the liquor, and boil it quickly in a large saucepan. Stir it well, in order to keep it smooth. Pour it into basins that have been dipped in cold water. If put in a cool place, it becomes a stiff jelly, that should be eaten with cold milk, and you can add salt or sugar according to your taste. There is one drawback to the advantage of making Budram in this manner, you make no use of the meal in soak, so it is not exactly cheap food; but if you find that your husband and children like the jelly, and that it agrees with them, you might prepare it in a more frugal manner, but then the jelly would not be quite clear. However, they may not mind that. Put a gallon of coarsely ground oatmeal in two gallons of water. Let it stand twenty-four hours, but stir it now and then. When you wish to cook it, pour the whole into a saucepan. Stir it thoroughly, or it will burn or become lumpy. It should boil half an hour, and then be poured into basins. In a little while it becomes a jelly, and as it is a very common food among the labouring men in Wales, I do not doubt they find it very nourishing. But something of a savoury dinner is more to the English taste, and I also think that a savoury dinner is best suited to persons in health. For the morning and evening meal, oatmeal porridge, made in the manner recommended in the last chapter, is not only very nice if flavoured with sugar or salt (according to taste), but excessively nourishing.

But I beg my readers not to suppose that I undervalue the advantages of tea, coffee, and cocoa. As wholesome drinks they have beneficial effects, of which the general consumers are little aware; and I intend giving directions for preparing them in the most inexpensive manner. At present my purpose is to offer a few suggestions, by following which a clever person may prepare a better dinner for a certain number of pence, than a thoughtless spendthrift would provide for an equal number of shillings; and in the remarks about to follow, let it be observed that I shall give receipts for things that, when cooked, people of all classes would consider nice—in fact, for things I should be happy to partake of myself.

Custom often commits great blunders, and directs us to slight what may be quite as good as what it directs us to purchase. This is particularly the case with the different parts of animals killed for food. True, some improvement is taking place, and now rich people have too much sense to suppose that ox-cheeks and ox-tails have not some good in them to make excellent soup; and Soyer has shown that the meat from the ox-cheek may be made quite a delicacy. A bullock's liver, which may be had at a very low rate, is also nice. By doing it thoroughly, without suffering it to boil, an excellent dish may be made of it; and by the following manner of cooking it will render it most palatable:—Take a piece of bullock's liver, weighing three pounds. Do not cut it, but put it in a fryingpan with two rashers of bacon, or a little dripping or lard. Brown it all round. Take out the liver and bacon, and rinse the pan with about a quart of water. Do not throw this water away, but put it in a saucepan, with a quarter of a pound of rice, four or five onions, some carrots, turnips, or any vegetable you happen to have at hand.

When you have boiled the vegetables till they are tender and the liquor is nicely thickened with the rice, put in the bacon and liver. Cover the saucepan and place it beside the fire to keep as hot as possible without boiling. Let it stand in this position about twenty minutes, then turn the liver so that it may be done on both sides. In another twenty minutes serve it up; and as it furnishes a dish of good meat and vegetables, you will not find it necessary to eat bread with it. A moderate sized family could dine sufficiently for two days on this nourishing food. Of course on the second day you will warm it up. It will be quite as good as on the first day, and it will be to you a greater economy of time to dress enough for two days while you are about it.

Kidneys in a potato-pie would make a very nice dinner for the third day. This dish should be thus prepared:—Have of beef or mutton kidneys about a pound and a half. Cut the kidneys in slices of half an inch thick, and with a little dripping, salt, and pepper, brown them in a fryingpan. They must not be done thoroughly, because they will have more cooking in the potato-pie. Take four pounds of potatoes boiled until they are soft enough to be mashed. You should mash them with half a pint of milk and three ounces of dripping, then having greased the dish, put in half of your mashed potatoes and lay on them the sliced kidneys (already browned), with about a tea-cupful of finely chopped up onions and a little parsley and thyme. Then lay the remainder of the mashed potatoes at top; and having pressed down the whole, bake this excellent pie for one hour. If your family is small there will be enough of it left to warm up for the next day.

I have in reserve plenty more receipts for cheap, palatable dinners; but fear lest some of my remarks in the last chapter should have been misunderstood induces me to revert to them. I allude to what I said about employing young children. Let no mother suppose that I recommend children's giving their school-time to collecting any thing of any kind, either for sale or use. The poorest child in these dominions has a soul as precious as that of the heir-apparent. As soon as reason dawns, it is the duty both of father and mother to see to the religious and moral training of the children; and parents should even make sacrifices to have their young ones trained in a knowledge of their duty to their Maker and their fellow-creatures. But school-time, at the utmost, does not take up half the day, and on Wednesdays and Saturdays only a quarter of it. It is the spare time that children have on their hands, after school is over, that I wish parents to teach them to turn to account for their own profit and that of their father and mother; and I know from experience that children are happier in little occupations in which they feel they are being useful, than in throwing away four or five hours in play. Still, mere diversion has great advantages when taken in moderation. The true lover of the working classes is always happy to behold children enjoying themselves in due season; and even the aged look on with pleasure—

"When all the village train, from labour free, Lead up their sports beneath the spreading tree."

PICTURES FROM HISTORY.

THE VASE OF SOISSONS.

At the beginning of the fifth century, when Attila, the "scourge of God," and his Tartar followers were devastating southern Europe, and the northern nations were founding rude but powerful kingdoms,—the Visigoths, in Spain; the Ostrogoths, in Italy; and the Burgundians, in central and southern Germany,—there arose, in the fertile plains of Gaul, a remarkable race of savage warriors.

They called themselves Franks, or free men. They prided themselves on their liberty, which they guarded with zealous care. Though mutual interest linked them together in a large band, each man ruled supreme in his own family, executing justice, rewarding and punishing at his own pleasure, unchecked by law, and unrestrained by fear of any higher authority. Chiefs there were indeed among these savage warriors,—men who were looked up to by the nation for their superior sagacity, experience, or valour. But it was only in affairs concerning the whole people that these chiefs could exercise anything like supremacy or rule. More savage than the redoubtable Northmen, who were afterwards the terror of Europe, more lawless than the wild Huns, who were looked upon as the scourge and curse of every country whose evil destiny brought them, like a swarm of locusts, into its coasts, the Franks still possessed within themselves the elements of greatness and power—namely, strength, endurance, and intellectual power. Like the wild horse of the prairies, they could be made useful and even valuable; but they required a hand that should tame them—a will stronger than theirs to which they should be brought to bend their stubborn necks in obedience. Such a power arose in the year 481 in the person of the great chief Clovis, who may be regarded as the founder of the French empire.

Until the time of Clovis, the leaders among the Franks had been merely military chiefs, chosen at the commencement of a war, and invested with authority only so long as the war should last. The warriors were bound by a rude sentiment of honour to follow wherever the king should lead them, to rally round him in time of danger, and to sacrifice their lives, if need were, for the safety of their nation and the freedom of the Frankish name. But when the strife ceased, the power of the king expired also. The booty was divided into shares, and the king received his part like any other warrior. He was paid by a larger share of the spoils for the greater responsibility he had undertaken, but this was all. He had no right to dispose of a single chest of treasure, or to decide on the life or death of a single prisoner of war. The jealous Franks were far too proud of their freedom to allow any man to rule them as Theodoric ruled the Visigoths, or Attila the Huns; and thus, while the other nations were settling down into comparative civilisation, building cities, and practising rude husbandry with primitive implements, the Franks were still a savage race of marauders, living by plunder and robbery.

THE VASE OF SOISSONS.

Under Clovis the aspect of the nation changed entirely. This remarkable man contrived to obtain a complete ascendancy over the Franks; to be a king not only in name but in deed, to preserve during the days of peace the authority his predecessors had only enjoyed in time of war. When he first commenced his conquests in 481, the Franks were a wandering tribe, plundering the towns and villages of the more peaceful inhabitants of Gaul. At his death, in 511, he left among his sons an empire larger in extent than the present France, containing a Christian population—rude indeed, and warlike, but no longer dwellers in tents and vagabonds on the face of the earth. The means by which he obtained his ascendancy, and the difficulties he had to encounter, are vividly illustrated in one of the earliest anecdotes recorded in French history—the story of the Vase of Soissons.

The particulars are as follows:—There happened to be among the treasures in the cathedral at Rheims a vase of silver wrought with great skill, and highly valued alike for its intrinsic worth and as a specimen of the craft of the silversmith. One day, some Frankish warriors, pursuing a fugitive enemy through the streets, broke open the gates of the cathedral, penetrated to the very altar, and carried off the vase. The clergy were grieved at the loss, and the bishop of Rheims came in person to Clovis, to beg for its restitution. Clovis, who afterwards embraced Christianity himself, was always well disposed towards the church. He replied that the vase had no doubt been placed among the booty taken during the war, and promised to ask that it should be given up, when the lots were apportioned. So the bishop and his attendants departed, somewhat comforted by this reply.

Not long afterwards, the day came for apportioning the spoils. The Frankish warriors were drawn up in a circle on a plain near Soissons. In the centre of the group lay heaped a glittering pile, the spoils of the recent war. There were mingled in motley confusion rich suits of armour, not unfrequently stained with the life-blood of the last wearers. There were jewels, and gold, and silver, carpets, head-pieces, and even household furniture, and horses' saddles and bridles—everything that could tempt the rapacity of those undisciplined hordes was there heaped together; and a little apart had been placed, by the direction of Clovis, the silver vase, whose loss was so deeply deplored by the clergy and inhabitants of the good city of Rheims.

"My friends," said the king, "before we apportion the spoils, I would crave at your hands yonder vase of silver. It was taken from the cathedral of Rheims, and I have even promised the bishop it shall be restored to him."

One of the chiefs advanced from the circle and spoke in the name of the rest.

"How shall we refuse the prayer of our valiant leader?" he cried. "Take the vase, O king, and do therewith as seemeth good to thee."

The other chiefs waved their weapons, and raised a shout of joyful acquiescence.

"Do you all consent?" demanded the king.

"All!" shouted a thousand voices. But then there came forward from among the ranks a grim-visaged savage, clad in the skin of a bear, and brandishing a mighty axe.

"Are we Franks," he yelled, "or are we slaves, that we must yield up the spoil of our swords and spears at a king's behest? Thou shalt have nothing," he continued, turning upon Clovis, "but thy share, as apportioned to thee by fate. If the priest must needs have his bauble, let him take it, with the mark of the Frank thereon." And, raising his axe, he discharged a mighty blow upon the vase, crushing its beautiful proportions into shapeless deformity.

The eye of the Frankish king gleamed darkly, but he spoke never a word. Turning to the circle of warriors around him, he thanked them calmly for granting his request; and then he gave the mutilated vase into the hands of the affrighted priest, who stood ready to bear away the precious relic. Then the business of apportioning the spoil commenced; and not by word or gesture did the king reveal the deep anger that was tearing his heart, as the fabled vulture is described tearing the vitals of Prometheus.

Months rolled on, and the remembrance of the incident had vanished from the minds of most of the Frankish warriors, who deemed that by the king it was forgotten also. Then came the great assembly of the Field of March, when all the power of the Frankish nation was mustered as at a great review, and when the king was accustomed to pass before the ranks, observing the arms and equipment of each, and rejoicing in the sturdy strength and martial bearing of the warriors.

Clovis strode silently along the line, closely inspecting the men, as was his wont. Not a word of commendation had passed his lips, and nearly the whole long line had been reviewed. At last he stopped abruptly before a gigantic Frank, who bore a ponderous axe, and was clothed in the skin of a bear.

"Thy weapon is sullied, Frank," he said; "how darest thou show thyself to thy king with thine axe thus dim and rusty?" And, seizing the offending weapon from the warrior's hand, he cast it indignantly on the earth.

The Frank stooped to pick it up; but in that instant the sword of the monarch whistled above his head, and he fell a corpse upon the green turf.

"Thus hath he smitten the vase at Soissons," said Clovis, looking sternly round on the startled faces of the warriors. And he sheathed his sword without another word.

The grim warriors made no murmuring. "He hath insulted our king before us all," they said; "and our king hath avenged himself openly. It is well done."

Such were the Franks, and thus did Clovis establish his power among them.

OLD LETTERS.

CAME they from sinner or from saint,
Cast them in, for the fire is faint;
The fire is faint, and the frost is strong,
And these old letters have lived too long.

How welcome once it matters not:
Their worth away with time has sped,
The love is over, the hope is dead,
And the old friend has forgot.

Cast them in! they're hard to keep,
And will not let one's memory sleep,
For hints of age, and tales of change:
Oh, but the turns of life are strange!

The world whereof they speak is gone—
How bright they came, and how dim they part,
These passing ages of the heart,
While life and we wear on.

Cast them in! why should they last,
When the light we read them by is past,
And never again will glid our days?
Up like a banner goes the blaze:

It is waste paper, and nothing more,
Some have been treasured up for years,
Some are blotted with heavy tears,
And some our dreams read o'er.

These are sprinkled with many a vow—
The love was never as warm as now.
Those by a trusty hand were penned:
Woe is me for that friendship's end.

There goes a page of boyish rhyme!
That was a sheet of good advice;
We took our own way on the ice,
And learned the worth of it all in time.

One glossy curl of wavy gold
Was hid in this burning letter's fold:
'Tis long since that golden head grew gray,
And the grave where it rests is far away!
Up in its might the broad flame flashes,
And there they lie, in what all our aims,
Seekings, and strivings, hopes and schemes,
Must come to—dust and ashes!

THE FATE OF A QUEEN;

OR, THE BEAUTIFUL LOUISA D'ORLEANS.

It was an apartment in the palace of Charles II., king of Spain. The magnificence of the seventeenth century was visible throughout all its arrangements, and the gorgeous taste, distinguishing the Spanish ladies of that period, was conspicuous in almost a ludicrous degree, in the person occupying the apartment. Arrayed in costly robes, such as a queen might wear on presentation days, sat a woman, old, wrinkled, and savage-looking, her lips contracted into a pinched, malicious expression, her little black eyes sparkling with hate, and her long, thin, bony fingers eagerly held out to receive something from the hands of one of the royal household.

"Indeed, indeed, my lady duchess," pleaded the man, who stood at the door of the room, as if loth to come further, "I cannot leave them here without orders from the queen. You know what a special charge she gave me on the very morning she left the palace, and it is as much as my place is worth to have them out of my sight at all."

"Bring them here, fellow!" said the lady, enraged to find her authority questioned. "Bring them here, and I will let you find that I have something to order. Nay," she continued, springing across the room as nimbly as her age permitted, closing the door and locking it, "you shall obey me. Take the creatures out of the basket, instantly."

The man reluctantly opened the basket, carefully releasing from it two beautiful parrots of a very rare plumage. They perched on his hand and shoulder, apparently delighted at their escape from the basket, and began chattering in French. Reaching out her hands, the old woman caught them, and, in a moment, she had wrung the necks of both with her lank, skinny fingers, and thrust them hastily back. A spot of blood fell to the floor; for so violently had she twisted the delicate throat of the smallest, that the skin was wholly ruptured.

She started, and grew pale for an instant, as she saw it staining the pure white of the finely-plastered floor, pure and smooth as marble; but recovering herself, she turned to the man and told him to take them away. He stood clasping his hands together, and exclaiming, in a confused jumble of French and Spanish, over the poor dead birds.

Unlocking the door, she applied her satin slipper to the basket, and would probably have done the same to the man, had he not hastened out of the room to remove the birds to a place where they could be immediately stuffed and mounted, so as to resemble life as much as possible before the queen should return.

This idea getting possession of his head, he went away, forbearing to give utterance to the bitter oaths which had nearly escaped his lips. Closing the door, the panting old woman threw herself down upon a pile of cushions covered with gold brocade, sprinkling her hands as she lay with some odorous perfume from a richly-cut bottle.

"No more French chattering from them. I would I could rid the palace of her as easily. I would like to do it myself, if it were only that I should hear no more of the queen's sweet temper and amiability. Fugh! I hate her."

It did not keep her awake, however, for in a short time she slept as soundly as if she had taken a draught from Lethe, instead of the richly-spiced cordial which accompanied her noon meal, and of which no head but one as strong as that of the Duchess of Terranueva could have withstood the effects. For the lady who had just executed this piece of spiteful malice was none other than the first lady of honour (Camarrera Mayor) to Louisa d'Orleans, the Queen of Spain and consort of Charles II. Descended by her father from the royal house of Arragon, and by her mother from Fernando Cortez, who left her mines of gold and a principality, the duchess was haughty, proud, and arrogant even more than her Spanish blood entitled her to be. Unscrupulous she certainly was in regard to the means of destroying anything that offended her—as in the case of her cousin, Don Carlos of Arragon, whom she actually hired bravos to despatch, because he aspired to Terranueva, which she inherited in her own right. From her husband she held the title also of Duchess of Monteleone.

Previous to her being called to the queen's hotsehold, she had resided in magnificence with her daughter-in-law, the second duchess of Monteleone; but wherever she was, she claimed rule as a right which her rank and talents gave her.

When Charles—himself a mere boy, bashful, inexperienced, and ignorant—brought to his throne the young and lovely Louisa d'Orleans, and summoned the duchess to his household as lady of honour to the queen, a fierce hatred seemed to possess the soul of one who could not bear to witness youth and beauty in another, now that her own was gone for ever. Confident of her superiority to the "married babies," as she contemptuously termed them, she claimed and exerted a sway, which, at any other court, would have utterly ruined her. But Charles was careless and inconsiderate, and the queen was all sweetness; and so both tacitly acknowledged her influence.

Louisa d'Orleans, daughter of the Duke of Orleans, brother to the French king by Henrietta of England, was about eighteen years of age when proposals were made to her from the youthful king of Spain. She shrank with horror from the formality and gloom of the Spanish court, so different as she apprehended from the light and joyous character of that of her uncle, the French king.

And, indeed, had Charles welcomed her to a fairy bower, with sunshine smiling down upon it all the year through, it would not have tempted her; for, alas, the noble maiden's heart was no longer hers to bestow. Long since, even from her childhood, it had clung tenderly to that of her cousin, the Dauphin of France.

When, therefore, her kingly uncle accepted the offer of Charles for Louisa, and she remonstrated against it, Louis told her that he could have asked no better for his own daughter. "Ah, sire," she replied, "but you could, if you pleased, have done so much better for your niece!"

But the laws of courts over hearts are despotic, and the fair and noble Louisa, stifling the emotions she dared not betray, hid her bleeding heart under the bridal flowers, and became the queen of Spain.

From the moment of the bridal she had hidden from every eye the sight of her sufferings; and so sweetly and amiably had she performed every duty of her blameless and innocent life, in a court where pride, craftiness, and intrigue abounded, that Charles, ignorant, bashful, and a woman-hater generally, gave her the admiration and consideration which she truly deserved.

To the last of her brief existence, he greeted her as when he met her on the bridge leading to the Isle of Pheasants, and received her from the hand of the Marquis of Astorga, exclaiming, "My queen! my queen!" Not all the dreary discomforts of that tedious and stormy travel by which she arrived at Madrid, could disturb the sweetness and equanimity of that temper which won every heart, save that of the vindictive Duchess of Terranueva; nor, although mortified by the ignorance of the king, who did not even know the names of several important towns in his own dominion, did she ever show, by a single look or expression, that she was not perfectly satisfied with his wisdom and attainments. Still, had she truly loved him, his indifferent manner at times would have caused her the most excruciating grief; as, for instance, when she wished to repeat a summer excursion which had once given her great pleasure, she was coolly refused on the plea of expense; yet, almost immediately afterwards, he set off for the Escorial, attended by two or three of his courtiers.

Still amiable, Louisa sent thither an affectionate letter, accompanied by the gift of a splendid diamond ring. In return, the king sent her a casket of gold filigree, containing some beads of precious wood, set with diamonds. A little note was therein, which she eagerly opened. It contained these words—

"Madam, there is a great storm of wind here. I have killed six wolves."

Probably this was the only letter which he ever wrote her.

Whatever was developed in Charles of a high or manly nature, was indisputably owing to Louisa. For his sake, she learned, privately, the Spanish dances; and received for this accomplishment his delighted exclamation of "My rena!"

The sway of the Duchess of Terranueva now became insupportable. Not a day passed that did not witness some demonstration of her intolerable pride and haughtiness of demeanour, not only to the whole court, which she kept in incessant broils, but towards the king and queen.

These repeated instances called forth the fiery temper of the king, whose wide mouth, and thick Austrian lips, sometimes gave the lie to his fair hair, delicate complexion, and the remarkable sweetness of his eyes—showing that he could, on provocation, become terrible. He swore big oaths that she should be displaced, and was already on the watch for a suitable person to fill her situation. The Duchess d'Albuquerque, the Duchess d'Infantado, and the Marchioness de Los Velez were the principal aspirants. Don Pedro of Arragon asked an audience of her one morning, and gave her the unexpected advice to remove herself from court, as quietly as possible, lest a public dismissal might ensue.

Stung with rage, she refused to believe that he had any authority for thus advising her. Rushing unannounced into the king's presence, she related the insult, and asked his majesty's permission to leave a situation in which she was allowed to meet with such affronts.

"Certainly," answered Charles, "you are at perfect liberty to leave the place whenever you choose."

She was petrified with rage and amazement. Not even royalty had ever dared to speak thus to the duchess. She sprang from his presence, and as the queen was not yet risen, she entered her chamber without the usual ceremonies.

With her habitual sweetness, Louisa said, "I regret, madam, that anything so unpleasant should have occurred—"

Before she could speak further, the duchess struck her hand violently upon a small table, and caught up a splendid Chinese fan, much valued by her majesty, breaking it in pieces, and throwing the glittering fragments around the chamber.

"It is quite beneath the dignity of a consort of Spain to lament the dismissal of her Camarrera Mayor," she said, haughtily.

Her departure occasioned the most lively satisfaction, and her situation was soon filled more acceptably by the Duchess d'Albuquerque, who adopted an entirely different policy, being as good, gentle, and obliging, as her predecessor had been the reverse.

As if the fate of Henrietta of England had been entailed on her fair and beautiful daughter, consigning her, after a few brief years of life, to an early grave, Louisa began to exhibit the same symptoms as her mother had done. Returning from riding on horseback, an exercise which was admirably adapted to her figure, and in which she excelled, she complained of violent and distressing pain. More than at any other time, the king had been struck with the wondrous beauty of "My rena" on this occasion. She rode a spirited jennet of his own choosing, and was attired magnificently, in a riding dress of black cloth, with rich gold buttons fastening the habit and sleeves. A Spanish hat and feathers adorned her head, and her little fairy-like gloves were closed by diamond buttons. As she took these buttons from the splendid casket, which no hands save her own ever opened, the superb pearl, called Peregrina, as large as a small pear, hanging to a diamond clasp, which formed her present from Charles, when they first met, caught her eye. She held it up playfully, as if to remind him of that meeting, and caught his admiring gaze. It brought forth her blushes like a girl's. Perhaps there was another remembrance mingled with his, that she blushed to recall. That, too, was the hour in which she felt imperatively called upon to shut out from her loving heart the image of her cousin.

A momentary faintness, in which the blush was supplanted by deathly paleness, alarmed the king. He sprang towards her, but already she had recovered, and almost shrunk from his clasp arms. She attributed it to the close perfume of the orange and jasmine trees which were standing in silver cases about the room; and with this first prevarication on her lips (a rare instance in a Frenchwoman!) she buttoned on the diminutive gloves, and went slowly down the grand staircase, to the courtyard of the palace, where grooms were walking the superb animals up and down, while awaiting the royal pair. As the groom held out his hand for the little foot which the queen was about to place in it, Charles, impelled by a sudden gallantry, which, it must be confessed, did not often possess him, sprang forward, and received it in his own.

"Quite recovered, my rena?" he asked, tenderly. "Quite," she answered, but even as she spoke, a sudden pang shot through her frame. She pressed her hand upon her heart, as if absolutely to crush out the pain, and the paleness returned to her cheek; but this time Charles was mounting his horse and did not perceive it.

She rode superbly that day—her gay jennet distancing the other animals—and then, when carried almost out of sight, she would return with a bright smile on her cheek, and an apparent elasticity of spirits that seemed unconquerable by sickness or sorrow.

It was after this ride that she began gradually to droop; and in February, 1689, the flower of Spanish queens closed the beautiful eyes that never beamed but in sweetness upon all. Whether the fatal poison, of which she was supposed to be the victim, was introduced into her food, or into the flowers she so loved to inhale, is one of the mysteries that cannot be divulged until the earth gives up its dead. The dull, heavy formalities of the Spanish court, which the light and airy graces of Louisa d'Orleans had softened into something more elastic, resumed their sway after her death, never, perhaps, to be again touched into beauty by so sweet a spirit as hers. All tender and delicate memories cluster around her name; and even the proud and haughty Spaniards cherish the records of her gentle and unstained life with tenderness and respect, as the best and most beloved by her subjects of all the queens of Spain.

Small Change.

A MAN in praising porter, said it was an excellent beverage; that though taken in great quantities, it always made him fat. "I have seen the time when it made you lean." "When, I should be glad to know?" said the eulogist. "Why, no longer since that last night—against the wall."

A CAPITAL way to prevent the smell of cooking in a house: Have nothing for breakfast, and warm it up for dinner and supper.

HE that can please nobody is not so much to be puffed as he whom nobody can please.

"A dandy is a thing that would Be a young lady if he could;
But since he can't, does all he can,
To let you know he's not a man."

THE ex-president of the Conundrum Club perpetrates another atrocity, viz.:—"What is that which no man wants, which if any man has he would not part with for untold wealth?" Answer, "A bald head."

JEAN, jester to Charles IX., once tried his master's nerve by rushing into his room one morning with the exclamation—"Oh, sire, such news! Four thousand men have risen in the city!"—"What!" cried the startled king; "with what intention have they risen?"—"Well," said Jean, placing his finger upon his nose, "probably with the intention of lying down again at bedtime."

"I TELL you wat, Julius, I had a monstrous 'spute wid massa dis mornin', down to de cotton patch."—"You don't see so, Cassar; wat, you 'spute wid massa?"—"Yes, I tell you for one hour we 'spute togedder down in de cotton patch."—"Wa, wa, wat you 'spute about?"—"Why, you see, Julius, massa come down da whar I was hoein', and massa he say squash grow best on sandy ground, an' I say so too; and dar we 'spute about it for more'n one hour!"

MUST HAVE BEEN AN IRISHMAN.—"I never shot a bird in my life," said some one to his friend, who replied, "I never shot anything in the shape of a bird, but a squirrel, which I killed with a stone, when it fell into the river, and was drowned."

TO A BOTTLE.

'Tis very strange that you and I
Together cannot pull;
For you are full when I am dry,
And dry when I am full.

HE only is truly independent in the world, who can maintain himself by his individual exertions.

A YOUTH, with a turn for figures, had five eggs to boil, and being told to give them three minutes each, boiled them a quarter of an hour altogether.

"I NEVER complained of my condition," says the Persian poet Sadi, "but once, when my feet were bare, and I had no money to buy shoes; but I met a man without feet and became contented with my lot."

"I SAY, Jim," said a ploughman, the other day, to his companion, "I know of a new-fashioned Mackintosh to keep out the wet." "What is that?" "Why, if you eat a red-herring in the morning, for breakfast, you'll be dry all the day."

How many young men are carried away by a fine, musical, charming voice—a pretty, light-footed, reeling, ball-room dancer—a lazy, lounging, street-yarn-ing flirt—an oily-tongued, hollow-hearted, deceptive piano-pounder, and regret their folly when, alas, too late!

"My birth-day!"—what a different sound
That word had in my youthful ears!
And how, each time the day comes round,
Less and less white its mark appears!
When first our scanty years are told,
It seems like pastime to grow old!
And as Youth counts the shining links,
That Time around him binds so fast,
Pleased with the task, he little thinks
How hard that chain will press at last.

"ONE word more, and I have done." How we dread to hear this sentence from the lips of a speaker at public meetings! It is always a sure indication that he is bracing up for a fresh start.

"THIS tenement to let. Inquire next door." The place was in a dilapidated, wretched condition. Bannister, however, inquired the rent, &c. These particulars gained, he asked, "Do you let anything with it?"—"No," was the reply; "why do you ask?"—"Because," said the wit, "if you let it alone, it will tumble down!"

"QUILLS are things that are sometimes taken from the pinions of one goose to spread the opinions of another!"

WHEN Dr. H. and Serjeant A. were walking arm-in-arm, a wag observed to a friend, "Those two are just equal to one highwayman." "Why so?" was the response. "Because," rejoined the wag, "it's a lawyer and a doctor—your money or your life."

WHAT is it you must keep after giving it to another? Your word.

AN Irish paper, describing a late duel, says that one of the combatants was shot through the fleshy part of the thigh bone.

MARRIAGE.—A good woman is not thoroughly known before marriage. Of how many sweet domestic virtues may not she be possessed, of which even he who values her most highly is unaware, until he has placed her in his own mansion to be the guardian angel of his household-happiness.

A WISE MAGISTRATE.—That was a very learned and thoughtful mayor of Shrewsbury, to whom Lord Mansfield remarked at dinner, "Your town appears very old." To which his honour the mayor replied, "It was always so, please your lordship."

A YANKEE ADVERTISEMENT.—A down-easter advertises for a wife in the following manner: "Any gal what's got a cow, a good feather bed with comfortable fixins, five hundred dollars in hard pewter; one that's had the measles and understands tendin' children, can find a customer for life, by writin' a small billy duz, addressed to Q. Z., and sticking it in a crack of Uncle Ebenezer's barn, back side, joinin' the hogpen."

As a clergyman was performing the funeral service, a woman came and pulled him by the sleeve in the middle of it. "Sir, I must speak to you immediately." "Well, then, what is the matter?" "Why, sir, you are going to bury a man who died of the small-pox near my poor husband who never had it."

DIVORCE.—Cutting for fresh partners.

Chess.

Problem No. 49. By H. TURTON, Esq.

White to move, and checkmate in three moves.

Problem No. 50. By ALFRED KEMPE, Esq.

White to move, and checkmate in three moves.

Game Played between C. F. SMITH and J. N. SMITH.

WHITE.

Mr. C. F. Smith.

1. P to K 4
2. Kt to K B 3
3. B to Q B 4
4. P to Q Kt 4
5. P to Q B 3
6. P to Q 4
7. P takes P
8. Castles
9. B to Q Kt 2
10. B to Q Kt 5
11. Q takes B
12. P to K 5
13. B takes Kt
14. B to Q 5
15. Kt to Q B 3
16. R takes B
17. B to Q Kt 3
18. Kt to K 4
19. R to Q sq
20. P to K Kt 4
21. B takes P
22. B takes P
23. Q to K 5
24. R checks
25. R takes Q Kt P
26. Q to K B 3
27. K to K Kt 2

BLACK.

Mr. J. N. Smith.

1. P to K 4
2. Kt to Q B 3
3. B to Q B 4
4. B takes P
5. B to Q B 4
6. P takes P
7. B to Q Kt 3
8. P to Q 3
9. B to K Kt 5 (a)
10. B takes Kt
11. K to B sq
12. B takes P
13. B takes B
14. Kt to K R 3
15. B takes R
16. P to Q B 3
17. P takes P
18. P to Q B 4 (b)
19. Q to Q R 4
20. P to Q B 5
21. Q to Q Kt 5
22. K to K 2
23. K takes B
24. K to K 3
25. Kt takes P
26. Q to K 8 (ch)
27. K R to K B sq

And White mates in seven moves.
(a) Kt to K B 3 is the true defence.—(b) Q to K 2 would have been much better.

W. COATES.—Your Problem, shall be reported upon shortly.
A PERPLEXED JUVENILE.—The key move to Problem No. 41 is Q to Q R 4.

E. FLAYER, JUN.—Stalemate can be effected in one move in the Problem submitted by you.

W. GREENWOOD.—Many thanks for your excellent batch of Problems.

Answers to several correspondents are unavoidably delayed until next week.

Our Editorial Table.

A CONSTANT READER.—The waters of Cheltenham owe their virtue to the quantity of sulphate of soda, or chloride of sodium, which they contain in large proportions. The persons most benefited by the use of them are those who, after a long residence in hot climates, are affected with diseased liver; and also those who, by indulgence in what—a sad misnomer—is called "good living," have weakened their digestive organs.

M. T. (Slough).—According to Sir Richard Phillips, the reason why children die in such large proportions is, that their diseases cannot be explained, and because their organs are not habituated to the functions of life. Of human beings born, half die before twenty-six, and two-thirds before fifty.

JEMIMA JONES.—"Jemima" is informed that the late Duke of Wellington was born at Dangan Castle (county Meath, Ireland), in March, 1769. He was first sent to Eton, whence, being destined for the army, he was removed to the military college at Angiers, in France. He obtained his first commission, in the 73rd regiment, in 1787; and rose, in 1793, to be lieutenant-col. of the 53rd. In 1794 he ably covered and protected the retreat of the Duke of York in Holland, and became a colonel in 1796. In the same year, after a narrow escape of shipwreck, he landed in India with his regiment, where his brother, Lord Mornington, arrived the next year, as Governor-General. Of his subsequent achievements he has been his own—and the best—historian. His style is the exponent of the man. Truth—without which there can be no real greatness—was his polar star in every region; honour, and to do his duty, his object in every act. His shrine of renown was approached through the temple of virtue; and he trusted to a grateful country to provide means to support a dignity carved out with an untarnished sword.

X. Z.—You wish to know why the gun-cotton, that made such a sensation a few years ago, is never heard of now. The reason that this invention of M. Schönbein is no longer considered valuable may thus be stated. The gun-cotton cannot be brought under control. It ignites spontaneously; that is, catches fire of itself, at a temperature of about 90 degrees.

ELIZA.—The Court of Divorce is presided over by Sir C. Cresswell, a very able and accomplished lawyer. Many sentences of dissolution of marriage have lately been pronounced; but they were all cases of gross and flagrant immorality, and only one of them was tried by the intervention of a jury.

ALICIA, A TIMID GIRL.—We beg you will conquer your fears. In spite of some modern oratory there neither is, nor has been any imminent danger of war with France. But should war be forced upon us, and England be threatened as it was fifty years ago, young ladies ought to have too much confidence in their countrymen to be afraid. Read the accounts of the great captains of the last century. English skill and courage rose with the occasion. Think of Rodney, a man unaided by high birth or connections. Follow him in a few of his steps to eminence. Intrusted with the command of a squadron, he set sail for Gibraltar. In his way thither he first took a rich convoy of Spanish merchantmen; afterwards defeated a fleet of Spanish men-of-war, taking the admiral, Don Sangara's ship, and three other ships of the line. A few months after he fought a most obstinate battle with a superior French fleet under the Count de Guiche, in the West Indies; and in 1782 he obtained a most glorious victory, in the neighbourhood of Jamaica, over another French fleet, commanded by the Count de Grasse, taking the admiral's own ship of 110 guns. For these heroic achievements he was raised to the peerage, an honour he justly deserved. Then call to mind the indomitable valour of British warriors of the present day. Think of their achievements in the Crimea, and of the dauntless valour with which they subdued, and are still subduing, millions of ruthless mutineers in the East. Recollect all this, and, as an English girl, blush for your fears.

CURIOS.—Gold sovereigns, value 20s., were in use in 1532; value 24s., 1550; value 30s., 1552; and again, value 20s., from 1821 to the present time.

MORETON.—We agree with you that it is an unpleasant novelty for us to see other countries "getting a-head" of us in anything that relates to the arts and sciences. But certain it is that the electric telegraph (for the original idea of which we have to thank Mr. James Bain, an ingenious mechanic) has long since attained greater development in America than with us. To prove this we need only instance the practice of transmitting whole printed messages, as being carried out in the new world. It is Professor Morse, of America, whom his countrymen and the world at large have to thank for this improved working of the electric telegraph. The process of the learned Professor's apparatus is comparatively simple, and may be thus described:—Its distinguishing feature is the pressure of a blunt style, or pen, on the surface of a scroll of paper, moved by clock-work over a yielding substance. A momentary impression leaves a depressed dot; a longer continuance of the action, a short line or stroke. These dots and strokes, by their combination, form letters, something like the following, which are marked upon the paper:—

..... &c. Professor Morse has contrived seven ways of forming and breaking the circuit at such intervals, as to produce the requisite combinations of strokes and dots. The simplest and best is the contact (by the pressure of the hand) of a metallic stud with the surface of a miniature anvil, thus completing the circuit and depressing the style or pen at the extremity of the line. When the circuit is broken by the elevation of the key, which carries the stud, a spring raises the style or blunt pen, and leaves a vacant space on the moving scroll until the succeeding completion of the circuit. Any of our correspondents who devoted their attention to the production and perusal of this telegraphic language, would soon become familiar with it.

S. G.—Had you intended to show great cordiality you might have met your friend at the door. She on her part committed a solecism in good breeding by reproving you before a comparative stranger.

J. M. O.—"Chiario oscuro," in Italian, or "clear obscure," in English, from the Latin, clarus, "clear," and obscurus, "obscure," is a term used by painters, to denote the particular distribution of the lights and shades of a piece, with respect to the effect of the whole; also a design of two colours.

E. C. IN DANGER.—Moderate your indignation, and, at least, delay vengeance till you have calmly ascertained whether there is just ground for it. We have seen a good deal of the world, and, we believe, that generally speaking, ladies can by modest dignity protect themselves. Are you sure the object of your affections did not encourage your rival to take the unbecoming liberty of which you complain? If the lady is perfectly innocent of coquetry, and if in embracing her against her will your rival used violence, she can indict the aggressor for an assault. He would thus be more justly and more severely punished than by any rash deed of yours.

JOHN BULL.—As yet, no hippopotamus has been born in the Zoological Gardens; but this is no reason that none ever should come into being among us; for, although the hippopotamus is the native of a hot climate, the recent birth of a young one in Paris shows that the species may be propagated under a temperate sky. It was in the "Jardin des Plantes" that a little hippopotamus made its appearance last May, on the 10th day of the month. It was seen at the top of the water of the tank occupied by its mother. After swimming about a while, the little creature attempted to get on dry ground; but, the descent from the sleeping apartment of the parent hippopotami not being sloped, the young one had some difficulty in raising its weight out of the water. The mother then came to its help; but, in her endeavours to assist her offspring up the step, she unfortunately so bruised and injured its tender body, that it died the same evening.

A LITTLE BOY.—You may give flies as much to eat as you please, you cannot make them grow, for when once an insect has attained its winged state it never increases in size.

VENETIA S.—The holes in your beads are, most probably, made with a fine drill; and you will injure or destroy them by any attempt to enlarge them.

PULPITAGUS.—You can obtain the first volume, New Series, of our journal by post, on sending 3s. 8d. to Messrs. Petter and Galpin. Apply diluted nitric acid (aqua fortis) to your warts twice a day, by means of a piece of pointed wood.

HOPELESS.—There seems to be no connection between the practice to which you refer and blushing. Try cold bathing.

NEVER GIVE UP.—We do not see that there is any appeal from the decision of the County Court. Unless you are well known, or have influential friends, your proposal to publish your life, under the idea of selling one thousand copies, at one shilling each, would only increase your embarrassment.

A TRADESMAN.—We have already given receipts for making good black writing ink.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—The signification of the term "belles-lettres" is somewhat vague. It includes general literature, though, by some, it is confined to polite literature; as rhetoric, poetry, history, and philology.

A YOUTHFUL BARD.—"The World before the Flood" is one of the late James Montgomery's best poems. It is out of print; but you may perhaps obtain a copy at some second-hand bookseller's.

L. H. W.—You may make a kaleidoscope with either two or three glasses; those with three are the most perfect.

IMAGINATION.—The articles must be written in long hand, in ink, on one side only of the paper (ordinary letter-paper), and in a clear, legible hand.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Write to the Master, or the Secretary, of the Marines' School, Woolwich.

T. BROWN.—Stones may be polished by the use of emery, spread on a rubber made of felt, or of thick, close-grained, woollen cloth. Begin with a coarse emery, then with a second, finer; a third, finer still; and then polish off with "polisher's putty." Each degree of fineness must have its own rubber. The water used should be soft.

OSBORNE.—You will find receipts for lemonade, both powder and liquid, in recent numbers of our journal. See No. 25, p. 400, &c.

A CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER.—There is no law to prevent a person from insuring your life, if a company is willing to forego the usual inquiries and examinations; but no respectable company would, we think, do this.

POETICAL COMPOSITIONS.—We have on hand some hundred verses, some of which contain beautiful thoughts and excellent sentiments, but which, for various reasons, we are unable to insert in our journal. Some are defective in measure; some do not arrive in proper season; some refer to merely personal matters; some are more suitable for religious periodicals; and most of them are much too long for our use. To some of the writers we would say, "Confine yourselves to prose;" to others, "Wait a little longer."

W. MORLEY.—Coloured prints and drawings must be prepared for varnishing, by receiving one or two coats of isinglass size. The varnish used is spirit varnish; most commonly, "white, hard varnish." The process is delicate, and somewhat difficult, especially with respect to drawings.

A BOOK-HUNTER.—The tract about which you inquire, "The Christian State of Matrimony, wherein Husbands and Wives may learn to keep house together with Love," was written by Miles Coverdale, one of the first English reformers. You will find it difficult to obtain a copy.

HARRY.—We are astonished that two opinions should be expressed about the meaning of the words "upwards of." Of course, they mean "more than," "higher than."

CARRIE RALSTON.—The death of Pliny took place under the following circumstances: being at Misenum, during an eruption of Vesuvius, his anxiety to make observations on that phenomenon prevented him from taking proper precautions for his own safety, and he was suffocated by the sulphureous vapour.

B. ONDY.—You are too late in the season to obtain silk-worms' eggs.

ALEXANDER W.—By abstemiousness, useful occupation of your thoughts, and cold bathing, you may, we think, recover a healthy tone, without having recourse to designing adventures.

ATTILA.—If you reside in the parish you must pay whatever rates are levied by the properly constituted authorities. JOHN B.—The last quarterly return of the Registrar-General states that the natural increase of the population of the United Kingdom amounts to about 750 daily.

GO-A-HEAD.—If you knew what a swarm of young men are seeking engagements in London as "drapers' assistants," you would not be very ready to add to their number, especially if, as you state, you are in "a comfortable and first-rate country establishment."

PERSEVERANCE.—Read much when alone, aloud; but in as soft a tone as possible.

A. B. C.—We know of no establishment where you can purchase "lectures which have never been read to the public."

FATEMAN.—The punishment of beheading was introduced into England by William the Conqueror.

B. H.—Unless the native of Lancashire had property to the amount of five pounds within one of the English dioceses, the probability is that no will of his is proved in any English court.

H. H.—Your parents have a moral but not a legal claim for the money lent you during your minority.

R. SIME.—The parish register of births, marriages, and deaths, have been regularly kept for more than a century.

J. D. MASSINGHAM.—The work is out of print.

A SUFFERER. COATS, X. Y. Z., AFFLICTION, D. W., are suffering from various bodily diseases and infirmities. They should consult skilful medical practitioners.

FATIOR.—We have reason to believe that the party you name is unworthy of your confidence.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Marionettes are puppets.

HAWK-EYE.—If you send 5s. 2d., either in postage-stamps or post-office order, the numbers you require will be immediately forwarded to you by post.

BOB.—We are not very fond of giving directions for the preparation of explosives; but you will find what you ask for in No. 13, page 206.

CISSIE.—Read No. 26. "The dear old dog" came to an untimely end; but he was the means of saving his master's life.

A. MONTRESOR.—We fear your "tremendous scar" will remain with you through life; but you had better consult some skilful surgeon.

MARRUGO.—Upon application to a magistrate an order of protection will be granted to you under the new act.

R. S.—The Rev. Dr. Steinkopf, minister of the Savoy Church, Strand, was among the earliest promoters of the Bible Society.

M. A. H.—If the claim can fairly be made out, the owners are answerable to the representatives of the lost scamen.

STEPHEN.—The word "gipsy" is probably a corruption of "Egyptian."

E. B.—You cannot sue, for breach of promise, a man who is willing to marry you as soon as he can find the means of supporting you.

E. MONK.—You may make good manure of the mowings and sweepings of your lawns by constantly soaking them in house slops of any kind; but you should sprinkle them now and then with charcoal.

AMELIA CLIFTON.—Your personal property goes to your mother; your real property to your next of kin, who is your heir-at-law.

J. FILBERTON.—"J. Filberton" is informed that the massacre of the Jews in London was ordered by Richard the First, "for fear of the enchantments they were wont to practice."

COBBS.—Try to arrange matters amicably. If you cannot do so, it is to the Court of Chancery you must apply in all cases against executors.

A POLICEMAN.—2s. 6d. and a fraction per day.

A FRENCHMAN.—"A Frenchman" who wishes to see and taste everything that is good in England before he returns to his own country, should partake at Greenwich of a dinner of whitebait. The noble hospital for the aged seamen will excite his admiration; and as to the little fish, they are such as he can only procure in England. They are peculiar to the river Thames. Some naturalists think this diminutive fish is a species of itself; others that it is the young of a larger kind of fish. The former opinion seems most generally received. Whitebait is now in season; it should be eaten quite fresh and hot, after having been fried in butter.

LUCY.—We think you will act wisely in placing the sum you speak of in the savings' bank, but you cannot send it by another person, because your first deposit must be made by yourself, so that the institution may take a specimen of your handwriting, and set down some particulars for your future identification.

E. J. A. L. has sent us a recipe for making black ink, which he recommends as "very cheap and very good." It is at the service of our readers: bruised gall-nuts, eight ounces; green copperas, three ounces; gum arabic, two ounces and a half; indigo, fifteen grains; sugar-candy, two ounces; vinegar, three pints; rain water, five pints. We may add,—boil the galls in the water for about an hour; then add the other ingredients. Stir frequently, till all are dissolved. Place the whole in a stone bottle, cork up, and put it at the back of the hob, or sufficiently near to get a little warmth, for about four weeks, shaking it occasionally.

P. E., A. G., AND J. BRINDLE.—The mistake was corrected in No. 25, p. 400.

ERLIE RANULPH.—The usual proportions are, one ounce of powdered logwood, and the same quantity of copperas.

G. A. P.—Her Majesty's Opera-house in the Haymarket will accommodate a larger audience than the theatre recently built in Covent-garden.

* We cannot guarantee the return of rejected manuscripts.

All Letters and Communications for the Editor to be addressed to JOHN CASSELL, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

London: Printed and Published for JOHN CASSELL by PETTER and GALPIN, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

[THE RIGHT OF TRANSLATION AND REPUBLICATION IS RESERVED.]

NEW SERIES. VOL. II.—No. 31.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 3, 1858.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER LXII.

How shall our thoughts avoid the various snare?
Or wisdom to our cautioned soul declare,
The various shapes thou pleasest to employ,
When bent to hurt and certain to destroy?—PRIOR

OUR hero had not long returned from his visit to the country seat of Mr. Chutnee, before he felt a lassitude that rendered him not only indifferent to the active exertions, but even the pleasures of his age. At first he attributed it to the change of climate or the increasing heat of the weather, and imagined that he was merely paying the penalty which every native of Europe is supposed to pay when he exchanges the temperate atmosphere of his native land for the burning one of the East.

He was reclining in a state of dreamy listlessness upon a chaise longue which the servants had placed in the veranda, in order that he might catch the slightest breeze which came from the Hooghly, when Fred Wharton called. The young officer, who had been absent from Calcutta upon military duty, felt exceedingly shocked when he beheld the change that had taken place in his friend; the eye was dim, half glazed, and a sickly pallor had overspread the features lately so redolent with health.

"In heaven's name, my dear fellow," he exclaimed, as the invalid languidly held out a hand to welcome him, "tell me what has occurred."

"Occurred!" repeated the sufferer; "nothing."

"You are ill?"

"I can scarcely term it an illness," was the reply, "for I feel no pain; merely a lassitude which has invaded my entire system. In a day or two it will pass, no doubt, and I shall be myself again."

"Have you had advice?" demanded his visitor.

"Advice!" repeated Richard, with an effort to smile. "No; it is not so serious as that. I do not feel pain: it is merely—a kind of—"

Here a slight fit of coughing interrupted the speaker; and his friend observed that, as he wiped his lips, the handkerchief was tinged with green.

"Have you been eating fruit?" he asked.

"No; I have lost all appetite; but it is merely a slight indisposition, and will pass now you have returned. I have been too much alone. Your society will soon set me to rights again. You will stay and dine with me."

"I will do more," replied Fred Wharton.

Tyrrell regarded him inquiringly.

"I will take up my quarters and remain with you till you have recovered," continued the young man. "Not a word. I won't be refused. I have only to drop a line to the colonel to obtain leave of absence."

TYRRELL SAVED BY THE NATIVE PHYSICIAN.

"You must not state the reason," exclaimed our hero, raising himself from the couch; "it might create alarm."

"Trust to my prudence."

"For, after all, it is nothing. I feel ashamed of my weakness in giving way to it: for two days I have not had sufficient resolution to rise and quit the house. Is it not unaccountable?"

Here the poor fellow fell back, as if overcome by the exertion he had made, in describing his feelings to his friend.

"Do not excite yourself," said the latter. "But tell me what is the peculiar symptoms you complain of."

"A desire to sleep."

"And do you sleep?"

"I have not closed my eyes for the last two nights."

"Have you any other feelings?"

"A choking sensation on my lungs."

Here the invalid coughed again, and the slight froth tinged with green, which Fred had previously observed, rose again to his lips.

"I must write my note at once," observed the latter, looking round for the necessary materials; but not seeing any, he rang the bell.

Hassan, the khansumrah, or butler, entered the apartment. A slight shade of surprise, and perhaps displeasure, crossed the features of the Hindoo, when he perceived the presence of the young officer.

"Your master is ill," observed the latter.

"The sahib pays the penalty which Europeans pay when they arrive in India," was the reply. "He will be better soon."

"But I have never paid it!"

The native servant shrugged his shoulders.

"Why did you not send for advice?" demanded Wharton, who began to experience a sensation of dislike at the coldness of tone and manner with which Hassan spoke of his master's sufferings.

"The sahib would not hear of it."

"But I insist upon it. Bring me pens and paper."

The khansumrah saluted and withdrew.

"Don't speak angrily to him, Fred," said our hero.

"The poor fellow has been very attentive to me—scarcely left me an instant."

"Have you received any visitors?" inquired Wharton.

"No—that is, I believe not."

"Perhaps you gave orders to be denied?"

"No."

"Strange no one should have called."

On being reminded of the fact, Tyrrell confessed that it was strange, and added that doubtless he should be well enough on the following day to quit the house, and resume his usual occupation.

"Where is Jack Manders all this while?"

"I have sent him to the office for letters, for, as I hear, the English mail has arrived."

Hassan returned, and placed before his master's friend the writing materials he had demanded; then, folding his arms, stood in an attitude of attention at a distant part of the saloon.

"What are you waiting for?" inquired the officer, seeing that he showed no intention of quitting the room.

"The sahib's letter."

"When written I will send for you," was the reply.

"You need not wait."

The butler once more saluted and disappeared.

Naturally Fred Wharton was anything but inclined to suspect the actions or motives of his fellow men; still, there was something so sudden in the illness of his friend, and so unusual in the symptoms, that he felt alarmed. The manner, too, of Hassan did not altogether satisfy him, and he came to the resolution of not sending his letter to the colonel by him, but to wait the return of Jack.

It was nearly an hour before the faithful fellow made his appearance. During the interval the Hindoo had twice found an excuse for entering the room, and each time asked if he should take the letter.

A dry negative was the reply, and the fellow withdrew, bowing with more than oriental servility to conceal the scowl of disappointment which darkened his features.

"I don't at all share the confidence you feel in your butler," observed the young officer. "I may be wrong—I trust I am—but if ever I saw designing villainy stamped upon the face of any one, it is upon his."

Tyrrell regarded him with surprise: he could not comprehend the sudden prejudice of the speaker.

"Who recommended him to you?" added Fred.

"Sanford, if you remember."

"Right; I was present."

Impatient at the non-arrival of Manders, whom he had directed the native servant to send to him,

Wharton quitted the room of his sick friend, and, crossing the courtyard, entered the offices. To his anger and astonishment, the first person he perceived was Jack.

"How long have you been here?" he demanded.

"An hour at least," answered the poor fellow. "I am so glad you have called," he added, "for I fear Mr. Tyrrell is very ill."

"And yet you did not come near to inquire."

"Hassan ordered me not."

"Why not?"

"He said you were engaged."

"I told him to send you to me the instant you returned," exclaimed Fred Wharton. "I don't understand all this mystery, and fear there has been some foul play against my poor friend."

The eyes of Jack sparkled with anger. He, too, had been haunted by the same suspicions.

"If I could only prove it," he exclaimed, "I'd wring the rascal's neck. I won't leave the house again," he added: "it was a fool's errand the Hindoo sent me out on, there is no mail arrived from England."

"Are you sure?"

"Certain. Mr. Wharton told me so."

Things began to look still more suspiciously. Fred's presence of mind, however, did not desert him.

"You must quit the house once more," he said, "for you are the only person in whom I dare trust. Take this letter to Sir Charles Fourreau; give it into his hand; tell him how ill Mr. Tyrrell has been, and request him from me to send Dr. Burke, and call himself. In fact, I cannot understand why he has not done so already."

Jack rose from the bench on which he had been seated to depart; as he did so the speaker observed that he behaved extremely listlessly of manner—that his eyes, which had lately flashed with rage, like those of his master now appeared dull and heavy.

"Why, Manders," said the officer, "you, too, are not well."

"Don't mind me, sir," replied the honest fellow; "think only of Mr. Richard. I am suffering from the same complaint; but I bore up in order not to alarm him. Hassan says it's the change of climate, that all Europeans feel it, but I don't believe him. I have been both in China and India before, and never experienced anything like it."

Wharton saw the messenger to the entrance of the house, and watched him till he had crossed the street on his way to the artillery barracks, before he returned to the sick room of his friend, on reaching which he found Hassan trying to persuade him to take a cooling drink which he had prepared.

"I can't," sighed the invalid; "the odour of it revolts me."

"It will do the sahib good," added the Hindoo, pressing it to his lips.

"Set it down," said the stern voice of the officer, who did not choose to express all he felt and thought. "Mr. Tyrrell will take it when he feels disposed."

"It is nauseous," murmured Richard.

"But it cools the fever of the blood," replied the khansumrah, without the slightest change of countenance: "Europe has no such medicine."

"Perhaps not," observed Wharton, taking it from his hand, and smelling it. "I will give it to him when he feels more disposed; now go and prepare dinner. I shall remain and dine with your master."

The Hindoo was about to quit the room; on reaching the door he paused and said,

"In my way to the market," he said, "I can deliver the letter of the sahib."

"It is gone already."

Hassan disappeared without a word.

"I feel exceedingly faint," sighed the sick youth. His friend, who by this time was seriously alarmed, scarcely knew how to act, or what to do. On looking round, he fortunately discovered a liquor-stand upon one of the side-tables. Pouring out a glass, he held it to the lips of the sufferer, who at once drank it off.

A violent spasm followed, the poor youth rolled in agony upon his couch, and drew his breath with such difficulty, that his friend feared lest the froth which kept bubbling to his lips, should choke him. After a few minutes the agony ceased, and he became calm again.

"Thank heaven!" he murmured, "it is past. Where is Jack?"

"I have sent him with my letter. Sir Charles and Dr. Burke will soon be here."

Richard could only express his gratitude by a silent pressure of the hand, for he felt too much exhausted to speak.

"How feel you now?"

"Better," he murmured; "much better. I think that I shall sleep that is all I require to restore me."

Fred Wharton took the hand of his friend in his, and sat by his side till sleep sealed the weary eyelids of the sufferer, whose breath came thick and heavily, as if labouring under some extraordinary oppression of the chest.

"This is no natural illness," thought the officer, and yet he knew not what else to attribute it to; for, although the manner of the Hindoo khansumrah had created a vague impression in his mind, he was far from suspecting the fatal truth, that his friend had been poisoned. Had he been longer a resident in India, the probabilities are that he would at once have divined the cause.

Sir Charles Fourreau and the officers were at mess when they were disturbed by the loud, angry tones of Jack Manders—who, despite the refusal of the waiters to admit him, or to disturb the colonel at table—would insist in forcing his way into the room.

"What the deuce is all this row about?" demanded Major Plinlimmon, angrily. "Can't we eat our dinners, like Christian gentlemen and officers, in peace? Has a mutiny broke out?" he demanded.

"See what is the matter," said the colonel to one of the servants.

In a few minutes the man returned, and related what had taken place.

Apologising to his brother officers for quitting the table, the baronet walked to the ante-room, where he found poor Jack still disputing with the waiters and servants. On hearing the voice of the colonel there was a general silence.

"What is the meaning of this disturbance?" asked Sir Charles.

The messenger—who seemed half fainting, for he, too, it must be remembered, was suffering from the same cause as our hero—placed the letter in the hand of the speaker, who perused it attentively.

"Great heavens!" exclaimed the gentleman; "Mr. Tyrrell ill!"

"Dying, I am afraid, sir."

"When I called, his servants told me he was absent."

"It was not by his orders, Sir Charles. I am afraid there has been foul play."

"Ask Burke to come to me," said the colonel to one of the men.

The doctor instantly joined him. A few words explained what had occurred.

Dr. Burke had passed many years of his life in India; and, being a great lover not only of his profession but of science in general, had paid more than usual attention to the diseases peculiar to the East. There were few points connected with the literature, religion, or the natural history of the country that he had not made himself acquainted with.

His first words were to request the messenger to describe minutely the symptoms of his master's illness.

"The same as mine, sir," faltered the poor fellow, who appeared half choked with the effort to speak—"the same as mine."

Here Jack was seized with a fit of coughing, similar to those our hero suffered from.

The doctor noticed the green froth upon his lips. Carefully wiping them with his handkerchief, he observed it closely for a few minutes. As he did so, Sir Charles Fourreau observed that his countenance changed.

"Nothing very serious, I trust," observed the colonel.

"Bring me some brandy," said the doctor, hastily, to one of the waiters, without appearing to notice the question; "quickly."

It was brought and with some difficulty forced down the throat of Jack Manders, and similar convulsive spasms to the one which had so shaken the frame of our hero took place.

"Let him be removed to Mr. Tyrrell's in a palanquin, as quickly as possible," exclaimed the man of science. "Sir Charles, you will at once proceed there, and administer to the unfortunate gentleman stimulants every quarter of an hour, till I arrive."

"Is there danger?" demanded the baronet.

The expressive look of Dr. Burke, who felt a warm interest in the fate of Richard ever since he had heard of his attachment to Lillian, warned the speaker that he considered it imminent.

"The fever?" he whispered.

"Worse."

"Worse!" repeated the colonel.

"Poisoned."

The baronet uttered a deep groan, as he thought of his ward.

"And, worst of all," added the speaker, "by the only drug to which I do not possess an antidote. You have heard of the root?"

"Never."

"I have no time, then, to explain it now. Hasten to Tyrrell, at once. I will seek the native physician, Mirza Algee,—he is the only man in Calcutta who possesses sufficient skill to save him."

It was so evidently a matter of life and death that Sir Charles Fourreau hesitated not an instant. Jumping into the first palanquin in the barrack-yard, he directed the bearers to carry him to the residence of our hero. Poor Jack followed in another.

Although Dr. Burke had no time to explain to the colonel what he meant by the root, there is no reason why we, who are not equally pressed, should not do so to gratify the curiosity of our readers.

India, through all ages, has been celebrated for its poisons. In that land of passion and of crime, it would seem as if nature, for reasons not granted man to scrutinise, had placed the means of death within the reach of all—a means as various and subtle as the arts of those who employ them.

The root, as it is emphatically called, grows something like the truffle—underground. It puts forth neither leaf nor flower in its natural state, but resembles an irregular-shaped piece of dried cork. The natives who seek for it know by certain indications where to dig for it.

It requires to come in contact with living animal matter to develop its latent powers of vegetating. Ground to an impalpable powder, and mixed in a glass of water, or mingled with food, it is sometimes administered.

Once received into the system, a sickly languor takes possession of the victim, accompanied by a choking sensation. The latter is caused by the singular fact that each particle which has been swallowed begins in a few hours to vegetate, sending forth a long, slimy thread. These threads interlace one within the other till suffocation ensues.

Although Dr. Burke, except in very peculiar cases, would have laughed at the idea of consulting a native physician, in the present instance he did not hesitate for an instant, well knowing that it was the only chance of saving the life of our hero.

When his palanquin stopped before the door of the Hakim Mirza Algee, he found the old man seated upon his carpet, in the courtyard of his mansion, performing his evening prayers. They were no strangers to each other.

Orientalists rarely permit themselves to betray a feeling either of curiosity or astonishment. Yet a close observer might have detected, as the old man muttered his prayers, a peculiar glance from the corner of his half-closed eyes, directed towards his visitor, who waited with patience till he had concluded, well knowing that no earthly business could be attended to till the last bead was told, and his devotions finished. Here, par parenthèse, we ought, perhaps, to explain that the Indian fakirs and devotees count their beads in the same manner as the catholics.

"May your shadow be never the less," said his visitor, as the hakim, after closing his eyes, commenced swaying his body to and fro with a peculiar, snake-like motion.

"I am my lord's slave," was the reply.

"Is your health good?"

"Disease dies in the presence of the hakim of hakims. Whose dog is Mirza that he should be ill before him?"

"My soul is enlightened by your praise."

Having gone through the usual form of compliments, which mean about the same thing as compliments in Europe, only they are much more tedious, the doctor explained the reason of his visit.

The oriental stroked his beard and smiled.

"Will you not come with me?" he demanded, hastily.

"Is thy servant a yezid that he should do this thing?" demanded the oriental, with a sarcastic expression upon his wrinkled features. "If the angel of death flies not at his presence, who is the lord of wisdom and of sense, what hope is there that he will spread his wings at my bidding?"

"But the youth may die."

"Allah kerim! what is written is written."

"Will you not pleasure me in this?"

"It is his kismet."

Kismet means fate.

"The hakim of the feringees," added the speaker, scoffs at our knowledge; let him try his own."

"I scoff at no man's knowledge," replied his visitor, with difficulty repressing his rising anger, "being well aware that my brother practitioners in the East possess secrets which are peculiar to them and their art."

"It is so," answered Mirza, somewhat mollified.

"The wisdom of countries differ."

"That is truth."

"Each land has its learning."

"My lord hath said it."

"The poor youth for whom I solicit your aid has taken the root," added the doctor, "and what can the learning of Europe do to save him?"

"Nothing," answered the native physician, emphatically.

"Save him, and gold shall be poured forth like water."

"Gold is good."

"And the fame of Mirza Algee proclaimed to the confusion of the science of the hakim of Frangistan, and the glory of the East."

"In a few minutes I will attend my brother," exclaimed the old man, whose avarice and vanity were both excited.

So saying, he quitted the small square piece of carpet, commonly called a praying carpet, from its being used only on devotional occasions, and walked into one of the rooms of the house. In a few minutes he returned, holding a small box in his hand, and began calling loudly for his palanquin bearers.

Impatient at the delay, Dr. Burke further won his good opinion by inviting him to share his. The Hindoo bowed assent, and they started at once for the house of our hero.

CHAPTER LXIII.

Trembling between life and death,
Back I call thy parting breath;
Thou' thy soul be on the wing,
O'er thy cold clay hovering,
By words no human tongue may tell,
Which bind the moonbeams in this spell,
Arrest the light stars on their track,
Fleeting soul, I call thee back.

AUTHOR'S SCRAP BOOK.

On the arrival of Sir Charles Fourreau with Jack Manders at the house of our hero, Hassan, the khansumah, received them with the usual obsequious salam, then stood with his arms folded over his breast to await his questions or orders.

"How is your master?" demanded the baronet.

"He sleeps."

"Thank heaven."

"The Hindoo secretly smiled.

"Prepare a bed instantly for this poor fellow," said the baronet; "I expect Dr. Burke, the physician of my regiment, in a few minutes."

"The hakims of Europe are wise," observed Hassan, with a covert sneer; "doubtless, the danger will fly at his approach."

"I trust so," answered the unsuspicious colonel.

After seeing Jack, who prayed to be carried into the same room where his master was lying, removed from the palanquin, he made the best of his way to the saloon where Richard was still sleeping and Fred Wharton watching by his side.

The two officers exchanged a silent pressure of the hand.

"You may speak," said the youngest; "his slumber appears to be almost lethargic—see how heavily he breathes."

The baronet approached and gazed with deep emotion on the pale, wan features which he had so lately beheld beaming with health and animation; the change shocked him greatly.

"There has been treachery," he said, "infernal treachery. Burke declares that our friend is poisoned."

At this confirmation of his suspicions, Fred Wharton started from his seat and began pacing the room in violent agitation.

"Monstrous!" he resumed; "whom has he ever wronged? I cannot point out one single enemy."

The baronet shook his head mournfully.

"It cannot have been for plunder."

"No."

"What then?"

"Either revenge or jealousy," answered the colonel; "but this is not the moment to investigate the truth. Our first care must be to cure him. Burke has gone to fetch the native physician, Mirza Algee, the hakim most skilled in the poisons of the East."

"Will it be safe to trust him?"

"We must trust him—it is our last hope."

Several of the servants, including the ayees, now entered the saloon bearing Jack between them. Hassan followed. On seeing the latter, the suspicions of Wharton returned with additional force.

"Rascal!" he exclaimed, "if anything fatal occurs, you shall swing for it."

The Hindoo looked up with well-acted surprise.

"What said the sahib?"

The words were repeated.

The khansumah answered them by a cold, disdainful smile.

"Speak," said the baronet: "what is the meaning of this sudden desolation?"

He pointed as he spoke to Jack and Richard, as they lay each extended and unable to speak upon a sofa.

"Is thy servant a hakim," replied the man, "that he should explain these things? The flower fades, while the root is still within the earth, and who can tell the reason why. It is kismet."

Sir Charles was sufficiently an orientalist to know the meaning of the word.

"I will tell you what your destiny shall be," he muttered, sternly, "if it be proved that you have tampered in this deed."

Hassan regarded him calmly.

"A rope, and a felon's grave," added the baronet.

"Be it as you have said," answered the man. "The innocent are strong, and there is justice in Calcutta for the Hindoo, as well as the feringee."

At this moment, Dr. Burke made his appearance. On seeing him, the khansumah only smiled; but when he saw the native physician, Mirza Algee, following him with his box of drugs, his countenance underwent so palpable a change, that it was impossible to mistake his emotion.

He would have quitted the room, but Fred Wharton sprang between him and the door.

"Murderer!" he said, "I arrest you."

"I am innocent."

"That remains to be seen."

Sir Charles was so convinced of the fellow's guilt, that calling to his palanquin bearers, he gave him in charge to two of the strongest, and directed one of the others to go for a party of the police, into whose custody he was ultimately consigned.

The hakim advanced to the couch on which his patient was reposing, and felt first his chest and then his pulse.

"The root," he slowly pronounced.

"I thought so," exclaimed Dr. Burke, who, with all his skill, found himself, in this peculiar case, reduced to act the part of a spectator.

"His sleep does not seem natural," observed Sir Charles.

"What have you given him?" demanded Mirza, addressing the young officer, whom he had found watching the sufferer.

Fred Wharton pointed to the liquor stand.

A grim smile passed over the features of the Hindoo.

"Good," he said: "ignorance, in this instance, has performed the work of knowledge."

He next advanced to one of the side tables, and examined the draught which Hassan had pressed upon the lips of the sufferer, and which still remained untasted. Wharton had resisted the attempt which the assassin had twice made to remove it, and explained why he had prevented his friend from taking it.

"Good," repeated the hakim. "Had he but swallowed a single mouthful, not all the science of India could have saved him: it is the kersunas water, which promotes the growth of the root."

"The villain!" exclaimed all present, struck with horror at the infernal malice of the khansumah.

The old man opened the box—which he had never for an instant permitted to quit his grasp—and taking from it what appeared like a piece of pumice-stone, began rasping it rapidly. Doctor Burke regarded it curiously, and with such evident desire to examine it that the hakim motioned him to a distance.

"The West has its secrets," he exclaimed, "and I seek not to penetrate them: let my brother in knowledge respect the wisdom of the East."

This was a plain intimation that no examination of his specific would be permitted.

When he had grated about as much as would cover the surface of a shilling, he called for a glass of milk.

One of the native servants brought it.

The Hindoo examined it carefully, and, satisfied that it was unadulterated, he slowly dropped the powder into it, muttering at the same time words in an unknown tongue.

The English physician smiled: he fully comprehended that the verse, or whatever the old man might be reciting, could only be by way of blind—that the real virtue of the remedy lay in the powder.

"Now raise him up," said the hakim.

Sir Charles and Fred did as he directed.

"Hold back his head."

It was done.

"Grasp him firmly," added Mirza, "as you would cling to life. Violent convulsions will follow. Let not feeling at the sight of his sufferings unnerve you. Should you release him the consequences will be fatal."

His patient was placed exactly in the position he required, yet still the physician paused. The friends of the sufferer began to grow impatient, they could not understand why he delayed to administer the remedy.

"Patience," observed the old man, "is the mother of wisdom."

Gradually the milk in the glass began to effervesce. Mirza approached it to the lips of our hero, and despite his struggles, forced the contents down his throat, notwithstanding his efforts to reject it.

It was well that he had informed those who witnessed him of the consequences of the draught, or the fatal effects he had predicted in all probability would have ensued. A violent convulsion took place; the eyeballs of the patient appeared distended with agony.

Even Burke, who had watched the proceedings with all the curiosity natural to his profession, could scarcely endure to look upon him. Sir Charles and Fred felt terribly agitated.

"Has the dose been sufficient?" demanded the former.

"A grain more or less were death."

Still the convulsions continued; they had lasted now several minutes, and so intense was their violence, that fatal effects were anticipated.

"Poor Lilly!" thought the baronet, who fully expected to see our hero expire under the violence of his sufferings, "this will be a sad blow to thy young and loving heart."

At last a deep groan broke from the patient, whose limbs writhed in agony.

"Hold him fast," said the hakim, sternly.

A second followed.

"Be not surprised," he added, "at what I am about to do."

Clenching his long, meagre hand, he struck the patient a violent blow upon the chest.

"Monster!" exclaimed Fred, "you have destroyed him!"

"I have saved him," replied Mirza, calmly. A violent fit of vomiting followed the blow.

For nearly a quarter of an hour the sickness continued. Strange to say, the matter ejected consisted of long fibrous threads, green, resembling, in everything save colour, the seaweed cast upon the beach.

The quantity was enormous.

At the expiration of a quarter of an hour the sufferer appeared to breathe more freely, and he asked to be laid back upon the couch.

"Hold him up," repeated the hakim; "if he responds he dies."

As a matter of course, after such a caution, the entreaty of our hero to be permitted to recline back upon the sofa was unheeded; Fred and Sir Charles continued to support him.

Dr. Burke observed with intense interest that the ends of the last fibres were tinged with blood, and he pointed out the fact to the hakim, who nodded his head.

"Aye," he said, "they were already rooted on the lungs; it is five days, at least, since he took the poison."

When the sickness had entirely subsided, the old man prepared a draught in which he mingled various drugs and simples. His patient swallowed it with far less difficulty than the first.

Mirza anxiously watched its effects.

"Allah kerim!" he exclaimed, after a pause: "the last fibre is removed, and the youth is saved."

A sigh of relief broke from all present.

"Lay him down."

They did as he directed.

"He will sleep for hours, but his slumbers must be watched."

Sir Charles and Wharton both declared their intention of passing the night by the sufferer.

"It is well," said the old man. "Should he wake, give him stimulants; but, beware how you break his sleep, leave nature to herself."

The same process had now to be gone through with Jack Manders, whose sufferings were far less acute than Tyrrel's, for he had not taken the fatal root till several days after him.

The hakim, having completed his task, was about to depart.

"Stay," said the baronet; "you have saved a life that is very dear to me, and to all who know him."

"His star has been fortunate."

"Let this speak the gratitude of his friends."

He placed in the shrivelled hand of the Hindoo a purse filled with gold, and, drawing from his finger a valuable diamond ring, added it to the gift.

Mirza Algee raised the sparkling gem to his head, after the manner of orientals, and then kissed it.

"May your shadow be never the less!" he exclaimed.

Sir Charles thanked him for his wishes.

"And health and wealth attend you."

"Should the former fail," observed the baronet, who really felt impressed with his skill, "I shall send for the hakim Mirza."

"Who will be at the sahib's disposal, though the angel of death stood at his side."

"I have said it," he added, emphatically.

"Brother," said Dr. Burke, "would you have any objection to give or sell me a portion of that peculiar-looking stone?"

This was in allusion to the one he had rasped and put into the draught which saved the life of our hero.

"It is not a stone," replied the old man, drily.

"Root, then?"

"It is not a root."

"Perhaps you will term it a fungus."

The hakim seemed slightly annoyed, for the English physician had hit upon the truth; the remedy was a peculiar species of fungi, found only in the remotest province of India, and which, when dried in the sun, became so hard, and so closely resembled pumice stone, that the first error of the speaker was easily accounted for.

"I may neither sell it nor give it," replied the old man; "I can only administer it to those who suffer."

"But why keep such a secret to yourself?"

"Knowledge is a pearl more precious than gold. Farewell."

So saying the hakim quitted the house.

CHAPTER LXIV.

He that has nature in him must be grateful:

'Tis the Creator's primary great law.

That links the chain of beings to each other.

MADDEN.

OUR readers will doubtless wonder why, after the scene which Jack Manders, Caleb, and the sycee had witnessed in the garden of the temple, precautions had not been taken to prevent the perpetration of the crime which so nearly succeeded in depriving its victim of existence, and that the intention which the former expressed, of bringing his master on a future occasion to the spot, had not been carried out.

It would have been so, had not the deadly root been administered by Hassan the very next day; the languor which immediately ensued rendered the victim incapable of exertion, added to which the groom had disappeared.

The adventure, therefore, had been dismissed from the minds of all but Caleb, who felt that natural impatience which the grateful heart experiences to prove its devotion to its benefactor. Night after night he had returned to the spot, without success; no second interview had taken place between the Brahmin and Al Moorad; or, if it had, it must have been held in the recesses of the temple, where he was unable to penetrate.

The illness of Richard and Jack, from its very nature, appeared to him as the natural effects of the climate—nothing more. Hereafter he believed the assurance which the former gave him, that the next day he should be better.

On the night which followed the detection of the assassin, Caleb was at his post as usual, crouching beneath the thick flowering shrubs in front of the temple. One of those vague presentiments of ill, which most of us in our lives have received without ever being able to account for, weighed upon his spirits; he felt dull and wretched—as if he had once more found himself on board the Caradoc, subject to the tyranny of Captain Gall.

He had been more than an hour on his post when the sound of a footstep startled him, and, unfortunately, he raised his head before the intruder, who proved to be one of the servants of the temple, had passed him. The action was but momentary, for the sense of his imprudence struck him, and he concealed himself again; trusting that he had not been seen. But the quick eye of the Hindoo had marked him; although, with that self-possession and cunning so peculiar to his caste, he betrayed neither surprise nor fear, and passed on without interrupting the low, monotonous chant he had been singing.

"A lucky escape!" mentally ejaculated Caleb, as the object of his fear disappeared beneath the archway of the temple. "I wish I could have seen the fellow's face," he added, "for I feel certain that he is not unknown to me."

He was right; the man had long been employed as a spy about the residence of our hero. Hassan had engaged him in the ostensible capacity of a bheestie or water carrier, and he was now on his way to inform Al Moorad and the chief Brahmin of the detection of their scheme and the imprisonment of their agent.

We must leave poor Caleb for awhile, and follow the native into the interior of the idol's temple.

The hall in which the banker and his confederate were seated was one of the most elaborately decorated in the edifice; the walls painted with representations of the incarnations of Vishnu, and the emblem of Bramah, the supreme deity of the Hindoos. Of the latter deity, singular to say, they have no idol; and the reason assigned for it in the "Veda," or sacred book, is as follows:—

"Of him whose glory is so great there is no image. He is the incomprehensible being who illumines all, delights all, and from whom all proceeds; that by which we live when born, and that to which all must return."

The residence of Bramah is supposed to be in the triangle of Quivelinga, in the centre of a rose.

Had we space, and did not fear to tire our readers by digressions which, however interesting to the antiquarian, or in a literary point, would be foreign to the progress of our tale, we should feel disposed to pursue the reflections which the peculiarity of the symbol of the supreme god of India has awakened. As it is, we must resign the task, merely observing that the ungleamed plains of Hindoo literature are rich in truths, disjointed relics of the past, shreds from the many-coloured garment of old Time—worthless to the ignorant or thoughtless, but to the patient and the learned hieroglyphic keys to the past—spells by which investigation separates truth from fiction.

There is little doubt but the compilers of the Bhagavat had a knowledge of the sacred writings. One expression, in particular, recalls the tremendous I AM of Scripture. As the work is not generally known, we will quote it, before resuming the thread of our narrative:—

"Even I was at first; not any other thing—that which exists, unperceived, supreme."

"I am the creation and dissolution of the whole universe: there is nothing greater than I, and all things hang upon me, even as precious gems on a string."

"I am moisture in the water, light in the sun and moon, sound in the firmament, human nature in mankind, sweet-smelling savour in the earth, glory in the source of light."

"In all things I am life; and in animals I am desire, regulated by moral fitness."

We have indulged in these extracts from the sacred writings of the Hindoos, to show that, however debased the latter have become through the craft and ambition of their priesthood, there was nothing originally in their faith to render them incapable of receiving the great truths of Christianity.

Al Moorad was in high spirits. The last report he had received represented his successful rival at the point of death; the next one he doubted not would confirm it.

"Father," he exclaimed, addressing the Brahmin, who was seated by his side, "the work goes bravely on. One of the hated race of our oppressors, by this time, stands before the judgment-seat of Yamen."

The old man faintly smiled.

"Still, I could have wished," continued the speaker, "that you had not spared Kehoda."

"Spared her!" repeated the aged bigot; "for what? the tremendous sacrifice which has too long been neglected."

"She may escape."

"Impossible!" replied the former. "She is at the chief temple of the offended goddess. Mariatele watches over her."

"The wretched groom, too," muttered the banker.

"He is faithful."

Al Moorad made a gesture of incredulity.

"He would not sacrifice his faith, even to the love of his master," added the speaker. "He must live."

"And yet it would be more prudent to—"

"He shall live!" interrupted the Brahmin, in a tone which admitted of no reply: for the wealthy Hindoo banker was wholly in his power. "And now, urge me no more upon the subject. Although the death of every son and daughter of the Christian race has been decreed, have we not, in pity to thy weakness, consented to spare this Lillian?"

The Hindoo bowed his head, to conceal the mortification he felt at the dictatorial air and words of the speaker.

The servant of the temple entered the hall, and, after inclining with profound respect before the Brahmin, stood, with his arms folded over his chest, waiting until he should question him.

"Now, is the Christian dead?" demanded Al Moorad, hastily.

The man made no reply.

"It is permitted thee to speak," said his superior.

"The sahib Tyrrel has escaped."

"Impossible!" exclaimed both the conspirators.

"The English hakim and the officer came to the house," resumed the messenger, "and brought with them the father of knowledge—Mirza Algee, at whose presence the angel of death fled. He administered the antidote, known only to the sacred race."

"Curse him!" muttered the banker.

"It is like the feringees," calmly observed the Brahmin, who, apart from the general hatred he felt to all of European blood and the desire of obliging his confederate, had no particular motive in wishing for the death of our hero: "it was not his destiny to die."

"Father," exclaimed the Hindoo, with a sudden burst of passion, "you have never loved, never felt the gnawing pangs of jealousy, the agony of knowing that a rival—a successful, happy rival—is by the side of her you worship, the companion of her walks, the sharer of her thoughts and smiles."

The Brahmin eyed him with a look of cold disdain, as if such feelings were far beneath one of his sacred caste, and yet a keen observer might have detected a latent expression on his features, indicating that the frost of age, which rested on his wrinkled brow, had not yet stifled every emotion of the heart; for if love were extinct, ambition still reigned there.

"And Hassan!" he exclaimed, suddenly struck by the danger of discovery to his project.

"Is in prison."

The priest clapped his hands thrice, and several attendants entered. Hastily writing a few lines upon his tablet, he gave it to one of them.

"To Arad, the moonshee," he said, "who resides near the prison."

The man withdrew.

"There is danger," whispered Al Moorad.

"I have guarded against it," replied the old man, with a cynical smile. "Before the dawn, Hassan will be beyond the reach of his enemies."

"Free?"

"The freedom of death," answered the Brahmin, in a tone of indifference; for, like most Asiatics, he recked but little of human life. "You may withdraw," he added, waving his hand to the spy.

The man, instead of obeying him, folded his arms and remained motionless—a sign that he had something further to communicate.

"Speak."

"In passing through the wood in front of the temple, I saw that I was watched."

"By whom?"

"A Christian of the servants of the sahib Tyrrell. I took upon myself to order his arrest."

A grim smile of satisfaction rested on the features of the aged bigot: he had now a Christian in his power.

Caleb was brought into his presence, bound with cords, and the ends of a shawl thrust into his mouth to prevent the possibility of an alarm. The banker laid his hand upon the weapon he wore in his girdle, and, doubtless, would have made short work with the helpless captive, had not his companion restrained him.

"Blood must not be shed within these walls," he said; "to Bramah will I offer him. A Christian and a renegade from our holy faith are now within my power—the sacrifice will be complete."

"Should he escape?"

"Fear not. Long before the dawn of another day he shall be far from Calcutta, on his way to the great temple of Mariatele."

Al Moorad disliked the delay, but circumstances compelled him to submit.

The precaution taken by the cunning priest to prevent his secret being betrayed proved an effectual one, for on the following morning, when Sir Charles Fourrean visited the police court to prefer a charge of attempted assassination against the khansumam Hassan, human justice had been forestalled; the ruffian had been found dead in his cell.

A serpent of a peculiarly venomous kind had stung him, though how it came there no one could explain.

It was not generally found in that part of India.

(To be continued.)

BOAT SONG.

On! beautiful, beautiful over the waters
Glimmer, like sapphire, the rays of the sun;
And sweetly we'll row till the last rosy glow
Of the sunset has faded, and daylight is done.

See how yon islands like phantoms are floating,
And winds toss the blossoms all over the wave,
And, dreamy and wild, like a gay, sportive child,
The beautiful billows our pinnacles lave.

Enough for this life is the joy we are taking,
While over the lake, in the moonlight so gay,
We merrily float and rock to each note
Of the echoing bugle and clarion gay!

Hopes and Helys for the Young.

PROFITABLE READING.

WE have already offered some remarks on books, to show their importance, and some suggestions as to how to read in public so as to give the sense of the author. A word of advice and direction as to the best means of deriving the largest amount of benefit from reading may be acceptable. And we begin by noticing that we should—

Read with attention.—There are hosts of inattentive readers. They skim books, so they say, and if by this means they get all the cream, it might not be an objectionable method; but, in nine cases out of ten, there is no such result. They close the book no wiser than when they opened it. They have made no effort to grasp the meaning of the writer. They forget all they read; and all they remember is indistinct and more likely to lead them into error than guide them into truth. A strong effort of the will to bind down the thoughts to any subject taken in hand, is positively necessary and practically possible—it ought to be done—it may be done—it must be done, if we would read with profit.

Then we must understand what we read. Unless we apprehend the sentiments of an author, we are none the wiser. His thoughts are expressed in his words. We must therefore know the meaning of his words. This is easy, for dictionaries are cheap. When we have procured a good dictionary, we should study it frequently. When we come to an incomprehensible word in any volume we are reading, we must turn to our dictionary, and find out what it means. Never skip the hard words and guess the sense. If there is any thought you cannot understand, think it over, turn it round and round, look at it on every side, and never give it up in despair; above all, never lose the sense of a thought for want of understanding the meaning of words.

It is an excellent plan to commit portions of what we read to memory. We have memories as we have hands and feet, for use. The extent to which our memories can be improved is incalculable. Like the body, its strength depends on exercise. Observe the brawny arm of the smith. It has grown strong and muscular by constant use. It is precisely the same with our mental faculties. In strengthening the memory, the best way is not to attempt too much at the commencement. Let the first lesson be short, add a little to it everyday. Not a single day should be allowed to pass without adding something to our mental store.

Another capital plan is to read with pencil in hand, and mark the margin of our books for future reference. This, common integrity teaches us, must only be done with our own books. It saves time. It more forcibly impresses the mind, and it enables us to judge our past thoughts at a future period—to "talk with our past hours."

It is well to take extracts. This is a fine exercise. Writing out a paragraph once is equal to reading it several times over. And then it is important to have a note-book filled with good thoughts, culled from the best authors. Such a volume of extracts is a real treasure; it will furnish a condensed library; and, in the process of copying, our style and writing are improved. We attend to paragraphs, capitals, stops—for in extracting we keep our eyes open and follow the printer. Our mode of expression insensibly becomes better. We adopt, without knowing it, a more graceful form of speech.

It is well to write on the subject about which we have been reading. When we put our thoughts on paper, it is like turning our minds inside out. If we want to know what is in a purse, we pour its contents on the table; and then we can readily distinguish the coppers from the silver, and the silver from the gold. Until we have done this we may mistake farthings for sovereigns. Many a man has persuaded himself that he possessed an abundance of golden thoughts, but on submitting them to paper, discovered them to be nothing but copper; and men who believed they had nothing but copper, suddenly discovered that their thoughts were virgin gold. Put your thoughts on paper. Test them with pen and ink.

Talk about what we have read. We may just as well converse about what is useful, nay, a thousand times better than that which is useless, and nothing can be more interesting than the subject of a good book. Talk about what you have read. If it is not worth talking about, it is not worth reading. If it is bad, why debase yourself by reading it; if it is worthless, why waste your time over it; if it is good, why keep it to yourself?

In conclusion, we would say be economical. Make the most of your time. Take care of the minutes, the hours will take care of themselves. Devote your leisure time to reading and thinking. Never attempt the first without the last—they should be inseparable. Never be afraid to question your author, and to stop him in his loftiest flight or profoundest depths with the question: Is it so?

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH. CHAPTER IX.

As the weather had become intensely hot, George went to give his friend a French lesson in the cool of the evening. It struck him that Robert's countenance looked remarkably animated. George asked him if he had been reading anything very eloquent, or making a speech, or—

"You need not continue your cross-examination," said Robert: "for I have been making a speech, but only a short one. I was refreshing myself, taking tea, when one of my mother's neighbours dropped in accidentally. This neighbour is a Miss Cribb. She is daily governess in the family of a Mr. Plum, a retired tradesman. My dear mother could not help boasting to her a little of the great progress I was making in French. Instead of listening with satisfaction, Miss Cribb seemed quite indignant when she heard that I was already learning dialogues, and writing, and translating what I learnt."

"That's not the way I should have taught your son," exclaimed she; and then added, turning to me, 'You ought to have been kept for three months at the articles.'

"Forgive my differing from you, Miss Cribb," said I, with all the calmness I could collect, 'but I am quite certain if it had been profitable for me to linger so long over the first part of speech, that my friend George would have directed me to do so. I have unbounded confidence in my instructor.' Having said this, I rose and politely wished Miss Cribb 'good evening.'

"I am very glad, Robert," said George (evidently much pleased), "that you have such confidence in me. Encourage the feeling; it will promote your success as a pupil, and mine as a teacher. Miss Cribb's pupils must advance very slowly if they are kept so long over the article—a part of speech that certainly offers more difficulty in French than in English, but nothing very serious, after all. Of this, as of the seven parts of speech that follow, you have a very correct idea, nothing more; but it was all I wished to give you. Details will be given when, in due time, we revert to things you have lightly touched upon. At length you shall enter into particulars, that even Miss Cribb shall allow that you have a sufficient number of directions given you; but they shall all be intelligible directions—in fact, rules, of which you shall see the illustrations; for I shall keep to my original plan of making theory and practice go hand in hand; and I promise you that you shall not find the details of etymology more difficult than the outlines. As to the article, you will soon understand every one of its peculiarities—aye, and know as much about it as Miss Cribb herself. I shall give you, at the end of my lesson, an exercise on the article, by means of which you will be able to master many of the difficulties to which Miss Cribb has alluded. We shall also dwell some time on the noun, because of the unlucky practice the French have adopted of making inanimate things masculine and feminine. The gender is determined by the termination of the word; and, to accustom your ear to distinguish between masculine and feminine terminations, even before we classify them, I shall direct you to affix m to the masculine nouns, and f to the feminine ones; and, of course, this will only be necessary with inanimate objects; others speak for themselves."

"Yes," said Robert, with a smile; "and the feminine nouns sometimes speak (like Miss Cribb) a little too much."

"Hush, hush!" exclaimed George; "not a word against the ladies. I am quite a Frenchman in my admiration of the fair sex. And now pray don't forget that there are two of the parts of speech still left undefined—the conjunction and the interjection."

"Conjunctions, like prepositions, are generally short words; but they perform a very different office to that assigned to the preposition. There are two kinds of prepositions—the conjunction copulative, and the conjunction disjunctive. The former serves to connect words and sentences, the latter to disjoin them. Example of the copulative—'Vous et moi' (You and I). Example of the disjunctive—'Ni vous ni moi' (Neither you nor I). The interjection expresses any sudden emotion, as 'Oh! Hélas! Hola!' (Oh! Alas! Holloa!)

"In to-day's vocabulary you shall write the French of sacred words, and of some things that belong to sacred subjects—"

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
Religion	La religion (f)
The Holy Scriptures	La sainte écriture (f)
The Gospel	L'évangile (m)
God	Dieu
The Almighty	Le Tout-puissant
The Lord Jesus Christ	Le Seigneur Jésus Christ*
The Holy Ghost	Le Saint Esprit
The apostles	Les apôtres
The evangelists	Les évangélistes
A missionary	Un missionnaire
A church	Une église (f)
A chapel	Une chapelle (f)
A minister	Un ministre
A clergyman	Un ecclésiastique
Prayers	Les prières (f pl)
Hymns	Les cantiques (f pl)

"Of course, Robert," said George, "there are as many words of a serious nature in French as there are in English, but you cannot learn them all at once. And now, if you are not tired, we will resume the dialogue.

"If you remember, we left off at the railway station. You may recollect that the travellers (that is, you and I) had not taken their tickets. Well, they change their plan of route, as you will see by what follows.

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
I have altered my mind.	Je me ravise. Nous n'avons pas encore les billets (m pl) pour Douvres; si cela vous est agréable, allons à Paris par Newhaven et Dieppe.
We have not yet the tickets for Dover; and, if it is agreeable to you, let us go to Paris by Newhaven and Dieppe.
I shall be delighted to do so.	De tout mon cœur (m). Nous jouirons des plus beaux points (m pl) de vue, et nous verrons de belles et anciennes villes (f pl).
We shall enjoy beautiful prospects, and see some fine old towns.
We can set off in a little less than a quarter of an hour.	Nous partirons dans un petit quart (m) d'heure (f).
Shall we go by a first or a second-class carriage?	Irons-nous par une voiture (f) de première ou de seconde classe? (f)
Let us go by a first-class carriage.	Allons par une voiture de première classe.
Where have you put our luggage?	Où avez-vous mis notre bagage? (m)
There it is, sir.	Il est là, monsieur.
We have good places.	Nous avons de bonnes places (f).
I like to have my back to the engine; one escapes the wind and dust.	J'aime avoir le dos (m) tourné à la locomotive (f); ainsi on évite le vent (m) et la poussière (f).
What a length this train is!	Que le convoi (m) est long!
We shall go at a rapid rate presently.	Tout-à-l'heure nous irons bon train (m).
With what rapidity the objects near us seem to pass.	Avec quelle rapidité (f) les objets (m pl) paraissent se succéder!
I hope there is not any danger.	J'espère qu'il n'y a pas de danger (m).
The look-out is making signals, and the train is stopping.	Le cantonnier (m) fait des signaux (m pl), et le convoi (m) s'arrête.
Perhaps the engine is off the rails.	Peut-être que la machine (f) déraile.
Fear nothing. The engine-man has put on the brakes, because we are approaching a siding.	Ne craignez rien (m). Le mécanicien a servi les freins (m pl), parce que nous approchons d'une gare (f) d'arrêt (m).
You comfort me.	Vous me rassurez.
I am beginning to be hungry.	Je commence à avoir faim (f).
So much the better. At there is a refreshment room.	Tant mieux. A — il y a un buffet (m).
And how long do they stop there?	Et combien de temps (m) s'y arrêtent-ils?
A full quarter of an hour.	Un bon quart (m) d'heure (f).
How one enjoys the beautiful country views!	On jouit des belles vues (f) de la campagne!
It is like a fine panorama.	Il semble qu'on voit un beau panorama (m).

EXERCISE ON THE ARTICLE.

1. I have the plaisance of the waiter. 2. Speak to the waiter and tell him to set the table. 3. The mistress of the house is good. 4. The cat of the mistress of the house is ugly. 5. God created man and woman, birds, animals, fishes, fruits, fishes, and insects; he has made gold, silver, copper, diamonds, iron, and the other metals. 6. The willow of the diamonds pleases (to) me.

* The name of our Saviour is sounded according to the rules for pronunciation already given: and observe particularly, that, excepting before a vowel, the final s in the first word, and the st in the second, are mute.

† "Cantiques" is sounded as if written kan-teek. Observe, also, that (m) is added to masculine nouns, (f) to those that are feminine, and that (pl) is added either to the m or the f when nouns are used in the plural number.

the eye. 7. The neatness of the plates, (of the) dishes, (of the) forks, (of the) knives, please (to) the eyes. 8. The taste of (the) water is pleasant; but I prefer that of (the) wine. 9. The son of the master of the house said to the daughter of the mistress of the school, that the room was not warm. 10. Man and woman are the children of God. 11. Dogs are good, but cats are treacherous. 12. Good oranges are better than good apples. 13. France and England are two fine countries. 14. I love fresh eggs, white bread, milk, cream, and good butter. 15. Give me the cups, saucers, decanters, glasses, dishes, and sugar-pot, which are on the table. 16. The books of the father, sister, mother, and brothers of the son of the master of the house are beautiful. 17. The rich are not always happier than the poor.

A KEY TO THE EXERCISE.

1. J'ai la serviette du garçon. 2. Parlez au garçon et dites lui de mettre la table. 3. La maîtresse de la maison est bonne. 4. Le chat de la maîtresse de la maison est méchant. 5. Dieu créa l'homme et la femme, les oiseaux, les animaux, les fleurs, les fruits, les poissons, et les insectes; il a fait l'or, l'argent, le cuivre, les diamants, le fer, et les autres métaux. 6. L'éclat des diamants plaît à Paul. 7. La propreté des assiettes, des plats, des fourchettes, des couteaux, plaît aux yeux. 8. Le goût de l'eau est agréable; mais je préfère celui du vin. 9. Le fils du maître de la maison dit à la fille de la maîtresse de l'école, que la chambre n'était pas chaude. 10. L'homme et la femme sont les enfants de Dieu. 11. Les chiens sont bons, mais les chats sont traîtres. 12. Les bonnes oranges sont meilleures que les bonnes pommes. 13. La France et l'Angleterre sont deux beaux pays. 14. J'aime les œufs frais, le pain blanc, la crème, et le bon beurre. 15. Donnez-moi les tasses, les soucoupes, les carafes, les verres, les plats, et le sucrier, qui sont sur la table. 16. Les livres du père, de la sœur, de la mère, et des frères du fils du maître de la maison sont beaux. 17. Les riches ne sont pas toujours plus heureux que les pauvres.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON VIII.

STABILITY OF HEAVY BODIES (continued).

191. Is the stability of a body standing on a level surface the greater for the centre of gravity being low? It is. It will require a greater displacement to overturn it. It will also be less liable to upset if placed on a sloping surface.

Fig. 10.

192. Illustrate by a familiar fact.—A wagon loaded with stone is less liable to upset than one loaded with hay.

193. By what are ATTITUDES controlled?—By the necessity of preserving the centre of gravity.

194. Illustrate by an example.—If a man carries a load on his back, he stoops forward to keep the centre of gravity over his feet.

195. Suppose he bears a load in one hand or on one shoulder?—He leans to the other side, and if he carries it in his arms he leans backward, for the same purpose.

196. If he thrusts one leg out, what must he do?—He must throw his arms to the opposite side, or incline his body in that direction, to balance it.

197. How does the rope dancer perform his feats of agility?—He balances himself with a heavy pole which he holds in his hands. He counteracts any tendency to fall on the one side by thrusting the pole toward the other side.

198. How long will a wall or tower stand securely?—So long as the perpendicular line drawn through its centre of gravity falls within its base.

199. How is this illustrated?—A striking illustration is furnished by the celebrated leaning tower of Pisa, which is 315 feet high, with an inclination from the perpendicular of 12 feet.

Fig. 11.

NOTE.—In the accompanying diagram the line from the summit to the ground, passing through the centre of gravity, falls within the base, and the tower stands securely. If, however, the tower was carried a little higher, the perpendicular line passing through the centre would fall without the base, and the structure could no longer support itself.

THE LEVER.

200. What is a lever?—It is a bar of wood or metal, movable around a fixed point called the fulcrum.

201. For what general purpose is the lever used?—To raise a weight, or overcome a resistance greater than the power exerted; in other words, to gain power.

202. How many kinds of levers are there?—Three; divided according to the relative position of the power, the weight, and the fulcrum.

203. Describe the difference which distinguishes them from one another.—In a lever of the first kind, the fulcrum is between the power and the weight. In the second, the weight is between the fulcrum and the power. In the third, the power is between the fulcrum and the weight.

204. Are the power and weight always applied on opposite sides of the fulcrum?—No; they are sometimes applied on the same side.

205. What is necessary to gain power, by the use of the lever?—That the power should act at a point farther from the fulcrum than the weight does.

206. If the distance of the power from the fulcrum is twice as great as the distance of the weight, how much greater is the weight than the power which balances it?—It is twice as great. If the distance of the power is three times that of the weight, the weight is three times the power, and so on.

207. What is the distance of the power or weight from the fulcrum called?—The lever arm, or leverage, of the force.

Fig. 12.

208. In the case of the lever represented in Fig. 12, which is the greater, the power, P, or the weight, W?—The power; because it acts nearer the fulcrum, or with a smaller leverage than the weight.

209. It seems, then, that with this lever we lose power instead of gaining it—can it be used to any advantage?—It can be advantageously used when it is desirable to obtain a more rapid motion.

210. Show that we may gain speed with it.—When this form of lever turns around its fulcrum, F, the point, A, at which the resistance acts, moves faster than the point B, at which the power acts.

211. How does the loss of power compare with the gain of speed?—We lose power in the same proportion that we gain speed.

212. Can this be avoided in any mechanical contrivance?—It cannot. There is often more power at command than is needed to overcome the resistance.

213. Give an example of the application of this kind of lever.—The treddle of a turning lathe, represented in Fig. 13. A small motion of the foot causes the spindle to turn rapidly.

214. Explain the figure.—The treddle is a flat piece of board, movable about one end; the foot presses on the treadle near that end, and the pressure is transmitted by means of a rod from the other end to the spindle of the lathe.

Fig. 13.

215. Mention another, and the most interesting, application of this form of lever.—Our limbs, and the limbs of most animals, are levers of this description.

216. Explain, by the example of a man undertaking to raise a weight in his hand, by bending his arm at the elbow-joint, as represented in Fig. 14.—The elbow-joint is the fulcrum, and a strong muscle attached to the bone of the arm on the upper side, and just below the joint, is the power. In Fig. 14, a is the joint or fulcrum, and the muscle is at b.

Fig. 14.

217. What is the advantage of this arrangement?—A slight contraction of the muscle gives considerable motion to the limb.

218. In raising a heavy weight from the floor and holding it out at arm's length, the whole arm acts as a lever, with the fulcrum at the shoulder joint—how does the contractile force of the muscle at the shoulder joint compare with the weight raised?—To hold 50 pounds at arm's length requires an expenditure of muscular force at the shoulder equal to 2,450 pounds.

219. Has this feat ever been performed?—It has, by men of very great strength.

220. If we gain power with certain levers, do we not lose velocity in the same proportion?—We do. It moves only half as fast when the lever is in motion; and the weight is twice as great as the power.

221. How is it with other mechanical contrivances or machines?—We can in no way gain power without losing speed in an equal proportion.

222. A man can easily lift a stone weighing 10 pounds to the height of 3 feet; suppose he should undertake, with the same muscular force, to raise a stone weighing 100 pounds to the same height, with the aid of a machine, how much longer would it take?—It would take ten times as long; and the force would have to be exerted through a distance of 30 feet.

223. Give an example of the application of the lever.—A pump-handle; or a bar used to pry up a heavy weight, as in Fig. 15.

Fig. 15.

224. Mention other instances of the useful application of the same form of lever.—The common balance, for weighing bodies; and the steelyard, used for the same purpose.

225. On what principle does an oar act?—On the principle of the lever.

226. Where is the fulcrum?—The resistance of the water to the blade of the oar is the fulcrum: the boat is the weight or resistance, and the hand of the rower is the power.

THOMAS FAIRBAIRN.

THERE is no class of her citizens of which England has more reason to be proud than the class of civil engineers. At the head of this class stand George and Robert Stephenson, father and son, and William and Thomas Fairbairn, also father and son. Emerging from the lowliest ranks, these men show of what sterling metal the body of the English people is made. Appearing at the very moment when they were wanted, these men also illustrate the flexibility of adaptation and fecundity of supply with which society in these favoured lands is endowed. But for these men, of small value would have been the coals of Durham, the enterprise of Lancashire, the cotton of the United States. In virtue of their genius, industry, and skill, myriads of human beings are now living in ease, if not abundance, who would never have been living at all; and the most distant parts of the globe are brought into mutually beneficial contact, which otherwise would have been sundered in space, and alienated in heart. Men such as these are, then, the true benefactors of humankind. These are they that senates and princes ought to honour, and these are they whose names a grateful posterity will encircle with undying fame. Yet are these the very persons who care least for popular favour. It is not that they are insensible to the good opinion of their fellow men, but so ample, so full, so enduring, are the satisfactions they enjoy in the simple exercise of their powers, and the constant employment of their activities; that they are to a great extent independent of all external things, and quietly and contentedly leave the world to take its own course, concerned only to confer upon it the largest amount of pure and lasting good.

Of the two Fairbairns, William, the elder, still lives to enjoy the hard-earned fruits of a life of honourable enterprise. Tough and plastic as the best of his own iron, he has raised himself from the forge and the hammer to culture, respect, wealth, and position: Loved in his family, valued among his fellow citizens, honoured in his profession, and highly estimated throughout the world, he enjoys a hale and vigorous old age, surrounded on all sides with silent or speaking testimonies to the usefulness of his laborious life. His son, Thomas Fairbairn, whose portrait stands at the head of this memoir, was born in Manchester in the year 1823. Not unnaturally he embraced the profession of engineering, in which his father had already achieved a high reputation. Passing through the several grades of service, and making himself a proficient at every step, Mr. Thomas Fairbairn took the control of the vast establishment conducted by his father in Manchester, when in 1854 that gentleman retired from the active pursuits of business. In this important position Mr. Thomas Fairbairn has displayed that calm and persevering enterprise, that fertility of resource, that unwearied industry which characterises the merchants of Manchester. In another prominent feature of their character Mr. Thomas Fairbairn has gained distinguished honour. "Manchester men" are full of practical benevolence. It is a gross error to suppose that they find no pleasure except in money-making. Vast fortunes doubtless they do accumulate. Equally true is it that they spend large sums for the simple promotion of the public good. From long and intimate acquaintance with Manchester society, the writer feels himself justified in declaring that nowhere is there a larger amount of money-giving, as well as money-making. The chief reason is this, namely, that nowhere is there a larger amount of superfluity. And why? because everybody, including the richest, lives far within his means. "Enough and to spare," therefore, is the order of the day. The fact receives illustration from the late commercial crisis. That crisis which fell like a hurricane on New York, Glasgow, Liverpool, Hamburg, &c., passed over Manchester with slight and transient damage. A higher credit than can result from pecuniary liberality may be claimed for Manchester tradesmen. They are not scholars; they may easily be surpassed in drawing-room refinements; they must be blamed for letting Owen's College pine for lack of students; but possessing sterling sense, good hearts, active and vigorous minds, all disciplined and balanced by constant exercise and varied information, they have a keen and full perception of what is for their own real good and the real good both of all around them, and of their country at large. Hence they are sound politicians, good economists, considerate employers, and, in the true sense of the term, benefactors of all whose condition they can affect. How many of the great undertakings, the high thoughts, the noble sympathies of the present day have been either originated or fostered and matured in the metropolis of the cotton manufacture!

In exemplification of these observations, we may point to Mr. Thomas Fairbairn. For several years he has, under a well-known signature, been a leading contributor to the Times newspaper. His communications, ranging over a great variety of subjects, have been marked by that practical good sense and impartial good will which seek and go far to secure "the greatest good of the greatest number." In this laudable spirit, and with equal point of force, he has written on the relations of employer and employed; on the present state of British manufacture, as compared with previous states; on legislation, as it affects manufacturing interests; on parliamentary reform; on banking, &c. When, in 1851-2, the manufacturing districts were sorely disturbed, and their prosperity seriously imperilled by associated bodies of working engineers, Mr. Fairbairn, by his contributions to the Times, greatly contributed to the diffusion of exact and reliable information, and gradually prepared the way for a return of masters and men to a good understanding.

The same practical benevolence actuated Mr. Fairbairn, in taking a foremost part in the Great Exhibition of Art Treasures, with which Manchester honoured itself in the year 1857. The rise, progress, and success of this enterprise was something marvellous. A few gentlemen, well-known and highly esteemed in their own circles, but of no great repute beyond, met together, and at once contributed nearly £20,000, as a guarantee fund for the purpose of preparing the way for an Exhibition of Art Treasures of the United Kingdom. The £20,000 soon became £40,000, and, ere long, reached £80,000. Foremost among the guarantors appeared Mr. Fairbairn's name. It was a rare specimen of benevolence for a gentleman to contribute his £500 or his £1,000 towards a matter of taste. The liberality was crowned with success. Prepared to pay as much as was required, even to the last pound, the generous originators have not been called upon to pay one penny. The exhibition was self-supporting. Better still, a surplus remains of from £3,000 to £4,000. This is a great result. Most important is it to show, by actual instances, that enterprises for popular pleasure and profit may be made to pay their own cost, and even have something in hand for similar purposes. Great as are the services rendered by Mr. Fairbairn and the other members of the executive committee, they have done most good of all by the wonderful pecuniary success they have achieved by wisdom, care, and skill, never equalled in a similar effort.

Those of their fellow-citizens by whom they are best known, will be the readiest to declare that their election to the duties of the executive was a happy thing for the undertaking. What that undertaking should effect depended on the idea entertained of its object by those who were at the centre. Should it be a mere show—a display of beauty in art—an appeal to the eye, to the taste? Objects worthy in themselves, yet not the worthiest; and none but the worthiest would satisfy Mr. Fairbairn and his associates. If properly studied, what more truly or more beneficially educational than art? Educational, then, it was resolved the exhibition should be. For this end, every proper means was taken, and educational the exhibition was. Of course, there was a full share of mere gaiety and display; but thousands brought away from those halls impressions no less durable than pure, refining, and ennobling; and a much larger number of persons, varying no less in rank than in culture, had tastes called into existence whence many will derive ever-growing pleasures. Specially gratifying is it that so many of the working classes frequent the exhibition. The refinement of the taste is intimately connected with the improvement of the character. Already signs are visible of the beneficial effects on the moral tone of the district, which may be observed by the vigilant eye of intelligence. The permanent exhibition in Peel Park, Salford, is visited by the people far more than before; the parks of the city in general prove more attractive; the free-libraries are busy; and two "people's colleges"—one in Manchester, another in Salford—have been recently set on foot.

The numerous benefits conferred by Mr. Fairbairn on Manchester and his native country, have not failed to call forth acknowledgments. The Queen, in visiting the Exhibition in June, 1857, intimated her willingness to confer on Mr. Fairbairn, with others, the honour of knighthood. That gentleman did not, however, feel at liberty to profit by her Majesty's gracious disposition. It was not because he undervalued honours bestowed by the hand of royalty; but he held that such honours can answer their proper end only in being discriminative. At present knighthood is vulgarised in England. Gained by persons whose sole claim is money or mayoralty, and whose chief function in society is to vend this bane or the other, knighthood can be desired by none who are conscious of solid worth. If a bauble of the sort must be retained by the monarch for the delectation of some of her spoiled and overgrown children, let there be an order of merit which the best in the nation shall think it worthy to struggle for; and then men like the subject of this notice may descend into the arena without discredit. Something of the kind was received by Mr. Fairbairn when the King of the Belgians presented to him a private gold medal as a mark of his approval of the exhibition, and of the pleasure his Majesty experienced during his visit to Manchester. The pleasure Mr. Fairbairn hence derived was renewed by an expression of satisfaction on the part of his fellow-citizens.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

THOMAS FAIRBAIRN, ESQ. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY R. MENNAH.

On Wednesday, 30th of the last year, the Mayor of Manchester, Ivie Mackie, Esq., gave a déjeuner at the Town-hall of that city, for the purpose of presenting to the Executive Committee of the Art Treasures Exhibition a resolution of approval and thanks adopted by the Council some days before.

There sat down eighty gentlemen, comprising, besides the members of the corporation, several of the most highly respected members of the community. The resolution ran as follows:—"That this Council is deeply impressed with the great advantages conferred upon this city, and the community at large, by the recent Exhibition of Art Treasures of the United Kingdom—an exhibition of works of art unrivalled in magnitude and value, the examination and study of which were eminently calculated to improve the knowledge and elevate the taste of all visitors; and, by bringing together different classes not accustomed to associate, to promote goodwill and kindly feeling amongst all sections of the people. That, gratefully acknowledging the munificent liberality with which the heavy expenses to be incurred were originally guaranteed, as also the noble manner in which the applications made for the loans of works of art were responded to by the contributors, this Council feels called upon, as representing, and on behalf of, the citizens of Manchester, in an especial manner to tender its thanks to Thomas Fairbairn, Esq., the chairman, Sir James Watts, Thomas Ashton, William Entwistle, Joseph Heron, Edmund Potter, and Sigismund J. Stern, Esqrs., the members of the Executive Committee, for their disinterested and arduous labours; for the untiring zeal and unremitting attention, which, during so lengthened a period, they devoted to the undertaking; for the judgment and ability which characterised all their proceedings and arrangements, and which so largely contributed to render completely successful the most memorable exhibition of modern times, conferring lasting fame and honour upon the city in which it has been held."

In returning thanks for the compliment, Mr. Fairbairn, among other suitable remarks, observed:—"We acknowledge, with peculiar pleasure, the steady and excellent support that was extended to the exhibition by its visitors of all ranks and classes; and, fortunately, we can also record, with unfeigned satisfaction and pride, the admirable conduct of the humbler classes, who, on this occasion as on many previous ones, proved themselves most jealous guardians of the safety of property and the truest friends of order."

TRENT.

THE foundation of the city of Trent is lost in the mists of antiquity. In the time of Augustus it was elevated to the rank of a Roman colony, and assigned to the Pepiria family. It was then the principal city of that part of Italy which extended to the east of the Lake of Garda, and which at the beginning of Roman history was occupied partly by the Etruscans and partly by the Euganeans, or Cisalpine Gauls. It was for a long period regarded as a place of considerable importance.

In the division of Italy by Augustus, it was comprised in the tenth department. After the fall of the Roman Empire, it passed into the hands of the Goths, and formed one of the thirty-six duchies of Lombardy.

At the beginning of the eleventh century Trent became a marquisate independent of Italy; in 1802 it passed from under the domination of Austria, and was ceded to Bavaria; in 1810 it was re-united to the kingdom of Italy; and in 1815 annexed to the province of the Tyrol.

These vicissitudes explain the architectural peculiarities of the city of Trent, and the diversity of style which is noticeable in its public buildings.

The city is formed by a half circle, flanked by two massive gate towers. The Adige flowing around the walls divides the town from the verdant fields which stand around it, and the effect is singularly beautiful. The eye wanders from the old castle to the modern convent of the Capuchins; and from the magnificent villas to the little church, which, on the summit of a hill, stands out boldly against the deep blue sky. Everything is picturesque—everything in harmony—nature and art combine to render the appearance of the city and its suburbs peculiarly attractive.

THE CITY OF TRENT.

Within the walls there is much to engage the attention. Here the contrasts between wealth and poverty, luxury and misery are most striking. The two extremes of society are strongly blended together—Lazarus sitting in the hall of Dives. There are but two or three streets which present anything at all approaching that regularity of building common in most European cities. The disposition of the streets is without plan, and the buildings—huddled together in juxtaposition—are the strangest ever seen. Here is a splendid palace, flanked by a hovel falling into ruin. Here is an edifice, the basement of which is decorated with all the wealth of art, but whose upper storeys would figure appropriately in the worst city's worst rookery. The handsome gothic windows, the elegant balconies, the costly mouldings crowned by some heavy roof and upper storeys, supported by huge timbers, are repaired with rough planks, ominously overhanging the street below, as if the main effort of the builder had been to test how far the law of gravity would allow a wall to depart from the perpendicular.

The contrast of the buildings in this city—the city of princes and beggars, rags and riches—is its most remarkable feature. Next to this are the multitude of clock-towers and belfries—rude erections of the middle ages. One of these, near the Place du Dôme, is perhaps the most barbarous in all Italy. By the way, this same public square is a curious place. The surrounding houses date from the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. In addition to the usual extravagance of gable and chimney, the fronts are covered with gigantic paintings. On of them represents a procession of Hercules, his attendants being fantastically coloured white and blue. But the grand square is worthy the consideration of the artist and the tourist. It has much to interest both. The old houses, the antique fountain, the gay groups of peasants and country carts, make up a singular but pleasing picture.

One of the most interesting buildings is the palace of Galasse. The delicacy of its architecture in the style of the Renaissance, is rendered more than usually agreeable by the uncouth ugliness of the structures which surround it.

The people are proud of their churches, and regard with particular satisfaction that of St. Mary the Great. It is that in which the famous council of Trent assembled from 1545 to 1560. The memory of this illustrious assembly is preserved by a wretched picture black with age, which still exists on one of the walls.

Trent, notwithstanding its ancient origin, contains no remains of antique art, with the exception of a fine head of the god Terminus, and a bas-relief representing a cock-fight in the style of a fragment found at Innsbruck.

In following one of the three principal roads in the direction of Verona, Padua, and Germany, we arrive at a celebrated precipice formed by the embankment of the Adige. It is the precipice of Ponte Alto. At some distance from this is erected, under the shadow of cypress and other trees, a monastery. It is impossible to convey any adequate conception of the melancholy beauty of the landscape, seen from this spot at the setting of the summer sun. The soft sweetness of the evening affects the senses. The city sends up its murmur of activity. The pastures are dotted with cattle. Passing by as in a dream, you see the half-naked mountaineer, and the peasant women with their dark eyes and olive complexions; while the last rays of the sun linger fondly, as though unwilling to depart, on the summit of the hills, till the moon rises and bathes everything in a soft flood of silvery light.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER XLIX.

He builds too low who builds beneath the skies.
COWPER

GREAT events, like great misfortunes, love a crowd.

Already two very important occurrences have startled Ada out of her habitual composure,—the most unexpected and astonishing catastrophe that secured to her father the title and estates of the earl, his cousin, and the return of Gerald St. Maur, the only man in whom she had ever felt that warm and passionate interest which at one time would have made her gladly accept the offer of his hand and heart.

But Ada, though still fully alive to all the charms of Gerald's frank, manly nature, is no longer the impulsive, rash, unthinking creature she was. She is no longer dependent on Gerald for peace and happiness. A purer fountain has been opened to her than that over which first love presides, and where at one moment the waters dance and sparkle, and at another all is drought and disappointment.

At one time Ada had looked up to Gerald, so learned, so gifted. Now Ada feels that in the only true wisdom she is much fitter to lead him than he her; and reverence—so great an element in woman's love—is gone from her feelings towards him.

Compared with the men with whom she has of late been associated—the God-loving, earnest, wise, thoughtful Jem Goodman and Mr. Stephen, Gerald's aims seem so paltry, so selfish, so vain,—fashionable clubs and balls in Belgravia or May-fair.

Never—never—never will she give up her high mission and forsake her Saviour and her work for such a vain and frivolous existence.

If she ever marries Gerald, it must be when he has made himself worthy of her; and of that there seems no chance.

We have said events, like misfortunes, love a crowd; and Ada found it so when, just as she was going to see her father, she was told that Mr. Goodman begged to speak with her.

Ada ran down to the library to welcome him. He looked very pale and grave; and, as Ada begged him to be seated, he passed his hand over his face, and it was with a great effort, and with tears in his eyes, that he said—

"I came, miss, to give you the first intimation of what I know will shock your kind heart; but, as a principal witness, you must be prepared. Poor Ben Darrell's trial comes on at the Central Criminal Court this day week."

"How is he?" faltered Ada.

"Ill in mind and body, miss, but I think there's a dawn of peace and hope for his soul. He thinks it'll go agin him, miss, he won't hear no other; and he says—though he never meant to kill his poor wife, and had no idea what he was about—he deserves to die again and again for his cruelty to her and the little ones."

"But you do not think he will be found guilty?"

"They do in the prison, miss, and they're not often out. He was heard to swear he'd do for her; and, though the man and woman, their neighbours, as heard him, had disappeared—and if it warn't for she, Stunning Steenie mightn't go for much—yet, Natt Stone has spent hundreds to find 'em out, and get 'em ready to appear; and then, miss, wife-beating and wife-murder are the crying sins of these times, and the legislature is doing all it can to make examples, and this do seem a very bad case indeed. He three days and three nights at hard drink, and she no food at all; and yet he loved her. It was all the drink. Oh, miss! if they do hang him, what a lesson to drunkards!"

"Oh, I hope it will not come to that, Mr. Goodman," said Ada.

Jem shook his head; he evidently thought it would. "And, about your papa, miss?" said Jem Goodman; "you mentioned, miss, that you wished me to see the good gentleman. I shall not have much leisure, miss, now, till Ben Darrell's trial is over, and his fate decided one way or the other, but, if Sir Augustus was agreeable, this morning, miss."

"I have spoken to him much and often about you, Mr. Goodman," said Ada, "and yesterday he said he should so like to see you. I will go and ask him now, if he is willing to receive your visit."

"I hope he knows, miss, that I'm a poor, unlearned man, only wise—"

"Wise unto salvation, and that is wise enough," said Ada. "I will go to my father, and return directly."

In a few minutes Ada did return.

"My father will see you at once, Mr. Goodman," she said. "He is very low, nervous, and dejected to-day. He has had a bad night, and I am afraid you will think he looks very ill. But don't let him see that you think so, for he is very nervous about himself, and his doctor told me he must be cheered up, or he would not answer for the consequences. I have told you that he had at one time an iron constitution, but it has been sorely tried. I cannot say how, but you will guess. Follow me. I wished to send for the clergyman to talk to him and read to him, he is so full of terrors. But Dr. McGlossom assured me if I did, papa would take alarm; and in his present state, a shock might be fatal."

Ada led the way to her father's room. He was sitting up in an arm-chair by the fire, and looked, as invalids always do, much worse and weaker than when in bed. But ill or well, there was always a kindly, courtly grace about Sir Augustus, and he bowed as politely as if his visitor had been a nobleman, and held out the thin, tremulous hand, in the peculiar shaking and twitching of which, Jem, who had made intemperance a study, recognised the earliest stage of delirium tremens.

"Give Mr. Goodman a chair, Ady," said the invalid. "I'm glad to see you, sir," he added, addressing Jem. "My daughter has told me so much in your praise and in that of your principles, that I'm very glad to make your acquaintance."

"Ah, sir," said Jem, "it's but little we can do; but that little it's our duty to do."

This was Jem's favourite opening remark. And then he took out his handkerchief. He was not a little affected to see so fine and gracious a man, and one evidently not much passed the prime of life, so beaten down—trampled down under foot by the same demon that had brought Ben Darrell, perhaps, to the gallows.

"Nay," said Sir Augustus, "my good girl there gives a very different account of you. She tells me of wonders you have done and are daily doing."

"Has she told you my principles, sir, and by what means, and by God's blessing, I have been enabled to do what you are so kind as to call wonders?"

"She has given me some idea of your views, sir; but I should like to hear them explained more fully. I'm a poor wreck, sir; and I begin to think I've gone on a wrong system. And if it should please God to spare me for a few years longer, for her sake and—"

Here bodily and mental weakness overpowered him, and he wept.

Mr. Goodman made a sign to Ada to leave him alone with her father. Ada gently approached, kissed his trembling, hot hand, and saying, "Papa, I'll go and see if your medicine is come," left the room.

"You see that bottle, Mr. Goodman," said Sir Augustus, pointing to a table on which stood a spirit-stand, a wine-glass, a tumbler, and a glass jug full of cold water. "Give me a glass of brandy; I feel as if I were dying."

Jem Goodman felt his pulse. "There is no danger," he said; "and I cannot, even at your own request, Sir Augustus, administer poison to you. You are low, hot, feverish—all these symptoms that liquid fire will in the end increase, though it may for a moment seem to enliven you."

"Give it me, or I shall faint," said Sir Augustus. "It is too late."

"No, sir; it is just the time."

He went to the table and poured out a glassful of the clear iced water Ada had placed there for Jem Goodman's own use. "Now, drink this, sir!" he said.

"I have not drunk a glass of water since I was a boy."

"Try its effect," said Jem, earnestly; "and may God, in his great mercy, bless it to you."

Sir Augustus drank a large draught.

"It is refreshing," he said. "I had no idea water was such pleasant drink."

"Now, Sir Augustus," said Jem, going to the washing-stand, pouring out a basin of cold water, and bringing a sponge and towel, "will you be advised by me? I am here to do you what good I can. You say you grow daily weaker and weaker; that shows the system you are going on does not answer. Will you give mine a fair trial? I believe it is not too late, and that you can, with God's blessing, be restored to health of body far better than you have enjoyed of late, and of mind and soul such as you have never known."

"Work your will, my good sir," said the baronet, kindly; "but I fear it is too late."

Jem Goodman then sponged the hot head, flushed and yet flabby face, chest, arms, and hands of Sir Augustus with the cold water, rubbing them dry with a coarse towel until the friction produced a glow, and then he persuaded him to drink what was left in the tumbler.

"I must say I feel revived and refreshed," said Sir Augustus. "I am much obliged to you, Mr. Goodman."

"Now," said Jem, having carefully covered up each part he had rubbed, and once more wrapped up the invalid in his flannels and silk wadded wrapper, "I am going to open the window."

He did so. It opened on a balcony gay with flowers, bright in the sun, and stirred by the west wind.

"Take my arm," said Jem; "let me help you out on to the balcony for a few minutes."

"How delightful!" said Sir Augustus. "I have not breathed this air for a month."

"You feel stronger now," said Jem; "and, if you will allow me, I will, when you return to your arm-chair, explain to you my principles, and the experience on which they are founded. I have a few reports to read to you, and, from what I have seen, I feel certain that, if you will promise me to abstain from all stimulants till I see you again, I shall find you, ere long, convalescent."

After some demur, the promise was given.

Sir Augustus, who had naturally a quick insight into character, soon discovered the fervent philanthropy, and true disinterestedness of Jem Goodman's nature. He grew intensely interested in his sketch of his principles, his experience, and his own life, enlivened as it was by many anecdotes of a humorous nature, and rendered interesting by touching episodes of tragic interest, all connected with strong drink.

When Ada returned, which she did not do until her father's bell rang for his early dinner, she found a great improvement in his looks and spirits. He declared he felt something very like an appetite, for the first time for many weeks; and cordially he thanked Jem Goodman, and begged him to repeat his visit as soon and as often as possible.

Jem gladly promised compliance—explained to Ada that whenever her father felt unusually faint, low, and feverish, cold water, externally and internally, was to be resorted to; that he had promised to abstain from every kind of stimulant until they met again; pointed to several works on the great subject of temperance which he wished Ada to read to her father—and then took his leave, amid the thanks of both, to hurry off on another errand of mercy, namely, to see Ben Darrell in Newgate, and try to comfort his heart, raise his spirits, and save his soul.

Sir Augustus ate a bit of whiting and a slice of the breast of a chicken with something very like a relish.

And after his dinner Ada told him the important news of his accession to the title and fortune of his cousins.

He certainly was moved by it, but not half as much so as Ada had expected.

It touched her heart to hear him say, "I'm glad of it, Ada, for your sake and your mother's. She always so coveted a title, and the precedence it brings. And oh, Ady, if Mr. Goodman is right, and it is not too late, and I can yet be saved by a life of abstinence from the effects of one of intemperance, the temperance cause, my girl, shall have a powerful advocate in Augustus, Earl of Glenlonely, and I'll build a refuge for all poor reformed drunkards who are willing to take the pledge, and Jem Goodman shall be its master, with a handsome salary, good rooms, coals, and candles, as the advertisements say."

Ada was overjoyed; her father was in good spirits. He smiled—he who had not smiled at all for a month, not such a smile for years. How in her heart she blessed Jem Goodman and the temperance movement. Oh, if her father were indeed saved and restored to himself, to her, and to society!

"I did not sleep at all last night, Ady," he said. "If you will help me to my bed-room, I will lie down for an hour. Bring one of those books Mr. Goodman brought. Your sweet voice, my angel child, will lull me to sleep."

Ada read, and for awhile he listened; then by degrees his eyes closed and he fell into a sound sleep, a sleep so calm and so free from the starts and spasms she had of late remarked in his brief slumbers, that she felt sure a great change for the better had commenced. No wonder that the affectionate Christian daughter felt her tears fall, and the name of Jem Goodman rise to her lips as she sank on her knees in earnest, grateful prayer.

Her father woke at the end of two hours much refreshed, and Ada proposed to him to have tea with her in her own little boudoir, which was on the same floor.

Both father and daughter thoroughly enjoyed that quiet little repast.

CHAPTER L.

There is a pleasure in poetic pains
That none but poets know.—COWPER.

Mrs. GOLIGHTLY recovered rapidly. She—as she herself boasted—had "never applied hot and rebellious liquors to her blood."

She was of an iron constitution. Her mother was a Scotchwoman, who had lived to be a hundred, and then died from an accident.

This was Mrs. Golightly's first serious illness, and it was brought on, as she herself said, by a species of intemperance, and would teach her a sort of moral and intellectual abstinence for the future. She had entered so warmly—heart, brain, spirit, and soul—into her work, and had so often remained at her desk (after Ellen had left her) till dawn, that she was already over wrought and upset, when the interview-with the publishers put the finishing stroke to her excitement.

A determination to succeed, in spite of what she considered a base combination against her, her book, and her sex, induced her, although her head ached, her pulses throbbed, and her face was flushed, to return to her desk; and it was while fired by a sense of her own and her sex's "rights and wrongs," that the thought of Messrs. Sneer and Bluster, who had published some works written by women in their own defence, crossed her excited, and now disordered, mind. We would not on any account lower this excellent lady in our readers' opinion, but it is quite certain that when she rushed out in her writing costume, her mental balance was a little disturbed. It was the natural result of dwelling too long and too exclusively on one subject, and it should be a lesson to all not to do so, for if the strong-minded Mrs. Golightly could not do it with impunity, those of smaller heads and more delicate organisation, of course, would incur a still greater risk by devoting themselves too entirely to one pursuit.

However, after some dozen of leeches had gratified their thirst for blood, and after she had been cupped, blistered, and well dosed, to all of which she submitted because she was not quite herself, Mrs. Golightly, looking very leaden, hollow, and gaunt, but perfectly rational, was enabled to thank Ellen for her watchful love, to understand what had happened, and to inquire after her beloved MS.

Luckily it was safe; and on the fourth day after her attack, Mrs. Golightly was able to get up, and enjoy a roast chicken, mashed potatoes, and batter pudding, with her kind and devoted pupil-patroness, Ellen St. Ange.

The absence of Mrs. Golightly, and still more that of gentle, kind, endearing Ellen, had been remarked at the Green Fields Ragged School—indeed, Ada, who attended regularly, and would have done so, had she, instead of becoming an earl's daughter, been a duchess in her own right, Ada—or rather Lady Ada Pemberton—was touched by the deep and affectionate anxiety evinced during the illness of the strong-minded woman—not merely by the children of her own class, who knew her well, but by the poor women in the mothers' gallery, who were a good deal afraid of her, but yet did ample justice to her zeal, her perseverance, and her resolution to spare neither them nor herself in the acquirement of knowledge.

"Poor dear old soul!" said Apple Blossom. "I hope 'tain't with her as Festus said it wor with St. Paul, as she her blessed self read to us the last time she wor here."

"What do ye mean, Apple Blossom?" asked one of the women, looking up from her work. "I don't remember nothink as Festus said to Paul."

"Don't 'ee, then, Molly Muddle," said Apple Blossom; "and thee can read and write dacent, and is a good scholar; and I—poor Mrs. Golightly used to say I shouldn't never come to read like a Christen, and yet I remembers Festus said to St. Paul, 'Much larnin' doth make thee mad!' And I'm sure, if much larnin' will make a body mad, it's no wonder if Mrs. Golightly is downright crazy—for oh, the book she've wrote, if it wor Latin and Greek, it couldn't sound grander or be more forrin to anythink I ever heerd. I couldn't understand not two loines in a page. But I know it wor somethink about some poor females as she knows on, that's got more wrongs nor rights, and is kept in bondage, and ignorance, never tached nothink; and no pleasure in life, not like we, with our homes and childern, and all our comforts!" Poor Apple Blossom! a tear trembled in her beautiful eyes as she tried to speak cheerily, and as if she were happy in her husband and her home; but that tear stole down a pale cheek (Apple Blossom's cheek used to have the downy blush of a peach), and that forced smile played on lips that no longer boasted the bright scarlet of the mountain ash-berry.

"Don't go for to make no brags, Apple Blossom," said Molly Muddle; "them forrin women as you says her book wor about, warn't wuss off nor we. I ha'n't seed Pat this blessed week. He wor paid up for a tough job out at Hackney, he and that drunken chap Slybrute; and though he knowed the rent wor over due, and I and the babbies downright starving, he've gone off with Slybrute, drinking and pleasuring, and never comed aught. Looker here," and, sobbing, she lifted up her thin, faded skirt, "I've had to pawn my flannel petticoat, and," holding out her hand, "my wedding ring, too; and every stick would have been seized, only Mr. Goodman happened to meet me, crying on my way to the landlady; and he went with me, and bless his gen'rous, Christian spirit, he paid one month, and got him to let t'other run on till we see what Pat's about. Lor, I knows what he's about!"

"Well," said Apple Blossom, "till Pat comes to his senses, Molly Muddle, I can lend thee a warm woollen petticoat, lass, and kindly welcome thee'll be. Come home with me this evening, and I'll give it to thee."

"Thank 'ee kindly, Apple Blossom," said Molly, glad of the petticoat, but a little envious of the better fortunes of her friend. "I can't make out no ways how ye keep things tidy about ye, for Bob's no better than Pat when drink's consarned. Slybrute told a fine yarn about meeting you with both your eyes bunged up, and your nose broken, and your lip cut, a-going afore the beak to speak up for Larky. Now we knows who bungs up your eyes, Apple Blossom, and spiles your beauty for ye."

"And we knows, too," said Sally Slink—a woman marked and scarred with the small-pox, blind of one eye, and with a hair lip—"who admires your fine, wax-work face and black hair, Apple Blossom."

"Ye be a good woman, I will say that," said Molly Muddle, "but if it plased Providence to take Bob, I think it 'ud be your own fault if ye warn't soon a Good-man."

They all laughed at this sally, except Apple Blossom, who was hurt and vexed at it. That very day Bob had muttered something between his teeth, which sounded very like an ill word—and a jealous one, too—about Jem Goodman. Between Bob and herself there was something approaching to coldness and estrangement, and had been ever since that luckless night at the "True Briton," when he had been, as little Hope had prophesied, "overtaken."

Jem Goodman's friendship was—next to the dutiful affection of her brave, bright Larky Grigg, and the grateful, beautiful love of Hope Evermore—poor Apple Blossom's chief comfort.

Indeed, she had no one else to turn to for help, advice, and consolation; but if this pure and Christian friendship caused the slightest feeling of jealousy in Bob's heart, or exposed him to any suspicion or misconstruction, Apple Blossom felt she must give up one of the best blessings of her now unhappy life.

This feeling was confirmed when Sally, returning to the charge, said—

"Maybe, Molly, if you were as despart 'ansome as Apple Blossom, you'd not be obliged to part with your flannel petticoat and wedding-ring. Jem Goodman's very free with his money, when his fancy goes along with it."

Sally was very jealous of Apple Blossom's beauty, and being single, and very anxious to be married—and particularly to Jem Goodman—she attributed his indifference not to her repulsive appearance and indifferent character, but to his affection for Apple Blossom. In the hope of getting him as a husband, she had quitted a very good place when he had lost his old housekeeper, and offered to supply her place without wages; and as he certainly did consult Apple Blossom, and did not accept Sally's offer, the latter owed poor Apple Blossom a bitter grudge—all the more so because she failed to get another place, and being fond of drink, soon came down to great poverty, and had even been glad, more than once, to pass the night in the female refuge.

"I don't know what thee means, lass," said Apple Blossom, very red, and her eyes flashing fire through their tears; "Jem Goodman's a good friend to all of us, and he's very fond of Bob, and a true friend to Bob."

"As fond of Bob as he is of you?" said Sally.

"Yes, quite."

"Oh, come, that's too much of a good thing," said Sally.

"We can't none of us swaller that 'ere," said Molly.

"Do you mean to say," said Sally, "that Jem Goodman never helped you out of no trouble unbeknown to Bob? There now, look at her colour!" cried Sally.

Poor Apple Blossom! Bob had earned nothing for a whole week; or at least, had brought home nothing. Her own little trade had not thriven, owing to wet weather and her own bad health. And at that very moment, she had in her bosom half-a-sovereign, which Jem, guessing she was, in his own language, "short," had offered to lend her as a brother might have done, and which she had accepted as if she had been his young sister.

"Come, own the truth, woman," said Sally; "'tain't my place to judge you."

"Why," said Molly Muddle, "there's naught to be ashamed on; Jem Goodman have helped us all in our troubles, one time or another."

"But not unbeknownst to your husbands," persisted Sally.

"He've helped thee afore this, and more nor onst," said Apple Blossom, recovering.

"But I ain't got no husband; you took care o' that," said Sally.

"I!" said Apple Blossom; "what had I to do with it? I never know'd you had a chance; and if you had, 'twouldn't be no business of mine."

"You made it business of your'n, then," said the bitter Sally. "A word to the wise; and don't go for to despise your betters, just because they ain't got a pair o' staring black eyes and a great round red and white face. Every Jill shall have her Jack is just the same as every Jack shall have his Jill; and for all your fine beauty, when I finds my Jack he sha'n't be a drunken brute of a feller that'll blacken my eyes for me, I can tell ye that."

"I see Jem Goodman coming," said Apple Blossom, very white, but standing up like a statue of Diana's self, firm, calm, and pure, "and Mr. Stephen's with him. I shall just call 'em both, to hear me ax Mr. Goodman afore ye all whether he ever zeed the look in my eye, or heerd the word from my lip, to make him think that I wor one ever to give a thought to any man but Bob. No, that I ain't, as everybody as knows me can testify. Not if t'other wor the finest-grow'd, freshest-coloured chap you'd meet in a summer day; and I wor such a poor, silly, weak, vile, mean-spirited creatur' as to be false at heart to my Bob. Jem Goodman ain't the man to ruin his friend and his friend's wife, I can tell 'ee. Jem Goodman knows the ten commandments, and keeps 'em, too,—the same which God spake in the twentieth chapter of Exodus," she added, much excited and her eyes flashing. "My own poor, erring, but beloved Bob—I'm zure Mr. Stephen and Jem Goodman'll tell you you've done him and me great and cruel wrong; and that it's a crying shame, that's what it be."

So saying, she turned to go in search of Jem; but Sally, holding her by the gown, said, "Why you ain't never a-going to get me into trouble for what I said just in a bit of a lark. But if ye be, I won't stay to hear it. I've got a night's musing to do, and lucky for me I have; for if you goes for to make mischief for me, I sha'n't come here again in a hurry."

So saying, she slipped away, and stole out of the ragged school.

And poor Apple Blossom, partly from a feeling of modest dislike to broach the subject to Jem Goodman, and partly from a great hatred of making mischief for Sally Slink, sat down and cried bitterly, but said nothing.

When she rose to go home, Molly followed her for the flannel petticoat of which Apple Blossom had so kindly offered her the loan; and, as Apple Blossom took it out of a drawer well filled with tidy clothes, Molly Muddle, who, in addition to being the wife of a sot, was a slattern, a gossip, and fond of spirits herself, wondered how a poor apple-woman whose husband drank, could have such a sight of good clothes; and began to think Sally's suspicions must be true.

The idle and extravagant, in the destitution they bring upon themselves, never ascribe to honest industry and thrift the comfort and abundance which they can contrive to insure in all ranks of life, if constantly practised.

CHAPTER LI.

Trifles light as air
Are to the jealous confirmation strong
As proofs of holy writ.—SHAKESPEARE.

Poor Apple Blossom's trials for the day were not over. She had returned from "the mothers' class" much wounded and excited; and of late any emotion had caused the once strong, rosy Apple Blossom to feel an almost deadly sickness, followed by something very like a swoon.

Ever since that dreadful night when Bob Blossom had returned dead drunk from the "True Briton," and in his selfish and brutal violence had kicked her in her fond and faithful bosom, while she was trying to pull off his muddy boots, a great change had taken place in Apple Blossom's health; and as to her fine buoyant spirit it had almost forsaken her.

In that full, fair bosom, which still supplied some of the cravings (though not all of them) of the now ruddy, chubby baby Ben, poor Apple Blossom frequently felt a gnawing, sickening pain; and with an agony, in which distress on Bob's account had a great share, she discovered that exactly where he had kicked her, there was a small hard lump. She was quite alone when she made this discovery, undressing herself; not as she once had done with a light heart after a hard day's work, and chatting merrily to Bob already in bed, over the small events of the day; small in themselves, but of more importance to her than a change of ministry, or a royal marriage.

No, there had been no hearty and complete reconciliation between Bob and Apple Blossom since that night at the "True Briton." Not that Apple Blossom was unforgiving, she was willing, and even eager to forgive and forget, not merely his backsliding after all his boast and confidence, but the brutality of his conduct when he was drunk. It was Bob who hung back.

For the first time in his life Bob was jealous.

The seeds of this dreadful upas-tree of the heart had been sown by Jack Badger at the "True Briton," and the growth was rapid and rank in its luxuriance.

Apple Blossom had no idea of its existence, and in her perfect innocence she praised and consulted Jem Goodman as much as ever.

Bob's manner towards both his wife and this true friend had assumed a sort of dogged restraint. He often came back suddenly and when not at all expected. That was of no consequence, for there was not that hour of the night or day when Apple Blossom could have been found doing anything that Bob in his right senses could have taken umbrage at.

Bob had also assumed a sort of bravado about drink, and hinted that people who were afraid of an honest glass, were mostly people who had secrets they were afraid of letting out; and that he thought the total abstinents "wor mostly a cold-blooded, cowardly set o' Mormonites, and from all he'd zeed, and the more he zeed, the more he was determined never to sign none o' their cowardly, unmanly pledges."

Of course, Jack Badger and little Fisher, as long as they were in London, backed him up in this resolve, and when they were gone Sam Slybrute got his ear, and having a grudge against both Apple Blossom and Jem Goodman, he worked on the growing jealousy which Bob in his cups soon betrayed to one so crafty and full of evil as Slybrute.

We have said Apple Blossom was alone, when first she discovered a small hard lump just where Bob had kicked her, and where she had, ever since that brutal kick, suffered such sickening pain.

Yes, she was alone although it was past ten. A sudden and dreadful thought seemed to strike her, and she came all over first red, then pale, hot and cold, and trembled violently. Tears gushed from her eyes, and she clasped her hands. A cold perspiration broke out all over her, and kneeling down by that bed on the edge of which she had been sitting when she made this discovery, she prayed long and fervently.

Everything was quiet. All the children slept; even bold Larky. She went into the front room in which he lay, and took down from a shelf above his head, an old worn copy of "Buchan's Domestic Medicine." She was, as we know, a very poor scholar, and she could make nothing out of it. But the next day, she asked Larky to read her about measles, as a child in the next house had that complaint; and then she begged him to read her all about cancer; assigning as a reason for her curiosity, the fact that a poor woman in the London Hospital, and with whom she was acquainted, had been pronounced afflicted with a cancer in the breast, and had to undergo the dreadful and dangerous operation of amputation.

She told Larky to turn down the leaf, and he, suspecting nothing, did so.

She listened very attentively while he read all the dreadful symptoms of this appalling disease; and often, when she was alone, she took down the book and tried to spell out by herself the sickening account of this loathsome infliction. She succeeded, at last, in making it out from first to last.

Meanwhile her health was visibly impaired. She grew daily weaker and more nervous. Her fine bloom left her cheeks,—the sparkle was extinguished in her large hazel eyes, and the scarlet of her lips faded to a pale, dull pink; her features sharpened,—an anxious expression settled on her fine face,—the lump in her bosom grew larger and harder, and the weight at her heart more grievous and intolerable.

Things were in this state for some time. Jem Goodman grieved to see Apple Blossom so altered, but, like many others, attributed the change to a natural cause; and, indeed, he was so engrossed by Ben Darrell and his protracted trial, that Apple Blossom's misery, and Bob's return, "like the sow that is washed to her wallowing in the mire"—in other words, to those habits of intemperance he had at one time conquered—were almost unnoticed in his constant attendance on the miserable Ben Darrell, both in court and in Newgate.

Apple Blossom had, as we have said, a doctor who came from her own village, near Preston. He was a kind, old-fashioned man, and had settled in London to be near a son who was walking the hospitals when first the old gentleman came up to town, but had since passed his examination, and been taken into partnership by his father.

However, it was the old father in whom Apple Blossom placed all her confidence. She would not have consulted the young dressey son, who smoked cigars and wore moustaches, and was called "gay!" for all the world; nor, on such a delicate matter, would she have breathed a word to any but her own kind old friend the parish doctor of — her native village, who had brought her, and all in the village (her contemporaries) into the world, vaccinated her, attended her parents in all their illnesses, even the last, and herself in some of her confinements — to him, with many tears and blushes, she revealed the disease, hidden from all the world, more especially from Bob. Poor Apple Blossom, she invented a little story to account for the injury—if ever this was a white lie (which we doubt, since the father of all lies is so black) that was the one Apple Blossom told Dr. Doser—"Dr." he was always called, though, of course, only dubbed so by his poor patients; and that lie, while pretending to believe it, Dr. Doser saw through, and knew as well as if the poor wife had told him so, that a brutal kick from Bob when drunk had caused this disease and all poor Apple Blossom's sufferings.

Apple Blossom had occasionally indulged, in spite of Buchan, in hopes that she might be mistaken, and the evil not of the deadly nature her symptoms, as compared with those in the book, rendered probable; but after Dr. Doser had examined the poor, fast-wasting bosom, and been compelled by her to tell her the truth, she entertained no further hope or doubt, and murmuring with pale lips, "Father, thy will be done!" "Poor Bob!" and "My poor children!" she went home, to think very seriously over a terrible ordeal, which the doctor had told her she must go through, if she wished to do her duty as a wife and mother, and save her life for the sake of those to whom that life was so invaluable.

Dr. Doser did not wish to hurry her; he told her that the insidious disease would probably remain for some time in a torpid state, but that the ultimate development was inevitable, and he advised her to consult her husband.

Her husband! Apple Blossom shuddered at the thought. She did not like to cause him the agony of remorse and shame, which she felt sure he must feel when the consequences of his own foul sin were forced upon his mind—there was one reason against it. Then poor Apple Blossom was a woman and a loving one; not vain, but she had always been admired for her beauty. Bob had always been proud of her pure, strong, healthful nature. How could she reveal to him that she had a loathsome, unsightly, foul disease, only to be got rid of (if at all) by an operation that would disfigure her for ever!

Then she wished she could die, but the next moment she blamed herself for the wish. A wife, a mother! how selfish to wish to die!

To die and leave her bright bold Larky; Merry so pretty, so thoughtless, so ready for the snares that a mother alone could warn her against; Hope, little angel Hope—Hope who, ever since she had been ill, had waited upon her with the submission of a child, the devotion of a saint, and the self-sacrifice of a martyr; Hope who daily grew more and more exquisitely and dangerously lovely, whose mother had confided her to poor Apple Blossom with her dying breath. Bob, who, if he lost his wife, would probably, like so many others that she had known, be persuaded by sottish associates to drink to drown care, and at last drink himself to death, or into the Union.

No, it was sinful to wish to die. It was her duty to submit to anything that would save her life.

Apple Blossom had just decided on this, upon the very evening of her dispute with "Sally Slink" in the mothers' gallery, and was sitting, as we said, alone, preparing to undress.

She had taken out of her bosom the half-sovereign Jem Goodman had lent her, and laid it on a little table beside her, with her cap, her mittens, her apron, and other matters which tidy Apple Blossom always folded neatly up at night.

The children, as we have said, were asleep. Merry flushed, and dreaming of a holiday and tea-drinking to take place at the ragged school, and Hope, her long, soft, brown eye-lashes wet, and tears, scarcely dry, on the faint rose of her cheeks; for Nessy was to go, the next day, to the — Female Orphan Asylum, Ellen St. Ange having got her admitted.

Suddenly, Apple Blossom started, she felt, although she had not heard him come in, that Bob was in the next room.

Bob now always came in unexpectedly and stealthily. The door was ajar, and Apple Blossom did not know whether Bob had seen her or not, but she thrust the half-sovereign back into her bosom; he was most likely (coming home at that hour) fuddled, and, when he was so, he always seized on any money that met his eye; and often, of late especially, he was very quarrelsome.

She had just put the half-sovereign into her bosom, and was fastening her dress, preparatory to going to him to ask him if he wanted anything, and to see what state he was in, when, with two strides, he crossed the little room, and stood over her. He was fresh from a carouse with Slybrute and other boon companions, and they had been poisoning his mind, and exciting his jealousy about his wife and Jem Goodman; and Slybrute even ventured to repeat what he had heard from his own wife at tea—the story, with many additions, told her by Molly Muddle, of what had passed that day in the mother's gallery; and of Apple Blossom's shame and confusion when accused of receiving money from Jem Goodman, unbeknown to her husband.

Fired with jealousy, he had stolen home, crept in like a thief in the night, and, sobered by the violence of his passions, had stood, for some minutes, at the partly-open door, watching Apple Blossom, and glaring on the half-sovereign, which seemed to him to confirm all he had heard.

He laid his hand very roughly on Apple Blossom's shoulder, and said—

"What hast thee done with that half-sovereign?"

"Lor, Bob! how thee do startle a body," said Apple Blossom, looking up.

"Thee didn't used to be startled when I comed a-nigh thee, lass!" said Bob, his eyes full of fire, but his voice deep and husky.

"And thee didn't used to stay away at bed time, and steal in more like a thief than the master of the house, Bob," sobbed Apple Blossom.

"Measter! I am measter, and I'll be measter,—thy measter, as thee'll foind; and I'll not be laughed at as a fool while thee runs thy rigs along of one I'll pay out if ever I see un dangleing after thy skirts agin. Who guv thee the half-a-sovereign—thee'd better speak, I won't stand no sulks, I ain't in the humour," and he shook her rudely.

"No one guv me no half-sovereign, Bob," she said, with streaming eyes; "thee as should bring in thy earnings, and as did used to, haven't guv me a sovereign, no, nor a half-sovereign either, this month past."

"Where did thee get the half-sovereign I zeed on this table five minutes agone; and what have thee done with it?"

"I borrowed it, Bob, to pay the rent and other small matters. I borrowed it of Jem Goodman."

"Give it me," growled Bob, "or by —"

"I won't give it thee to make thee a greater beast and sot than thee is. Thou'rt half-seas over already, Bob."

"A beast and a sot be I; that's the duty to thy husband Jem Goodman teaches thee, is it? If thee won't give it, I'll take it, lass; and, what's more, I'll force it down his hypocritical throat. He can't swallow a glass of honest liquor; he shall swallow this, my lass, and let's see if this will help his psalm-singing."

So saying he caught her by the back hair in his drunken, jealous rage with one hand, and held her back by the long, jetty coils, in which his fingers were twisted, while with the other he tore the small gold coin from her bosom, in spite of her cries, her sobs, and her piteous exclamations of "Oh, Bob Blossom, is it indeed thee, and can I be the same Betty Blythe thee swore to love and cherish! Be still and I'll g'e it thee; but, if I does, the poor bits o' things'll be seized for the rent."

"Let 'em be seized," growled Bob, with an expletive with which we will not sully our pages, and he rushed out of the house.

Poor Apple Blossom called after him in vain; she darted to the door, but he was out of sight; and then she returned and sat down again on her bed and wept bitterly, her face hidden in her hands.

Presently she felt a soft arm thrown round her neck, and a warm little velvet lip on her throat.

"Mammy, don't ee cry, there's a good mammy. I heard dad a-scoolding thee, mammy. He've been overtaken again; but don't ee give way, mammy. Mr. Stephen says there's them as have been overtaken seventy times seven as have come at last to be 'never touch lads;' and, mammy, thee must forgive dad, even if he offend ag'in thee seventy times seven."

"Oh! my child, I've no comfort left; no hope—no hope."

"Why, ain't I Hope?" said the sweet child, who, having climbed up behind her mammy on the bed, now slipped into her lap, and nestled there. "I'm

THE RAG-PICKERS OF PARIS.

Hope, surely; and Lark's a great comfort, to say nothing of Merry, who've promised me to mind and be steady, and not take a'ter Meg. Get to bed, dear, dear mammy, and I'll tuck thee up. Thee do look so pale, and thy dear eyes so red and swelled. Here's thy night-dress, mammy, and here's thy night-cap. How wild thy hair is! and what a great red mark on thy shoulder!"

It was the mark left by Bob's gripe.

Apple Blossom yielded to little Hope's persuasion, put on her night-clothes, and lay down in bed. Hope got in too—just, as she said, to warm poor mammy up a bit, and then get out into her own little bed. But, while Hope was singing the last verse of the Evening Hymn—

"Praise God, from whom all blessings flow;
Praise Him all creatures here below;
Praise Him above, angelic host,
Praise Father, Son, and Holy Ghost," her blue eyes closed, her voice died away, and her cherub head sank on Apple Blossom's shoulder—poor Apple Blossom! who, soothed by the sympathy, cheered by the faith, and lulled by the hymn of the little girl, had also fallen into a quiet sleep

(To be continued.)

THE RAG-PICKERS OF PARIS.

It is not a miserable makeshift, as you would suppose, dear reader,—not a temporary expedient, resorted to in the times of necessity and heavy want for the sake of a morsel of bread—rag-picking, in Paris, is a regularly constituted trade—a pursuit to which a certain number of persons devote themselves day by day and year by year—groping and grovelling in the kennels, among garbage and offal, for the rags that have been trodden under foot in the street-fight, or have fallen from the degraded body of some wretched outcast. Year by year do the families of chiffonniers or rag-pickers (from chiffon, a fragment) sally forth from their slums and alleys to pursue their noisome trade. "Once a chiffonnier, always a chiffonnier," seems to be the dreary motto of their calling; save when, at rare intervals, a political "movement" gives them the fierce excitement of defending a barricade, until, after an émeute of a certain number of days or hours, they sink back into the degradation from which they have emerged. Hopeless, reckless, and desperate—ready to take advantage of anything that will offer the chance of a few hours' license—the chiffonnier of Paris is neither the safest nor the most desirable member of the large class who live from hand to mouth; rising in the morning with a very vague notion of where they shall sleep at night, and whom the Parisians designate by the expressive title of gagne-petits, or "earn-littles."

It is half-past eleven o'clock at night. Paris is asleep—rich Paris on its bed of down, behind the heavy curtains; poor Paris, in its attic, shivering on the bed of straw. The industry of the day has ceased, and men are taking breath for the fresh struggle of the morrow. But the pulse of the city never stands still. Now commences the nocturnal industry that shuns the face of day. Nocturnal industry comes creeping down the Rue Mouffetard, in the shape of the chiffonnier and his family. Each member is armed with a long stick with a hook at the end, used in turning over the unsavoury materials which form the staple of their merchandise. In the left hand each carries a lantern; and on each stooping back swings a large wicker basket—dubbed, by Parisian wit, a "Cashmere of osiers." Uponestreet, and down another, through the broad boulevard, up the narrow, tortuous lane goes the stooping procession; old rags, old bones, old bits of iron, things so apparently worthless that the wonder at their ever being purchased is only exceeded by the amazement at the idea of their ever being sold again, by the buyers. All nameless scraps of uninviting appearance, are turned over carefully with the iron hook and deposited in the chiffonnier's basket; and so, through hour after hour of the night, he plies his noisome trade.

It is four o'clock in the morning. The gray dawn is already struggling with night for the mastery, and the light in the chiffonnier's lantern is reduced to a guttering, flickering stump. Then, at some chosen street corner, the wife and daughter, who have been distributing their search throughout various streets, rejoin the father of the family—notes are compared as to the success of each—and I have heard of chiffonniers who could produce gold pieces, obtained by no honest means, after meeting the dissipated men of fashion reeling home through Paris streets—a few ferocious words of menace to the unfortunate girl whose hotte, or basket, is light (she looks light and thin enough herself, though her wasted form is too heavy a burden for her tottering limbs)—a whispered word of consultation, and the whole party march off.

At a dirty, tumble-down house, in a back alley, they stop, and the father knocks with his hook or crochet at the door. An old crone looks down from an upper window. With a satisfied grunt, she withdraws her wicked-looking old head, after a moment's inspection. She knows well enough why her customer comes so early. He has not a sou in his pocket, and the dram-shop opens in half an hour. He drums impatiently on the shutter—"Make haste, la mère," he cries; "do you want to keep me here all day?"

The bargain is soon struck. The rags are shaken out into a fragrant heap on the floor of a cellar, and bought at a rough estimate of their bulk. But the old buyer has a notable advantage over the miserable company of sellers. They are impatient to be off to the dram-shop which will open in half an hour. Not the father and mother only, mark you. The poor thin girl and the precocious boy, are alike anxious to buy the poison which will ruin them body and soul, unless a pitying Providence snatch the fatal draught from their lips. So, with much shrewd diplomacy on the part of the old crone, and much savage impatience from the chiffonnier, the bargain is concluded, and the party adjourn to the dram-shop, whose door a sleepy, slatternly woman is now unbarring.

What will they do now? It is not difficult to guess. If their money holds out, they will drink poisonous compounds of vitriol and other abominations, for three or four hours. Then the fresh-looking, white-capped servant maids, leading out chubby children for their morning walk, and the healthy trim-looking artisan going forth to his daily labour, will hear drunken shouts or maudling snatches of low songs; and with stooping form, glazed eyes, and uncertain steps, the chiffonnier will be found, slinking home to his den where he hides his misery from the sight of day. There he will throw himself down; and, if his gains have not been greater, or the liquor he has imbibed more poisonous than usual, he will be ready to sally forth again at night, as the clock strikes ten, to resume his industry, with a like result.

But sometimes the potent morning's draught is too strong for his poor muddled brain. Then, unable to stagger further, benumbed by the poison he has imbibed, and insensible even to his own degradation, the chiffonnier falls down in the street, and his career ends as it began—in the kennel.

It must not be supposed, however, that all the followers of "street industry" in Paris are as fallen as the chiffonnier; far from it. The man who sells liquorice-water—the marchand de coco—the purveyor of pies at six sous apiece,—and even the décrotteur, or shoe-black, who cleans your boots and brushes your coat for a sou—all these frequently show marks of a certain humble prosperity, and look as if they were, in their small way, beforehand with the world. But the chiffonnier, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, is a miserable wreck, without the chance, or the faculty, of rising. Why is this?

Because, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, he will spend his earnings in that dram-shop, where they sell liquor so cheap, and which opens so early in the morning!

THE PEASANT GIRL OF ROME.

The long Italian summer day was in its glowing noontide. There was not the slightest breeze to fan the close, almost suffocating atmosphere, and the sun seemed to hang from the sky like an immense globe of actual fire, scorching all it looked upon.

Within the walls of the Sistine Chapel at Rome, a boy of thirteen years was standing before an easel, on which he was anxiously endeavouring to imitate the perfections of the Madonna of Michael Angelo. A loaf of brown bread and a jar of water stood beside him, from which he was evidently about to make his noontide meal; and, from time to time, he cast a look upon it that told of the healthy appetite of a hungry lad, which such meagre fare could hardly satisfy.

"I wonder if my father thinks I shall become a better painter by starving upon bread and water," said the boy, musingly, as his distaste for the dinner seemed to increase. "I would like to be in Dresden now, this hot, stifling day, instead of among these musty arches, and partake of such a dinner as only my own dear mother can cook."

At this moment a deep and somewhat harsh voice called to him from one of the distant aisles to make haste and finish his dinner, and not be dreaming all day.

"Dreaming!" said the boy, softly. "I sleep too hard at night, and work too hard by day, to leave much room for dreaming."

He turned to the unsatisfying lunch, however, and then continued his work, although the beads of perspiration stood thickly upon his fair, white forehead, and almost dripped from the long, shining curls of his auburn hair. He worked silently and without intermission, until the dim light of the chapel was fading into darkness; but even then the harsh voice asked if he could not see a little longer.

"No, father," answered the boy, "my eyes are aching now; and these last touches will have to be effaced to-morrow. Let me go now, for my head is dizzy."

At the door of the chapel the father joined him, and seeing that the boy looked really ill, he began to be alarmed. He had not noticed before that his son was so emaciated, nor had the thought occurred to him that the mouldering walls, and damp, humid air of the chapel, were sapping the life from which he had hoped so much.

"You shall have a change, Antonio, indeed you shall," said the father, in a softer tone than he had used before. "Next week—nay, to-morrow, perhaps." The child's large, melancholy-looking eyes sparkled; he thought that his father was going to propose going home for a season, until this terrible weather was over. The next words struck a chill to his homesick heart. "To-morrow, perhaps, you will commence your studies at the Vatican. I am impatient to have you begin to follow Raphael."

"Dearest father," said the boy, sadly, "I am afraid I shall never realise your hopes of my becoming a great painter. I love the art sometimes, but, at others, I do so weary of the details. If I could but become a painter without this wearisome study! But, father, do not frown so. I am not thinking of giving it up, but only warning you that I shall, after all, do no great things in my profession."

"You will not disappoint me, Antonio, if you are only true to yourself. I will give you time to recruit a little before you commence at the Vatican. You shall not study there to-morrow, but only go there as a visitor. Does that suit you?"

A faint smile and nod was the boy's answer. "A fresh breeze on my forehead, a good run in the open air, and my mother's nice food, would do me more good," he said to himself. But he knew that his father would call him childish for thinking of food or play; and so the weary lad reached his home in one of the humblest quarters of Rome, and threw himself on the bed, where he slept heavily, until his father roused him at early dawn. Then a hasty and scanty repast, and he followed his father along the streets in his way to the Vatican. Here the boy's real and innate love of art made him forget himself and his weariness before the inimitable paintings of the divine Raphael.

His father saw his entranced look as he stood before these beautiful creations, and whispered to himself: "The boy will be a painter yet."

Antonio Raphael Mengo was born in Bohemia in 1728. His father, a Danish artist, settled in Dresden after the birth of this child. When the boy was a mere infant, the father decided that he should be a distinguished painter, laying his plans to that effect even before he knew he would possess an ordinary capacity. His joy was unbounded when the little creature began to exhibit the most lively sense of the beautiful; and at the age of six years he began to instruct him in oil, miniature, and enamel painting.

The father's grand error was in not allowing Antonio to be a child. In his zeal for his favourite art, he forgot that the physical nature needs culture and relaxation, and that to be truly intellectual as a man, the child must first become a healthy animal. But, like most enthusiasts, he rode his hobby too far; and although Antonio readily became all that his father wished, yet the memory of his overtaken youth embittered his life, and the privations which he endured in pursuit of art, naturally lessened his enjoyment of it.

Three years passed away, however, and Antonio returned to Dresden. Soon after his return, when he was not quite seventeen, Augustus appointed him court painter. He had now become enthusiastically attached to his art. At the age of twenty he executed a painting of the Holy Family, which elicited great admiration. This was the crowning excellence of his youthful compositions, and he was appointed as principal court painter, probably upon the strength of this piece. It was executed at Rome, for he now began to feel that he could paint better under the inspiration of Italian scenes than on the banks of the Elbe. Forgetting the home-sickness and heart-sickness that deepened the sombre twilight of the Sistine Chapel.

In one of his walks in the outskirts of Rome, he saw a beautiful peasant girl, whom he wished much to secure as a model for one of his figures in the Holy Family, which painting he was about to commence. She was surrounded by a troop of boys and girls, evidently, from the resemblance, her own brothers and sisters. They were teasing her to sing for them to dance, and the sweet, loving look which she bent upon them as she complied with their request, was too charming for Antonio to resist. Her voice—such a voice as is only heard in Italy—completed the charm. It need not be added that Antonio found his way again and again to the spot, in order to impress his mind fully with her image, hoping to be able to transfer it to the canvas without troubling her to sit to him. He found it difficult, however, to do justice to her face, and he set off one morning to ask her to come once at least to his studio, to enable him to make the alterations which it needed, to satisfy his sense of her beauty.

It was a sylvan place, that of Allegra's abode. Her father, a vine-dresser, but above the common peasantry by habits, principles, and education, had stimulated his children to more than ordinary attainments, while they still kept the innocent and graceful simplicity of their rank. It was to him that the painter applied for permission to introduce his daughter's figure into his work, and Minetti thought that so honest a face as Antonio possessed might surely be trusted. Still his fatherly care induced him to wait for her in the ante-room of the studio, at several successive sittings, till he was assured his child was as safe in the care of the painter as in his own. Had she descended from a line of kings, Antonio could not have been more deeply respectful than he was to the peasant girl.

One more sitting, and then Allegra might be lost to him for ever. This was the thought which revealed to the painter the state of his own heart. Young, inexperienced, and unambitious, save in the single matter of his profession, Antonio would not have blushed to exhibit the Italian peasant girl to the whole world as his chosen wife. His father, he knew, had higher hopes for him; but his gentle mother would smile and be so content with his choice. He thought of all these things while she was sitting there with her calm, serene, and deeply religious face, her soft, liquid eyes turned upward as if in prayer, and her long hair lying in thick flutings of jet upon her cheek and neck. There were tears, too, in those beautiful eyes; and Antonio was not blind to the belief that it was for him she wept—for the breaking of those tender ties which their short intercourse had established between them.

"Allegra!" he said, in the lowest tones of that voice which had been such sweet music to her ear, "could you leave your home and kindred, to follow the uncertain fortunes of an artist?"

She did not, could not comprehend his meaning at once, and her wondering look made him repeat his words. When, at length, she understood him, her face lighted up like the sunshine of an April day. That night there were both sorrow and happiness in the vine-dresser's home; for Allegra was the light of that home, and although they rejoiced in her new hopes, still it would be very desolate without her presence.

It was summer when the young bridegroom carried his beautiful bride to the pleasant home on the banks of the Elbe; and the father and mother welcomed with kindness the chosen of their son.

Daily, almost hourly, Antonio's reputation increased, and with it came troops of friends, powerful ones too, and each and all paid the homage of the heart to the beauty and virtues of the artist's peasant-wife. At twenty-six, Antonio was appointed director of the new academy in the capitol. Invited to Spain by Charles III., he executed the Descent from the Cross, and other paintings; and returning to Rome, where he was now induced to take up his residence, he was employed by the pope on a large allegorical painting in fresco. Here he collected a vast number of drawings, vases, engravings, and all the expensive paraphernalia of his art; and everything which a refined taste and the ample compensation of his labours could command, was bestowed upon Allegra and his children. Beautiful as seraphs, these children were not destined to a long life, but most of them passed away in early childhood. But they lived upon their father's canvas, some with the dark eyes and raven hair of their mother, and some with golden locks, and orbs "soft as the blue eyes of a poet's child," the true German complexion.

Another summer day in Rome. The setting sun sheds its last gleam over a long procession, the slow passing on of which indicates that no festal nor triumphal occasion has called out the thronging multitude. There are the great, the gifted, and the mighty. Princes, and nobles, and poets, the flower of Roman station and Roman genius, thought it no degradation to follow him to the grave, who was deemed worthy to lie beside the divine Raphael. And lo! there cometh the peasant girl of the Tiber, with her fair children, to gaze once more upon that noble face which for twenty-eight years she has never looked on save in joy, until now.

A noble monument marks the resting-place of the artist, beside him who was his model upon earth. It was erected to his memory by his friend, the Cavalier d'Azara. Another, erected by the empress of Russia, stands in St. Peter's; so that the mighty of the earth may well be said to bear deep tribute to the memory of the lonely and unknown child, who brooded through the silent hours at the Sistine Chapel over the thought that genius would never come to him.

TRUST IN GOD AND DO THE RIGHT.

COURAGE, brother! do not stumble,
Though thy path is dark as night;
There's a star to guide the humble—
Trust in God and do the right.

Let the road be long and dreary,
And its ending out of sight;
Foot it bravely—strong or weary,
Trust in God and do the right.

Perish "policy" and cunning,
Perish all that fears the light;
Whether losing, whether winning,
Trust in God and do the right.

Trust no party, church, or faction;
Trust no "leaders" in the fight;
But in every word and action
Trust in God and do the right.

Trust no forms of guilty passion,
Flourds can look like angels bright;
Trust no custom, school, or fashion,
Trust in God and do the right.

Some will hate thee, some will love thee,
Some will flatter, some will slight;
Cease from man, and look above thee,
Trust in God and do the right.

Simple rule and safest guiding,
Inward peace and inward light;
Star upon our path abiding,
Trust in God and DO THE RIGHT.

A LAMP THAT WILL BURN TWELVE MONTHS WITHOUT REPLENISHING.—Take a stick of phosphorus and put it into a large dry phial, not corked, and it will afford a light sufficient to discern any object in a room, when held near it. The phial should be kept in a cool place, where there is no great current of air, and it will continue its luminous appearance for more than twelve months.

The Matron.

NO. XXVI.

My readers may recollect that I told them I had plenty more receipts for nice cheap dinners. I will now endeavour to furnish them with some. The first dish I shall recommend is a stew, the meat of which is composed of the "pluck" of a calf or sheep. These parts of the animal sell for half the price of the prime meat; but that which makes them so very profitable is that there is not any bone in them. Take two pounds of the pluck, cut in pieces; half a pound of rice, a third of a pound of Scotch pearl barley, two or three onions chopped, and some turnips and carrots sliced. Pour over these ingredients two quarts and a half of water; but, if you have liquor in which either meat or bones have been boiled, of course it would make the stew richer. Add one table-spoonful of salt, and a tea-spoonful of pepper, and stew it slowly for two hours. You will most likely have enough for two days' dinner; but, mind you do not put away the remainder in the same pan in which it was cooked; pour it out into some other vessel, and put it away in a cool place.

In the last chapter I mentioned a potato-pie, and gave a receipt for it. You may remember that the meat composing the principal part of it was kidney. Bear in mind it had better be bullock's kidney; that is the cheapest. Sheep's kidneys, serving as a relish for rich people's dinners, are not sold at so low a price. I will suppose that in the potato-pie you have used half of the quantity bought of bullock's kidney, and that you wish to give your husband a change for the next day's dinner, yet you do not know how to effect it. In the first instance, parboil the kidneys; then take a cabbage, two onions chopped up, and three pounds of boiled potatoes. Mix these vegetables well together, and season them according to taste. Put them over the fire with two ounces of dripping, and a tea-cupful of broth. When the vegetables are tender, drop in the bullock's kidney, cut in slices about a quarter of an inch thick. Keep it on the fire for about twenty minutes, and then dish it up. It is sure to be liked.

Another good dinner can be made of that which a thoughtless person throws away, after making soup of it—I mean a milt. To render a milt an agreeable article of diet, you should soak it three or four hours in salt and water, with a little vinegar. When you take it out of the water, mind you wipe it dry, and sew some nice stuffing into it; but supposing you have two milts, you had better sew them together, having first put the seasoning (for which I am about to give the receipt) between them. Chop up a small quantity of sage, parsley, and thyme, with two large onions. Place these in a basin, and add to the ingredients two table-spoonfuls of oatmeal, and a tea-spoonful of salt, and a quarter ditto of pepper. As before directed, let this stuffing be sewn between the two milts. Lay outside the milt a rasher of bacon, and send it to the bake-house, or if you have an oven of your own, bake it for one hour. Should neither of these plans be convenient for you, you may contrive to do it in a frying-pan, but mind your fire is not fierce, for on account of the seasoning it will require to be done very gradually, and thoroughly.

Before I give you any more receipts, I must caution young housekeepers not to think all vegetable liquor equally wholesome. That in which potatoes have been boiled, unlike the liquor of most other vegetables, is unwholesome, and, not only so, it discolours and gives an unpleasant flavour. Therefore mind you parboil your potatoes, before you add them to soups, stews, pies, or any other savoury dish.

Now, for the sake of a little variety combined with utility, let us give a little thought to tea and coffee. These beverages greatly add to the comfort of civilised man, and assist in forming a cheap, wholesome, and palatable bill of fare. Every year sixty millions of pounds of tea are made into drink in the British islands, besides thirty millions of pounds of coffee, also put to the same use.

I have already told you that there are properties in tea, coffee, and cocoa that are little known to the multitude. In the first place, tea contains a flesh-making substance resembling that of the meal of peas; but this is not the substance to which I must particularly direct your attention,—a substance which gives to tea, and also to coffee and cocoa, a property that is not generally appreciated. This substance is a white powder which chemists call theine. Of course it was the duty of learned men to discover the properties and the influence of this white powder, or theine. They have done so, and the result of their investigation is as follows: that this white powder contained in tea has, when swallowed in a moderate quantity, a wonderful sustaining strength. It is even asserted that if a man has half a pound of bread taken from his meals, and three grains of the white powder of tea, or theine, added in its stead, his body does not miss the bread. In fact, this white powder is found by philosophers to be adapted to supply the substance which the nerves and brain lose by "wear and tear;" it is, in fact, nerve food. When we consider all this, can we be surprised at the cheering, enlivening effect of a good cup of tea?

Small Change.

It is unquestionably true that charity covers a multitude of sins, but we are more than half afraid that crinolines covers a multitude of sinners.

ALBERT SMITH once wrote an article in Blackwood, signed "A. S." "Tut," said Jerrold, on reading the initials, "what a pity Smith will tell only two-thirds of the truth!"

"THAT cat has got a cold," said a friend to Jerrold, pointing to a domestic favourite. "Yes," Jerrold replied, "the poor thing is subject to cat-arrrh."

LET no repugnance to the single state
Lead to a union with a worthless mate.
Although, 'tis true, you'll find full many a fool
Who'd make old maids the butt of ridicule;
A single lady, though advanced in life,
Is much more happy than an ill-matched wife.

A GENTLEMAN, on taking an edition of Gibbon's Rome to a book-shop in Bath to be bound, was asked whether he would have it bound in Russia? "Oh, no," he replied, "Russia is too far off. I will have it done here."

It seems so easy to be good-natured, I wonder anybody takes the trouble to be anything else.

A VERY distinguished philosopher says that whatever is most useful is most beautiful. We utterly deny it. A dog's nose is not half so comely as that of a beautiful lady, but twice as good for smelling.

A SPRIGHTLY book has just been published, entitled "Lectures to Married Men." The author was probably mistaken in supposing that there was any lack of such lectures. They are said to be very abundant. But curtains are generally drawn over them.

PERHAPS men are the most imitative animals in all the world of nature. Only one ass ever spoke like a man, but hundreds of thousands of men are daily talking like asses.

HUMAN life is one great Saturday, in which the world should get ready for Sunday, closing up accounts with time, and putting things in order for a holiday.

THE surest way to lose your health is to be all the time drinking that of other folks.

"CAN you return my love, dearest Julia?" "Certainly, sir. I don't want it, I'm sure."

MANY men are very entertaining at a first interview, but then they are exhausted; at a second meeting we find them flat and monotonous. Like hand-organs we have heard all their tunes, and, unlike those instruments, they are not readily new barreled.

LOVERS, whose only desire is to take long and romantic walks beneath the moon, are not long in discovering, after marriage, that they cannot subsist on moonshine.

"MASTER at home?" "No, sir, he's out." "Mistress at home?" "No, sir, she's out." "Then I'll step in and sit by the fire." "That's out, too, sir."

ONE of the Mormon editors in Deseret says that his church rests on the shoulders of Brigham Young and Elder Kimball, whom he calls "a firm base." We fear that it might be more correct to call them a base firm.

"You don't seem to know how to take me," said a vulgar fellow to a gentleman he had insulted. "Yes, I do," said the gentleman, taking him by the nose.

THE ladies of the congregation of Dr. —, Edinburgh, lately determined to present the doctor with a pulpit gown. The doctor, on the Sunday after it was presented, intimated to the people in the church: "The ladies have been kind enough to present me with a pulpit gown; but lest any member should object to my wearing it, I sha'n't put it on yet, and will hear objections on Thursday night." Nobody came to object, but an old lady. The doctor said, "Well, Janet, what objections have you to the pulpit gown?" "Awful, sir," said Janet, "we never read of the Apostle Paul wearing a gown!" The doctor said (and there was a significance in the reply), "You are quite right, Janet; but we never read of St. Paul wearing breeks (trousers)!" That satisfied the old lady.

Chess.

Problem No. 51. By R. B. WORMALD, Esq.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in four moves.

Problem No. 52. By C. W. (of Sunbury).

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in four moves.

Solution of Problem No. 45.

WHITE.
1. R to K Kt 6
2. Kt to Q B 3
3. Q takes Kt
4. Q mates

BLACK.
1. K to K B 6 (best)
2. Kt to K R 2
3. Any move

Solution of Problem No. 46.

WHITE.
1. R to K B 4 (ch)
2. B to K sq
3. P to Q 4, discovers mate

BLACK.
1. P takes R
2. Any move.

C. ROBERTS.—Try the reply of P to K 3 to your first move in Problem No. 40. In Problem No. 41 you overlook the escape of the Black King to Q 5, or the move of R to Q B 4, if White play as you suggest.

M. O.—Your Problem possesses scarcely sufficient interest for publication.

JAMES WEBSTER.—In Problem No. 1 we do not see how mate can be prevented at the 3rd move if White commence with Kt to Q K 7 (ch) followed with B to Q 5. Problem No. 2, from the peculiarity of its conditions, is inadmissible. W. S. (Dartford).—The moves should be recalled and the King placed out of check.

EXON.—Your Problem shall be reported upon next week. The friendly tone of your letter affords us much gratification.

S. C. S.—The game of double chess is but rarely played, and we cannot recommend its practice to you.

Solutions of Problems by F. G. Rainger, Nos. 41 and 42; J. Phenix, No. 42; Mona, Nos. 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, and 44; Ars-sur-Moselle, Nos. 38 and 39; T. Martin, Jun., Nos. 33, 39, and 40; Grapes, Nos. 42 and 44; M. A. R., Nos. 41, 42, 43, and 44; W. D. T., Nos. 42, 43, and 44; Calise Amiens, Nos. 43 and 44; E. Grant, Nos. 42 and 43; Queen's Knight, No. 44; W. Helt, Nos. 43 and 44; Oxon, No. 44; A. Novice, Nos. 41 and 44; Douglas, 41 and 44; and J. A. B., Nos. 41 and 42, correct.

E. Grant, C. Austin, F. G., F. G. R., R. B. W., D. W. O., W. B., J. W., C. W. (of Sunbury), J. Phenix, and W. Helt, your communications have been replied to through the post.

Our Editorial Table.

B. SMITH.—For the greatest ornithological novelty at the Zoological Gardens—viz, the mooruk—we are indebted to Dr. Bennett, a gentleman well known for his scientific attainments. He purchased this bird of a Captain Derlin, who makes annual trips from Sydney to New Britain, whence he brought this new specimen of the ostrich family. It has created a great sensation. The natives of New Britain call it the mooruk on account of the sound of its note. Dr. Bennett, well knowing the curiosity this bird would excite in England, determined to present it to the Zoological Society, with which he has long been a corresponding member. Through the united care of Dr. Planky and the captain and officers of the British Merchant, the mooruk has safely reached England, and the Zoological Gardens; and it now makes its appearance between the ostriches and the apes.

A FAMILY MAN.—When you come to London you can take your children to see the Leviathan without exposing them to the least danger. This vessel, the wonder of art, is, in her present position off Deptford, admirably placed for picturesque effect. The water forms a kind of bay, and she is surrounded by objects that show off her huge size by comparison. A strong rail, breast high, runs all round the deck, so that you may travel from stem to stern; and as you look over bow or taff-rail, you have a view almost as extensive as that which the Monument commands. Then you should compare the huge vessel on which you stand with the ordinary vessels constantly passing up and down the river. The visitor should go down below, and stand in the great saloon, as vast and almost as lofty as Freemasons' Hall. He should inspect the private sleeping cabins, each as large as an ordinary bed-room, and what is still more important, admirably ventilated. Before he leaves the vessel he should dive down into the abyss of the engine-room, or he will not be able to form a correct idea of the size of the Leviathan. Captain Harrison and his chief officers are constantly on board; thus safety, order, and good management are secured.

AN AMATEUR CHEMIST.—Alcohol is the name applied to pure or highly rectified spirit, obtained from fermented liquors by distillation. It consists of hydrogen, oxygen, and carbon. It is extremely light and inflammable, and a powerful stimulant and antiseptic. It is the intoxicating principle of all vinous and spirituous liquors, as wine, brandy, whisky, ale, &c.; but as it was first procured from wine it has retained the name of spirit of wine. All writers on materia medica now rank alcohol among the most powerful and fatal of narcotic vegetable poisons.

ZADIG.—The author of "Elizabeth, or the Exiles of Siberia," was Sophia de Cottin, a celebrated French lady, the daughter of a merchant at Bourdeaux. She was born in 1772, and at the age of eighteen married M. Cottin, a banker in Paris, who died, leaving her a beautiful young widow at twenty-two. As to your other question, we may say, who shall decide when doctors (or critics) disagree?

A FARMER'S SON.—A grange, properly speaking, is a corn farm; it was, originally, a place where the rents and tithes, paid in grain to religious houses, were deposited; from granum, grain.

H. WALKER.—We have referred your note to the author. The "purple kind of death rife among the Indian priesthood," cannot well be described in our Paper. But if you have an opportunity of consulting those fragments of the Vedas which have been published, you will get the information you require.

VERDANT GREEN.—Bruised cloves, or a few drops of creosote will prevent mouldiness in ink. If your "agreement to serve for a certain time" was for a consideration, or recompense, it is legally binding. Your third question we cannot comprehend.

CAROLUS.—A penny stamp must be affixed to all receipts for forty shillings and upwards.

DAWLISH.—The apparatus required for silvering mirrors, is far too expensive for a youth, to say nothing of the delicacy of the process.

W. MASON.—Gum arabic.

AYRSHIRE, HUMBLE BEE, and several other correspondents.—Mr. J. F. Smith's interesting tale, "Smiles and Tears," you will find is continued in Volume II. of our journal, New Series.

TIMOTHY LIGHT (Engineer).—If you can prove what you say, you may break off the engagement without any risk.

A RAILWAY CLERK, ARCTIC CRUSOE.—We believe that railway clerks are not obliged to furnish change for passengers. At any rate, it would save much time and trouble to all parties if passengers were to provide themselves with change before applying for their tickets.

J. ROPER.—A Ghaut (Indian) is either a pass through a mountain, or stairs descending to a river.

M. T.—The best way to avoid being imposed upon by adulterations, is to purchase of respectable dealers.

A READER OF CASSELL'S PAPER.—Metals may be silvered thus:—Take one part of precipitated silver powder, mixed with two parts each of cream of tartar and common salt. Clean the surface of the metal well, and then apply the mixture with a piece of soft leather.

SELF-EDUCATOR.—You will find valuable lessons in Logic, Rhetoric, and all the other forms of the English Language, with choice specimens in illustration, in one of the volumes of "Cassell's Educational Course," entitled, "The English Language, in its Elements and Forms;" a thick volume, price 3s. 6d., bound. It may be had free by post, of Messrs. Petter and Galpin, for 4s.—We have little faith in the remedy of which you speak.

T. C.—We have travelled to Paris by various routes, and are therefore tolerably well acquainted with the relative advantages of each. You ask us our opinion of the route by Dieppe. We reply, first, that it is economical. First-class throughout, £1 5s.; second-class, £1. We have crossed the channel several times, and on no occasion has the sea-passage extended beyond five hours. The steamers are first-rate, not only powerful as steamers, but beautiful sailers.

In our opinion efficient servants, polite and attentive to passengers, are a most important element in rendering a sea-passage pleasant; and we are happy in bearing our testimony, that in all our voyages, we never met with a more civil or obliging crew, from the captain to the steward's boy, than on these vessels. You say you have only a few pounds at your disposal, and you want to see as much as possible in a fortnight. Well, you can make a very agreeable tour to Paris. Take your ticket through. Four days are allowed you to make the journey. You can stay at Dieppe for a night. Twice we have adopted this plan. There are several good hotels: that which we patronised was the "Queen Victoria," and its arrangements were excellent—obliging servants, moderate charges, and first-rate accommodation. From Dieppe you can proceed to Rouen. The scenery is the most picturesque in France. Leaving Dieppe early in the morning, four or five hours may be spent at the romantic old city of Rouen—a city intimately associated with some of the most interesting events in our own history. From thence to Paris, you pass through a country abounding in historic sites, and other remarkable places. All these things interest the traveller, and make a long journey short. With respect to your passport, first obtain a letter from your banker or your minister—churchman or dissenter—a magistrate, or an M.P.—a surgeon, or solicitor. You can forward this letter to Mr. W. J. Adams, Fleet-street, who will, for a small charge, attend to all the necessary formalities, get your passport signed, visé, and sent to you.

DICK TABLETON.—You can have four numbers of our Journal sent to you, by post, for 6d., or five numbers for 7d.

RADICAL.—Apply to one of the county members. J. T. (Newcastle).—We entertain a high opinion of Mr. Curwen's Tonic Sol Fa method of teaching music.

EDIN.—There is no animal in existence resembling what is called the unicorn in heraldic representations. The creature so named in the Scriptures, is supposed to be the rhinoceros. The sea unicorn, called narval, is of the whale kind, and is remarkable for a long horn growing out of his nose, of a substance closely resembling ivory.

KATHLEEN.—The corn-crake, or land-rail, is a migratory bird, found among grass, corn, broom, or furze. It makes its appearance in England, Scotland, and Ireland in the month of April, and takes its departure to warmer climates before the approach of winter. Its cry is very singular, and may be imitated by rubbing the blade of a knife on an indented bone, by which it may be decoyed into a net.—The E. C. appended to our address denotes the postal district in which our office is situated, namely, the East Central.

M. R.—Wash night and morning in lukewarm water, into which two or three drops of sulphate of zinc have been introduced.

W. F. G. (N. S. W.).—You will be able to obtain our publications from Robertson, Bookseller, Melbourne.

J. S.—If you and your brothers and sisters cannot agree about your deceased brother's umbrella, you had better sell it, and divide the proceeds!

A VICTIM TO — J. Newland, Spotted Jack, A. B. Y., Bonus Avunculus, Orlando, John Bull, A Belfast Rioter (I), Mackbeth and Malcolm, A. H., Angelina.—These are cases of bodily ailments, or physical infirmities, in the treatment of which you will require the advice and attendance of a respectable practitioner.

J. WILSON.—Your letter does you credit. To meet the circumstances of youths and others situated as yourself, "Cassell's Educational Course" has been re-issued in weekly numbers, 1½d. each, and in monthly parts, 7d. or 8½d. each. The first volume, "Science Popularly explained," containing 574 pages, may be had complete, bound in cloth, 3s. 6d.

MARY SPRAY.—You may make a good rice cake thus:—mix ten ounces of ground rice, three ounces of flour, and eight ounces of pounded sugar. Beat up eight yolks and six whites of eggs, and the peel of a lemon shred so fine that it is quite mashed; sift the flour, &c., into these by degrees; mix the whole well in a tin stew-pan over a very slow fire with a whisk, then put it immediately into the oven in a well-buttered tin; and bake for about forty minutes. Arrow-root cakes, thus:—take eight yolks of eggs and half the whites, with some lemon peel to flavour, and a little rose water, half a pound of pounded sugar, and a quarter of a pound of arrowroot stirred in very carefully. Beat the eggs for nearly an hour, and after the arrowroot is added it must be constantly beaten until it is put into the mould. Bake in a slow oven. Your other questions must stand over for the present.

J. WAX.—The marriage fees at a parish church, not including license, are 7s. 6d. The parties to be married must have resided in the parish for at least three weeks.

Z.—Apply to the Divorce Court, Westminster, for directions as to procedure, list of fees, &c.

A CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER will require a recommendation from a Member of Parliament before he can obtain the situation of a letter carrier in the General Post Office. The salaries vary from 12s. to 21s. per week.

COBRA DE CAPELLE.—(A strange signature for a lady). To prepare ice creams and ice waters proceed as follows:—Choose the coolest part of the house; get a pail and place in it a few pounds of ice broken very small, throwing among it a large handful of rock salt. Having prepared your cream, according to directions presently to be given, put it into a pewter ice pot and cover it; place this in the middle of the pail, and draw the ice closely round the pot. Stir the ice and salt briskly round, removing to the centre the parts that freeze round the edges. There should be holes at the bottom of the bucket to let off the ice as it thaws.—To a pound of preserved fruit of any kind, or to new fruits as they appear in season, beaten into a pulp, add a quart of cream, the juice of two lemons to improve the flavour, and sweeten to taste. Rub the whole through a fine hair sieve, and if the fruit be red, add a little cochineal colouring. Lemon ice is prepared in a similar way, using, for the same quantity, the juice of four lemons and the peel of one grated, two gills of lemon syrup, and one pint of cream. Mix, pass through a sieve, and freeze. There are other varieties and cheaper modes, which we may furnish in a subsequent number. Receipts for lemonade and ginger beer we have already given.

R. LETHED.—"R. Lethed" complains that all the views he has seen of India give him no new ideas, and that the towns and villages look very much like towns and villages in Europe. "R. Lethed" should recollect that towns, &c., are works of art. It is the natural produce of India that renders it so distinct from anything he has ever seen. As painting does not satisfy "R. Lethed," perhaps poetry may convey to his mind some idea of the scenery in the glorious Eastern Peninsula.

"Where sacred Ganges pours along the plain,
And Indus rolls to swell the eastern main,
What awful scenes the curious mind delight—
What wonders burst upon the dazzled sight.
There giant palms lift high their tufted heads,
The plain wide its graceful foliage spreads;
Wild in the woods the active monkey springs,
The chattering parrot claps her painted wings.
'Mid tall bamboos lies hid the deadly snake,
The tiger couches in the tangled brake,
The spotted axis bounds in fear away,
The leopard darts on his defenceless prey.
In reedy moors or dreary forests rude,
The ancient haunts of solemn solitude,
The huge rhinoceros rends the crashing boughs,
And stately elephants untroubled browse."

We trust "R. Lethed" will not consider this description would apply to England; but certainly it forms a striking contrast to our happy isle, with its well cultivated plains, flower-clad valleys, and meads dotted with peaceful flocks and herds.

A SUBSCRIBER.—We fear that the defect of which you complain is past the skill of surgery.

W. R. B.—The work about which you inquire is still on sale.

HOUSEWIFE.—A cheap cement or covering for jars or bottles may be made thus:—Stir into half a pound of beeswax, one pound of powdered rosin, melted together; on moving it from the fire, stir in as much brickdust as will make the mixture of the consistency of melted sealingwax. Place it, while warm, around jar covers; dip in corked bottles. Saleratus, the article so often mentioned in American cookery books, is a carbonate of potash. Carbonate of soda may be substituted.

J. MCMAHON.—Please to repeat your questions. Your lines are hardly up to our mark. Your suggestions are under consideration.

CHARLIE.—Unless we know the cause of your "spots," we cannot tell you how to remove them.

A WORKING MAN.—For admission into "the City Police force," your application should be made at the Chief Commissioner's office.

MAZATLAN.—Wait patiently.

RICHARD MARKHAM.—Your eggs will probably be hatched before you see this. You may obtain mulberry leaves at the herb shops in Covent Garden Market.

B. ODDY.—Silkworm's eggs may be obtained at the same shops.

L. TAYLOR.—We do not approve of your violent condemnation of those placed in authority over you; nevertheless, we heartily wish that, for the benefit of settlers in Australia, a firmer tenure of land could be granted. Not merely on account of the profit that emigrants may derive from the gold mines, but from the fertility of its soil, is Australia a highly favoured country. And then its vast treasures of copper should not be forgotten. Did you ever hear how, with the view of working the Burra-Burra mines (about ninety miles from Adelaide), a company was formed, three years ago, with a capital of only two thousand pounds? In three weeks from the purchasing of the mine, they raised two hundred tons of pure red oxide of copper. They have now built a village, containing several hundred inhabitants. They have completed smelting works, and have sunk their excavations to the depth of 144 feet, and a mile and a half in length. Wonderful to say, they have raised, in one year, 7,200 tons of copper ore, worth, on an average, at least £25 per ton.

MELISSA, MOLLY BAWN, and LILLIAS.—You will find the following an excellent wash to prevent sun-burn:—Take one drachm of camphor, two drachms of borax, one drachm of Roman alum, half an ounce of sugar-candy, and one pint of ox-gall. Mix the ingredients, and stir them well together, repeating the process three or four times a day, until the mixture becomes transparent. Then strain it through filtering paper, and it is fit for use. But apply it only once a day, and in the following manner:—wet the corner of a linen towel in the mixture, and wash your face and hands with it on rising in the morning. Afterwards proceed with your ablutions as usual.

F. P. J.—Your question refers to a journal of the private management of which we know nothing.

R. R.—161, W. Seymour-street, Portman-square.

W. T. ROBERTS.—Write the lessons off first, and then commit them to memory.

M. H.—The name of the Princess Charlotte's medical attendant was Sir Richard Croft.

PHILOLOGUS.—Your transpositions are very ingenious; but the word on which you have exercised your ingenuity, causes us, respectfully, to decline their insertion.

PEEBLEAN.—Why not repay the 20s. in four equal parts, 5s. each?

HUMBLE BEE.—Use your knife rather than your fingers.

AN ANXIOUS ONE.—You propose a dangerous expedient. Firmness and patience will, no doubt, prove your safety.

H. V. (L. DERRY).—If you personally present a cheque payable to self, a stamp is not necessary.

 We cannot guarantee the return of rejected manuscripts.

All Letters and Communications for the Editor to be addressed to JOHN CASSELL, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

London: Printed and Published for JOHN CASSELL by PETTER and GALPIN, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

[THE RIGHT OF TRANSLATION AND REPUBLICATION IS RESERVED.]

NEW SERIES. VOL. II.—No. 32.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 10, 1858.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG FETTERED," ETC.

CHAPTER LXV.

No counsel from our cruel wills can win us,
But ill's once done, we bear our guilt within us.

FORD.

THE cause of the march of the gallant 01st to Delhi soon became apparent. The government had taken alarm at the spirit of insubordination manifested by the native troops: the forces on which, with a blindness partaking of fatuity, England had hitherto confided the stability of her dominions in the East.

When the news first begun to be whispered in Calcutta, the young officers and many civilians merely laughed at it. Nothing could shake their faith in the fidelity of the native army. They regarded it as a mere passing ebullition, arising from some caprice of caste, or an attempt to avail themselves of the absence of the larger portion of the Queen's troops in Persia, to extort an augmentation of pay or batta. The greased cartridges they looked upon as the pretext.

In the last opinion, most probably, they were not far wrong, for the Hindoo, like the European, seldom gives the reason for his act, it is generally veiled by the excuse.

A few old residents in India viewed the affair in a widely different light. They had long been aware of the spirit of disaffection, which, like the smouldering fire, only waited a favourable occasion to burst forth, and spread destruction around; but even they were far from imagining the horrors which were soon to be perpetrated—horrors destined to desolate many an English home, and leave an indelible stain upon the page of history, when treating of our rule in India.

It is astonishing how few men, till the events of the late war, ever formed a correct notion of the sepooy character; and yet the data for a sound judgment were ample. Their religion was and is a religion of cruelty founded on an appeal to the worst passions of humanity. The Asiatic character is naturally deceitful, and truth a stranger to it.

All orientals, without exception, deem it a meritorious act to deceive the European; and after so many years of contact with us and governed by us, it is a sad blot upon the policy of Englishmen, but an admitted one, that they neither love nor respect us.

The fact is, they look upon us as hypocrites; and when we calmly and dispassionately consider all the circumstances which have attended the progress of our empire in the East, we can scarcely feel surprised that they have come to such a conclusion.

Let us examine them.

In the first place, the conquerors vaunted the superiority of their religion; proclaimed the faith of the Hindoo a blasphemy and a mockery; yet at the same time absolutely assigned revenues for the maintenance of its idolatrous worship—levied a tax upon the countless multitude of pilgrims who flocked to the obscene ceremonies of Juggernaut, whose horrid idol was annually dragged forth in procession, whilst English soldiers kept the line, and paid military honours to the Moloch god.

RICHARD CONFIDES HIS SECRET TO LILLIAN.

The British government proclaimed disinterestedness as a principle, and displayed the most grasping avarice as a practice. Not a native ever did, or probably ever will, believe that the tortures inflicted upon them to exact the taxes were inflicted without its knowledge; and, notwithstanding the denial in parliament, we venture to assert that few Englishmen will be found who are not of the same opinion.

Neither were the lives of our countrymen in India calculated to awaken respect. The majority lived in a state of open immorality—professed Christianity but practised paganism; not in its grosser form of idolatry, perhaps, but in abandoning themselves to those vices they professed to abhor.

No wonder the Hindoo pronounced the religion of the conquerors a mockery; that the haughty Brahmin, who at least paid the homage of external observance to his faith, both hated and despised us, and, like the tiger, only wanted the favourable moment to make the fatal spring.

That moment had now arrived, and the utter want of precaution—steps that the simplest prudence might have dictated—all tended to make the insurrection as successful for a while as it was destined to prove remorseless and bloody.

Last and not least amongst the heavy charges to which England is called, morally, at least, to answer, is the reckless, grasping spirit shown in the aggrandizement of our possessions. State after state became absorbed, entire kingdoms annexed; and yet at the same time, with a fatuity which no other nation in the world would have been guilty of, we allowed the fallen possessors of the thrones we had abolished to maintain a royal state.

Thus the shadow of the great Mogul still sat enthroned at Delhi, with all the external symbols of sovereignty. The ex-king of Oude resided and received royal honours at Calcutta; and the number of petty princes who continued to exist under similar conditions is so great that it would exceed the limits of our pages to enumerate them.

We have often wondered how England came to fall into so palpable an error, and, after much reflection, came to the conclusion that it arose from our fatal love of imitation—the German element ingrafted upon the Saxon stock.

Germany mediated a number of potentates, more or less considerable—that is to say, deprived them of their possessions, yet left them the externals of royalty—and England aped Germany in the East, as she is gradually doing at home.

If the example is less striking here, it is that we have no princes to mediatise.

The approaching departure of Sir Charles and his family for Delhi was a sad blow to the hero of our tale. Fain would he have accompanied them; but a tie stronger even than that of love—honour—chained him to Calcutta, at least for the present, and he could not break its fetters without abandoning the hope which had first brought him to India.

"I cannot comprehend," observed Lady Bell, when the approaching departure was talked over, "why you should not go with us."

Lillian looked the same.

In this dilemma, the baronet, like a gallant soldier, came to his rescue, for he alone of the speakers understood the cause.

"Simply, my love, because he has a reason," he replied.

The lady gave one of her pretty little shrugs, which, in those of her sex, mean so much or so little.

"And that I, for one," added her husband, "should blame him for a dereliction of duty."

There was no mistaking that.

"Duty," repeated her ladyship, emphatically—for her warm, affectionate heart grieved for the disappointment of her adopted child—"that is the word with which you lords of the creation always try to silence us."

"I am glad you said try," observed her husband, with a smile.

"Duty," continued the lady, "duty: a word which means everything or nothing, when we ask for reasons."

Sir Charles both looked and felt annoyed. "Dear Lady Bell," exclaimed our hero, "you cannot doubt but the first wish of my heart is to accompany you and Lillian—to watch over you and guard you; but it is impossible. Did you know how imperative are the motives which retain me here you would pity me."

"But I do not know them," replied her ladyship, dryly.

"You forget, my love," observed the baronet, mildly, "that I do."

"True."

"And approve them."

The marked emphasis upon the word approve, reminded the fair rebel to conjugal authority that she was becoming a little, only a very little, unreasonable.

"It is not from a selfish motive that I wish it," she said, after a pause.

"That I am sure of," replied Richard, warmly.

"Poor Lillian has never uttered a word upon the subject."

Her lover regarded the sorrowing girl gratefully.

"But after the attempts upon your life," continued her protectress, "which we can neither of us think of without terror, you cannot wonder at our feeling. And now the secret is out. You men are such conceited things," she added, "that I am compelled to explain myself in order to avoid rendering you more vain than nature has made you."

"Do you admit such a thing to be possible?" demanded Sir Charles Fourreau, with a good-humoured smile, for the explanation had touched the right chord in his heart. In fact, he was not without certain misgivings himself upon the subject of his young friend's safety.

With that tact which distinguishes not only her sex, but the speaker in particular, her ladyship contrived to lead her husband from the drawing-room, so that the lovers might be left together.

"And do you think me unkind, Lillian?" demanded our hero, touched by the expression of sorrow on her features.

"No, Richard," replied the fair girl, in a tremulous voice; "it is your danger, not my own weak, childish desire to have you near me, which distresses me. You have an enemy in India."

"Most men meet with an enemy in their path in life, and whether in India or England makes but little difference," was the reply.

"You are wrong—believe me, you are wrong. Little as I have seen and can remember of my father's land, I feel that there the danger is comparatively harmless; the passions of mankind are under subjection to the law of reason—here, they rage in all their fierceness."

"Humanity is the same everywhere," observed her lover.

Lillian shook her head incredulously.

"It is only its phases that vary," added the speaker.

"I have heard such fearful tales of their violence in the East," said the poor girl; "and we have witnessed one such fatal example that you cannot wonder at my terror. Be careful, Richard," she continued, "for my sake, and the sake of all who love you. Should—"

Here her feelings so far overcame her that she was unable to proceed, and burst into a flood of tears.

As most of our readers have loved in their time—if not, we pity them—it will be quite unnecessary to recapitulate the arguments and reasons her lover made use of to calm her sorrow, or the precautions he promised to use to guard against the menaced danger, which he professed to laugh to scorn; and yet, at the instant he made the assertion, a chill ran through his veins, for he recollected the pangs he had endured—the dangers he had escaped.

"You forget, too," he added, "that Jack is with me; that he would lay down his life in my defence."

"I have no doubt of his fidelity," replied the fair girl, "but—"

"Still this doubt?"

"What precautions can avail against the deadly skill of the poisoner. I have heard such fearful examples of it."

"Dismiss them from your mind, Lillian," answered her lover. "Providence is no more blind in India than in Europe. Remember how it watched over your own infant years."

"I should be ungrateful to forget it."

"The friends it raised you up."

"They have indeed been second parents to me."

"My own life proves that she has been equally friendly to me," resumed her lover, who felt that the woman on whom he had bestowed his affection was equally entitled to his confidence. In fact, he had frequently reproached himself for having listened to the advice of Sir Charles, although given with the best of motives, and kept the secret from her.

Lillian regarded him with surprise.

"I must tell you," he said, "that my early years were steeped in poverty to the very brim—a poverty as desolate as yours."

"No, Richard, no—impossible!" exclaimed the maiden. "You must have had friends who loved you."

"True, I had a mother and a sister."

"Then your fate could not have been as desolate as mine."

"Not when I saw them starving?"

His hearer repeated the word with terror and astonishment.

"And, half mad at the sight," resumed her lover, lowering his voice almost to a whisper, "my heart and brain both on fire, I rushed into the streets—the pitiless streets of London—to procure them food at any sacrifice—even the sacrifice of honour."

"Terrible!"

"You will not blame me, Lillian?" said the youth, gazing on her with feelings of deep emotion.

"Not even if you fell, Richard!" exclaimed the affectionate girl, enthusiastically. "The motive might not have sanctified, but, at least, it would have excused the crime."

"But I did not fall," said our hero, after a pause. "That Providence on which I still rely, watched over me."

"Thank heaven!"

"On the brink of crime, I was saved by my grandfather, who, angry at my mother's having married the man of her heart without his sanction, had cast her off to penury and want."

"Can there be such a nature?"

"Do not blame him. I, at least, have not the right, for he has proved kind to me; neither dare I judge him, for there was much in the conduct of my unhappy father to justify his resentment—he was a drunkard. Happily, you do not know all the misery that word implies."

Lillian shuddered: she recollected, but too well, the scenes she had witnessed whilst under the roof of Mike, in the Belvedere-road.

"My grandfather adopted me," continued the speaker.

"Bless him for that. His heart could not have been all of clay. One chord, at least, was human."

"Educated me," added her lover, "and has ever manifested the warmest affection for me."

"Could he do otherwise?"

Richard smiled: there is no flattery like that which falls from the lips of those we love.

"No doubt," exclaimed the fair girl, "he became reconciled to his offending child; your influence must have accomplished that."

"Alas, no."

"Did you seek it?"

"Most earnestly."

"And failed?"

"There was a reason, which reason brought me to India. My father, who had been a clerk in my grandfather's house previous to his marriage, was suspected of having abstracted certain securities, which had been realised in India. There were no proofs—that is to say, positive proofs; for those who planned and executed the dishonest act, and then with devilish cunning contrived to cast suspicion upon my parent, never dared to make the accusation public."

"Thank Providence."

"Still it hangs over him."

"Your grandfather, Richard! surely if he loves you he will never make it; it would be cruel, unjust!"

"He never would, but his enemy might; and the dread of such a disgrace upon the name of my grandfather, has prevented the reconciliation. Now, Lillian, mark me," added her lover, impressively; "the children of the poor are naturally observant. Want is a stern instructress; her pupils become prematurely old, and whilst others of their age think only of amusements, dreams of happiness, they learn to scan and measure the character, temper, strength, and weakness of those who come in daily contact with them."

"That is true," observed his hearer, sadly. "My own brief experience can bear witness to your words."

"Well, then, I have watched my father well—know his weakness and his strength. He never swerved from the path of strict integrity."

"His son could not be deceived."

"I am sure of it," he continued, "sure as that I live and breathe, sure as that you, with eyes beaming with love and confidence, are standing here beside me. He has redeemed himself nobly, redeemed himself, and is now, if not rich, at least respected and in honour."

"But if your grandfather loves you," observed Lillian, "he never could have the heart to disgrace the name you bear."

"It is not in his power to prevent it."

"How so?"

"In the first burst of anger and disappointment at my mother's marriage, which he only learnt on his return from India, the old man, who had discovered the loss of the securities, accused my father."

"Openly?"

"Alas! no—would that he had."

"Where, then, is the danger?" demanded his hearer.

"He accused him to the man who once expected to be his son-in-law, and the heir of his immense fortune, —to his own nephew, and, unfortunately, by letter. Had he done so publicly, much misery might have been avoided."

"And the name of this nephew?"

"Carus Kearn."

Lillian repeated it twice.

"This imprudent, because unjust, act," resumed our hero, "has borne with it bitter punishment. My grandfather, I believe, is now sincerely anxious to be reconciled to his offending child; but fears the revengeful nature of his nephew, whose villainy he more than suspects; for there is little doubt but, on the downfall of his long-cherished designs upon the fortune of his relative, Carus Kearn would at once make use of the fatal letter to blast the rising reputation and prosperity of the man he so deeply hates."

"Still I do not comprehend," observed the fair girl, after a pause, "the motive of your coming to India."

"That is soon told."

"Or the necessity of your remaining in Calcutta."

"You shall learn both," replied Richard. "Shortly after the discovery that the securities had been abstracted, my relative, at the request of his old correspondent, Mr. Chutnee, sent out a clerk from England, which clerk was selected from his own office, by the recommendation of his nephew."

"I see, I see."

"It was in Calcutta that the securities were cashed."

"And the clerk is?"

"Mr. Sanford."

"But surely your presence must put him on his guard," observed the maiden. "He must feel that you are watching him."

"I am here under the assumed name of Tyrrell; but Sir Charles," added the speaker, hastily, "to whom I have related my story, knows my real one and the motives of my concealment, for I could not endure the thought of deception towards one who has proved a second parent towards you."

"You are right, Richard—very right!" exclaimed the adopted daughter of the baronet, "he is the very soul of honour; but will Mr. Chutnee keep your secret as faithfully as my benefactor?"

"I have never intrusted him with it."

"Not!" repeated Lillian, with surprise.

"He knows me only as Mr. Tyrrell. It was under that name another of his correspondents, Mr. Curry, the head of the great house of Curry and Sons in London, introduced me."

"How kind!"

"Curry is my grandfather's oldest friend," added our hero. "And now, Lillian, you know my history. If it has not been revealed to you before, it arose from no want of confidence, but in obedience to the advice of Sir Charles Fourreau. You are aware also of the motive which chains me here."

"A motive too sacred to be broken by any wish or caprice of mine!" exclaimed the rightly-judging girl. "It is your duty to remain, and clear, if possible, the reputation of your father. I shall feel your absence," she continued—"feel it severely,—the more so that the danger you have so lately escaped has not revealed the name of your secret enemy."

"I expect in a few days," replied the young man, "the return of a valued friend; who, at my grandfather's request, accompanied me from England."

"Mr. Wharton?"

"No; a Lieutenant Marsh."

"Singular," said Lillian.

"Why so?"

"I remember seeing him at the government house, and shall never forget the peculiar look he gave me."

"I can explain that."

"You?"

"Yes; at the residence of my grandfather, Mel-down Park—a seat he hired for a few years from Sir Norman Boothroyd—there is a portrait of his only child and heiress, painted by Winterhalter, so like you in every respect, that it was impossible Marsh should not have been struck by it, seeing that we both admired it together."

"Flatterer!" said Lillian, with a smile. Then, musing for an instant, she repeated the name of "Boothroyd" several times, in an under tone.

"Something in my narrative," observed her lover, "seems to have struck you particularly."

"Yes; the name. I feel convinced that I have heard it before, though when or where I do not now recollect; but it will return to my memory as many things have done since I have been in India."

"You do not think my refusal to accompany you to Delhi unkind, then?" said our hero.

"Unkind!" repeated the maiden; "no. I should love you less, Richard, were you capable of being diverted from the path you have chosen, by the tears or wishes of a silly girl like myself, even though you love her. It is man's place to be guided by duty, woman's by affection; follow yours, and leave to an all-wise Providence the rest."

CHAPTER LXVI.

I part with thee,
As wretches that are doubtful of hereafter,
Part with their lives, unwilling, loth, and fearful,
And trembling at futurity.—Rowe.

We will not attempt to describe the pain of the lovers at parting, certain there are many of the readers of the tale who have doubtless experienced a similar agony; and their memories can picture it more graphically than the pen of an author can describe it.

There was one person who felt surprised and annoyed that our hero did not accompany Sir Charles and his family to Delhi. It was Mr. Chutnee; all his jealousy, which had slumbered for a time, revived.

Young, rich, and perfectly uncontrolled in his movements as Richard was, he could not understand the motives which retained him in Calcutta. His love of business seemed inadequate to explain them, and he mentally attributed it to a passion for his young and innocent wife; for his insane jealousy had returned.

Unfortunately the merchant had lately fallen into a habit of consulting his managing clerk—managing in more senses than one. Although he had never avowed the suspicions which were gradually undermining his peace of mind and destroying his domestic happiness, the veil he threw over them was so transparent that a child might have penetrated it. Sanford both saw and rejoiced at his uneasiness, and considered how he might turn the sort of tacit understanding established between them upon the subject to the advancement of his own guilty views.

"You have heard," said Mr. Chutnee, "of the departure of the Oist for Delhi?"

"I have, sir," replied the clerk. "We have made heavy advances to the planters, and should any outbreak occur—"

"Pshaw! It is not the money I am thinking of," interrupted the old man, impatiently.

His hearer already divined as much.

"I have little fear of losing that," added the speaker.

"Still, things look threateningly."

"Let them threaten," replied Mr. Chutnee. "The yoke of England is too firmly fixed upon their necks for a rebellious movement to shake it off."

"Not if the insurrection proved a military one?"

"I see you are one of those croakers who have lost faith in the stability of British power in India," observed his employer. "You have not watched its growth as I have."

The speaker had passed the greater portion of his life in India, having come over when a boy.

"Wherever England plants her foot, she is inviolable."

"Eventually, perhaps," observed his more clear-sighted hearer.

"But that is not the point: you have, doubtless, heard that our young friend Mr. Tyrrell is engaged to the ward of Sir Charles?"

Mr. Sanford had heard as much.

"Is it not strange that he does not accompany them—for a few months, at least?"

The hypocrite admitted that it was rather strange.

"How do you account for it?"

"His intense application to business."

"Pshaw!"

"Or some tie we are ignorant of, which detains him in Calcutta; in fact, I have frequently thought—"

Here the artful fellow hesitated, and tried to look confused, as if he had gone farther in his confidence than he intended.

"What have you thought?"

"Nothing—a mere surmise."

"Your surmise, then?"

"I cannot utter that."

"Why not?"

"It might prove unjust."

"Do speak plainly," said the merchant, impatiently.

"You are one of those men who move in the world with your eyes open, and are not likely to come to an incorrect conclusion."

"But I have come to no conclusion yet."

"Your surmise, then."

"Well, sir, since you will have it," replied his confidential clerk, "I must own that I have frequently wondered why Mr. Tyrrell, who is so rich already, and the heir to a still greater fortune—according to your correspondent, Curry's, account—should so devote himself to business."

"It is rather singular," observed Mr. Chutnee, moodily.

"He is more regular in his attendance at the office than any paid clerk."

"That is true."

"And the suggestion naturally is —"

"Speak it."

"That it covers some design," added the former speaker: "a laudable one, no doubt, for I would be the last person in the world to insinuate anything against his honour."

Mr. Chutnee turned pale with conflicting emotions, as the unprincipled man, who perceived, and secretly smiled at his folly, thus heartlessly sported with his feelings.

"Had I been the lover of Lillian—I mean really her lover," added the clerk, "the chain must have been a strong one to detain me here."

The jealous husband groaned.

"I know," continued his tormentor, "that Lady Bell expressed considerable surprise at his determination."

"And well she might."

"Tried to shake it."

"And failed."

"Evidently, since Tyrrell remains. But since you feel interested in the matter, there are means by which we might obtain a clue to his motives."

"Name them."

"They might prove expensive."

"Count not the cost," replied the merchant.

"Amongst the servants, natives whom Mr. Tyrrell has engaged, there is one who formerly lived with me. Like most of his caste, he is accessible to a bribe; in fact, there is scarcely an act gold would not tempt him to commit. Now I know that his master has lately had a very strong cabinet made of zebra wood, with locks from Europe."

"Well?"

"It can't be to keep his money in."

"Certainly not," replied his employer; "he draws upon me for that, and never in any considerable sums."

"Truly, sir."

"What can he guard in it?"

"Letters."

Had a serpent stung him, the jealous man could not have started more suddenly; for the look which accompanied the word conveyed far more than the mere word itself.

"And you think that this fellow—" he faltered.

"I am sure of it," replied the clerk, seeing that his employer had still too much shame left to explain his meaning more clearly.

"I must be satisfied," exclaimed Mr. Chutnee, "even though the knowledge insure the misery of all my future days. You must obtain possession of the letters."

"That will be impossible."

"How so? Have I misunderstood you?"

"You forget the lock, sir," replied the clerk. "But the cabinet might be removed whilst Mr. Tyrrell is at the office, and—"

"I understand you. An act of—No, no; I cannot descend to that. Is there no other way?"

"I fear not."

"Then must I risk it!"

The eyes of the clerk flashed with a momentary expression of triumph at the thought of persuading the wealthy merchant, whom he secretly hated, to compromise himself by an act of felony.

"Will you undertake it?" said his dupe.

"If you desire it, I will."

"Spare not for money; it is the key to every Asiatic's heart," added Mr. Chutnee. "Reflect on the impatience which is devouring me, poisoning my existence, and do what you have promised at once."

With this understanding, they separated.

It was a fortunate circumstance for our hero and the success of the design which brought him to India, that—before the unprincipled plan could be put into execution—his friend Lieutenant Marsh arrived from his mysterious journey.

"Where have you been?" demanded his ward, after the first congratulations had passed between them.

"In the Punjab," replied his guardian.

Richard repeated the name of the place with surprise.

"Where I have been on an errand in which your happiness is concerned," added the old soldier.

"Mine?"

"Yours and Lillian's."

"Do explain."

"You recollect the portrait we both admired at Meldown Park?" said the gentleman.

"Perfectly."

"And my observation that it resembled the late Allan Boothroyd, the younger brother of Sir Norman?"

"That, too, I remember," observed Richard.

"At the same time, I did not explain to you that the woman Allan married was my only sister. On seeing Lillian at the ball, I was struck by the resemblance, and cautiously made inquiries. The result has been a firm conviction in my own mind that she is my niece."

"Impossible!"

"There is nothing half so strange as the truth," observed the lieutenant, with a smile, "and experience proves it daily. At present, understand me, it is only a conviction; but soon I trust to obtain the proofs. Had Sir Charles not left for Delhi, my task would have been easy."

"But why not proceed at once then?" demanded Tyrrell, with considerable excitement.

"And leave you again alone?"

"Yes."

"Not after the infamous attempt which has been made upon your life," replied Marsh. "It might be renewed, and if successful, I could never face your grandfather, who has confided you to my care, again."

"Think not of me."

"I can comprehend your feelings," said Marsh, "but you must also make allowance for mine. I have a sacred duty to perform, and will not shrink from it. My private affairs must wait."

Knowing how useless it would be to attempt to turn him from a purpose thus seriously decided upon, his hearer remained silent.

"Listen to me, Richard," continued the speaker; "it is evident that you have an enemy unscrupulous and cunning to deal with: the death in prison of your khansumah Hassan could not have been accomplished unless that enemy had powerful friends."

"I have frequently thought so," answered the young man.

"The repetition of the attempt must be guarded against."

"But how?"

"By dismissing every native from your service, and engaging European ones in their place."

"And then?"

"Next you must permit me to take up my abode with you—not as a guardian, I do not ask it in that character, but as a friend."

"In either character," exclaimed the young man, extending his hand to him, "you will be welcome."

Lieutenant Marsh pressed it cordially.

"I will watch over your safety. They must be cunning if they deceive me, for a long residence in India has given me a knowledge of their ways. I will answer for your safety."

CHAPTER LXVII.

Night is the mask of crime, and opportunity
The bait that tempts us.—WEBSTER.

SANFORD was not the kind of man to permit a project, on the results of which he calculated so greatly, to remain like an idle dream within his brain; on the contrary, he proceeded to make arrangements for carrying it into execution immediately. As he stated to Mr. Chutnee, when the unprincipled scheme was first proposed, the concocter of it found little difficulty in bribing the domestic, who readily undertook to admit him and his companions to the house of our hero on the following night, for, in order to insure success, the managing clerk had decided on accompanying his agents. Unfortunately, however, for him, the very morning the attempt was to be made, Richard, in compliance with the advice of his friend Marsh, dismissed every native from his service, consequently Jack Manders and an Englishman, named Edwards, who had brought out horses for the governor-general, were the only persons in the house beside himself and the lieutenant.

Sanford, with his usual mistrust, had made the payment of the sum he had promised to the faithless servant contingent on success, which stipulation induced the equally cunning Asiatic to conceal from him the fact of his dismissal. By hiding in the courtyard he doubted not but he could perform his part of the agreement; unbar the gates, and admit the party to the house.

Jack and the groom were seated in the dining-room long after our hero and his friend had retired to rest.

The grateful fellow was relating to his new acquaintance the attempt which had been made upon the life of his benefactor, and described his own sufferings from the poisonous root.

"I can believe it," observed the man; "this is not my first visit to India. I came out with the marquis, and once saw one of the conjurers or priests perform a trick that many a Newmarket jockey would give a trifle to get hold of."

"And what was that?" demanded his hearer.

"I scarcely like to tell you, lest you should think that I was kicking over the traces, and stretching the rein too far."

"No fear of that, after all I have seen and heard," said Jack.

"Well, then," continued the man, "we had been three weeks trying to break in a charger for his lordship, a fiery, vicious brute, the dread of the stable; it had nearly killed one poor fellow, and thrown me twice. I am not reckoned the worst horseman in the world. We were exercising it in the Madden, as they call it, when a little withered old man—I think they said he came from the hills—offered to ride him, without saddle or bridle. Of course, I and Jem—Jem was my fellow servant—both laughed at him, but a gentleman, who was standing near, advised us to let him try."

"And did you?"

"We did. The fellow passed his hands once or twice over the head and face of the horse; then jumped upon his back and rode him thrice round the course with a single hair."

"A single hair!" repeated Jack, with astonishment.

"That was the strangest thing of all," said Edwards. "He twisted one hair of the charger's mane round his finger and guided him with it as easily as if it had been the strongest bit in the stables."

"It didn't last, I suppose?"

"No," answered the groom, "I only wish it had. When Jem or I mounted him, the brute was as vicious as ever. You must have been pretty lonely," he added, looking round him, "before I came."

"Mr. Tyrrell dismissed the native servants from the house this morning," replied Jack. "Henceforth he is resolved to employ only Englishmen."

"And very right too!" observed his companion.

Manders related in his turn some portion of his own adventures; but what he most dwelt upon was the mysterious disappearance of his old friend and companion in misfortune, Caleb, whose persecutions from Captain Gall he described.

"Do you think his skipper nabbed him again?" inquired Edwards; "he seems to have been a bad one."

Before Jack could inform him that the Caradoc had sailed some days previous to the loss of his friend, both the speakers were startled by a noise in the adjoining saloon.

It sounded as if one of the heavy punkahs had been held back, and suddenly let fall against the window.

"What is that?" exclaimed the groom, starting from his seat.

"Hush!" whispered Jack Manders, at the same time extinguishing the light; "there are strangers in the house."

"Thieves?"

"Or something worse," was the reply.

"Shall I give an alarm?" demanded Edwards, in the same under-tone.

"Let us first see what the danger is like," replied his companion, who was not easily terrified, and whose self-possession was increased by the knowledge that the intruders, whoever they might be, could only approach the chamber of Richard by passing through the apartment he and his companion were in.

For some time past the speaker had made it a point, especially at night, to be well armed. Drawing a revolver from his pocket, he placed it in the hand of the groom, and both advanced stealthily towards the door of communication between the dining-room and the saloon.

Applying his eye to the keyhole, Jack beheld three men in the dresses usually worn by natives; two of them were carrying off the zebra-wood cabinet in which he knew that our hero kept his private papers; whilst the third appeared to direct the operation.

Without a moment's hesitation, the faithful fellow threw open the door and discharged his revolver at the plunderers; Edwards followed his example.

Two of the thieves fell, the third escaped.

The report of the weapons speedily brought Richard and the lieutenant from their chambers. Both were well armed. There was no occasion to ask an explanation of the scene before them—the overturned cabinet, and the bodies of the wounded men, rendered it but too apparent.

"Are you hit, Jack?" demanded our hero, anxiously; for his first thoughts were of his faithful, though humble friend.

"Not a scratch, sir," replied Manders; "the shots you heard were fired by us. We have winged two of them."

"This fellow is dead," observed Edwards, turning over one of the bodies with his foot. "As for this," he added, approaching the second and giving it a kick—

"I soon shall be," muttered the guilty wretch.

All present started at the sound of his voice, for the words were uttered in English.

"Sanford!" exclaimed our hero, who was the first to recognise him. "What motive could have induced you to attempt a crime like this?"

The wounded man pointed to the cabinet.

"Had you obtained possession of it," said the speaker, "you would have been disappointed in your hopes of plunder; it contains only papers and letters."

"It was those I wished to see," replied the clerk, speaking with great difficulty, for the bullet had penetrated one of his lungs, and the blood rose gurgling to his throat with every effort he made. "There is a mystery about you which I feel affects me. I resolved to fathom it; and that jealous old fool, Chutnee, he encouraged me; gave me money to bribe my accomplices with, in the hope of detecting proofs of your correspondence with his wife."

"I never received a line from her in my life," said Richard, indignantly. "His suspicions are as false as his conduct is now proved infamous."

A party of police, which the lieutenant had sent for, as well as a surgeon, now arrived. The latter, after a brief examination of Sanford's wound, pronounced it to be mortal.

"Don't let them send me to a prison," murmured the unhappy man; "I haven't done you any very serious wrong."

"At such a moment I could pardon it, were it ten times greater," replied Tyrrell. "Think of other forgiveness than that of a poor, frail being like myself. There is a future, Sanford, and a Judge from whom no secrets are hidden—we cannot deceive Him."

"I have committed no crime," said the dying man, "that is, no great one."

"Nor concealed any?"

The question agitated the clerk fearfully. It seemed as if each word acted like a probe upon his half-seared conscience.

"Who," he demanded,—"who is he that asks me?"

"Richard Markham, not Tyrrell—the name is but an assumed one—the son of the man whose reputation you and Carus Kearn contrived to blast between you."

At the name of Carus, Sanford became greatly excited, and cursed him as the cause of his ruin.

"A bad end," he muttered, "a bad end. Peter Mangles always foretold that it would fall upon us both. It has overtaken me; it will be the turn of Carus next."

This last idea seemed to afford him considerable satisfaction.

Richard Tyrrell, instead of attempting to excite his evil feelings towards the partner of his iniquities, acted a far nobler, and, as it ultimately proved, a wiser part, by speaking to him of forgiveness and mercy.

"Well, I suppose I must forgive him,—at least, I'll try to do so," replied the dying clerk; "but you don't know what a villain he has been. Repeat that prayer again," he added; "I feel as if it did me good to listen to it."

Richard Markham complied with his request, and prayed by him long and fervently.

A few minutes only before Sanford expired, he drew from his bosom a small key, and placed it in the hands of our hero.

"When I am dead," he said; "when I am dead."

These were the last words he ever uttered, for suffocation soon afterwards ensued, and the struggle of life was ended.

(To be continued.)

THE most difficult department of learning is learning to unlearn. Drawing a mistake or prejudice out of the head is as painful as drawing a tooth, and the patient never thanks the operator. No man likes to admit that his favourite opinion, perhaps the only child of his mind, is an illegitimate one. Sluggish intellects are ever the most obstinate, for that which it has cost us much to acquire, it costs us much to give up; and the older we get the more closely we cling to errors.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

IMPROVEMENT OF TIME.

WHATEVER study you pursue, to whatever branch of knowledge you turn your attention, the importance of time must be borne in mind, and its precious moments gathered up as gold-dust.

The value of time is so obvious, that it is unnecessary to enforce it by argument. But the proper way to show our estimation of its value is to employ it usefully. To do this, we shall find it an excellent plan to allot certain hours for certain purposes, to make for ourselves a time-table, and to adhere to it with the utmost regularity.

This is the method which most successful men have adopted, in whatever position of life they have distinguished themselves. They have said, I will read for so long a time each day; I will devote so much of the day to business, so much to study, so much to rest and recreation. They have arranged their plans consistently and practically, and have steadily pursued them. Erratic genius spurs any such systematic course, and highly gifted genius may do without—it can bear no restraint—Pegasus never adapts himself to harness; but to all persons of merely ordinary ability, to the great majority of mankind, such arrangement is conducive to much good, and to such these remarks are addressed.

We noticed that most of those who have become eminent in literature or science have divided their time according to a fixed rule. King Alfred divided his day into three portions—eight hours to business, eight hours to study, eight hours to recreation and repose. Other examples might be mentioned, but this familiar illustration of our old Saxon monarch is enough. Of course, in dividing our time we must consult ourselves. It is useless for us to adopt the plan of somebody else. We must consider our own position. How are we circumstanced? How many hours is it necessary that we should labour? We are not to be slothful in business. We have to win our bread, and this must take precedence. To exhaust ourselves with prolonged studies, if those studies impair our constitution and unfit us for our daily avocations, is worse than unwise. But, at the same time, we must recollect that the mind and body may be trained so as to undergo and cheerfully sustain an astonishing amount of exercise. Supposing we begin to study, and find ourselves weary and exhausted, we must not take it for granted that such exhaustion is inevitably connected with study. We must gradually train ourselves to such efforts, and we shall find that the mind as well as the body is strengthened by exercise.

Again, we must consider our health. There is always to be taken into the account the difference between the delicate and the robust. There are some whom no amount of training will enable to undergo the same mental or physical exercise. To attempt anything of the sort would be extremely detrimental. At the same time, the common expression that people can't tell what they can do till they try, is as true of mental effort as of everything else.

On your state of health must depend the rest and recreation which you require. By the term rest we mean sleep, and by recreation we mean a change of employment. Whether we are simply seeking amusement, or steadily acquiring information, we must be employed. We must be doing something. Recreation should divert our minds from our common pursuits; and, properly diverted, our hours of recreation may become seasons of improvement. What time can we devote to recreation, and how can we best render our recreations profitable? These are questions which our readers must answer for themselves.

It is probable that four or five hours, and, in some cases, even more, are at our disposal every day. But, to realise this, we must gather up our fragments, so that nothing be lost. An occasional five or ten minutes is of importance. By wasting these we throw away years of life. But, in order to avail ourselves of them, we must have something always in hand. It was thus Elihu Burritt became so competent a linguist. That philosopher was wise who affixed to the door of his study the inscription, "Time is my estate; if I lose an hour, how shall I pay the debt?"

We would urge very earnestly on our young readers the necessity of a right use of Valuable Time. We would suggest that they should all strive to make the best use of all the time they have. We would ask them to set about some systematic arrangement: to undertake some task, so as to work with an object, say the acquisition of French, or the Elementary Principles of Natural Philosophy, and we would encourage them to persevere, and not to recede from their purpose, nor to give it up in despair, because often interrupted.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.
CHAPTER X.

[TO FRENCH CORRESPONDENTS.—We have received a great many communications on the subject of the "French Lessons." The letters of the students shall receive our best attention, and we will endeavour to remove all difficulties; and here we must again impress on the minds of learners that it is by the attentive perusal of the lessons that they must seek the solution of their doubts. There is not any "royal road" to the French language, any more than to geometry; and, like Euclid, we can only solve one problem after another, and not all at once.]

"MISS CRIBB would think I was following her advice, Robert," said George, at the beginning of the next lesson, "if she heard me say, Now you shall write another exercise on the articles. But the fact is, the study of the peculiarities of the first part of speech comes now in the natural order of things. You have acquired a correct idea of all the parts of speech, and you may safely enter into details.

"By the exercises on the article, you will see in what cases the French employ this little word where we omit it, and vice versa. And you will also learn to translate properly that useful word, some. Thus, in the following sentence, 'Donnez moi du fruit, s'il vous plaît.'—Give me some fruit, if you please, 'le du' is merely the genitive case of the article le (the). But the exercises will speak for themselves.

"You had now better add to your vocabulary a few words relating to the Universe.

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
Nature	La nature (f)
Matter	La matière (f)
The sky; heaven	Le ciel (m)
The sun	Le soleil (m)
Sunrise	Le lever du soleil (m)
Sunset	Le coucher du soleil
The moon	La lune
Moon-light	Le clair de lune
The new moon	La nouvelle lune
The full moon	La pleine lune
The stars	Les astres (m pl)
A star	Une étoile (f)
A fixed star	Une étoile fixe (f)
The polar star	L'étoile polaire (f)
The earth	La terre (f)
The milky way	La voie lactée
A fluid	Un fluide (m)
A solid	Un solide (m)
Gas	Un gaz (m)
A continent	Un continent (m)
An island	Une île (f)
A peninsula	Une presqu'île (f)
An isthmus	Un isthme (m)
A cape	Un cap (m)
A promontory	Un promontoire (m)
Latitude	La latitude (f)
Longitude	La longitude (f)
The meridian	Le méridien (m)
The tropics	Les tropiques (m pl)
The poles	Les pôles (m pl)
A plain	Une plaine (f)
The sea-shore	Le rivage (m)
A valley	Une vallée (f)
A rock	Un rocher (m)
A sand-bank	Un banc de sable (m)
A shoal	Un bas-fond (m)
Breakers	Des brisants (m pl)
Pebbles	Des cailloux (m pl)
The sand	La sable (f)
A mountain	Une montagne (f)
A hill	Une colline (f).

"To-morrow you must learn the names of the different divisions of water, but to-day you can add to your stock the names of the four points of the compass."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
The cardinal points	Les points cardinaux
The north	Le nord
The south	Le midi
The east	L'est
The west	L'ouest

"Now, Robert, I see you are all impatient to go on with your journey to Paris; but I can only allow you to go a very little way, for there is something of great importance to which I must direct your attention.

CONTINUATION OF LE VOYAGE À PARIS.

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
What is that dark hole, yonder?	Qu'est-ce que ce trou (m) noir, là-bas?
Do you not know? It is a tunnel.	Ne savez-vous pas? C'est un tunnel (m).
Do you like going through the tunnels?	Aimez-vous traverser les tunnels (m pl)?
Not particularly. But I do not much mind them if they are lighted.	Pas trop. Mais je ne m'en soucie pas, s'ils sont éclairés.

How glad I am we are now out of that dark gulf! Que je suis charmé nous voicil hors de ce gouffre (m) noir!

And very soon we shall be at the refreshment-room. All's well. Here it is. Et bientôt nous arriverons au buffet (m). C'est bon. Le voici.

"I think, Robert," said George, smiling, "we may safely leave our travellers here for a time, while I speak of the important subject to which I alluded. This subject is the similarity that exists between many French and English words, and—what will please you still more—the identity of several of them, and also the manner in which the French have naturalised some of our words, after giving them a few French touches; and now for a few examples (taken at random) of the observations I have just made. Our word packet-boat the French have made their own, and call it paquebot. The train they call train, as well as convoi. Roast beef they term rosbif, and beefsteak—bifstick. Even our favourite word comfortable they have naturalised, and call it confortable. But let us consider the words that are similar to ours—words that have, in fact, one and the same derivation. Do pay particular attention to what I am about to say; for by so doing, your progress in the French language will be amazingly facilitated; and, though the subject belongs, strictly speaking, to what the learned call the physiology of language, I think I can simplify it so that it shall not be more difficult than grammar.

"Our language is a compound of other languages. If you refer to a book in which I know you take great delight, I mean 'Cassell's Illustrated History of England,' you will find that the Romans, Saxons, and Normans have successively held sway in this island. Therefore, besides the language of the original inhabitants—the settlers from the opposite parts of Gaul—the language we speak is compounded of Roman, or Latin; Norman, or French; and also of Saxon. This leads to an important fact for you, Robert. All the words in our language which are of Roman or Norman derivation, are much the same in French as in English.* Almost every word in our language that ends in tion or in ble is nearly if not exactly the same in French as in English. But, of course, you must pronounce every French word according to the rules I have given you for French pronunciation. You can only tell how much French you acquire through attention to the preceding remarks by taking up an English spelling-book and counting the very great number of English words that do end in tion and ble. But here remark particularly that the tion is pronounced in French just as we should sound see-ohng; and take care that I do not hear you giving to the final g the harsh sound of g as we hear it in gust, good, great. The liquid sound of the final n in French words is represented by the ng as we sound it in thing. But, mark me, I do not say that the final French n is represented by the ng as uneducated people pronounce ng in the north of England, and as you yourself, Robert, sometimes commit the blunder of pronouncing it. I know you have been a good deal in the 'north country'; and you talk about nothingue (actually sounding the final g as that letter is pronounced in plague and rogue). But the unlearned in the south are quite as inaccurate, for if you, Robert, chance now and then to talk about nothingue, the Londoners are apt to shock the ear of the educated with their nothink."

ON THE PARTITIVE WORDS "SOME" AND "ANY."

1. I have some apples, but I have no knife. 2. Give me some soup and some wine. 3. Will you have some beef, some roast veal, or some vegetables? I (should prefer) beef, m. (veau rôti), ou légumes? je préférerais some codfish, some partridges, and some goose. 4. I have bought some pepper, some salt and some mustard. 5. I have seen some fine oranges, some excellent chickens, and some bad pigeons on the table. 6. Have you some fruit for dinner? Yes, but I have no wine. 7. I have seen some coxcombs in the public garden to-day. 8. We have eaten some green peas and some petty patees. 9. The memory of great men is always respected. 10. Have you any (roast meat)? No, but we have some excellent (boiled meat). 11. Do you choose fat or lean? A little of both. 12. If you have any cheese, give me some.

* The Roman or Latin language being the fountain-head of the Norman and French languages, accounts for this fact.

me some. 13. (There are) some raspberries and strawberries.
m'en. voilà framboises f. fraises. f.
 14. Put some oil and vinegar into the salad. 15.
mettez huile f. vinaigre m. dans salade. f.
 Eat some vegetables. Will you have any sauce? 16.
mangez légumes. m. voulez sauce? f.
 Shall I help you to some fish? 17. Help the gentleman to (vous offrirai-je) poisson? f. versez à monsieur some champagne; have you offered any (to the lady)?
(en offert) (à madame)?
 Yes, but she prefers water. 18. Will you take some tea?
oui, mais préfère eau. m. voulez-vous prendre thé? m.
 Yes, I will take some with pleasure. 19. (Help yourself to) (s'en prendrai avec plaisir). prenez some sugar and milk.
sucré m. lait. m.

DES EXPRESSIONS PARTITIVES, "SOME" ET "ANY."

1. J'ai des pommes, mais je n'ai pas de couteau. 2. Donnez-moi de la soupe et du vin. 3. Voulez-vous du bœuf, du veau rôti, ou des légumes? Je préférerais de la morue, de la perdrix, et de foie. 4. J'ai acheté du poivre, du sel, et de la moutarde. 5. J'ai vu de belles oranges, d'excellents poulets, et de mauvais pigeons, sur la table. 6. Avez-vous du fruit pour diner? Oui, mais je n'ai pas de vin. 7. J'ai vu des petits-maitres dans le jardin public aujourd'hui. 8. Nous avons mangé des petits-pois et des petits-pâtés. 9. La mémoire des grands hommes est toujours respectée. 10. Avez-vous du rôti? Non, mais nous avons d'excellent bouilli. 11. Voulez-vous du gras ou du maigre? Un peu de l'un et de l'autre. 12. Si vous avez du fromage, donnez-m'en. 13. Voilà des framboises et des fraises. 14. Mettez de l'huile et du vinaigre dans la salade. 15. Mangez des légumes. Voulez-vous de la sauce? 16. Vous offrirai-je du poisson? 17. Versez du champagne à Monsieur; en avez-vous offert à Madame? Oui, mais elle préfère de l'eau. 18. Voulez-vous prendre du thé? Oui, j'en prendrai avec plaisir. 19. Prenez du sucre et du lait.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON IX.

THE LEVER (continued.)

227. Give a few examples of double levers; that is, of two levers turning about the same fulcrum.—Scissors, shears, nippers, and nut-crackers are double levers.

228. Where is the fulcrum?—At the joint.

229. Mention two or three examples of double levers of the third kind.—Tongs, sheep-shears, tweezers.

230. What advantage is gained by the use of them?—By a slight movement of the fingers the ends are brought together rapidly.

231. Can levers be combined, so as to overcome a greater resistance?—They can; such a combination is called a Compound Lever.

232. Can you mention an instance of an important application of the compound lever?—The large platform scale is essentially a compound lever.

233. Describe it.—The platform rests on several levers which are connected with the side lever that supports the sliding weight; this weight, when brought to the proper notch of the lever, balances the load of hay, or coal, that rests on the platform.

THE PULLEY.

234. What is a PULLEY?—A small wheel movable about an axis, and turned by a rope that lies in a groove cut around its edge.

235. Fig. 16 represents a pulley with a fixed axis, and for that reason called a FIXED PULLEY—for what general purpose is it used?—A power, P, applied at one end of the rope, supports, or gives motion to, a weight, W, suspended from the other end.

Fig. 16.

Fig. 17.

236. How does the power compare with the weight which it sustains?—It is just equal to it.

237. Describe the arrangement of pulleys shown in Fig. 17.—One end of the rope that hangs down from the fixed pulley is passed underneath another pulley, and then brought up and fastened to a fixed point, F.

238. Where is the weight suspended?—From the centre of the lower, or Movable Pulley.

239. When the end of the rope at which the power, P, acts is pulled down, what will take place?—The lower pulley will go up and take the weight with it.

240. How much greater is the weight than the power that supports it?—It is twice as great.

241. To raise the weight one foot, how far must the end of the rope be pulled down by the power?—Two feet.

242. What is the construction of the common tackle so much used in raising heavy bodies to considerable heights?—It consists of several pulleys, placed side by side in two frames, or blocks—one fixed and the other movable. The same rope passes around all the pulleys.

243. Where does the power act?—At one end of this rope: and the other end is attached to the fixed block.

244. How much greater is the weight than the power which sustains it?—Four times, if there are two movable pulleys; six times if there are three, and so on.

245. Are there any other mechanical contrivances, or MACHINES, by which power can be gained, besides the lever and pulley?—There are; those in most common use are known by the names of the—Wheel and Axle, Inclined Plane, Wedge, and Screw.

246. What are these machines, together with the lever and pulley, called?—The Mechanical Powers.

THE WHEEL AND AXLE.

247. What does Fig. 18 represent?—A Wheel and Axle.

Fig. 18.

248. Where are the power and weight applied?—The power acts on the circumference of the wheel by means of a rope, and the weight is attached to a rope that passes off from the axle.

249. If the diameter of the wheel is ten times that of the axle, how great a weight will the power sustain?—A weight ten times as great as the power.

250. How is the power applied to it?—The hand grasps hold of wooden pins inserted in the rim of the wheel.

Fig. 19.

251. Explain Fig. 19.—It represents the capstan, used on board ships in lowering and raising the anchor, and on land in moving buildings.

252. What is the power by which the capstan is worked on ship board?—The combined strength of a number of sailors, applied to several handspikes inserted in the axle.

253. How may the power and motion of one wheel be transferred to another?—By an endless band passing round the two wheels.

254. What is the more common method?—By means of projecting pieces, called cogs or teeth, set on the rims of the two wheels.

REVERSES.

On a dark, lowering afternoon in the beginning of winter, a young man might have been seen riding over an extensive prairie in the far west. While he was deliberating in his mind as to the best course to take, an elderly gentleman rode hastily by him. The young man called to him for information, wishing to know if there was any house in the vicinity at which he might pass the night, and, if not, as to the probability of his reaching the nearest village before the storm could overtake them.

"The storm has already commenced, sir," replied the other, and as he spoke the flakes of snow began to fall thick and fast. "There is no house of entertainment near; indeed, mine is the only house that deserves to be so called within a mile. If you will do me the favour to stop there, you shall find yourself welcome. We can at least give you comfortable lodgings, which you would not find, I fear, anywhere else in this neighbourhood."

The young man thanked him warmly, but declined intruding on his hospitality, saying that he was accustomed to the deprivations of the pioneers, and could no doubt rest comfortably in some of those rude cabins the other seemed to despise.

"Oh, no! I could not think of allowing you to ride in search of shelter in such a storm as this threatens to be. I must insist on your accompanying me."

They soon reached the house, a pretty English cottage, standing on one of those knolls common in the western prairies; and, as Mr. Manning threw open the door of the room in which the family were assembled, he turned to his companion—

"What name shall I say?"

"Wardour, John Wardour, from Ohio," replied the young man.

"Ah!" said Mr. Manning, in a tone which said plainly that the name was a familiar one, and he fixed on him a scrutinising gaze; then recollecting himself, he turned to the group collected around the blazing fire, and introduced them to the stranger as—"My daughter, Miss Henrietta Manning; Miss Ward; Miss Lovell, my niece; Mr. Ward; Mr. Francis Manning, my son."

Feeling reassured, after a while, by their apparent forgetfulness of his presence, he ventured to examine the group before him. Miss Manning and Miss Ward were about the same height, and if they had not been friends, might be called rival belles. Though Miss Manning's full, erect form, and majestic carriage, and the noble and perfect outline of her features would have induced almost every person to pronounce her the more beautiful, yet there were few but were glad to turn from the calm, haughty, and almost disdainful glance of her full blue eye to her more animated and easily pleased friend. Easily pleased, yes, that was the great charm that Kate Ward exercised; and with it, when Henrietta could only count her thousands, Kate could count her tens of thousands of victims. Little Carry Lovell, without possessing any great beauty or grace, was yet a greater favourite with all classes than either of the others; for, while Henrietta was called cold and proud, and Kate vain and capricious, by those who were clear-sighted enough not to be blinded by the vivacity of the one, or the beauty of the other, Caroline's gentle, unassuming, and considerate manner preserved her from all harsh criticisms. The second daughter in the numerous family of a poor physician, she had all her life been accustomed to work and think more for others than herself, and that had given a quiet, unselfish tone to her mind, which, with her cheerful disposition, charmed all who came in contact with her. Her father lived only a few miles from Mr. Manning's; and she had ridden over to spend a few days with her cousin and Miss Ward, who had been an old school-mate and very intimate friend of Henrietta's when she was finishing her education in Philadelphia.

Mr. Francis Manning was rather a reckless, good-natured young man, a great favourite with everybody, his father in particular, who indulged him in every freak or whim which his extravagant fancy dictated. Mr. Wardour had heard often of the family before, and he knew there was another son, Julian, the eldest of the family, a reserved and melancholy man in society, who had obtained the reputation of being very peculiar and eccentric.

Mr. Wardour had met Julian several times in the course of his travels, for he was an itinerant Methodist preacher, and had been very much interested in him on account of the resolution, self-denial, and energy he had shown in the course he had marked out for himself, and the many kind deeds he had heard of his doing.

The group around the fire had also heard of Mr. Wardour, as every now and then a curious scrutinising glance at him testified; so he resigned himself to circumstances and his own thoughts, their course being very rarely interrupted by an observation from any of the party till towards the close of the evening, when Carry Lovell, taking compassion on his loneliness, sat down by him, and entered into conversation. The most exquisite music in the world would have seemed discord to him contrasted with the effect of her sweet voice, burdened as he had been for many hours with a sense of loneliness which he had never experienced so thoroughly, for never before had he been thrown with people who seemed to have so little sympathy with him. Out of gratitude he exerted himself to entertain her, and talked of his travels and adventures so interestingly that the earnest attention of Carry drew on her more than once a wondering glance from the cold proud eye of Miss Manning.

As soon as Mr. Wardour retired, Kate Ward gravely congratulated Caroline on the conquest she had no doubt made, and on the brilliant prospect open to her of becoming a Methodist clergyman's wife, especially dwelling on the fine opportunities for travelling that would be afforded her. Caroline bore the raillery with her usual good humour, insinuating that it was caused by jealousy on the part of Kate, who would have been as much interested as she was if she had been a listener.

"He told me, among other things," continued Carry, "that he had been a missionary to the Indians, and that while there he had become acquainted with cousin Julian, and that he had never met a man for whom, on so short an acquaintance, he had formed so decided a friendship."

"Julian has a singular taste in selecting his friends," said Mr. Manning, rather contemptuously; and yet he felt more kindly towards Mr. Wardour for this discovery, for he knew better, and therefore appreciated more thoroughly than any one else, the purity and strength of his son's principles; and to be his friend he knew it was necessary to be a man of uprightness as well as of intellect.

Mr. Wardour, who had reluctantly consented to stay on account of the inclemency of the weather, now busied himself in assisting Frank in making a sleigh.

Under his direction one was constructed which promised to answer all the expectations of the makers; and, when they were all collected round the fire in the evening, the subject of reverses of fortune being introduced, Mr. Wardour related a striking one as having occurred within his knowledge.

"About fourteen years ago," he said, "a lady came to our village in the western part of Ohio, who had married some years before one of the wealthiest men in New York. He died, leaving her with six children, the eldest a boy of about twelve, and—as she and all her friends supposed—in affluent circumstances; but, through the villainy of his partner, in whom he had always placed the utmost confidence, the widow found herself deprived of all her fortune; and so cunningly had the fraud been contrived that she could obtain no reparation. Thrown thus penniless upon the world, she might have starved if a cousin of hers, who had married a gentleman in our village, had not sent for her, and offered her a home till she could find means to obtain one herself. She came, with all her children; and, in a few months, was able to establish herself as seamstress in a small house; and her oldest boy, who had given promise of becoming a fine scholar, was obliged to learn a trade. As he was about my age, my father, at my solicitation, took charge of him; and lately he has been able to relieve his mother almost entirely of the charge of the other children. But her trials and sufferings for the first few years were very painful."

"That was a very sad lot," said Miss Ward.

"What became of the wicked partner?"

"I don't know," replied Mr. Wardour. "He left New York a short time before the widow—Mrs. Deane's—departure, and she had never heard from him. She told me that he had a lovely family, for whose sake he had probably committed the crime."

No one had noticed Mr. Manning's countenance, or it would have created some remark: his earnest attention, his start when the name of the widow was mentioned, and the dark shade that passed over his face; but he said nothing, and soon after, without his usual good-night, retired.

The next morning rose cold, clear, and bright; and after breakfast Mr. Wardour, declining the offer of a ride in the sleigh, which was pressed on him by the gentlemen, left the house, bearing with him the good wishes and kind feelings of all, even of the haughty Henrietta, who had regarded him at first with so much contempt.

About an hour after, the sleigh, so covered with superb buffalo skins as to hide its rough outside, stood before the door, drawn by two fine horses, which Francis was holding in with all his strength, and calling impatiently for his sister and her friends to make haste. They came in time, as almost everything will, if one only has patience to wait for it, laughing and talking, wondering how they should all get in, and declaring that it was the most comfortable sleigh they had ever seen. Mr. Manning stood by, assisting, but with such a troubled, anxious countenance that his daughter asked him several times if he were not well.

Mr. Wardour had passed the prairie, and was riding leisurely along on the main road, which wound around the foot of a hill at some little distance from a precipice overhanging a river flowing at its base. His eye was wandering carelessly over the scene, but his thoughts were with those whom he had left that morning, especially the gentle Carry Lovell, when he heard the loud gingle of bells and quick tramp of horses' feet, and saw close upon him the sleigh with its precious freight, drawn by the infuriated horses, with the reins loose about their necks, that were almost leaping directly towards the precipice. It was his first thought to spring from his horse, and, seizing the reins, he contrived so to change their direction that they ran along the road, but it was some time before he could stop them.

When he succeeded, he was almost frightened at the situation of the occupants. Kate Ward was in a violent paroxysm of hysterics, which Carry Lovell, herself pale and trembling, was vainly endeavouring to soothe, while Henrietta lay motionless and apparently dead in the arms of Mr. Ward, and Edward was nowhere to be seen. He was thrown out soon after the horses first started, so Mr. Ward said, about half a mile further back. Turning the horses, which had been apparently much frightened, but now seemed quiet, Mr. Wardour led them back in the same direction they had come, and found Mr. Manning lying stunned and senseless in the road. His head had struck a stone, and was apparently much hurt. He was laid carefully in the sleigh, and sadly and slowly they proceeded homeward.

Late in the evening, Mr. Manning sent for Mr. Wardour. He was so pale and haggard that the kind young man started; but Mr. Manning would not allow him to speak, but, motioning him to a chair, said: "These last two days have been the most trying, and yet I hope the most beneficial ones I have ever passed. I never saw so clearly the worthlessness of those objects in whose pursuit I have passed my whole life. And, while I was standing over the almost lifeless bodies of my children, I renewed a resolution which I have often formed, but never yet had courage to put in practice. I feel a confidence in you which induces me to tell you what, two days ago, I would rather have died than have breathed to any one, in the hope that you may strengthen and confirm me in the resolve I know by experience to be very weak. But, first, you must promise never to reveal what I relate without my consent."

Mr. Wardour readily promised, and Mr. Manning continued:—

"You recollect the widow, Mrs. Deane, of whom you were speaking the other night? I was her husband's partner! You would not blame me so much, perhaps, if you knew all the circumstances. But I will not attempt to justify myself. I will only say that I had no choice between taking the step I did and utter poverty. But I will say I have never known a peaceful mom nt since. Though nothing could be proved against me, the public feeling was so strong, and showed itself so openly in the coolness of my old friends, that I was glad to leave the city, and retreat to this wilderness. By some accident, Julian, who was spending a few days in New York, heard of what I was accused. He recalled some circumstances which proved my guilt conclusively, and hastened homeward to entreat me to make restitution. I was several times on the point of yielding, but the thought of my other children restrained me. Now I am resolved to continue firm. Poor Henrietta! She little knew what agony I was enduring while she was talking the other night. Neither she nor Francis must have a suspicion of the truth. I have written to Julian, who will be here to-morrow, probably, and then we can decide what to do."

"You had better try now to sleep a few hours, if possible," said Mr. Wardour; "you seem very much in need of rest."

"Yes," replied Mr. Manning. "I have not slept for three nights. I will follow your advice."

Nothing could exceed the joy of Julian when he heard his father's resolution, except his sorrow at his brother's precarious situation. Nothing could be done while they were all so anxious about him. And in the meantime Julian exerted himself to obtain a professorship, then vacant in a college in one of the Eastern States, and being eminently qualified, was successful. So that, by the time Francis—who, contrary to the opinion of the doctors, did recover, thanks to his robust constitution—was well enough to hear of their loss of fortune, Julian had not only a comfortable but a delightful home to offer to his family in one of the pleasant New England villages.

Six weeks after the eventful ride, Henrietta was standing alone by her open window, with the bright moonlight falling in floods over her exquisite figure and statue-like face. The air was cold, but she felt it not; for Mr. Wardour had left her not an hour before, and she had at last yielded willingly to a discovery she might have made some days before. But, though she had suspected it, she could not endure the thought that the proud, aristocratic Henrietta Manning should love the poor Methodist, the son of a mechanic. And so filled was her mind with the delightful visions of her future life, which her fancy pictured before her, that it was morning before she closed her eyes.

She was aroused by a kiss on the forehead.

"I have come to bid you good-by, Henrietta," said the voice of her cousin Carrie. The room was so darkened that neither could see the other. "Father has come for me sooner than I expected; and I would not have wakened you, but I wanted to tell you something before I went. Mr. Wardour was here last night, you know?"

"Yes. What of it?" said Henrietta, starting up. "Why, a great deal, ma belle cousine. He came to ask me—I may as well say it in plain English—to marry him, and 'of course I said yes; and so I wanted to tell you first, and ask you to be bridesmaid. Will you?"

"Yes, yes, certainly. When is it to take place?" "Next spring, I think; I don't know. Good-by. Father is impatient, I fancy, by this time;" and, with a hasty embrace, Carry left her cousin alone to the pangs of unrequited love.

For nearly the whole day, her room, on the plea of a headache, was closed to all who came to ask for her; and the sun was setting before she could summon resolution to meet any one. When, at last, she ventured to the parlour, where Francis was sitting in an easy chair, with Kate by him, pretending to read to him, their gaiety seemed so discordant to her feelings that she retreated to a sofa in a dark corner; and, throwing herself upon it, begged to be left unnoticed. Julian had been closeted nearly all day with his father, settling his business for him, as he was intending to set out the next day to prepare his new home for the reception of his father, brother, and sister. But now his firm, quick tread was heard approaching.

"I am glad to see you down," said he to Henrietta, sitting by her, and drawing her towards him. "I have some rather disagreeable news for you; and you too, Francis;" and he went on to announce them the complete loss of all their fortune; and told them of the home he had secured for them.

They both bore the intelligence much better than Julian had expected. Henrietta indeed seemed perfectly indifferent. Her mind was so filled with her peculiar sorrows, that she hardly realised this misfortune. That they were to change their residence was all that made an impression on her, and at that she was pleased.

"Now, Kate," began Francis, with an earnest, troubled look.

"Now, Frank, I hope you are not going to accuse me of being mercenary. If you are, I will never forgive you. I have enough for us both, and Henrietta too, at least to begin with; and with your wonderful genius I should not wonder if we were as rich as Rothschild before long."

"Ah, Kate, that was all nonsense of mine; for I would not like father to know how badly I felt, more for you than myself, though. To think that I should have nothing but my own poor self to offer you, after all; and it is a very serious matter to be a poor man's wife, as, if you venture to try it, you will find."

"I never intend to be a poor man's wife, at least not long; and therefore I am resolved to marry a man of such remarkable genius. I know I am not fitted in the slightest degree for that elevated station; and so I give you fair warning that I can neither mend nor make, bake nor brew, nor spin, nor do any of those notable acts of housewifery that all young ladies are bound to know; and for all that I am determined to marry you, and no one else."

That Francis was willing, no one can doubt; and, when April came with its south winds and showers, they were married; and, in the course of time, Kate's prophecy was fulfilled, for Francis showed, if not genius, great skill and energy in his business. The day after Francis' marriage (Carrie and Mr. Wardour had been married a week or two before), Mr. Manning and his daughter left the old home for the new with less regret than, six months before, either would have thought possible.

Henrietta had never been fond of society, and therefore neither her father nor Julian thought it strange that she kept herself almost entirely secluded from the people in the village. Neither did they wonder much that, though her hand was often sought, it was never given. Her father seemed so wrapped up in her that it was cruel even to think of leaving him; but, when he died, and left her alone with her brother, she wrote to Carry, begging for one of the numerous little family which were growing up around her. The sacrifice was too great; Carry could not consent to part with any of her darlings.

But when, nearly twenty years after Henrietta had left her western home, a feeble invalid, bowed down more by grief than age, stood before her, leading two children, she recognised John Wardour, changed as he was, and knew that he brought her the legacy her cousin had left her.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

THE HON. P. J. LOCKE KING, M.P. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

"They are all that remain to me," said he, mournfully, after the first painful interview was over. "Their mother and six others have gone before where I hope soon to follow them. Under any other circumstances I would not leave them till I was taken from them; but my health would not permit me to watch over them as I should. My little Henrietta I will confide entirely to you; but, if I should recover my health, I must reclaim John."

"John and Henrietta?" muttered, half unconsciously, Miss Manning.

"Yes, she was named for you. You know my wife loved you like a sister."

Mr. Wardour left in a week or two; and, the next time they received information of him, he was dead. Henrietta lived long and usefully, and her two adopted children mourned for her as they would have sorrowed for their mother.

MR. LOCKE KING, M.P.

THE HON. PETER JOHN LOCKE KING, M.P., the representative of East Surrey, is a younger brother of the Earl of Lovelace, and is son of the seventh Lord King by the eldest daughter of the first Earl Fortescue. He was born in December, 1811, at Ockham Park, Ripley, Surrey. He commenced his education at Harrow School, and completed it at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself, and took the degree of Master of Arts in the year 1833.

On the completion of his academical career, Mr. Locke King evinced an ambition for parliamentary distinction, and showing a liberal tendency, notwithstanding his relationship with the party generally opposed to progressive movements, he soon found a market for his abilities. His family influence no doubt helped him to secure the good graces of the electors of East Surrey, but his success was principally due to the enlarged views he expressed upon different questions of education and domestic policy. He professed to be an earnest advocate of the ballot, as it is one of the means by which electioneering corruption could be checked. He held that the protection of secret voting was certain to promote the independence of the elector, and so lead to an improvement of the House of Commons as an exponent of the opinions of the people at large. He also saw the necessity of extending the franchise, and early identified himself as an earnest reformer on this particular question.

Mr. King has, moreover, devoted himself strenuously to improve the law of succession to the real property of parties who die intestate. He strongly opposed himself to the injustice of the law which makes a difference, where a parent has made no difference, between one child and the other children of the same family; a law by which a widowed mother and a whole family of dependent and helpless children (said Mr. King) are rendered destitute, in order that one member of the same family may, through their poverty, become powerful, pampered, and luxurious. He wanted to see "the old feudal law as to landed property brought into harmony with the law of common sense and modern usage as to personal goods and chattels, so as to remove the anomalies which now exist, and which often cause, in the second generation, one first cousin of a family to become a peer of the realm, while another cousin is serving on starvation wages as a governess, or sent out to keep sheep in Australia." Himself a younger member of a wealthy family, although far more fortunate than the extreme case he mentioned, Mr. King was well able to discuss the matter, and to point out the evils of the law relating to the division of the property of persons dying intestate. He did so, feelingly, and convinced many of his hearers that he had truth and justice on his side.

The question more particularly advocated by Mr. Locke King is the extension of the county franchise. In this matter he has the support of many leading members of the House, and the adoption of his views seems to be only a matter of time. He proposes extending the county franchise to £10 occupiers, a measure which would greatly increase the number of electors, and diminish the influence of family connections. Mr. King's measure to this effect was brought into the House of Commons in 1851, and has been annually discussed ever since.

Mr. King is a quiet, gentlemanly man, and transacts his parliamentary business to the satisfaction of all with whom he comes in contact. As a speaker, he is popular, for he always goes to the pith of his subject, and discusses its merits with a lawyer-like ability, evidently beginning at the right place, and continuing in that course to the end. He is listened to with great attention, even when he speaks late, which is saying a great deal of an independent member of parliament, unless he occupies a very marked position, like Mr. Bright or Mr. Disraeli.

Our portrait is from a photograph by Mr. Mayall.

OBERSTEIN, ON THE RHINE.

OBERSTEIN

The river nobly foams and flows,
The charm of this enchanted ground;
And all its thousand turns disclose
Some fresher beauty varying round.

THE Duchy of Oldenburg is a small state between Prussia and Bavaria, watered by a fine river, a tributary of the Rhine. The rocky acclivities through which the stream forces its way are crowned with the debris of ancient castles, mementoes of the rugged days when this fatherland was ruled by those fierce lords whose iron will was supported by their iron hands.

Oberstein, represented in the accompanying engraving, is a city built on one of these rocky heights, and is one of the many beautiful pictures with which Germany attracts the tourist. Its old castle, old watch-tower, old church, old houses, old wall, old steps, with its clear river, its deep sky, and the verdure of its hills, possess an indescribable charm.

The hills which rise up behind the old-fashioned houses, are crowned by two castles; one of which is in tolerable repair, while the other has long been abandoned, and is now nothing more than a ruined tower covered with ivy.

Beneath these ruins, in a cavern of the mountain, is built, like a swallow's nest, a little Gothic church, the belfry of which peeps out from the cavern, and is sharply defined against the side of the mountain. The ascent to this church is a matter of some difficulty, but it is well worth more than the trouble it costs. The old porch is very romantic in its appearance; the church windows are filled with devices by Albert Durer; there are besides some quaint old pictures and curious tombs—old sepulchres of the Oberstein worthies.

The porch of the church commands a panoramic view, unsurpassed of its kind in Europe. Oldenburg lies like a map before you. Fields, pastures, meadows, dotted with cattle; an undulating country with yellow corn patches on the upland, and rivers and lakes, embroidering, as with silver lace, the green vesture of the duchy.

There is much to attract the artist, the tourist, or the idler—every one who has anything of romance, poetry, or the picturesque in their hearts. On the hill, in the gothic church, among the ruins, amid the decadence of man's art, and the eternal youth of nature, one may muse and dream. Or, on the river, in whose clear, still depths old Oberstein regards her beautiful face as in a mirror, one may recall the past, give the imagination wings, and resign oneself entirely to the influences of the hour and the place. But Oberstein, or, indeed, any part of Oldenburg, is not likely to gratify the practical business man, whose motto is "go ahead." For Oldenburg has lagged in the race of progress. The industry of its inhabitants is principally rural; but they do not produce sufficient corn for home consumption, and though their horses and cattle are of a superior breed, they do not turn them to any very profitable account, and are content to go on in primitive fashion, both as farmers and graziers. The chief branches of manufacturing industry are spinning and weaving, but these are pursued only as auxiliary occupations by the agricultural population. The trade of the duchy also is exceedingly limited, and its commerce is principally confined to a coasting traffic with the neighbouring countries.

ALONE.

ALONE with all the busy crowd
Who throng life's narrow streets,
No sympathy among the proud
My eager spirit meets.

Alone, alone, no kindred heart
Responsive beats to mine;
None with the stranger claim a part
Mid the dark scenes of time.

Alone, when at the kindly word
From sympathetic hearts,
My spirit's inmost depths are stirred,
And tears of joy will start.

Alone upon this happy earth,
Where all seems bright and gay,
And every breeze wafts joy and mirth
While speeding on its way.

With lips of love and eyes of light
That kindred others meet,
But loving words, and glances bright,
The stranger never greet.

But when this weary life is o'er,
This heart, now cold and chill,
May meet upon that heavenly shore
With those who love it still.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER LII.

Desdemona. And yet I fear you, for you are fatal then,
When your eyes roll so. Why, I should fear, I know not,
Since guiltiness I know not; but yet I feel, I fear.
Othello. Think on thy sins.—SHAKESPEARE.

BOB BLOSSOM was sobered for a moment by the passionate jealousy, which had never before found vent in words. He rushed out with the intention, he had so savagely expressed, of forcing down Jem Goodman's throat the half-sovereign which that kind and good man had so generously lent his wife; and, although there was something wild in his eye, and almost insane in his groundless rage, there was no outward evidence left of his having taken a drop too much, as he would himself have called the being very nearly, if not quite, tipsy.

It was not that he exactly suspected Apple Blossom's conduct, or doubted Jem Goodman's honour. He did not take the coarse view, even in his cups, that his vile and sordid associates did, of the intimacy he had always been proud of, and encouraged until that fatal night at the "True Briton."

He knew the purity of Apple Blossom's heart. He knew the integrity of Jem Goodman's character.

All that Jack Badger and Sam Slybrute had been able to do was to fill him with a vague jealousy of Apple Blossom's affection, and an almost fiend-like rage at the idea, that she must hate the man who had proved such a weak, vain, idle boaster, the beast who had returned to her in a loathsome state of dead drunkenness after all his promises, and the brute who had struck her, kicked her, swore at her, abused and cursed her, even while she was trying to do her utmost to help and comfort him.

With the, to him, maddening thought, that she must hate himself, came that, not less irritating, that she must compare her dull, sulky, selfish, sordid husband, unshorn, ill-dressed, haggard, and squandering his few and uncertain earnings on drink, that made him alternately stupid and excitable, with that clean, neat, kindly, self-denying, self-sacrificing friend, who never spoke but to comfort, never came but to do some service, and would rather have wanted himself than have let Apple Blossom do so.

"She's my wife, and she can't help herself," he would say to himself a dozen times a day; "but if she won't, if she won't free to choose now, it's my opinion she'd prefer Jem Goodman to Bob Blossom." And this thought was so intolerable to him that, to get rid of it by a temporary oblivion, he hurried off to the "Good Intent," the "Rose and Crown," the "True Briton,"—anywhere where alcohol could be procured for ready money, or where he could get trust; and very often on these occasions Slybrute shared in the carouse.

When Bob Blossom got out of the alley in which he lived into Holborn, it struck him all at once that he did not know where to find Jem Goodman. Since Ben Darrell's trial had been going on, he had, with the sanction of the humane and noble-hearted Governor of Newgate, spent much time with the wretched Ben, who seemed to find no comfort in any other person.

"I dare say he's a-praying and singing psalms along of Ben Darrell inside Newgate now," said Bob to himself, pausing for a moment before the illuminated windows of the "Rose and Crown."

As his evil genius, in the shape of a bad habit, would have it, Sam Slybrute came up at this moment. "Let's have a glass together, Bob," he said.

"No," said Bob; "no, meate. I ain't in the mind to."

"What! have Jem Goodman been a-preaching to ye, as well as to pretty Apple Blossom?"

"Hang him!" said Bob.

"With all my heart," laughed Sam Slybrute. "I haven't the least objection. I shouldn't care if every teetotaler as ever signed the pledge wor hanging as high as heaven. But what's set thee up, man? Apple Blossom's a good wife to you. She may like his smooth tongue and soft sawder, cos vy? she's a ooman; but he'd never make her forget her duty to you."

"I ain't afeared o' that. I'd trust her all the world over. But you wor right—he have lent her money; she never denied it; and I've got it here; and I'm half minded to chuck it in his face, or force it down his throat. I don't choose no man to seem koinder to she nor I do! I had a tussle with her for it, but I've got it,—here it is!"

Sam Slybrute's small, bloodshot, pig-like eyes twinkled at the sight of the slender bit of gold between Bob's broad finger and thumb. "Turn in here," he said; "let's talk it all over quietly, over a glass. I ain't much for violence and forcing things down people's throats."

"That 'ere money shall go down my throat and Bob's, in the shape of good liquor," he said to himself, "instead of going bodily down that teetotal Mormonite's."

After a feeble attempt at resistance, Bob accompanied Sam Slybrute.

Bob had already had far more than was good for him; and he was, on account of what he had taken before, all the more easily upset by the liquor he now so freely imbibed.

It was a protracted carouse. Even Sam—hard-headed, well-seasoned toper—was much elevated; Bob was drunk.

Bob had laid the half-sovereign and some half-pence on the table before him, when first they went in, saying, "I can't spend more nor they few coppers; that 'ere yellow-boy ain't mine. If I don't force it down Jem Goodman's throat, I shall give it un back, and beg un not to meddle with my wife or my household affairs. I'll take a glass or so for company's sake and then go home."

The glass or so, however, as Slybrute had foreseen, put Bob completely in his power. On they boozed hour after hour, till the landlord refused to supply any more liquor, and told them they must cash up, as it was closing time.

Slybrute, pretending to be a great deal more drunk than he was, allowed the landlord to take possession of the half-sovereign; and there was no change out of it, for Bob had broken two or three glasses in drinking confusion to all teetotalers.

But they staggered together—Slybrute half-seas-over; Bob, as usual, quite drunk.

"Hollo!" cried the landlord, looking after them with a lantern, as he saw them rolling and swaying about arm-in-arm and turning into a dark street, where several unfinished houses had their cellars as yet open, and, as is usual in low neighbourhoods, no fence or protection of any kind.

"Hollo! you there!" cried the landlord, "mind where you go. There's ugly holes. Steady, there!"

But it was too late. Slybrute saw the danger and tried to avoid it; but Bob did not relinquish his hold of his mate's arm, nay, as he felt himself going, he clutched it the tighter, and down they both went with a heavy and terrible crash, into the deep, dark excavations meant for cellars.

The landlord, who saw the fall, and heard Slybrute's yell, calling "Police" at the top of his voice, rushed to the brink of the black descent, and there he saw, among the stones, bricks, and mud, not yet cleared away, the two boon companions, forming now one muddy, bleeding mass.

Bob Blossom above and Slybrute below.

CHAPTER LIII.

I've seen the sick and ghastly bed
Of sin, delirious with its dread.—BYRON.

WE hope that our readers are sufficiently interested in Bob Blossom to be anxious to learn the result of the frightful accident with which we closed our last chapter; and, though there are other important events following each other, as they generally do in real life, in rapid succession when once the march has commenced in earnest, we will relieve their anxiety by informing them that when, after a considerable interval, the police reached the spot, and when, after one longer still, the two wretched men were lifted up out of the holes, which were one day to be cellars, and carried on stretchers to the London Hospital, both were insensible and covered with blood.

They presented a hideous spectacle, and they smelt so powerfully of spirits, beer, and tobacco, that there could be no doubt on the minds of any one present as to the cause of the catastrophe.

The result of a careful examination on the part of the house-surgeons was that Bob Blossom had broken a leg, but was not otherwise seriously injured; Sam Slybrute, on the contrary, who had fallen under Bob, pitching on a heap of bricks, and on the back of his head, was suffering from concussion of the brain, had two ribs broken, and compound fracture of the thigh.

A heavy price to pay for a night of sordid, swinish, sensual indulgence.

Bob's leg was soon set and he was pronounced likely to do well, if the heated state of his blood from his recent intemperance, did not cause inflammation and prevent the knitting of the bone.

Poor wretch! he lay in a drunken sleep or stupor—unconscious of all that had passed—in a neat little white bed in the London Hospital, while in earnest consultation—as earnest and as conscientious as if he had been a prince of the blood—several eminent surgeons in the operating room argued the pros and cons of immediate amputation in the case of Slybrute, who was stretched on the table, luckily for him in a state of perfect unconsciousness.

Slybrute was a gigantic fellow, huge-limbed, low-browed, bull-necked; sordidness and sensuality in every line of his bloated, repulsive face; but they were as anxious to save him as if he had been one of the brightest and best of God's creatures.

It was the life they thought of—not the man.

And the ultimate decision was in favour of immediate amputation.

Slybrute, could he have been consulted, would have preferred death. He was very proud of his strength, his gigantic proportions, and the day's work he could do when he chose; but it was quite unknown to himself that nearly a fourth of his whole person was removed at the hip joint, with consummate skill. It was a case that admitted of no delay. The whole limb, from the hip to the ankle, was completely crushed; and the heavy fall on the head had caused severe concussion of the brain. The inevitable hemorrhage probably saved his life.

No one knew the address of Bob Blossom or Sam Slybrute. Even the landlord of the "Rose and Crown," when questioned by the police, could not enlighten them on this point; and their irregular habits were now so confirmed, that no great anxiety was felt in their wretched homes when for two days they neither returned, nor sent any message to explain their absence. At last, however, poor Apple Blossom began to grow seriously uneasy, and Larky Grigg commenced an active inquiry.

In Sam Slybrute's home his mother-in-law, with whom he constantly boozed, missed him far more than the once pretty, but now haggard, little wife, whose front teeth he had knocked out, and who generally had a black eye of his cowardly infiction; but both were willing to await his return.

His mother-in-law, in spite of his good fellowship over the whisky toddy, comforted herself and his wife by the assurance that "nought never comes to harm, and that a bad half-crown is sure to come back."

We must leave Bob Blossom and Sam Slybrute—victims of strong drink as they were—for the present, to repent at leisure in their hospital beds, while we return to inquire after the fate of Ben Darrell, whose protracted trial at the Old Bailey is drawing to a close, and about the saving of whose life Jem Goodman has very little hope, while none whatever remains in the breast of Ben Darrell himself.

But even if Jem Goodman could not succeed in saving the miserable remnant of his earthly life, he has done for him what was far better—he has awakened in his once hardened heart a lively faith and a fervent penitence.

Faith and penitence! We need nothing more to open to us the gates of everlasting life. And on those gates the eyes of Ben Darrell were fixed.

CHAPTER LIV.

"But, after all, the numbers murdered by violent hands will give us but a faint idea of the fatal consequences that follow the use of inebriating drinks. He who starves his wife and children, or breaks their hearts by his cruelty, and ruins their morals by his example, destroys as effectually, though far more cruelly, than he who employs the razor, the pistol, or the dagger; yet this mode of destruction is life everywhere."—ANTI-BACCHUS, an Essay by Rev. B. Parsons.

THE court of the Old Bailey was densely crowded. Ben Darrell's trial for the murder of his wife had attracted a great deal of attention, because just at this time, a party in parliament was making strenuous efforts to protect women from the brutality of their husbands.

The crown lawyer, himself an M.P., had brought in a bill for the punishment of assaults on women and children.

He was a man of fervid eloquence, persuasive, impassioned, always carrying his hearers along with him; and, on the popular subject of wife-beating and wife-murder, able to draw tears, if not from stones, at least from hearts almost as hard.

All the witnesses had been examined and cross-examined again and again.

On the day of Ada's and Jem Goodman's examination the jury looked less gloomily and moodily at the prisoner, and probably at that time would have returned a verdict of "not guilty;" probably the judge on the bench, after the perusal of Ben Darrell's letter to Jem Goodman, would have summed up in his favour.

But Natt Stone and his witnesses completely turned the scale against the wretched man.

The touching proof of the murdered wife's clinging with forgiving love, in the evidence Natt gave of her refusal to leave him, even when she might have taken her children with her to the dear old home, and have lived there in peace and comfort, affected many to tears; but none wept so bitterly at this part of the evidence as the miserable prisoner in the dock.

His sobs convulsed his strong frame again. When Stunning Steenie—whose term of imprisonment was over, and who was in court, waistcoat and all—swore to Ben Darrell's threats, that he would yet do for his wife, and that he had sworn with an oath that he regretted he had not done for her before, a shudder passed through the court. But by far the greatest impression was produced—as it had been at the inquest—by the fact that no food of any kind was found in her stomach, and that there were many bruises, and marks of severe ill-usage, both recent and remote, on her wasted body.

Poor Ben Darrell did not once look up, and the public naturally decided that he was a down-looking fellow; but he groaned when he heard the evidence of starvation and violence, and his counsel—the best to be had, and who had done all man could do to save his wretched client—glancing at the lowering brow of the judge, and the excited faces and flashing eyes of the jury, felt there was no hope.

He had spoken long and eloquently, but, even to himself, it was evident he made little impression, and that little became less after the crown lawyer's eloquent, passionate, and most touching rejoinder. After harrowing up the feelings of the jury by a picture of Esther Darrell's early love, and lifelong devotion, and the unspeakable miseries of her married life—herself and children starving at home, while the prisoner at the bar was wallowing in excess, and squandering not merely whatever he could earn, but whatever he could raise on her little property, in drink, up to the time that he fulfilled his threat, and murdered her,—he suddenly lowered his voice, and said—

"It is not for the sake of that angelic, though humble, victim—that loving, patient, devoted wife—that I press for a conviction: wife-murder—murder of the truest, fondest, gentlest wife that ever called a ruffian husband!—not for her sake. After 'life's fitful fever she sleeps well;' and, had her spirit a voice, I have no doubt, she would plead for the life of the man who so remorselessly slew her. No, it is not for her—it is for the sake of the whole wedded female world that I require you to find the prisoner at the bar guilty. On your verdict hangs not merely his miserable, blood-stained existence—but that of hundreds of loving, patient wives, especially among the working classes, whose brutal, sottish husbands can only be frightened from crimes like that of the prisoner at the bar by seeing that capital punishment, however often remitted in other cases, is never remitted in that of wife-murder. Let the prisoner at the bar escape, and no woman wedded to a sot can feel safe for an hour. Make an example of one wife-slayer—who, as the evidence proves, was an habitual wife-beater—and you save thousands of innocent lives. Many a sottish sensualist will see, in the fate of the prisoner at the bar, the result of strong drink; and the first punishment of one criminal may restore peace and comfort to many a wretched home—starving, bruised, and half-broken-hearted wife, and perishing little ones. The greatest of poets has said—

'Murder, most foul, as at the best it is;
But this most foul, base, and unnatural.'

"I ask you, gentlemen of the jury, to re-consider the evidence, and see if those lines do not apply to this piteous case, even more forcibly than to that which they were written to illustrate.

"Remember, credible witnesses have sworn they heard the prisoner swear he would do for his wife. Remember, her poor, wasted body was covered with bruises, recent and remote. Remember, no food at all was found in her stomach, and then acquit him of wife-murder if you can, if you dare."

The summing-up of the judge was, in many respects, a counterpart of the crown lawyer's rejoinders, and his own bias was observable throughout, even while, as a matter of course, he urged the jury, if they had any doubt, &c. &c. &c., to give the prisoner the benefit of that doubt.

The jury retired, but did not remain long in consultation, and, when the foreman, in answer to the usual question, replied that they found the prisoner "GUILTY," they only announced what all had expected. When questioned by the judge, as to whether he had anything to urge why sentence of death should not be passed upon him, Ben Darrell, for the first time, looked up, and, bowing to the judge, said—

"Nothing, my lord. I deserve to die, for it's quite true that I squandered in liquor what ought to have kept my wife and children decent and comfortable. It's true that, when in liquor, I often ill-used her cruel. It's true that she and the little ones were starving. It's true, too, that I threatened to do for her; but it's true, also, and God in heaven, and thou, Esther, blessed wench as wor, and angel now, knows the same, I never meant to do for her; and, when I struck her the blow as killed her, I'd no more thoughts of doing for her than I has, at this blessed moment, of doing for you, my lord. It's all along of strong drink," he added, "that I'm to be cut off in my prime. And if there's any drunkards here, let 'em take warning by Ben Darrell, and never touch a drop of liquor more."

The judge then put on the terrible black cap, and proceeded to pass sentence of death, preceding those dread and solemn words, with an earnest appeal to the miserable prisoner to repent of his cruel and cowardly crime, and wisely making his sentence a sermon to all drunkards and wife-beaters.

When his lordship came to the words "Benjamin Darrell, if you have indulged in any hope of a recommendation to mercy, and a commutation of your sentence, I implore you to drive it from your mind, and fix your thoughts entirely on things above. Your time on earth is short, but not too short if you employ it well to secure you the pardon of that Saviour who died for sinners, and who said to the penitent, believing thief on the cross, 'This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise.' Benjamin Darrell, there is no limit to God's mercy in heaven, but the safety of others, of wives especially, compels justice to shut out all further mercy on earth. Therefore, for this cruel murder of which the jury have found you 'guilty,' the murder of your loving, patient, devoted wife, you shall be taken from the prison to the place of execution, to be hanged by the neck till you are dead, and the Lord God Almighty have mercy on your guilty soul."

Ben Darrell remained still, white, and rigid as marble, while the judge addressed him, his eyes fixed on his lordship's pale and agitated face, and then he suddenly exclaimed—

"My lord, I deserve to die; but to the last I'll say I never meant to kill her; and I'd rather die nor live, for living, I'd never cease to reflect on myself; and dying, it's my faith, I'll find mercy in heaven, and see my blessed Esther there."

The prisoner was then removed; and Jem Goodman, pale and worn, accompanied him, by permission, back to his cell.

It was Thursday afternoon, and Ben Darrell's execution was fixed for the following Monday.

Natt Stone (brother of the murdered Esther) had been present during the whole of the trial. When in the witness-box, his passionate vehemence formed a curious contrast to the tranquil resignation of the prisoner—varied only by fits of sobbing or deep dejection, as different parts of the evidence recalled his brutal behaviour to his devoted Esther.

Natt Stone was always among the first to arrive. He seemed to live without food or sleep; for his days were spent in court, and his nights in acting as a sort of voluntary patrol round the walls of Newgate. He seemed to think Ben Darrell might yet escape if he were not always watching that grated, spiked, and hopeless-looking gate. His eyes were blood-shot, restless, fiery; his pale face sharp with fasting; his movements spasmodic—twitching his fingers, grinding his teeth, and, at times, tearing his hair and stamping his feet. While the jury were consulting, his nails tore the flesh of the palms of his hands, which were soon filled with blood; and when the verdict "Guilty" was heard, a cry of joy and exultation escaped him.

All Thursday night Natt Stone paced up and down watching the gates of Newgate.

CHAPTER LV.

'Tis these that early taint the female soul,
Instruct the eyes of young coquettes to roll,
Teach infant cheeks a bidden blush to know,
And little hearts to flutter at a bow.—POPE.

The fair ones feel such maladies as these,
When each new night-dress gives a new disease;
On the rich couch sink with becoming woe,
Dress'd in a robe for sickness or for show.—IBID.

THE trial of the miserable Ben Darrell had been a source of great and painful excitement to Lady Ada Pemberton; but she was supported by the presence of her dear friend Ellen St. Ange, and by the advice of Jem Goodman, who snatched any little time he could spare from Ben Darrell to devote it to her father, now Augustus, Earl of Glenlonely, and better still, a reformed drunkard—a resolute abstainer, and consequently a convalescent.

Ada's mother, now the Countess of Glenlonely, had not yet arrived in town. Ada had not at all overrated the effect on her mother's mind of this sudden and most unlooked-for elevation to that peerage which to her was paradise.

Imaginary woes and sham illnesses, often worked up into real ones by artful doctors, had made Lady Glenlonely, to herself and others, an invalid for many years; but the first real swoon she had ever known (yet how many had she imitated) was when first Gerald St. Maur tenderly, as if he were announcing her husband's or her daughter's death, informed her of the accident to her husband's cousins. She started from the sofa on which she was reclining, propped up by pillows and covered with cashmeres—Sultana in her basinette by her side—she clasped her hands, became first crimson, then white as marble, and exclaimed—

"If they are all dead, Sir Augustus is Earl of Glenlonely, I am Countess of Glenlonely, my boy will yet be a peer of a realm!"

And the next moment her strength forsook her, she fell forward, and, had not Gerald caught her in his arms, she might have fallen with her face on the bars of the grate.

Gerald for some moments feared she was dead, so much like death was this protracted swoon. As soon as he had laid her on the sofa, wisely removing the pillows and laying her head level with her feet (a precaution always to be observed in such cases), he rang for Tarlatan, and when that finikin fine lady had arrived, he rushed out for Lady Glenlonely's doctor.

Tarlatan knew perfectly well how to proceed with sham fits, but had not the least idea what to do in a real one; and summoning Townley to her aid, went off herself into a fit of hysterics.

Sultana behaved much better, and appeared on this trying occasion the more human of the two. She waddled out of her basinette—wonderful instinct of the canine race! she had never stirred when a sham fit was going on—she whined piteously, and began assiduously to lick her poor, cold, lifeless mistress's hands and face with her warm, wet, peach-blossom tongue.

She was thus engaged when Gerald St. Maur returned with the doctor.

The doctor was a shrewd and humorous man; and, seeing the nature of Tarlatan's hysterics and Townley's pretended alarm, he said—"That's a case for the cold water cure. Carry her down into the scullery just as she is, my man, and dash a bucket of cold water over her. If that doesn't bring her to, repeat the operation; and if she's still in this state, let me know, and I'll come down and pump upon her."

Tarlatan suffered Townley to carry her down as far as the hall, and then she opened her eyes, sighed, and declared she felt better; begged Townley to take the keys out of her apron pocket, and get her a glass of rum, neat. This he did, first helping himself to two; and Tarlatan, after sipping the rum, declared herself much better, and tripped briskly up to her own room to re-arrange her cap and her ringlets, and get rid of the smell of the potent spirit she had imbibed.

Meanwhile the recovery of Lady Glenlonely was a much more serious matter.

All ordinary remedies failed to recall her to life. Gerald began to think with horror of many instances he had read and heard of where sudden joy had caused death; and even Dr. M'Mode began to look anxious.

Sultana, who really loved her indulgent mistress, had been by this accident converted from a fat, panting bundle, into an active intelligent being. She whined incessantly, and positively sprang from the sofa to come round and raise herself by her fore-feet to lick Lady Glenlonely's white cheek, and pretty pale ear.

"It is more than a common fainting-fit," said Dr. M'Mode, "and I fear cupping will be necessary."

In a few minutes a surgeon was sent for. Her ladyship was cupped; and, as the blood flowed, consciousness was restored; the colour came back to her fine face and chiselled lips.

She opened her large blue eyes, and seeing Gerald tenderly supporting her, she said, holding out her hand to him—

"Tell me, Gerald; was it all a dream, or am I Countess of Glenlonely?"

Gerald, imploring her to keep quiet, lest she should never wear the peeress's coronet and robes she had so sighed for, re-assured her.

Sultana barked and bounded for joy; and Tarlatan, who had kept aloof during the operation—declaring the sight of blood always turned her nerves, now came back to help her lady to her room, and to put her to bed.

It was several days, however, before she was sufficiently recovered to travel even to London.

Gerald remained at the hotel in attendance on her, as Ada's having been subpoenaed as a witness at Ben Darrell's trial made it impossible for her to go down to her mother; nor did Lady Glenlonely wish it. In her new delight she found far more sympathy in Tarlatan than she expected in Ada.

And Gerald, who was admitted to her dressing-room, and who, of course, wished to conciliate his future mother-in-law, listened to her schemes of worldly ambition and worldly grandeur with a patience she had never found in her own daughter.

Gerald, in return, confided to Lady Glenlonely his hopes of obtaining Ada's hand, and his intention of offering himself at once as her husband; and Lady Glenlonely highly approved of her young friend as a suitor for her daughter.

Lord Glenlonely and Lady Ada were at breakfast in her little boudoir.

He was now so much better that he was able to rise and lie on her sofa, and listen to all her plans and projects.

Ada was pale, and her eyes were red with weeping. The newspaper was not yet come in; but, the night before, Jem Goodman had sent up Larky Grigg to inform her of the result of Ben Darrell's trial; and Larky had added the intelligence that "Feather had not been home for three days, and mother was not only very ill, but getting downright terrified; and that but for Hope everything would go wrong; for Merry was up to all sorts of tricks with Carrot Meg, and wor running such rigs. Hope had not only to set all to right at home but to mind the stall; and Apple Blossom had begged Mr. Stephen to give it well to Meg and Merry, and not to let 'em out of the ragged school till she fetched Merry home."

All this was very bad news; and Ada wept bitterly for the wretched Ben Darrell.

She took Larky Grigg into her father's room and introduced him to the earl; and having a note to write to Ellen St. Ange, whose messenger waited for an answer, she left Larky Grigg, whose fine face and thick, curly black hair shone with cleanliness, and whose poor fustian dress Apple Blossom had washed so nicely, standing modest but not awkward before the kind old invalid, in his silken wadded wrapper, velvet cap, and furred slippers, his aristocratic head and face, gray hair, frail, worn look, and wan, white hand.

They formed a curious contrast, did the boy and the old man.

Lord Glenlonely, who had heard all about Larky Grigg from Ada, took a great interest in the bold, bright, clean boy, so full of natural politeness, instinct, courtesy, and innate grace; and whose fine black eyes moistened as he spoke of his mother's illness and his father's absence; while they sparkled and his cheeks glowed as he described all the virtues and marvellous doings of little Hope Evermore in the time of unwonted trial.

"It's a great pity," added Larky Grigg, seeing the real interest the kind, noble-looking old gentleman took in all his troubles; "it's a great pity our Merry don't take after our Hope; then she'd be a comfort and a help to mother; but then, sir, all her delight is that 'ere Meg Grimes—Carrot Meg, as she's called."

"I know, my boy," said Lord Glenlonely, "Potato Heels."

"Did you ever see her, sir?" asked Larky.

"With my mind's eye, my boy," said the earl. "I can see her shock head of red hair, and her freckled face, and great white teeth, and red lips; and all her rags and jags, and her black legs, and her potato heels."

"Well, I never," said Larky; "that's the very model of her. And now 'Stunning Steenie's out o' prison, thof he licked her crule for peaching on him, and so did Prigging Peter and the Fox, she've come round 'em by trating 'em to the gaff agin, and to the penny ball, and roast tatis and butter. She had such a treat one night with her loocifers, she had, sir. It was very wet, and a gentleman with a young lady—the size of Meg—a-getting out of a fine carriage at Astley's, seeing her wet through, took pity on her, and gived her half-a-crown, and off she ran and got hold of Stunning Steenie, and Prigging Peter, and the Fox, and tried to get Merry and I, but that warn't no go, sir. I've gived my word to mother I'll never go again to them bad and low places, and if mother don't like I to go, t'aint likely she'd let Merry go. It's a wussur place for gals nor for boys, sir, and so Meg said to Stunning Steenie, thof he licked her crule, and so had t'others, that if they'd never cast up her having a-peached to the beak no more, she'd trate 'em as long as that 'ere half-crown lasted; and then I caught her a-winking to Merry to get her to go along of 'em, but I soon spiled that sport, sir."

"What did you do, my boy?" said Lord Glenlonely, much interested.

"Why, sir, I said to Merry—'Merry, lass, get in there, and go and sit with mother; beant thee ashamed of giggling and gaping here, and mother in trouble about feather, and poorly herself, and no one but Hope to spake a word o' comfort, or to do a stroke o' work.' So, sir, Merry turned as red as a cherry, and went in looking very down in the mouth, and then I spake up, and I said—

"'Lookee here, Stunning Steenie and Prigging Peter, and Joe, alias Fox, and you, Potato Heels! you're a bad lot, that's what you are; and a mean lot, and it's thanks to little Hope, and not to none o' you, I won't imprisoned, and whipped, and disgraced, and ruined for your doings. If I had a been 'twould a broke my mother's heart and ruined my good name. Howsomever, thanks to Hope, 'twarn't come to pass, and a miss is as good as a mile. But it's showed me what sort you are—mean, false, white-livered, pitiful creatures as 'ud let a pal, an innocent pal, suffer while you kept a whole skin. Onst for all, I despises the whole lot o' you; and I can lick ye all, as ye well knows, one at a time or all together, as convanient. Don't make no odds to me which way 'tis. Well then, now I tells you all, including you Potato Heels, alias Carrot Meg, if you ever 'ices my sister Merry into a gaff or a penny ball, or any of them low, vicious places, I'll give ye all a reglar good licking all round, beginning with you, Stunning Steenie, and winding up with you, Meg, by way of a finish. Now I tells you that, and I'll do it too as sure as my name's Larky Grigg.'"

"Well done, my boy!" said Lord Glenlonely, taking a sovereign out of his waistcoat pocket; "here's something for you. What'll ye do with this?"

"Give it to mother, sir," said Larky, turning very red and tears of joy in his eyes. "O sir, it'll pay the rent that poor mother's a-fretting about night and day. Oh, Heaven bless and reward you, sir! With your loaf, I'll run all the way home; the grass won't grow under my feet, I promise you, sir! Poor mother, this will comfort her sore heart! Good-bye to you, sir; my duty to Miss."

"Good-bye, my fine boy," said Lord Glenlonely, as Larky, not even in his haste and his joy forgetful of "manners," pulled his thick, jetty forelock, and left the room, gently and carefully shutting the door after him.

But once in the open street, how he sped along—brave, bold, warm-hearted Larky! Good son! Apple Blossom has some comfort left. The wife must weep; but the mother is not all desolate if she has a son like thee—a loving, faithful, Christian lad, who honours his father and his mother, and whose days shall, therefore, be long in the land.

Yes, he honours his father and his mother; taught to keep that commandment and nine others, and to keep them well, at the Green Fields Ragged School!

(To be continued.)

MIDNIGHT.

'Tis midnight, and no single ray
Of starlight gilds the gloom,
But darkness deep as that holds sway
Which reigns within the tomb.
But there's a midnight of the heart—
A heart by sin debased,
When not a ray of hope will dart
Its beams across the waste.

'Tis midnight, and the howling winds
Shriek an unearthly wail,
As if some spirit, lost, its sins
Bemoaned upon the gale.
But there are soul-complainings none
Save God himself may hear,
More mournful than the saddest tone
Borne on the night wind drear.

And wildly beats the midnight storm,
And loud the thunders roll,
Till seems to quake earth's trembling form
From distant pole to pole;
But there are tempests in the breast
Of mortal men so wild,
The stormy element's unrest
Compared seems meek and mild.

And fiercely streams the lightning's glare
Across the gloom of night,
Till realms infernal through the air
Seem bursting on our sight.
And human passions sometimes flame
In feeling's potent hour,
Till Jove's own thunderbolts grow tame
Beside their scathing power.

But there's a land beyond the tomb,
Whose skies are ever bright;
Nor night, nor storms, nor darkness come
To cloud their peaceful light.
And there are souls on that fair shore
That know no grief nor care;
And sorrow, passion, pain, no more
Assail the dwellers there.

PICTURES FROM HISTORY.

CHARLES V. AT ST. JUST.

CHARLES V., Emperor of Germany, and King of Spain, was born at Ghent in the year 1500. He ascended the throne of Spain at the age of sixteen, and three years later, on the death of Maximilian, succeeded to the empire of Germany. He was the first prince of his age, in rank and dignity; and, whether we consider the greatness, the variety, or the success of his undertakings, was the most conspicuous. The very beginning of his public life was involved in trouble, his right of succession to the German empire being warmly disputed by Francis I. of France; a dispute which was the immediate occasion of a sanguinary and desolating war, and the cause of that rivalry between the two monarchs, the animus of which is still to be detected in the writings of Spanish and French historians.

Between Francis I. and Charles V. there was in every particular a striking and remarkable contrast. Francis formed his resolution suddenly, prosecuted it with enthusiastic ardour, pushed on with adventurous courage, but soon tired of his own exploits, and gave up, through carelessness or impatience, that which dashing enterprise and determined bravery had attained. Charles deliberated long, and determined with coolness. Having once fixed his plan, he adhered to it with inflexible obstinacy, and from the execution of it, neither danger nor disappointment could turn him aside. He would not for one repulse, nor for a hundred, forego the purpose he had resolved to effect. If Francis, by his impetuous activity, disconcerted the emperor's best-laid plans, Charles, by a more calm, but steady prosecution of his designs, checked the rapidity of his rival's career, and baffled or repulsed his most vigorous efforts.

CHARLES V AT ST. JUST.

After a disastrous war, during which Charles V. made a league with Henry VIII. of England, Francis I. was taken prisoner at the battle of Pavia. It was on this occasion that Francis wrote to his mother—"All is lost, except our honour." There was much rejoicing, both in Germany and England, on receipt of the news. Nothing could be more melancholy than the situation of France. Her king in captivity; her most distinguished generals and the flower of her army taken or slain; powerful and triumphant enemies on all sides ready to seize her as a spoil. But Charles assumed an air of singular composure and moderation. He had expected defeat, but he made no sign of surprise or joy when he heard of his victory. He was as calm and collected as man could be; and, though surrounded by all the magnificence of a court, appeared a fit inhabitant for the cloister. He commiserated, or affected to commiserate, the fall of his rival; and, as he read the despatches, he moralised on the uncertainty of human greatness.

Treaties of peace having been ratified, Charles turned his arms against Africa, where he was successful in several engagements. Soon after this, hostilities were renewed with France, which soaked with blood the plains of Champagne and Picardy. In 1541 Charles attempted the conquest of Algiers, but failed. Another war with France, with fluctuating success, the confederation of the protestant princes of Germany—taking their stand for liberty of conscience—these, and other antagonistic circumstances, together with his declining health, induced Charles to adopt a long cherished plan, namely, the exchange of his throne for the retirement of the cloister.

The emperor Charles V., at the age of fifty-five, resigned his immense empire to his son, Philip, husband of Mary, queen of England. Thus Spain, the Netherlands, Naples, Sicily, Milan, and the new and beautiful lands of South America, were surrendered by the monarch who, in camp and council, had made himself famous throughout the world. On the 25th of October, 1555, Charles, in an assembly of the States of the Netherlands, formally resigned the government of these countries to Philip, and, in a few months later, he also put him in possession of all his other governments. He then retired to the monastery of St. Just, Estremadura, on the borders of Spain and Portugal, where this powerful king, who had so long exercised so great an influence on the destinies of Europe, shrank into the condition of a private gentleman, retaining only a few servants and a single horse for his own use, and employing his abundant leisure in religious exercises, in gardening, and clock-making. And finding that he could never make two clocks go precisely alike, he is said to have discovered what it would have been of infinite use if he had discovered at the beginning instead of the end of his career, and could have impressed practically on his successors—namely, if no two clocks can be made to agree, how is it likely that millions of men can be compelled to do so on any given point of religious opinion.

A prey to the sharpest physical suffering, Charles had long entertained the idea of seeking repose in the privacy of a cloister. He had invariably manifested the deepest interest in monastic institutions, and the warmest solicitude for the welfare of the monks, especially of the order of St. Jerome. To this order belonged the monastery of St. Just. It was surrounded by a forest of chestnuts and olives; a small stream passed immediately before it; the site was extremely picturesque, and particularly attractive to those "who would ambition shun." When the king had once tasted the pleasures of retirement, nothing could induce him to come forth again to take part in the busy pageant of government and state. It has been said that he regretted the choice that he had made—that the eagle chafed at the bars of the cage into which it had come so willingly. But certain it is, that when besought to resume his state and glory, he positively and definitely refused.

ANECDOTES OF ELEPHANTS.

TRAVELLERS in the East are apt to deal in the marvellous, and their accounts of the elephant, as of everything else, must be received with caution. Sensible of the high estimation in which the understanding of elephants is held, they scruple not to invent numerous fables for the amusement of their wondering audiences, who eagerly devour them.

A few of the many wonderful stories that are in circulation about elephants we are now about to publish for the amusement of our readers. They may, however, be relied upon with the most implicit confidence.

The practice in India of reducing to submission an elephant that has been taken in a state of wildness, is by retaining it for a long time fastened to a large tree with strong ropes. The custom formerly was to starve an elephant thus captured, but now it is to feed it well, and omit no inducement to render the animal gentle. Its intended mohout, or driver, supplies it with choice food, gradually habituating it to his voice and touch, and ultimately rendering it completely familiar. Thus, in course of time, the animal will answer to its name, lie down and rise again when commanded, and even allow the mohout to sit on its back. When sufficiently reconciled it is unbound from the tree, and driven out to water, and is gradually made accustomed to bear a small load of grass or boughs for its own diet.

An elephant, like a horse or a dog, becomes more tractable by good usage than by harsh practices. And it is extremely curious that sometimes their tempers will take a complete reverse when the conduct towards them is altered from severity to mildness. Of this a proof is found in the deportment of a very fine male elephant in the possession of a gentleman at Chittagong, which he endeavoured for two years in vain to render tractable. The elephant was repeatedly offered for sale at a low price. But no one would purchase it—its character was so well known. It is customary in that district to have the firewood, which is cut into stumps of about a foot or less in diameter, and perhaps five or six feet long, piled regularly; and this work is usually done by elephants, who, when properly trained, will do it as well as any labourer. The animal in question could not be induced to perform this drudgery, and all attempts to enforce its obedience having proved fruitless, its master at last gave up the point. To his utter astonishment, the elephant suddenly became good-tempered, and went of its own free will to the wood-yard, where it not only exerted itself greatly but was, in the regularity of its work, at least equal to those which had more practice.

A gentleman bought a female elephant at the sale of a deceased person's effects, not having the least idea that she was a koomkie, or decoy elephant, which to him would not have been any recommendation, as he was not a dealer in elephants. He resided for a short time at the place of sale, and repeatedly refused handsome offers for his late purchase. In fact, many persons seemed desirous to obtain this elephant—a circumstance that he could not account for, as he was ignorant of her qualifications—and all kept carefully secret upon the subject, lest a knowledge of them might cause him to overrate an animal that each hoped at some time to obtain. The mohout, or driver, equally anxious to get out of a line replete with danger, and more willing to be in the service of a gentleman than with dealers, both on account of better wages and less drudgery, carefully forbore to reveal the value of the elephant to his master.

One morning Lutchmee Pearee (as the elephant was called) was not to be found. For several days no intelligence could be obtained of the truant. In fact, she was given over as lost. It was supposed, as more likely than otherwise, that she had strayed into the neighbouring jungle, and joined with the wild herds. Thus no prospect remained of recovering her, unless by chance.

Conceiving their hopes were at an end, the many who had offered to purchase her did not scruple to reveal that she was a koomkie, or decoy elephant. As is common on such occasions, they joined in lamenting the loss of so very valuable an animal.

However, about a week after, Lutchmee made her appearance. She was secured and kept in a place of safety. Shortly after her master went on her to take a ride. He happened to proceed towards the skirts of a very heavy grass jungle, into which Lutchmee frequently attempted to turn, but was as often prevented by the mohout. Both master and man now suspected that she was become rather wild, and might prove dangerous. At length Lutchmee became quite restive, and, in defiance of all control, dashed into the jungle, nor did she stop until arriving at a thick patch of timber-trees. To the utter astonishment of her terrified burden, there was a large male discovered, round whose fore-legs the iron chain with which Lutchmee was ordinarily fastened during the night at her piquets was twined, so as to secure her prize in the most complete manner.

Now in this we cannot find anything repugnant to the general conduct of elephants, nor to that probability which, to those acquainted with their nature, may be requisite to produce a belief that the story may be true. It is proper to remark that many elephants are in the habit of tying their own legs at night, and that they perform other acts which tend to display the admirable sense of feeling they possess in their trunks. The sons of the mohouts are generally much attached to their elephants, and take great pleasure in teaching the young ones, which are extremely playful, a variety of tricks, such as taking off the turbans of natives in the streets, and lifting them up to the driver as he sits on their neck, throwing stones or clods of earth, which many do with great precision; picking up money, and, indeed, even discriminating between copper and silver.

A gentleman, who has written an account of India, says that he had once a chunchul (a young female elephant) of about six feet high, quite a "pickle"—up to all kinds of tricks, in which she appeared to take great delight. Once, however, her pranks caused much inconvenience. In marching from Dacca to Dinapore, she exercised her talents during the night, and not only untied her own ropes, but liberated several other elephants that were in the camp, some of them rather wild; and when the corps was to march in the morning, the tents were delayed for some hours, while persons were sent to catch the elephants, which were found some distance off, at the foot of the Gongapersand Hills.

The first, according to Suetonius, who exhibited elephant rope-dancers, was Galba, at Rome. The manner of teaching them to dance on the ground was simple enough (by the association of music and a hot floor), but we are not informed how they were taught to skip the rope, or whether it was the tight or the slack rope, or how high the rope might be. The silence of history on these points is fortunate for the figurantes of the present day, since, but for this, their fame might have been utterly eclipsed.

Elephants may, in the days of old Rome, have been taught to dance on the rope, but when was an elephant ever known to skip on a rope over the heads of an audience, or to caper amidst a blaze of fire fifty feet aloft in the air, as was done in the days of our grandfathers by Madame Saqui? What would Aristotle have thought of his dancing elephants if he had seen her?

Among the numerous interesting anecdotes of the elephant, we may narrate the following:—

At Delhi, an elephant, passing along the streets, put his trunk into a tailor's shop where several people were at work; one of them pricked the end of it with his needle: the animal passed on, but, from the next dirty pool, filled his trunk with muddy water, returned to the shop, and spurted every drop among the people who had offended him and spoiled their work.

A soldier refused to give the road to an elephant and his conductor, at which the elephant was highly affronted. Some days after, meeting the soldier upon the banks of a river, at a time when he had not his keeper with him, he seized him with his trunk, ducked him several times in the water, and let him go; he then walked off, seemingly much pleased (or laughing in his way) at thus having retaliated the affront he had received.

Elephants, though they never fail to retaliate an affront, are remarkably mild and gentle in their disposition.

When once tamed, their attachment to their keeper is very strong. They seem to live but to serve and obey him, and, when treated with kindness, testify their gratitude by fulfilling all his desires; and, caressing him with affectionate fondness, receive his commands with attention, and execute them with punctuality and zeal.

Elephants live to a great age. Some authors have asserted that an elephant lives four or five hundred years; but the most credible inform us that he seldom lives above a hundred or a hundred and fifty years.

He is endowed with a most retentive memory, a fine sense of feeling, and a quick hearing. He is very fond of music, and seems animated by the beat of the drum and the sound of trumpets. He is passionately fond of perfumes of all kind, but more especially of fragrant flowers.

The elephant in size surpasses all other terrestrial creatures, and in understanding he is inferior to none, man excepted.

Of the brute creation, the elephant, the dog, the ape, and the beaver, are generally the most admired for their sagacity. But Buffon says the genius of the dog is borrowed, being instructed by man in almost everything he knows. The monkey has only the appearance of wisdom, and the beaver is only sensible with regard to itself and those of its species. The elephant is superior to all three of them, being possessed of all their most eminent qualities. To judge correctly of their relative value, we must acknowledge him at least to possess the judgment of the beaver, the dexterity of the monkey, the sentiment of the dog, and, in addition to these qualifications, he has the peculiar advantage of strength, size, and longevity.

The sagacity peculiar to elephants was well displayed by those animals when the British army under Sir David Ochterlony were ascending the Ghauts to attack the Nepaulese forces in their mountain fortresses. An eye-witness, after describing the ascent of the army by means of projecting rocks and boughs in one particular part of the march, gives an account of the conduct of the elephants. "Having got all the men up," he says, "they were at a loss for expedients how to get the elephants up."

They cut a good deal of the most prominent part of the hill away, and laid trees on the ascent as a footing for those animals. The elephants were then made to approach it. The first one did so with reluctance and fear. He looked up and shook his head; and, when forced by his driver, he roared piteously.

"There can be no question, in my opinion," continues the writer, "that this sagacious animal was competent instinctively to judge of the practicability of the artificial flight of steps thus constructed; for the moment that some little alteration had been made, he seemed willing to approach. He then commenced his examination and scrutiny, by pressing with his trunk the trees that had been thrown across; and, after this, he put his fore leg on with great caution, raising the fore part of his body so as to throw its weight on the tree. This done, he seemed satisfied as to its stability.

"The next step for him to ascend by was a projecting rock, which we could not remove.

"Here the same sagacious examination took place, the elephant keeping his flat side close to the side of the bank, and leaning against it.

"The next step was against a tree; but this, on the first pressure of his trunk, he did not like. Here his driver made use of the most endearing epithets, such as 'Wonderful, my life,' 'Well done, my dear,' 'My dove,' 'My son,' 'My wife;' but all these endearing appellations, of which elephants are so fond, could not induce him to try again. Force was at length resorted to, and the elephant roared terrifically, but would not move. Something was then removed. He seemed satisfied as before; and he in time ascended that stupendous ghaut. On his reaching the top, his delight was visible in a most eminent degree; he caressed his keeper, and threw the dirt about in a most playful manner.

"Another elephant, a much younger animal, was now to follow. He had watched the ascent of the other with the most intense interest, making motions all the while, as though he was assisting him, by shouldering him up the acclivity—such gestures as I have seen some men make when spectators of gymnastic exercises. When he saw his comrade up, he evinced his pleasure by giving a salute something like the sound of a trumpet.

"When called upon to take his turn, however, he seemed much alarmed, and would not act at all without force. When he was two steps up, he slipped, but recovered himself by digging his toes into the earth. With the exception of this little incident, he ascended exceedingly well.

"When this elephant was near the top, the other, who had already performed his task, extended his trunk to the assistance of his brother in distress, round which the younger one twined his, and thus reached the summit of the ghaut in safety. Having both accomplished their task, their greeting was as cordial as if they had been long separated from each other, and had just escaped from some perilous achievement. They mutually embraced each other, and stood face to face for a considerable time, as if whispering congratulations. Their driver then made them salam to the general, who ordered them five rupees each for sweetmeats. On this reward of their merit being ordered, their driver immediately made them return thanks by another salam."

Another traveller in India thus gives an account of the sensations on being conveyed on the back of an elephant:—

"The elephant," says he, "was commanded to kneel down, and by the help of his tail, which one man held up to form a step, I succeeded in mounting. Another command being given, he rose, and I was lifted into the air to a height at which I certainly never before travelled.

"His motion was not unpleasant; but whenever he found himself incommoded by the heat, he occasionally put his trunk into his mouth, where he had some means of secreting water; and this he disgorged into it, and then squirted over his body, thus keeping the surface of his skin moist and cool by evaporation, though in a manner not very agreeable to his riders.

"The road we travelled was particularly hilly and rugged, sometimes passing over loose rocks, and everywhere full of deep ruts; yet the animal never made a false step, nor did he jolt us in descending the most precipitous steep. His tread was so soft it could not be heard; and on one or two occasions, where the stones were perpendicular for two or three feet, he let his foot down so gently, that he did not in the least shake his riders."

We will close our extracts with the following graphic account of the shooting of an elephant in Ceylon. Twilight had been rapidly drawing on, and the sportsmen were about to retire to their arbour for the night, when, in the jungle over the water, to their left, something of a dazzling whiteness attracted their attention. It was the splendid tusks of a full-grown elephant, perfect in all his points; but what a time to present himself! just as it was getting dark, and a quarter of a mile only between him and the hunters.

"However," observes the narrator, "as tuskers are far from common in Ceylon, and this appeared to be a most noble specimen, it was determined to attack him: not a moment was lost in brief preparation. In shirt and trousers, and one gun each, away we started, with the wind in our favour—an indispensable advantage. We kept close to the jungle until we reached the spot the elephant had first appeared at; and, after one look at our pans, committed ourselves to the open ground, walking down right upon him. He was slowly making his way to the lake, with his back to us, now and then stopping to pull a tuft of lemon grass, and raising his trunk in the air to collect intelligence. As we approached him—treading as lightly as possible—a deep, low grumbling—not unworthy of being compared to distant thunder—told us his suspicions were awakened. No time then was to be lost, so we moved quicker, when, being about twenty yards from him, he all at once wheeled round, and with a shrill, angry cry that made the woods resound, stalked furiously towards us. I happened to have the first fire—it was a front shot; but his head was too high from his nearness, and my ball, entering in the hollow above the eye, skimmed his brain instead of entering it. S. flashed in the pan, so did E., and it was saute qui peut when T. fired. For one moment the huge beast was stationary—then fell at his full length on the turf—his eyes glazed and legs stretched out, as stiff as if he had been carved in stone—the ball had entered behind the ear, and lodged deep in the brain."

The Matron.

NO. XXVII.

I PROMISED to speak of the best manner of preparing tea, coffee, and cocoa. I need hardly tell the youngest housekeeper that there can be no good tea made unless the water boils thoroughly, but there is one fact, not so generally known, viz., that the tea is best when made with water that has just boiled for the first time. Another useful hint about tea-making, is this. If you are able to choose, select a round tea-pot, rather than an oval one, and if you care about giving a good second cup, do not brew the tea with a very little water first, but half fill the pot, let it stand two or three minutes, then add what more water you require, and mind never drain the pot. You cannot make good tea for six persons with less than an ounce of tea. Black tea is generally considered more wholesome than green, but you should take the infusion of neither green nor black just before going to bed, as tea is exciting, and banishes sleep.

It is nevertheless a valuable article of consumption. It is to be regretted that tea, with all its advantages, should continue at so high a price. This is owing to the Custom-house duties, and hopes are held out of their being abolished.

Those who cannot possibly afford tea, yet wish for some warm cheering beverage, should gather young strawberry leaves, dry them carefully, keep them in a canister, and use them like ordinary tea.

Coffee is very nourishing if taken with milk. To have an excellent cup of coffee, one should grind the berry immediately before making it, but some prefer buying it ready ground, with a mixture of chicory in it. As thick coffee is very unwholesome, and coffee-pots with strainers very expensive, the plan of making I recommend is one adopted on the Continent, viz., to have a flannel bag placed inside the coffee-pot. Half a tea-cupful of coffee put into this bag will be sufficient for five or six persons, provided the water is quite boiling, but if you wish to be more economical put in only a quarter of a tea-cupful of ground coffee. Make of this half the quantity you require, then remove the bag from the coffee-pot, and boil it in as much more water as you wish to convert into coffee. Then add it to what you made in the first instance. It will be very tolerable, and as free from the grounds as if made more expensively.

As for cocoa, it is a more economical beverage than either tea or coffee, and it contains greater nourishment than either. You had better make it in a coffee pot. A table-spoonful of the cocoa makes a pint and a half. Of this liquid, if you can possibly manage it, half should be milk. You should keep the cocoa and milk and water on the fire for about ten minutes; and mind you stir it all the time to make it smooth and rich. It is palatable either with or without sugar.

I have now also a few words to say to young wives on the subject of breakfasts and suppers. Children can make an excellent breakfast on bread and milk, and bread and butter, or porridge, but husbands and fathers often require something more substantial, even where they cannot afford bacon or any fresh animal food. A clever woman can make a nice savoury dish out of "odds and ends" that the thoughtless throw into the hog-tub. If a few cold potatoes and scraps of pork are left from the dinner of the day before, they would not look very inviting if placed on the table as you found them in the safe or cupboard, but if the potatoes are nicely mashed, the bits of meat chopped, and the whole browned together before the fire, or in the frying-pan, a very good little dish is furnished. For young men who have strong digestions, a slice of suet pudding heated, in the manner we have just described, is not to be despised. I do not particularly recommend red herrings; they are very thirst-exciting, and therefore are apt to induce people to drink more than is good for the constitution. Where eggs are very plentiful, I recommend them; and a working man may rest assured that if he eats a couple, he has taken what is very supporting.

I have mentioned two things that could be cooked up for breakfast; but where a wife is really in earnest in her wish to prepare a nice morning meal, she will plan all sorts of relishes herself. I will only mention one more, viz., a savoury pancake, simply made with flour, water, and a little chopped onion, all fried of a nice light brown in some dripping.

If the husband gets these nice little, inexpensive relishes, it is the good management of the wife he has to thank for them, for no remnants can be nicely warmed or fried without a good clear fire, and a good clear fire requires forethought and arrangement; and even if there should be a good clear fire, things are burnt, not browned, if the frying-pan is neglected and dirty.

Universal as is the custom of eating bread and cheese for supper, I can assure my readers, on the authority of those who have studied the chemistry of food, that there is less nourishment in cheese than in the various articles of diet I have been discussing; less than in rice, or oatmeal-porridge, or in bread and milk; and, moreover, cheese is very difficult of digestion, and by no means a cheap article of food. At any rate, it is a good plan to vary the supper, and if cheese is taken three times a week, to sup on some savoury preparation of meal, rice, or vegetables on the other four nights.

Small Change.

THE following advertisement appears in an Illinois paper, from a man in the pursuit of business under difficulties:—"Take notice,—I have moved my residence; my shop is in the fore-room of the jail. All persons wishing to see me will please call, as my business is so that I can't leave.—Yours most truly, "Charles R. Johnson."

Joy, temperance, and repose,
Slam the door on the doctor's nose.

"OH, pray let me have my way this time!" said a young gentleman to his lady-love. "Well, Willy, I suppose I must, this once; but you know that after we are married, I shall always have a Will of my own."

THE following appears upon the clerk's record in Castlebar:—"Voted, that the March meeting be in April."

A SURGEON once waited on an eccentric old gentleman with his bill for medicines and visits. The patient agreed to pay for the pills, and return the visits.

"I SAY, Mick, what sort of potatoes are those you are planting?" "Raw ones, to be sure; your honour wouldn't be thinking I would plant boiled ones."

WE are near ingratitude when a benefit weighs upon us.—Madame de Lespinasse.

A "BAIT" may be defined as one animal impaled upon a hook in order to torture a second for the amusement of a third. Were the latter to change places with either of the two former (which might generally be done with very little loss to society) it would enable a man using the bait to form a better notion of the pastime he is in the habit of pursuing. To make some approximation to strict retributive justice, he should gorge the bait, and his tormentor should have all the humanity and ingenuity of an experienced angler.

"PAT," said an English gentleman to his servant, "what's all that noise in the street?"—"Oh, nothing, sir; they're only forcing a man to volunteer."

"I WISH you would pay a little attention, sir," said a stage-manager to a careless actor. "Well, I am paying as little as I can," was the calm reply.

WOMEN are never stronger than when they arm themselves with their weakness.—Madame de Deffaut.

It has been said that the American Indians and the American ladies differ in this—the former whoop only in battle, the latter hoop always.

DELIBERATE with caution, but act with decision. Either yield with graciousness or oppose with firmness.

OLD Mrs. Darnley is a pattern of household economy. She says she has made a pair of socks last fifteen years, by only knitting new feet to them every winter, and new legs every other winter.

Mrs. PARTINGTON has seen an article in the papers headed, "Conspiracy to murder Bill." She wants to know who "Bill" is.

ENVY is as malignant in a paltry waiting wench as in the vainest or most ambitious lady of the court. It is always an infallible mark of the basest nature; and merit in the lowest, as well as in the highest station, must feel the shaft of envy's constant agents—falsehood and slander.—Maccllin.

"SMOKE your pipe," as the coal said to the stove. "CORN bread?" said the Irish waiter; "we haven't got it; an' is it corn bafe (beef) ye mane?"

WHY is blindman's buff like sympathy? Because it's a fellow feeling for a fellow-creature.

As the next thing to having wisdom ourselves is to profit by that of others, so the next thing to having merit ourselves is to take care that the meritorious profit by us; for he that rewards the deserving makes himself one of the number.

TRUTH is the most powerful thing in the world, since fiction can only please by its resemblance to it.—Shaftesbury.

FRIENDSHIP often ends in love; but love in friendship—never.

Chess.

Problem No. 53. By HENRY TURTON, Esq.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in four moves.

CHESS TOURNEY.

The following game, which, we believe, will be new to most of our subscribers, was played in the second series of the late Home Circle Chess Tourney.

WHITE. Mr. R.	BLACK. Alpha.
1. P to K 4	1. P to K 4
2. K Kt to B 3	2. Q Kt to B 3
3. B to Q Kt 5	3. P to Q R 3
4. B to Q R 4	4. K Kt to B 3
5. Q to K 2	5. P to Q Kt 4
6. B to Q Kt 3	6. K B to Q B 4
7. P to Q R 4 (a)	7. P to Q Kt 5 (b)
8. B takes K B P (ch)	8. K takes B
9. Q to Q B 4 (ch)	9. K to K sq
10. Q takes B	10. Kt takes K P
11. Q to K 3	11. Kt to K B 3
12. Kt takes P	12. Kt takes Kt
13. Q takes Kt (ch)	13. K to B 2
14. Castles	14. P to Q R 4
15. P to Q 3	16. K R to K sq
16. Q to K Kt 3 (c)	16. Q R to R 3 (d)
17. Q to K B 3 (e)	17. P to Q 4
18. B to K B 4	18. Q B to Kt 5
19. Q to K Kt 3	19. B to K 3
20. R to Q B sq (f)	20. Kt to K R 4
21. B to K Kt 5 (g)	21. Q to Q 2
22. Q to K R 4	22. Q R to Kt 3 (h)
23. P to K B 3	23. R to K 4
24. P to K B 4	24. K R to K B 4
25. R to K sq	25. Q to K 3
26. Q to K R 3	26. P to K R 3
27. Kt to Q 2	27. P takes B
28. R takes B	28. Kt takes K B P
29. R takes Q	29. Kt takes Q (ch)
30. P takes Kt	30. R takes R
31. Kt to Q Kt 3	31. K R to K 4
32. R to K B sq (ch)	32. K to Kt 3
33. Kt to Q 4	33. R to K B 3
34. Kt to K B 3	34. R to K 7
35. R to B 2	35. R takes R
36. K takes R	36. K to R 4
37. K to Kt 3	37. R takes Kt (ch) (i)
38. K takes B	38. K to R 5
39. P to Q B 3	39. P takes P
40. P takes P	40. K takes P
41. P to Q 4	41. K takes P
42. K to Kt 4	42. K to Kt 7
43. K takes P	43. K to B 6
44. K to B 5	44. K to K 6
45. K to K 5	45. P to Kt 4
46. K to B 5	46. K to Q 6

White resigns.

Notes by Alpha.—(a) Well played; in any case the first player now obtains an advantage in position.—(b) This loses a Pawn; a singular oversight in a correspondence game.—(c) We incline to think that Q to K B 4, crippling the action of the adverse Knight, would have been embarrassing to Black.—(d) An important and well-timed coup, bringing the Rook at once into active service.—(e) Very weak; with the object, no doubt, of preventing the adverse Bishop being moved to Knight's 2nd; it was, however, of much greater importance to bring out the pieces on his left wing.—(f) Had he played R to K sq he would have lost a Pawn; nevertheless, we believe it to have been his best move.—(g) Perhaps his best play; if instead, he take Q B P with B, he loses a piece.—(h) The attack is prosecuted with the utmost vigour; this move virtually decides the game in Black's favour.—(i) The shortest road to victory.

Robert Webster will be happy to play a game of chess by correspondence with any amateur of fair strength.

Owing to the great increase in the number of our Chess correspondents, it is sometimes difficult to find room for answers to all their communications, but they may rest assured that each will receive attention in due course.

Our Editorial Table.

FRENCH PRONUNCIATION.—As we find, from numerous letters, that our correspondents are still doubtful of the correct pronunciation of certain French words, notwithstanding the explicit rules we have laid down in our "French Lessons," we have determined upon commencing, in our next number, a more amplified system of French pronunciation, that will, we trust, remove all the difficulties of which our readers have complained.

SOPHONISBA.—"Sophonisba" is invited to pass the latter part of her midsummer holidays at a watering place in the Isle of Thanet, but she hesitates accepting the invitation, because she has been reading of the advance the sea is making in that quarter, and she fears the whole island may be submerged while she is in it. "Sophonisba" may banish her fears, and accept the invitation. We can tell her exactly in what degree the ocean is advancing on the Isle of Thanet. It is gaining on its eastern coast one yard per annum. Old Father Ocean is taking still greater liberties with the north-eastern coast of our island. From Sutherland to the Humber villages have been absorbed, and the encroachment of the water is four yards per annum. Ravenspur and Hyde have long since disappeared, and Spurnhead is in danger. Ancient Cromer is in the sea. Dunwich, once a considerable town and port, has now but twenty houses; and Harwich will soon be an island. Thus, we hope, we have shown "Sophonisba" that she may just as well go to Margate, Ramsgate, or Broadstairs, as to any other sea-side town on the eastern coast.

PETER GREATHEAD.—You are mistaken in supposing that Paisley (the third "priest in succession at the Gretna-Green altar") was a blacksmith. He was a smuggler, and afterwards a tobaccoist. He was probably called "old blacksmith," from the mythological idea of Vulcan's being employed to rivet matrimonial chains. Paisley commenced his trade as a "marrying man" about 1789. During the latter part of his professional career, whenever called upon to officiate, he walked the streets, dressed in his canonicals, with all the dignity of a bishop.

A CIVIL ENGINEER.—Napoleon the III., the present Emperor of the French, was born at the Tuileries, April the 20th, 1808. He, and the King of Rome, his cousin, were the only two princes of the Buonaparte family born under the shadow of the imperial dignity. Louis Napoleon's sponsors were his uncle, the great Napoleon, and his aunt, the Empress Marie Louise.

CAMILLA GREY.—The operas of Don Giovanni, Figaro, and Il Flauto Magico are by Mozart. This great composer was born in the year 1756, at Salzburg, in Austria. He visited England in 1784, and remained in this country till the following year. He was lost to his friends, and to the musical world, of which he was the great ornament, at the early age of thirty-six.

INGRAM.—The remuneration made to reporters of the press varies. Casual reporters are paid according to the length of their communications. Regular reporters receive from £2 to £5 per week; and, for the first-class papers, and during the sittings of Parliament, £6 6s.

MARY SPRAY.—Plain biscuits are made thus:—Mix up wheaten flour, and a little salt, in as small a portion of water as will cause it, after long kneading and rolling, to hold together. Beat it well with the rolling pin, then roll it out to about one-third of an inch thick, cut it into biscuits, and bake in a quick oven. Watch that they do not burn. Digestive biscuits are made in the same way, but with wheat-meal, and about half-an-inch thick. For buttered biscuits, rub half-a-pound of butter into a quartern of flour, then wet with a pint of warm water and a little good yeast. Break down the dough, prove it well, and bake in a good strong heat.

ESTHER.—"Esther's" mamma has a quantity of fruit in her garden, more than she requires for herself and family. She would like to preserve some for the winter, but is deterred by the expense of sugar. If she follows the receipt we are about to give, she can preserve the fruit without sugar:—"Pick the fruit from the stalks; drop it into bottles. Put one drachm of alum into four gallons of boiling water; let it boil till it is cold, and then fill the bottles with it; bung them tight; then put them into a copper of cold water, and heat it to 176 degrees. Then tie them over with bladder, and seal them."

ELLEN ST. ANGE.—Your still remaining single would not prevent an action for breach of promise being maintained against you, if you refuse to ratify an engagement into which you had entered, but the other plea that you advance, may cause your suitor to be non-suited. We allude to his having deceived you about his age. You thought you were going to marry a young man, whose tastes would, for the next twenty years, be in harmony with your own, but a cousin of your lover revealed to you that, instead of being only thirty-five, your lover is turned fifty. On charging him with his real age, you tell us that he could not deny it. In our opinion you are not legally bound to keep an engagement into which you were inveigled under false pretences.

CHARLES.—"Charles" has been, for four years, in love "with a good-looking and most amiable young lady," yet he does not know whether she would accept him or not! At any rate, the young lady does not add frankness to her other charming qualities, or she would not have kept "Charles" in painful doubt year after year. We do not recommend him unnecessarily to expose himself to a mortifying refusal, but, if he is not very soon convinced that his regard for his first love is reciprocated, we advise him to hesitate no longer, but to devote himself to the other lady of whose affections he is convinced. Should the "first love" feel herself aggrieved by her lover's defalcation, it is not "Charles" she should blame, but her own injudicious assumption of indifference. If, however, the indifference was real, we congratulate "Charles" on being still sufficiently heart-whole to turn his thoughts to another fair one.

W. S.—A lac of rupees is one hundred thousand rupees, which, at 2s. sterling each, amount to £10,000.

US LECTURER.—Get a good Gazetteer

CLARA V. wishes to obtain "a situation as a clerk, or something of that kind, in the civil service." We know of no such situation for which females would be considered eligible.

A. C. (Aberdeen).—The first number of CASSELL'S FAMILY PAPER was published December 31, 1853.

A LAWYER'S CLERK.—The Acts of Parliament are published by the printers to her Majesty the Queen.

A SUBSCRIBER (Islington) will find the incident of Jack Cade striking London Stone in Shakespeare's play of Richard II.

ANNA.—For clearing the skin, flour of sulphur in milk may be used with advantage, but as the milk soon turns sour, only mix sufficient for one day's use. Put a tea-spoonful of sulphur in a small tea-cup of fresh milk, and wash your face with it morning and evening.

G. M.—Two volumes of "Cassell's Illustrated History of England" are completed, and may be had, bound in cloth, at 6s. each. The third volume is now in the course of publication, in weekly numbers, 1d. each, or in monthly parts, 5d. or 6d. each; and the work will be completed in four volumes.

K. WARREN, LILY DALE, H. C. SREEP, AND SOME OTHERS.—Please to repeat your questions, as we have not time to search through six weeks' correspondence.

A KITCHEN-Maid.—To destroy black-beetles or cockroaches, mix well a teacupful of oatmeal with half that quantity of plaster of Paris, and a little powdered sugar, and strew it on the floor, or in the chinks which they frequent.

ISABELLA.—"Isabella" has taken a situation as governess. She is living in a very retired part of the country. While her pupils are at their lessons, she is cheerful enough, but when, in the evening, they join their parents, and leave her to solitude, the thought of her isolation, and of the loved circle at home, from which she is separated by more than a hundred miles, quite overwhelms her. She is occasionally invited to join the evening party in the drawing-room, but she generally declines. Here we think she is in the wrong, for although she might not meet with the cordial reception that every well educated lady deserves, the change of scene, the topics discussed by the company, and the necessity of appearing cheerful, would check the progress of melancholy.

During her evenings of solitude in the schoolroom, instead of mourning her separation from her friends, let her busy herself with some pretty piece of fancy work for them, or some elegant little present that, when given, or sent, will show them that they are, "though absent, dear."

G. W. CARTER.—The ink stains may be removed from your handkerchief by means of a little salt of lemons, or tartaric acid, and hot water. The spots should be afterwards thoroughly rinsed in warm water before touching them with soap.

CUDJOE.—The life and travels of Dr. Livingstone may be obtained of any respectable bookseller.

A SUBSCRIBER.—No. 65 of the "Art Treasures Exhibition," price one penny, contains frontispiece, titlepage, preface, and index.

CRESCENT CITY.—Length of finger is, doubtless, of importance to a performer on the piano-forte, or organ; but skilful teaching and practice will enable you to overcome your difficulty.

R. B. (Dundee).—There is no law in France, by which the "goods, gear, and monies of foreigners dying in that country can be claimed by the government," unless the person deceased is suspected of treasonable practices.

A DISCIPLE OF HYMEN.—The opinion expressed by some of your friends, as to the results of the union of persons having hair of a particular colour, has no foundation in reason or in fact.

A. B. S.—We cannot be continually repeating receipts for the cure of warts, &c. See No. 191, page 271.

JENNIE.—It is strange that "Jennie," who is in the early bloom of womanhood, good looking, and (judging from her letter) well educated, should find no more suitable object on which to bestow ardent affection, than a married man. True, she tells us he is legally separated from his wife, and endeavouring to procure a divorce, with all-sufficient grounds for deserving it, but in the meantime his attentions to "Jennie" relax, and she begins to think she has not only "loved unwisely, but too well." Should her fears be groundless, we have only to wish her all the happiness she seems to deserve; but, if she finds she had cause for suspicion, we advise her to submit as cheerfully as possible. A marriage with a man just divorced from another woman would, at any rate, be an ill-omened match, and although disappointed love is a bitter draught, "Jennie" may also find it a wholesome one.

A COUNTRY GIRL.—You may obtain all the numbers of the "Ladies' Treasury" of any respectable bookseller; or by application to the publishers, Messrs. Ward and Lock, 155, Fleet-street. Fifteen Numbers have already been published, Sixpence each.

OBSERVER.—The planet about which you inquire is Venus.

J. R. BRUCE.—Wash your oily bottles well with warm suds, made from strong yellow soap.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—You cannot compel a "Collector of Inland Revenue," or, indeed, any other person, to take more than 19s. 6d. in silver, in payment of any demand.

ELIZABETH M.—You are right in your conjecture as to the peer referred to in the tale of "Hope Evermore." Put no faith whatever in the promises of the lady who advertises "to tell people what will happen to them in the course of their lives."

PERTHENSIS.—To stain ivory a bright red, soak the pieces for a few minutes in very weak aquafortis and water, and then immerse them in an infusion of cochineal in water of ammonia. Or, boil the pieces, with a pound of Brazil dust, in one gallon of water for three hours, then add a quarter of a pound of alum and boil for one hour more.

STAFFA.—Charles Lever is a native of Ireland; he is yet living, and resides in Dublin.

PERCUTATOR.—You are, doubtless, aware that your inquiry as to whether heat exists in friction, involves principles which have been discussed from the days of Bacon to the present time; perhaps, as you say, "some of the scientific readers of the FAMILY PAPER will be so good as to answer;" we give the inquiry, therefore, in your own words:—"An Calor in motu consistit?"

J. P. U.—The ages at which government situations may be obtained vary; for subordinate situations, generally speaking, the candidate should not be more than twenty-five. Physical infirmities, such as you have named, would be regarded as a disqualification.

TENAX.—As the fees accompanying briefs confided to counsel are merely honorary gratuities, they are not bound to return them, even if the services required are not rendered; though we should suppose that no right-minded counsellor would retain a fee when he was compelled to be absent, or refused to undertake the cause.

EAGA.—If the Poor Law Guardians have accepted the sureties furnished by their collector, and the collector is guilty of defalcations, they (the Guardians) are certainly responsible.

H. C. G.—Time alone can decide "whether Mr. Rarey's method of horse taming is a lasting one, or whether the horse is subdued only for a season."—Dr. Parr died at Hatton, March 26, 1825, in his 79th year. The rest of your questions must stand over for the present.

PENAX.—You may safely use the device and crest which you have submitted to us, without subjecting yourself to the duty on armorial bearings.

H. T. (S.)—Unless the freehold be entailed, it will be the property of the daughter on the death of the old man; but his wife may put in a claim for a third of the proceeds.

J. ANSELL, BOLINGBROKE, AND OTHERS.—We have several times given receipts for making lemonade, ginger beer, &c.; recently, in No. 29.

ALICE.—"Alice" has gained the affections of a young man of respectability, and of "gentle, though reserved manners;" but "Alice's" lover having, unfortunately, offended the young lady's friends, was afraid to betray his love, lest some "unpleasantness" might be felt by the object of it. In the meantime circumstances occur which make "Alice's" lover doubtful as to her regard for him, and report says that he is paying attentions to another lady. Our advice is this, if "Alice's" parents overcome their objections to her lover, let her communicate with him in a style as frank and affectionate as if no report of inconstancy had reached her ear. It is inconsistent with good sense and good feeling, to take for granted a report that may be only "title tattle." By the manner in which "Alice's" letter is received, she will be able to form a correct conclusion as to whether she is, or is not, beloved.

A TOWHIST.—Of course you feel hurt at the refusal of your present, viz., the Strasbourg pie. But you may assure your sister, on the authority of the celebrated Alexis Soyer, that the luxury of the "foie gras" is not obtained by cruel means. We give you Soyer's own words:—"After having carefully examined the subject, I can assure you that there is not a word of truth in the general belief. Up to the age of eight months," he adds, "the geese are allowed to feed at full liberty in the open air; they are then brought to market, and purchased by the persons whose occupations it is to fatten them for killing. They are placed in coops, and fed, for about a month or five weeks, three times a day, with wheat, and allowed as much water as they please. Each bird eats about a bushel of corn during the process of fattening; the water of Strasbourg, it is said, contributes to increase the volume of the liver. When sufficiently fat they are killed, having been treated with the greatest attention and humanity during the whole period of their incarceration, and entirely removed from any unusual heat."

ANNIE AND MARCUS.—Your gratifying communication has been duly received. We are delighted our advice proved beneficial, and we hope you may long enjoy the sweets of pure and virtuous love.

T. R.—The Bruces, as a royal family, are of more ancient date than the Stuarts. The first Scotch king of the latter family claimed the throne in right of his affinity by marriage to the daughter of David Bruce.

ISOCELES, W. H. G., JOHN W., W. H. L. S., A LAD OF FOURTEEN, JOHN —, E. T., OSCAR, HAMISH, MACDONALD, FLORENCE, A WEEKLY READER, H. R., PEDESTRIAN.—We cannot recommend cosmetics, nor furnish medical advice.

EMMELINE ST. CLAIR.—We strongly disapprove of your applying magnesia to your face. Minerals, in any form, are injurious to the skin, but a tea-spoonful of magnesia, taken in milk twice a week, while fasting, would probably relieve the unpleasant feelings of which you complain, by removing acidity and assisting digestion. To promote healthy perspiration, there is nothing so advisable as drinking freely of pure spring water, but beware of taking it when you are heated by exercise.

A. A. A.—We forbear from expressing our opinion of the publication about which you inquire. We recommend our correspondents, in all such cases, to refer at once to practitioners of acknowledged respectability and high standing.

CONTRIBUTORS by the following correspondents are respectfully declined:—Endymion, W. G., Lethi T. M. A., Lyneside, The Gold-digger's Boy, Anonymous, W. D. C., Ambitious, Benjamin's Brother.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—In some few instances letters are addressed to us, the postage of which has not been prepaid; these we are compelled to reject.

BRADFORD (Yorkshire).—You will find full and important information on the sciences you name in the first volume of "Cassell's Educational Course," entitled "Science Popularly Explained," a volume containing upwards of 500 pages, for 3s. 6d.

W. H. C.—We believe white lead is usually employed, but you had better consult a glazier.

P. E. AND A. J.—The mistake was corrected in No. 25.

* We cannot guarantee the return of rejected manuscripts.

All Letters and Communications for the Editor to be addressed to JOHN CASSELL, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

London: Printed and Published for JOHN CASSELL by PETER and GALTIN, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E.C.

[THE RIGHT OF TRANSLATION AND REPUBLICATION IS RESERVED.]

NEW SERIES. VOL. II.—No. 33.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 17, 1858.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

Danger, whose limbs of giant mould,
What mortal eye can fix'd behold?
Who stalks his round—a hideous form—
Howling amid the midnight storm.—COLLINS.

THE 01st had been three weeks on their march towards Delhi. Each day, as they advanced into the interior of the country, rumours of fresh insurrections reached them. Stations abandoned, officers murdered by the men they commanded, a few hours after the oath of fidelity had been clamorously and voluntarily renewed. Treasures looted, and women and children butchered in a manner too horrible to be described in our pages. It now became painfully evident that the rebellion, instead of remaining isolated, had become general, that the prestige of the English name and arms could no longer hold the infuriated sepoys in subjection. The spell was broken. It had never been a hallowed one, for the qualities of justice, mercy, and, above all, example were wanting.

The position of Sir Charles Fourreau, on whom a vast amount of responsibility rested, was a most painful one. With only a single regiment, surrounded by countless enemies or doubtful friends, his military duties required not only a cool head but a firm heart. No wonder that the latter sometimes failed him, when he thought of his wife and Lillian, who bore bravely up amidst scenes of danger and terror that might have blanched the soldier's cheek, and caused the iron nerve of manhood to quail. At each fresh tale of outrage, massacre, and crime, the mental agony of the veteran increased; and bitterly did he regret having yielded to their entreaties to permit them to accompany him upon his march. Had they been safe in Calcutta, how different would have been his feelings, how undivided his energies.

Lady Bell and her adopted daughter were not the only ladies with the regiment. The wives of Dr. Burke and the senior captain shared their perils. The former, a merry, strong-minded woman, had gone through the Sikh campaign, and seemed actually to enjoy the excitement of the march and its dangers; the lightness with which she treated the latter, and her wild flow of spirits served to keep up those of her companions.

As for the officers and privates, nothing could exceed their gallantry and devotion to the fair companions of their perils. At the mess, in the tent, or bivouac, they repeatedly vowed to perish to the last man in their defence; and we doubt not, had the stern necessity arisen, they would have nobly kept their word.

It was at the close of a long day's march that the 01st entered a long straggling village about six miles distance from the temple of Gonitsche, and the fort of Abra, held by a native rajah named Acbar, who had received not only an increase of territory, but many important favours from the English government.

ACBAR'S EMISSARY DELIVERS HIS LETTER TO SIR CHARLES.

Up to the arrival of the regiment, the wily Asiatic had not declared himself either for or against the insurgents, but contented himself by collecting provisions and gathering his forces in his stronghold.

As Sir Charles and the major entered the village at the head of the first column, the former observed with secret misgiving that the place was all but deserted. Neither the native police magistrate nor the collector made their appearance; not a male inhabitant was to be seen; a few women only gazed upon them sullenly as they advanced, looking the curses they dared not yet give utterance to.

"Humph!" muttered the major, in a dissatisfied tone, "our reception appears anything but friendly."

"Decidedly hostile, I should say," observed his commander. "And yet, after the letters of Acbar, his solemn assurances of fidelity—"

"Springes to catch woodcocks," interrupted Plinlimmon. "I would not trust one of the rascals. Remember Cawnpore."

The commander of the 01st shuddered and cast a nervous glance towards the carriage in which the ladies were riding.

"I know," he replied, "that the rajah is one of the few native princes on whom the governor-general and council place reliance."

"More fools they," said the major, drily. "But you are the best judge. I have no wish to obtrude my advice."

"Obtrude!" repeated Sir Charles; "is it possible you can do me the injustice to suppose that it is not highly prized. I am a man of few words; but never can I forget the firm support I have received, not only from yourself, Major Plinlimmon, but every officer of my regiment. If I have not always been guided by it," he continued, after a pause, "it was from no vain reliance upon my own judgment, but the fear that my motives might be misconstrued."

"Misconstrued!" exclaimed his brother officer. "By whom? There is not a man in the 01st but knows you to be as brave as you are prudent. Were I to speak my mind, I should say braver. For our last advance has been hazardous; we ought to have waited till Anson's forces came up."

"I know it—I feel it now," replied the baronet, with a sigh of bitter regret. "But had I done so, the reason, in all probability, would have been misjudged."

"Impossible!"

"You forget I am a husband."

"No, I don't!" exclaimed the warm-hearted Welshman; "more than enough has been done for honour; and if any one dares assert, hint, or insinuate the contrary, David Ap Oel Plinlimmon, major in her Majesty's 01st, is ready to give him the lie, and meet him and settle the difference like a gentleman and an officer afterwards. As for Lady Bell," he continued, "I cannot sufficiently express my admiration—never a look or word of complaint, always a pleasant smile and a cheerful word. She and Lillian are the only women I ever met worthy of being soldiers' wives."

"You forget the doctor's helpmate," observed the colonel, greatly gratified.

"Humph," ejaculated the major, drily; "she is a fine specimen of a female trooper, and an excellent partner for Burke. In the Sikh war, I am told, she more than once handled a musket, and brought down her man."

Here the adjutant rode up, and requested orders for bivouacing the men for the night. Before they could be given, an officer of the rajah, escorted by a dozen horsemen, was seen entering the village at the opposite extremity; a train of bullock carts with provisions followed in the rear.

After salaming with more than oriental servility, he placed a letter from his chief in the hands of Sir Charles.

Burke was summoned from the rear to interpret it.

The rajah, after a profusion of expressions of fidelity, informed the commander of the gallant 01st that he had been absent collecting his men, and had only just heard of the approach of his regiment. That in token of goodwill towards his allies, he had forwarded a supply of provisions, and proposed paying him a visit on the following morning.

"Do you think the writer may be trusted?" asked the colonel, as the doctor concluded the reading of the rajah's missive.

Before answering the question, Burke inquired of the bearer why his master had not come himself.

"He has not quitted his saddle for twelve hours," replied the messenger, "and his highness suffers from the jungle fever, which, as the hakim knows, is always more intense after sunset."

"The reason is a good reason," said Burke, replying in Hindostanee. Then, turning to the colonel, he added in English, "There can be no doubt of the rajah's fidelity. His highness has been collecting his forces."

Here Plinlimmon gave a short, dissatisfied cough.

"And has sent provisions for the regiment," added the speaker, hastily, to prevent the officer of Acbar from noticing the major's incredulity; "it would be both impolitic and unjust to doubt him."

The messenger was dismissed with the thanks of Sir Charles to his master, for the timely supplies he had brought, and the assurance that his visit on the following morning would be received with pleasure.

As the wily Asiatic rode away, there was a subdued expression of triumph in his half-closed eyes, and a sinister smile upon his lips.

"I have no faith in the rajah or his promises," observed the major, in a very decided tone, as the messenger disappeared.

"Nor I," added the doctor, calmly.

The two officers regarded him with surprise.

"But that is no reason why we should tell him so," continued the speaker; "the fellow who has left us, evidently understood English. I watched the expression of his countenance, his ill-concealed anxiety, when the colonel asked if I thought his master might be trusted."

"Burke," exclaimed his commander, "you would have made an admirable diplomat; you deceived even me."

Whilst the quarters of the men were being arranged for the night, Sir Charles Fourreau alighted for a few minutes at the house of the collector, which had been taken possession of for headquarters. Lady Bell and Lillian both met him with a cheerful smile, but he could see that it was forced. For several days they had made it a rule not to ask any questions, for fear that the answers might be painful.

The doctor's wife, on the contrary, not feeling called upon to exercise such abnegation of the privileges of her sex, assailed him with a shower of questions, which, each time the gentleman hesitated, she interpreted in her own peculiar way. She was a short, wiry woman, well calculated either for exertion or endurance, with a determined but not unfeminine expression of face. Her campaign with the Sikhs had given a military tone to her conversation, both original and amusing.

"Well, colonel," she exclaimed, "the rajah has sent provisions."

"Yes."

"Is he coming himself?"

"In the morning."

The dark eyes of the lady flashed with sudden intelligence. Fixing them with a peculiar expression upon the speaker, she observed, in a quiet tone, "That she trusted the 01st would be prepared to give him a fitting reception."

"Of course we shall do our best," replied the commander, in a careless tone, not to alarm his wife and Lillian; "but we have scant means of ceremony here."

"Sorry for it," muttered Mrs. Burke, drily; "especially as his highness may arrive sooner than you expect, and take you unawares. I shall be ready," she added, at the same time opening a small valise and taking from it a pair of exquisitely finished pistols, which she coolly examined before proceeding to load them.

The colonel perceived the effect which the appearance of the weapons, and still more the manner of the speaker, produced upon Lady Bell, and made her a sign to desist; but the quick eye of his wife detected it.

"O Charles," she exclaimed, reproachfully, and at the same time throwing herself into his arms; "am I no longer worthy of your confidence?"

"Of all that man ever bestowed on woman," replied her husband, embracing her affectionately.

"Why don't you tell her, then?" said Mrs. Burke, at the same time snapping the lock of one of her weapons; "suspense is worse than certainty. She can bear it, so can Lillian. You know their affection and goodness, but not their strength; men seldom do. It was years," she added, snapping the pistol a second time, "before Burke found out mine, but he knows it by this time."

Despite their anxiety, which predominated over every other feeling, her hearers could not refrain from smiling.

"That is right!" cried the good-humoured creature. "Glad to see you smile again. Look in her eyes, Sir Charles, and then ask yourself if Lady Bell has not courage."

"I never doubted it," replied the baronet; "but why try it by an unnecessary alarm?"

"When campaigning, always keep your force on the alert," answered the little Amazon, as she rammed a bullet into one of her weapons.

"Bell," said her husband, "I will no longer conceal from you that the conduct of the rajah is suspicious."

"I should think it was!"

"His promise to visit me in the morning, most probably, is intended to throw me off my guard."

"A child might see through it."

"And the desertion of the village," continued the baronet, "by the native police magistrate and collector, is a still more unfavourable sign."

"Exactly what I think."

We scarcely need inform our readers that the commentaries upon the statements of Sir Charles Fourreau, proceeded from the doctor's wife.

"In short," continued the commander of the 01st, "there is a possibility—nay, more, a probability of our being attacked; but fear not," he added, tenderly, "there is not a man in the regiment that would not die for you."

"Or woman either," said Mrs. Burke.

"I have not the slightest dread of ever falling alive into the hands of the barbarians," observed Lady Bell, with a calm smile.

In the midst of the danger which threatened her benefactress, Lillian found one consolation—Richard was not with them to share it; he, at least, was safe at Calcutta. Hers was no selfish love, but one of those pure, disinterested affections which hallow the heart of woman, even as an angel's presence consecrates the shrine in which it dwells.

Fred Wharton now made his appearance. During the latter part of the march, when the peril became daily more imminent, he had ridden, as frequently as his regimental duty would permit, by the side of the carriage which conveyed the wife of his commander and her adopted child. There had been no ostentatious parade of protection, but that unobtrusive, brother-like care, which proved the deep interest he felt in their safety. No wonder, therefore, that the feeling of confidence had gradually strengthened between them, and that he was warmly welcomed both by Lady Bell and our heroine.

"By-the-bye, colonel," he exclaimed, as if he had but just recollected the cause of his visit, "the major has been inquiring for you: he wishes to consult you respecting the disposition of the men."

"I thought we had arranged it," said Sir Charles, slightly annoyed at being obliged to quit his wife and Lillian.

A glance from his subaltern informed him that his presence was desired for other reasons than the one stated, and he rose to depart.

"Plinlimmon," he added, "is so sensitive on the subject of military etiquette, as if I were jealous of my authority."

With this observation he quitted the room, promising to return in a few minutes, instead of which nearly an hour elapsed before he rejoined those who were so dear to him.

No sooner had he left them, than Lady Bell motioned to her visitor to take a seat beside herself and her protégée.

"I am glad my husband has quitted us," said the wife of his commander, "for I have long wished to speak with you."

"With me?" repeated the colonel, with surprise.

"And to demand—nay, if necessary, entreat—a service from you."

"Is it possible," exclaimed the young officer, "that it lies in my power to be of use to you? I need not say with what pleasure I shall obey your slightest wish."

"You promise me?"

"Yes."

"On your word as a soldier and a gentleman?" demanded her ladyship, at the same time fixing her eyes searchingly upon his.

A pause of several instants succeeded, during which the speakers remained gazing upon each other: the colonel endeavouring to read in the expression of the fair suppliant's features the nature of the request, which he trembled to divine; the high-born Englishwoman to note if his courage or resolution were likely to fail him—for it was no common task she was about to impose.

"A few minutes since," said the officer, "I should have given the pledge you demand unhesitatingly; but now, I—I must first hear your request before I bind myself by so solemn a promise."

"I leave it to your honour to judge of its propriety," urged Lady Bell.

Wharton turned fearfully pale, and the drops of perspiration which gathered on his brow bore witness to the agony he endured.

"I must hear it first," he repeated.

"You shall, then, since you insist upon it," replied her ladyship, calmly. "I have long since marked you as one capable of great, if not heroic deeds. I speak not of the strife of war—most men are brave; it is the moral courage I have remarked in you that prompts my prayer, which you are too good, too generous to refuse. Had you a wife, a sister, or the being you most loved, with the regiment, would you permit her to fall a living victim in the hands of those who sport with woman's agony and woman's shame? Answer me, Wharton. What would be the last proof of your affection under such circumstances?"

"Spare me!" groaned the young man; "spare me!" "You would preserve her honour at the expense of her life," continued Lady Bell; "send her unpolluted to the throne of Him who judges alike the motive and the act; I am sure you would. Hear my request. Should my husband fall, and numbers prevail against our slender force, promise me, Wharton, that neither Lillian nor myself shall become the scorn of our heathen enemy."

"What is it you demand—a murder?" "No, a sacrifice," replied Lillian, in accents so soft and gentle that they fell like a seraph's prayer upon his ear.

"And break the heart of the true friend that loves me?" exclaimed the officer. "Impossible! It is too horrible. Nature revolts at the bare contemplation of such a deed. Tyrrell would curse me—hate me for a—"

"He would bless you," interrupted the orphan; "bless the firm hand and the true heart that spared him the pang of years, the life of agony, the recollection of a wrong, to her he loved, my cheek would burn to name. I have a claim, Wharton, a sister's claim to your protection—to shield me from dishonour; for are not you and Richard brothers in heart though not in blood?"

For several minutes the young cornet remained buried in the deepest reflection; not a word escaped him, but the quivering muscles of his face and compressed lips bore witness to the mental struggle he endured.

"Lillian," said her benefactress, in a tone so free from emotion and excitement that it rendered the resolution which animated her almost sublime, "since the friend in whom we both relied deserts us—since manhood's courage fails, a woman's arm shall shield you. Child of my love, whom Providence has called me to protect and guide, rest satisfied; living, no rebel's arm shall ever clasp you."

The orphan threw herself upon the neck of the heroic woman, and mingled her thanks with tears and kisses.

Wharton could resist no longer.

"Lady," he exclaimed, and every word he uttered seemed wrung from his very heart, "you have prevailed. I accept the fearful task you have assigned me. Do not speak! do not thank me!" he added, with a burst of manly sorrow, "lest the sound of your voice—the appalling horror of such a sacrifice—unnerves my resolution, and I recall my promise, cancelling it in tears."

They already fell so fast as almost to choke his utterance.

"Heaven will not permit the fearful deed," he murmured; "it is too just, too merciful; so good, so pure, and beautiful!"

"Others as pure," observed Lady Bell, gravely, "have not been spared. You are a generous fellow, Wharton, and need not blush at what coarse minds might term weakness; such tears honour your manhood, instead of shaming it. Receive the only thanks," she added, "it may ever be in my power to bestow for the vast service you have promised me."

Without the slightest hesitation or embarrassment, her ladyship parted the clustering hair from the sun-burnt brow of the young officer, and touched it with her lips. A cold shudder ran through his frame as he felt the contact; it seemed like the seal to a fatal bond—a contract with death.

Lillian followed the example of her benefactress.

"Richard will need no souvenir to guard my memory," she whispered. "Tell him that the last word my lips pronounced was his name—my last thought—save one—was of him."

"And that?" "The fair girl, with the sweetness of a martyr's resignation, gently raised her hand and pointed heavenward."

CHAPTER LXIX.

The tempest tries the pilot's skill.—OLD PLAY.

WHEN Sir Charles Fourreau arrived at the quarters of Major Plinlimmon, he found the choleric Welshman and most of the officers of the regiment impatiently awaiting his presence. In the same room with them was a tall, gaunt-looking fakir, his hands bound behind him, and guarded by a couple of soldiers.

The fellow had been detected spying out the exact position of the regiment, and the arrangements for keeping guard during the night, &c. He had been captured by the patrol in the attempt to conceal himself in one of the deserted houses in the village.

From the crowd of females who gathered round the door of the building, and the deep interest they betrayed for his safety, Dr. Burke, who again acted as interpreter, concluded not only that the prisoner must be well known but a person of great reputed sanctity.

To every question addressed to him, the old man had hitherto maintained an obstinate silence.

"Won't speak, won't he!" Sir Charles heard Plinlimmon exclaim, as he approached the group. "Brace the triangles; the cat may make him find his tongue."

The fakir, who evidently understood the menace, smiled disdainfully. Death, under such circumstances, would be the crown of glory—the martyr's palm—the consummation of his most ardent wish.

To such a man, it had no terrors.

The commander of the 01st was speedily put in possession of the facts of the case.

As there appeared no positive proof that the prisoner was other than he seemed—one of those wandering fanatics who are the pest of India—he hesitated to carry out the suggestion of the major, as an act of possible injustice.

"The lash will never make him speak," observed Dr. Burke; "he would die under it."

"What is it you advise?"

"It is my opinion he is no fakir," replied the man of science, eyeing the prisoner as critically as a jockey might do the points of a horse. "He has the type of a much higher caste—the features of the Brahmin."

At this observation, the old man, despite his endeavours to conceal it, appeared evidently disconcerted.

"How are we to ascertain it?" inquired the colonel.

"Nothing more easy," said the doctor; "a Brahmin never removes from his person the mystical cord which in infancy is placed around his neck."

"A cord!" repeated the major, "and round their necks, too! Very sensible arrangement; spares a world of trouble when their time comes!"

"Its real signification, I believe, has never been ascertained. Question ten Brahmins on the subject, and it is as many chances to one but they each give a different explanation of it."

"I do not know," observed Sir Charles, "even should your suspicion prove correct, how the confirmation of it would unveil the designs of our enemies."

"Leave that to me," exclaimed Doctor Burke; "if he proves to be a Brahmin, he shall find that I have not studied the Vedas for nothing."

The old man glanced upon the speaker with eyes so full of hatred and terror, and a countenance expressive of such diabolical passion, that he resembled some animal of prey hunted to its lair, rather than a human being.

"Strip him to the waist," said the colonel, turning to the soldiers who guarded him.

The men waited for no second order, but tore off the ragged mantle which enveloped the form of their prisoner. The suspicion of the doctor was confirmed—from his right shoulder hung the mystic cord.

"Slay me," exclaimed the Brahmin, speaking in excellent English, "but dare not to profane my person."

"Your fate is in your own hands," replied the commander of the 01st. "You are a detected spy, and the penalty is death."

"I am prepared to pay it," said the captive, cheerfully. "The law of the Christian is always just."

There was a slight touch of irony in the tone of the speaker which did not pass unnoticed by those around him.

"You may escape it," observed Sir Charles.

"How?"

"By revealing to us the design of the rajah Acbar."

"Christian," demanded the old man, calmly, "what bribe would induce you to betray the men under your command—deliver them up to the enemy—to sell the honour of your country?"

"Insolent rascal!" muttered Major Plinlimmon, "to suppose such a thing possible in a British officer."

"Not all the wealth of India," replied the baronet. The Brahmin drew himself proudly up.

"The Hindoo," he exclaimed, "has also a country, compared to which Europe is as the morass and the jungle a few wretched pariahs have reclaimed—a civilisation before which the learning and science of the western world are but as things of yesterday."

"And yet we have held your land," observed Sir Charles, struck by the tone of his reply.

"As the tiger holds its prey," retorted the prisoner—"by the fangs."

"The spy is condemned in all honourable warfare," "And yet you employ him."

"But we do not turn our weapons against helpless women and children," answered Sir Charles Fourreau; "or perpetrate outrages which language has no fitting words to name."

"Each nation has its own peculiar mode of warfare," was the quiet rejoinder.

"The observation is a just one," observed Dr. Burke. "You have fallen into our hands, and cannot complain if we make reprisals."

"I am prepared for death," said the Brahmin.

"And the manner?"

"Is indifferent to me."

"We shall see."

"I fear you not!" exclaimed the fanatic; "for, beyond the violence and cruelties with which man goads his fellow, I behold the spirit's freedom from its home of clay—its absorption into the Eternal Being—its endless ages of blissful contemplation."

The faith of the Hindoo, after all, as professed by the higher castes, is not the gross idolatry and superstition Europeans have been taught to believe.

Dr. Burke, who, with the permission of Sir Charles, had now taken the direction of affairs, whispered his instructions to one of the men, who quitted the house, but in a short time returned with a bowl of blood taken from one of the sacred bulls, which in India are permitted to wander where they please: no native would, under any circumstances, presume to drive them from his fields, however great the devastation, but, on the contrary, caress and fondle them.

The Brahmin shuddered,—he foresaw the trial that awaited him.

"Priest," said the doctor, "the blood of the sacrifice to Bramah has been shed; the fire is ready. In the latter I will first consume the sacred cord, and order the soldiers to pour the former down thy throat."

A groan of horror broke from the prisoner. Any ordinary pollution he might have resisted; for, according to his faith, a few thousand years of purgatory might have restored him to his caste, but the one now threatened, destroyed it for ever.

"You know the alternative."

Had death been at his command, the Hindoo would gladly have accepted it, but his guards held him firmly.

Like most of his race he was a fatalist, and believed the resolute band of Europeans who held him in their power, to be so completely hemmed in by the approaching columns of insurgents, that, after all, his treason to the cause could scarcely affect its ultimate triumph.

"And what pledge have I," he demanded, "that in the event of my accepting your terms, you will keep faith with me?"

"The honour of a British officer," replied Sir Charles Fourreau.

"Release me, then."

The colonel was about to give the order to that effect, when a look from the doctor restrained him.

"When you have fulfilled the conditions."

"Well, then," said the Brahmin, "the Rajah Acbar has sworn allegiance to the throne of Delhi."

"The perjured villain," muttered Major Plinlimmon.

"The forces of the Nena are advancing; you are in an open country, without the possibility of either advancing or retreating. The fort, your last hope, is too strongly manned to be taken."

"You forget the temple," observed Burke.

The priest replied only by a glance of the most intense hatred.

"Has the rajah any intention of attacking us before the dawn?" asked Sir Charles.

His prisoner hesitated.

"Remember," continued the speaker, "that it is only on condition of the most ample confession that I gave my honour. Deceive me in a single point, and I at once recall the pledge."

"He has."

"At what hour?"

"Midnight."

"He shall find us prepared to receive him," exclaimed the commander of the 01st. "You will remain a prisoner till the morning, when, if your statements prove true, you shall recover your liberty."

The Brahmin was committed to the care of a sergeant and four of the best men of the regiment, with directions to shoot him if he attempted to escape—an order they were not likely to trifle with, for the news of the massacre of Cawnpore and nameless outrages perpetrated upon women and children, as well as officers, had raised them to a pitch of fury bordering upon madness.

A council of officers was immediately called to decide what was best to be done in the emergency, and, strange to say, the opinion of one who could scarcely be looked upon as a military man was adopted.

Dr. Burke proposed that they should at once march from the village, and take possession of the temple. From a boy, whom he had questioned, he had acquired the certainty that it was well stocked with provisions.

The next difficulty was, to find a messenger to carry intelligence of their position to General Anson, who was rapidly marching towards Delhi; a dilemma from which Mark Rayner—whom our readers have lost sight of for some time, but, we trust, not forgotten—relieved them.

CHAPTER LXX.

Our crimes, like shadows, pursue us still.—OLD PROVERB.

FOR some time after his arrival in India Mark Rayner found himself, comparatively speaking, a happy and contented man. True, the recollection of the past would occasionally cast a shadow of doubt, if not of terror, upon his mind; but he dismissed it as speedily as possible, trusting, as most of us trust, hopefully, but blindly, to the future.

By exemplary and unremitting attention to his military duties, and the protection of Sir Charles, he had risen to the grade of sergeant-major, whilst the kindness of Lady Bell, who treated Rose more like a humble friend than a dependent, rendered their exile less painful than either husband or wife had ventured to anticipate.

Mark had not long attained his last promotion when a draught of recruits arrived from the dépôt in England, and amongst others Sanders, his companion on the fatal new year's night when Barney Gee and the keeper of Sir Norman both met their untimely death.

Sanders at first appeared highly pleased at finding his former friend in a position to be of service to him; but the feeling did not last long. Envy and jealousy succeeded, and he gratified his naturally malignant disposition either by wantonly braving his authority, or occasionally throwing out dark hints as to the cause of his leaving England and joining the 01st.

It was a matter of deep mortification to Mark to be compelled to endure all this. It was in vain that he reasoned and expostulated with the fellow privately, gave him a portion of his pay, and screened his faults, till the men of his troop openly murmured at his partiality.

"You will be my ruin," he frequently remarked to him, and it was not long before the prediction was accomplished.

Sanders had been sent to the guard-house for being intoxicated; and, unfortunately, Mark commanded the guard. In his fury the drunken ruffian would listen neither to entreaty nor remonstrance; he would have his liberty. It was only to avoid being accused before the men of murder, that the unhappy sergeant connived at his escape.

For this offence he had been deprived of his stripes. The entreaties of Lady Bell and Lillian had saved him from further and yet more degrading consequences. So that when his persecutor, who had been speedily taken in one of the low neighbourhoods of Calcutta, was brought back to the regiment, he found his former protector reduced to the same rank as himself.

This satisfied him, and for awhile he left him unmolested.

Mark, who bitterly regretted his degradation—more, perhaps, on his wife's account than his own—had long since resolved, if ever an opportunity of redeeming himself should occur, to embrace it, even at the risk of life. In the necessity of sending a messenger to hasten the approach of General Anson, such an occasion now presented itself. He spoke the language fluently, and from his black hair and beard, and his naturally swarthy complexion, which the sun of India had rendered still more dark, might possibly pass for a native, unsuspected.

Vainly Rose endeavoured to dissuade him from the undertaking; she felt only as a fond devoted wife; her husband, as one who had a character to redeem, a stain to wash out, a name to win.

These were not the only motives which prompted him; to do him justice, they were but secondary to the gratitude the generous conduct of the colonel and Lady Bell had inspired.

Firm in the resolution he had taken, he marched at once to the hut where Sir Charles was still holding consultation with his officers, and volunteered for the dangerous enterprise.

Mark was ordered to retire whilst his offer was being considered. Dawlish, who had taken an intense dislike to him from his connection, real or supposed, with Lillian, was the only one who opposed it, and even he objected indirectly.

"A fellow who has been reduced to the ranks," he observed, "can scarcely be trusted. Probably his object is to creep out of danger, or desert."

The major reminded him that the dangers Mark was likely to encounter by remaining with his regiment were slight, in comparison with those he would have to brave in the event of his offer being accepted; "and as for deserting," he added, "he could do that at any time."

The former muttered something about knowing the language.

"Speaks it better than any officer in the regiment," replied the doctor, in answer to the second objection; "but I perfectly understand Dawlish's motive."

The latter coloured—a proof that it was not a very honourable one, and his brother officers looked surprised.

"He wishes," added Burke, with a slight—only a very slight smile—"to undertake the dangerous task himself."

"In that case," exclaimed Plinlimmon, "the colonel, I am convinced, will be the last to disappoint so honourable an ambition."

"Certainly," replied Sir Charles.

Dawlish hastily assured the commander that had he possessed even a slight knowledge of Hindostanee, nothing would have delighted him more; still, if ordered to attempt it, he was ready, quite ready.

Mark was called in and questioned by his commander.

"In what way do you propose to cross the country, and meet the general?" was the first question put to him.

"Disguised as a native."

"You must be well armed," observed Plinlimmon.

"Pardon, major," replied the volunteer, saluting him respectfully, "but I should prefer going without arms of any kind."

"But not without money, I suppose?" suggested Dawlish.

"Not a rupee," answered Mark; "money would be as valueless to bribe—in the event of my being detected—as arms to protect me. I have considered of my purpose well," he added, "and am convinced that my only chance of success will be in assuming the dress of one of those fanatics whom I have so often noticed in Calcutta. I believe I can imitate their wild cant and manners so as to defy detection."

"And in the event of success, what recompense do you expect?" inquired his colonel.

"The satisfaction of having done my duty," replied the poor fellow, in a tone which went far to prove his sincerity—"of having served those," he added, "who have befriended me—of showing that I am not ungrateful."

"It's the best thing we can do," whispered Plinlimmon in the ear of his commander; "not that I quite comprehend the fellow."

"I do," replied Sir Charles; with which observation the discussion ended. Mark, being informed that his offer was accepted, retired to prepare for his almost forlorn enterprise.

The necessary disguise was easily procured in a Hindoo village deserted by all its male inhabitants.

Within an hour Mark made his appearance at the quarters of the colonel, accompanied by Doctor Burke, who had assisted at the metamorphosis of the English soldier into an Indian fakir, and good-naturedly furnished him with such hints and suggestions as might prove serviceable to him in his perilous enterprise.

So complete was the change, that on their return into the room, neither Lady Bell nor Lillian recognised him—it was the eye of affection only that his disguise could not deceive. Rose knew him in an instant, and threw herself upon his shoulders.

"Pardon her, colonel," said the poor fellow, deeply moved; "if you only knew all that she has endured for my sake. I am ready now," he added, gently removing her arms from his neck, "quite ready to receive your last orders."

They were soon given, for time and danger pressed.

"You will describe our position to Anson," said Sir Charles, speaking with stern and soldier-like brevity. "Tell him that the 01st will hold out against any odds the rebels may bring against them, to the last man—bid him hasten to succour if he can, if not to avenge us."

Lillian had been informed that a letter might compromise the success as well as safety of the emissary, and forbore sending a line to Richard: as a token of what might prove a last farewell, she had cut off a lock of her long silken hair, and placed it in the hands of Mark.

"You know for whom," she said. "God speed you! we will pray for you!"

The disguised soldier pressed his wife in one long, lingering embrace of love and agony. Then, without uttering a word, saluted his officers, and darted from the room.

Meanwhile Major Plinlimmon had not been idle. After duly considering the position of affairs, he had come to the resolution, subject of course to the approval of his commanding officer, to station himself with a party of men in the wood which skirted the village, and give the traitorous rajah and his troops a warm reception. Even if it failed to throw them into confusion, it would give time to fire the village, and allow the main body of the regiment to penetrate the jungle on their way to the temple, now their last hope.

When the colonel heard his plan, he warmly approved it; but at the same time urged, that as it was the post of danger, he ought to command the party in person.

"And so deprive me of the credit," replied the major, who perfectly comprehended the sensitive honour which feared to be misjudged. "No; let us adhere to our first arrangement. Whether the 01st returns to England or leaves its last man in India, rely upon it," he added, "that the courage of its commander will remain as untarnished as that of the best that ever bore his name; and if any one doubts it, refer him to David Ap Oel Plinlimmon."

(To be continued.)

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

METHOD.

A LITTLE method is a great help in every intellectual effort. Any plan is better than no plan. We alluded last week to dividing our time into available portions for labour and for leisure, and thus turning leisure and labour to the best account. We now suggest an additional plan, which we believe will be found to be of great advantage.

First of all, we would recommend our young friends to keep a diary. We can imagine that their reply will be, "We have nothing to put in it—nothing to say—nothing worthy of paper and ink."

Our answer is, "If it is your life, it is valuable to you. If it contains a faithful record of your daily doings, it is worth all the trouble it occasions; and it will incite to worthier deeds and nobler efforts than would otherwise have been undertaken."

What an interesting volume is a daily journal; how affecting to the writer. He lives his life over again, as he turns page after page of that closely written manuscript. He is old now; it may be, his few locks are gray; but he is young as he reads. From the faded ink come forth old faces, old familiar scenes, old hopes, old fears; he talks with his past hours; he overleaps all intervening time; he hears old voices, and if tears leap unbidden to his eyes, they are not tears to be regretted; if the still waters of the heart are stirred, they are troubled as by an angel, and there is healing in the troubling.

But for strictly plain, practical purposes, a diary is particularly useful. You know what you did, what you failed to do, what you purposed to do; where you went, whom you met—last Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday. You can account for your time, about which it is as necessary to be strict as about money. Carefully enough you would balance your books, and make them right to a halfpenny; it should be the same with time; and to do this, a diary is a very great help.

A diary must be kept with diligence. Entries must be made with regularity. We must not neglect it for days together, otherwise it will lose its interest and its chief utility—accuracy.

A diary must be kept with integrity. We must deal fairly with ourselves. We must set down those things which we have really done, or which we intend doing; and express those sentiments which we really feel. Nothing is so bad as a made-up diary—a daily journal full of artificialities. Honestly and uprightly let us set down the things we have done—good, bad, or indifferent—and plainly express the sentiments we feel: it is only thus that our diary can be really useful to ourselves or to anybody else.

Another excellent plan is, as we observed before, to make extracts from any book we are reading. It is also worth while to take note of any important fact we may hear of in conversation, or the name and character of any volume referring to any particular subject, or indeed of anything that may by any means be useful to us. "When found, make a note of," is excellent advice. But we may possibly make endless notes without profit, if we adopt neither plan nor arrangement with respect to them. The best thing we can do is to classify all our notes—to catalogue all our jottings. Let us have a table-book with an alphabetical arrangement, and carefully index all our entries. By this means we facilitate all our future labours, and gradually become the possessors of a great store of invaluable matter. Whenever we note down a fact, or a date, or an extract, we enter it at the same time in our index, and whenever we want to find whether we have anything in our note-book bearing on any given subject, we have simply to turn to our index and ascertain without any difficulty. It will be obvious to our readers that a plan is really useful.

In our readings, also, a capital plan for thoroughly mastering the contents of any book is to draw up a brief outline of its purpose and character. This keeps our mental machinery in motion. It is better than the routine work of copying, and is worth all the trouble which it costs. A little home-made literature of this kind cannot be too highly appreciated; it argues that we have reasoned as well as read.

But while we recommend different methods of intellectual exercise, our young readers must determine for themselves those which are adapted to their circumstances. All that we can do is to urge upon them the necessity for a plan of action, and to point out the indisputable benefit which results from well arranged method.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER XI.

TO CORRESPONDENTS ON THE SUBJECT OF THE "FRENCH LESSONS."—We heartily thank the students who have so favourably received our endeavours to instruct them in the French language, and we hope they will consider the addition of the exercises, with the key, or corrigé, as an important addition and improvement. We would willingly accede to the request of some of our readers, to continue the spelling of the French sounds, but not only would our doing so oblige us to exceed our limits, but the previous explanation of the sounds of the letters, and also of that of letters combined, should enable pupils to be independent of constant assistance in the way of pronunciation. Nevertheless, we are aware that great difficulties are experienced by some beginners in the French language, and, therefore, to meet the requirements of some without retarding the progress of others, a regular system of pronunciation, entering into very ample detail, has been added. This system does not interfere with, nor shorten the length of the lessons; they consist, as before, of conversation, rules, illustrations, vocabulary, and dialogue. The system we allude to will speak for itself. But the part offered to our readers with this day's lesson, can hardly be called the commencement of it, being rather an introduction to the commencement, than the commencement itself. Nevertheless the attentive perusal of this introduction is perfectly necessary to elucidate what is to follow.

"GEORGE," said Robert, as he settled to his French studies, "do you mean that I should continue writing out the sentences that I learn by heart, now that you leave me an exercise to write in your absence?"

"Yes, I wish you to write out the 'Voyage à Paris' by heart, when you find time to do so," said George; "but if you are obliged to neglect writing the dialogue or the exercise, I would sooner you neglected the dialogue, provided you learnt it thoroughly by heart. The exercises require great attention, and, for your own sake, I beg you will write them as much as possible without the assistance of the 'corrigé,' or key, by which I mean the whole exercise written in correct French. Now, although by means of this 'corrigé' you are enabled to become partly your own instructor, I should like you always to show me your exercise as you wrote and corrected it in the first instance. The number of corrections will be to me one test of the progress you are making. And now for some rules," said the teacher.

"The variations in articles are regulated in the French language by three considerations, their gender, number, and case. Gender is in French either masculine or feminine. Number, either singular or plural. The cases are four in number, for we moderns do not consider the vocative and ablative as distinct cases. The nominative simply names a thing; the genitive or possessive marks possession; the dative indicates a movement towards a thing; and the accusative or objective shows the object of an action. All this is rather vague until brought into practice, but with practice you will easily understand the nature of cases. The variations caused by cases are termed declensions. To-day you shall decline, in French, the definite article (the), in the masculine and feminine gender, and in the singular and plural number."

	SINGULAR.		PLURAL.	English.
Nom.	Mas.	Fem.
Gen.	du	de la	les	the
Dat.	au	à la	des	of the
Acc.	le	la	aux	to the
			les	the

"Before a word beginning with a vowel, the definite article is in the nominative (l'); in the genitive, (de l'); in the dative, (à l'); and in the accusative, (l'); and here's one comfort for you, Robert, the definite article is the same in the singular both for masculine and feminine nouns, supposing they begin with a vowel. For plural nouns beginning with a vowel, the definite article is written exactly as it is for nouns beginning with a consonant, but (according to a rule already given) the final consonant of the article is sounded. The indefinite article (a) has, of course, no plural, therefore you will only write the singular in its different cases, and in the masculine and feminine."

	Mas.	Fem.	English.
Nom.	un	une	a
Gen.	d'un	d'une	of a
Dat.	à un	à une	to a
Acc.	un	une	a

"You already know that by a literal translation of French into English you would not produce good French sentences, but the exercises you are now engaged in writing will teach you not only the variations of the parts of speech, but the genius or idiom of the French language. Thus, in the exercise you are to prepare for me for the next lesson, you will be able to practise your ear in the right use, or correct omission of the article."

1. Do you know these proverbs? Poverty is no crime; (connaissez-vous ces proverbes? pauvreté n'est pas vice; m. content is the greatest blessing. 2. Fifty men accompanied m. plus grand des biens. m. hommes (I accompanied him in his flight. 3. The two men who killed him (pagèrent) dans sa fuite. f. hommes qui (le tuèrent) died in misery. 4. God is the Supreme Being who moururent de misère. f. Dieu (être suprême) qui governs the world. 5. I (set out) for Paris to-morrow. gouverne monde. m. pars demain. 6. Venus was the goddess of beauty. 7. Napoleon and déesse beauté. f.

- Alexander the Great are the greatest monarchs who have Alexandre grand plus grands monarques qui aient ever reigned. 8. What a difference between the worship of jamais existé. quelle culte m. the God of the Christians and that of the gods of the Dieu m. Chrétiens m. celui dieux m. Pagans! 9. The Pagans had a great number of gods and Payens! m. Payens grand nombre m. dieux demi-gods. 10. Come (and see me) on Monday or Thursday. demi-dieux. venez (me voir) Lundi m. Mardi m. 11. September and October are two fine months in France. Septembre Octobre beaux mois m. en — f. 12. The works of Dante are not better written than those of ouvrages Dante mieux écrits que ceux Tasso. 13. How many years have you lived in France? Tasse. combien années vécu — ? 14. She has as much wit as you, and more judgment than your brother. 15. A great number of people were killed notre frère. grand nombre m. personnes tuées yesterday. 16. Many women (get married) without knowing bien femmes (se marient) savoir how or why. 17. Several young ladies have told me that ni jeunes personnes f. (m'on dit) que you hated marriage. 18. Several of my friends have left détestiez mariage. m. mes amis m. sont partis for America.

CORRIGÉ.

1. Connaissez-vous ces proverbes? Pauvreté n'est pas vice; contentement est le plus grand des biens. 2. Cinq-vingt hommes l'accompagnèrent dans sa fuite. 3. Les deux hommes qui le tuèrent moururent de misère. 4. Dieu est l'être suprême qui gouverne le monde. 5. Je pars demain pour Paris. 6. Vénus était la déesse de la beauté. 7. Napoléon et Alexandre le grand sont les plus grands monarques qui aient jamais existé. 8. Quelle différence entre le culte du Dieu des Chrétiens et celui des dieux des Payens. 9. Les Payens avaient un grand nombre de dieux et de demi-dieux. 10. Venez me voir Lundi ou Mardi. 11. Septembre et Octobre sont deux beaux mois en France. 12. Les ouvrages du Dante ne sont pas mieux écrits que ceux du Tasse. 13. Combien d'années avez-vous vécu en France? 14. Elle a autant d'esprit que vous, et plus de jugement que votre frère. 15. Un grand nombre de personnes furent tuées hier. 16. Bien des femmes se marient sans savoir ni comment ni pourquoi. 17. Plusieurs jeunes personnes m'ont dit que vous détestiez le mariage. 18. Plusieurs de mes amis sont partis pour l'Amérique.

"The vocabulary follows next, Robert," observed George; "and, in fact, it must conclude this lesson, for those declensions have taken up a long time."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
The ocean	L'océan (m)
The sea	La mer (f)
A bay	Une baie (f)
A gulf	Un golfe (m)
A lake	Un lac (m)
A river	Un fleuve (m)
A mouth	Une embouchure (f)
An arm of the sea	Un bras de mer (m)
A dike	Une digue (f)
A ford	Un gué (m)
A sluice	Une écluse (f)
A sewer	Un égout (m)
A tide	Une marée (f)
The port	Le port (m)
A spring	Une source (f)
A torrent	Un torrent (m)
The waves	Les vagues (f pl)

ON FRENCH PRONUNCIATION.

"The French alphabet is composed of twenty-five letters; a, b, c, d, e, f, g, h, i, j, k, l, m, n, o, p, q, r, s, t, u, v, x, y, z.

W does not belong to the French language; if it is sometimes used in the orthography of some foreign names, it is only in order to preserve to those names their nationality, and we recommend you to give that letter the same sound that it has in the language from which the name is derived.

These twenty-five letters are divided into consonants and vowels.

The vowels are five in number; a, e, i, o, u. The letter y is sometimes considered as a vowel, sometimes as a diphthong.

These letters are called vowels, because they are sounded by a simple emission of the voice. But these five or six vowels combined together, and with some of the consonants, produce other simple sounds, which, preceded or followed by the consonants, compose the musical vocabulary of the French language.

These simple sounds are twenty in number, as follows:

a, é, e, è, ê, i, î, o, ô, u, û, eu, ei, ou, oi, an, in, on, un.

These twenty simple sounds are sometimes represented by the assemblage of other letters.

We will now examine these twenty sounds separately; and in order to enable pupils to recognise them when represented by other letters, and to refer to the similar sounds in the English language, we will mark them by numbers from one to nineteen, one of the numbers being used twice, as may be seen in the following list:

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15 16 17 18 19
a, é, e, è, ê, i, î, o, ô, u, û, eu, ei, ou, oi, an, in, on, un.

When any vowel or consonant should be mute, it will be marked with a cipher (0).

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON X.

THE INCLINED PLANE.

255. What does Fig. 20 show?—An Inclined Plane.

Fig. 20.

256. Is any advantage gained by the use of the inclined plane?—The weight of the body is greater than the power necessary to draw it up the inclined plane; and many times greater if the slope is very gradual.

257. Mention a familiar case in which the inclined plane is usefully applied.—It is applied in rolling barrels of flour up a sloping plank into a wagon; also in lowering hogsheads of sugar, or molasses, by means of an inclined plank, into a cellar.

258. Mention other instances of the practical application of the inclined plane.—Inclined planes on railroads; also the inclined ways down which a new ship is launched.

THE WEDGE.

259. What is a WEDGE?—A triangular block of wood or iron.

260. For what is it used?—To split large blocks of wood or stone, to separate bodies that are firmly pressed together, &c.

261. What is the power?—It is usually a blow from a hammer, applied to the head of the wedge.

262. Is a blow commonly more effective than a steady pressure?—It is; a moderate blow from a hammer will drive a nail, but a heavy weight placed on the head of the nail will scarcely force it in.

263. Where do the resistances act that are overcome by the blow given to the head of the wedge?—Against the two sides, and by pressure.

264. Mention an instance of a special application of the wedge.—Ships are sometimes raised in docks by driving wedges under their keels.

265. Give another instance.—The wedge is used with great effect in the Wedge Press, to extract oil from the seeds of certain vegetables.

266. On what principle do all cutting instruments, as chisels, knives, razors, saws, &c., act?—On the principle of the wedge.

Fig. 21.

THE SCREW.

267. What does Fig. 22 represent?—A Screw.
 268. What is the projecting part that winds spirally round the upright cylinder called?—The Thread of the screw.

Fig. 22.

269. Where is the power applied?—Generally at the end of a long handspike, inserted in one end of the screw.

270. Where does the power take effect against the resistance?—At the other end of the screw.

271. What is the nut?—It is a hollow cylindrical piece within which the screw turns. It is firmly fastened to a frame, and has a spiral groove cut round its interior, into which the thread of the screw fits.

272. When the screw is turned round once, how far does the end advance?—Through a space equal to the distance between two contiguous threads.

273. Does the power at the end of the lever act through a much greater distance than the resistance at the end of the screw?—It does; and this shows that the screw must be a very powerful machine.

274. What else does it show?—That to obtain the greatest gain of power the threads of the screw must be close together, and the lever as long as possible.

275. Mention some of the more important applications of the screw.—The Screw Press, represented in Fig. 22. The screw is also used in elevating buildings, and raising ships in docks.

276. What are some of the purposes to which this powerful press is applied?—To express juices from fruits, and oil from seeds of vegetables.

277. For what other purposes is it used?—To stamp coins, and to compress paper, cotton, and other soft and bulky materials, into a compact mass for more convenient transportation.

COMBINATIONS OF THE MECHANICAL POWERS.

278. What is the essential construction of the larger and more powerful machines in use?—The different mechanical powers are variously combined in their construction; machines of enormous power are thus obtained.

279. What does Fig. 23 represent?—A combination of the screw with the wheel and axle, called the Endless Screw.

Fig. 23.

280. How does it work?—By turning the winch the screw revolves, its threads press against the teeth of the wheel, and cause it to turn and draw up the weight.

281. How great a weight could a man raise with the endless screw, properly constructed?—A weight of several tons.

282. What other combinations are in common use?—Very powerful machines for raising heavy weights, as blocks of stone used in building, and large iron castings, are formed by combining the wheel and axle with pulleys.

283. In the working of all such powerful machines does the weight rise very slowly?—It does; just in proportion to the power gained.

284. Is it possible, in the nature of things, to realise perpetual motion: that is, to construct a machine which will run of itself for any length of time, raise weights, and do other work without the aid of any external force?—Perpetual motion is a mechanical impossibility. A machine is merely the means by which some mechanical agent does work, and cannot possibly do any more work than the agent does in keeping it in motion.

285. Is there not, in fact, a certain amount of the moving power always wasted in the working of a machine?—There is; the friction and other incidental resistances generally consume a good deal of the working power.

286. In the machinery of mills and factories, is it the object to overcome great resistances?—It is not; but to obtain a variety of movements from the one motion of the point at which the propelling power acts.

THE PENDULUM.

287. What is a pendulum?—It is a heavy body suspended from a fixed point, and swinging to and fro, or oscillating, by its own weight.

288. How does the pendulum measure off time?—By its oscillations it divides time into equal parts.

289. Into what equal parts does the ordinary clock pendulum divide time?—Into seconds. It is said to beat seconds.

290. How many seconds are there in a day?—86,400.

291. By what is the wheelwork of a clock kept in motion?—Usually by a weight suspended by a cord that passes over one of the wheels.

292. Suppose the pendulum of a clock were to be removed, what would happen?—The clock would run down very rapidly.

293. What, then, is the office of the pendulum?—It checks the movement of the train of wheels, and causes the wheel with which it is immediately connected to revolve at a certain rate.

294. At what rate does that wheel revolve?—So as to make one complete turn in exactly one minute, or sixty seconds; the seconds hand is carried round by it.

295. What effect has the shortening of a pendulum upon its rate of motion?—It makes it oscillate faster.

296. What is the length of the seconds pendulum?—39½ inches, or about 3¼ feet.

297. What is the length of the pendulum of a mantel-clock, that beats half seconds?—One quarter of the length of the seconds pendulum.

298. How long must a pendulum be to make one oscillation in a minute?—More than two miles long.

299. What is the moving power of a watch?—A spiral steel spring, called the main spring, coiled up within a small drum. The inner end is firmly fastened, and the outer end is attached to the interior of the drum.

300. How does it move the wheels?—It gradually uncoils, carries the little drum round and all the wheels connected with it.

301. How is the drum connected with the first wheel?—By means of a chain that passes from the one to the other.

302. What regulates the motion of the wheels of a watch, in place of the pendulum?—An oscillating wheel, called the balance wheel.

303. What moves the balance wheel?—A delicate spiral spring, called the hair spring.

304. What makes it oscillate to and fro?—When the spring unwinds it winds up again, or passes to the other side of its natural position, and that brings it back.

I CAN'T MAKE UP MY MIND.

O, WOULD I were a married man,
 My house all full of glee;
 A smiling partner by my side,
 And children round my knee.
 The cause why I'm a bachelor
 Not hard it is to find;
 The fact is, that I really can't—
 I can't make up my mind!

There's Juliana Lilywhite—
 I know that she would drop
 Into my loving arms, if I
 Would but the question "pop;"
 With Carry Cowslip, too, I should
 No difficulty find;
 She would not hesitate, but I—
 I can't make up my mind!

There's Angelina Marigold,
 Who would with me elope,
 If to her window I would fix
 A ladder made of rope!
 She's gentle and she's beautiful,
 Her purse is richly lined;
 And she'd have me in spite of "pa," but I—
 I can't make up my mind!

Now, when I walk along the street,
 Girls' roguish looks I catch,
 As with a sneer they say "There goes
 A rusty-fusty loach!"
 Well, I'll resolve this very day
 Some sort of wife to find;
 I'll wed—I think I will—O, dear,
 I can't make up my mind!

ALUMINUM.—An important discovery, according to a contemporary, has just been made at Florence; a simple workman having found out the means of making aluminum in a manner much less expensive than has hitherto been known.

THE FLOOD-LOCKED PRISON.

A NARROW ESCAPE.

I NEVER saw a man yet," said my friend, "who hadn't, at some period of his life, had one or more very narrow escapes from death. 'An inch farther this way,' or, 'an inch farther that way,' and death would have been certain. Miracles of preservation form part of the experience of all; and, when we consider how slight a cause often leads to fatal results, it is no wonder that the theory of miraculous interposition is so universally cherished. I have had a good many narrow escapes in my day, but I think the smallest chance I ever had of preserving my life occurred last summer. It's the only time that I really gave up all hope, and prepared to die.

"Charley Poole and myself were spending a few weeks in Conway, New Hampshire, stopping with that prince of landlords, Jonathan Dow, of the Conway House, and amusing ourselves as opportunity offered. Our chief source of amusement, however, was in trout-fishing upon Swift River. This is, as its name indicates, a wild, dashing stream, taking its rise among the mountains, and emptying itself into the Saco not far from our hotel. One morning Charley and I set out for a day's sport. We rode up about six miles, and having left our team in charge of a farmer who lived near the river, we walked up some four miles further, intending to fish down to this point. When we reached the place where we were to commence fishing, I waded across, thus taking one side of the stream, while my companion took the other.

"We had been fishing an hour or so, when I discovered that huge clouds were rolling up over the mountains with every prospect of a shower. But I was too busy to think of rain then. The trout were biting freely, and I brought them ashore almost as fast as I could take care of them. At last the rain came, sweeping down like a cloud from the dark slopes of old Mote, and I was forced to find shelter. Charley had gone up into the woods on his side, but I found a snug place close at hand. Not a dozen yards from where I stood when the rain began to pour down, was a large rock projecting from the bank, beneath which was a cover as good as a house; and under it I crept.

"The river's bank was high and steep here, presenting an almost perpendicular surface of hard, coarse marl and gravel. The rock which served me for a roof seemed to be a projection from a ledge, as the bottom upon which I sat was of solid rock, extending for some distance above and below me. As I gazed around I imagined that this place had been fashioned on purpose for a shelter. The overhanging rock was so low that no rain could beat in upon me, and then there was a sort of rocky barrier all about me, which prevented the little muddy streams that began to run down the bank from pouring in upon my seat. This barrier had been formed in part by the wearing away of the surface within, where a furious eddy probably worked in seasons of freshet, and partly by other rocks which had been deposited there by the spring-time torrents.

"The rain poured down with increasing fury, and at the end of half an hour I began to think of leaving my shelter and finding some place where I could cross the river, for I knew that if it held out much longer all chances of crossing would be gone, as the stream always swelled rapidly when it rained heavily upon the mountains. I was pondering upon the subject of crawling out, and had just made up my mind to do so, when I heard a low, rumbling sound over my head. I looked up, and saw the rock above me in motion. I dared not attempt to spring out, for I might be caught by the falling mass, so I started quickly to the extreme back of the retreat, and as I did so, the ponderous roof came down with a dull, heavy crash. It had rested, near its centre, upon the rock which formed the rear wall of the corner, but the projecting portion was by far the thickest and heaviest. That portion of the bank which had held it in its former place had become loosened by the streams which ran down its surface, and the ground had thus given up its hold, and let the rock follow its own inclination of gravity.

"As soon as I found that the rock had stopped, and was likely to fall no further, I began to think again of getting out; and when I had fairly recovered my senses, which had become somewhat scattered by the catastrophe, I crawled forward; but—there was a worse fate than fright in store for me. I was shut in! Not an aperture could I find large enough to put my head through! The barrier which had kept back the muddy streams from the bank from pouring in upon me now served as a wall, and the heavy roof rested upon it so evenly that all loopholes for escape were stopped. I tried to move those rocks which were detached from the ledge, but I might as well have put my strength against a mountain. I soon convinced myself that no power of mine could set me free from my prison, and I then began to cry out for help. I hoped that my companion might hear me, though it was hoping against hope, for the river was roaring with a sound that completely drowned my voice as it left my lips.

"But the sum of terror was not yet complete. As I lay upon my hard bed, almost exhausted, the water began to pour in upon me through a chink at the upper side of the cover. At first I thought it was from the bank, but I soon found out my mistake. It came from the river! The stream was rising rapidly! The rain was falling in torrents, and I knew that ere long the swelling tide must increase fourfold. I had seen the river fill its banks in six hours, rising as many feet in that time. My place of retreat was not a foot above the level of low water, and I had not over three feet of room from the bottom to the top. The water must have risen nearly two feet already, else it could not have come in over the barrier. Another foot, and I should be lost!

"In came the torrent, dashing and whirling about me, and in ten minutes the water within was level with the water without. There was only about twelve inches now between the water and the rock overhead. I was upon my knees, and with the top of my head against the solid roof, the flood reached to within two inches of my chin. I could look out through one of the apertures, and see the foaming, hissing torrent as it dashed on, bearing trees and bushes, and logs upon its murky bosom; and I felt, my life rushing on with it. I screamed with all my power—screamed till I was hoarse—and then I madly braced myself against the ponderous rock that had fallen down upon me. I strained every nerve and every muscle—I tore my clothing from my back—I bruised my flesh—but all to no purpose. I was shut in, as though by a solid rock, and Prometheus himself was not more securely bound.

"When this paroxysm was past I began to reflect. The water was now up to my chin, and its rise was increasing in rapidity. Thousands of new brooklets were finding their way to the river, and I knew that in a few minutes more the flood would reach to the roof! I felt that I must die! It was a hard thought, but I could not escape it. The thunder roared and rumbled over the mountain tops, but the lightning would not strike for me. I prayed that a bolt might shiver my prison bars, and then I prayed that it might strike me. Anything would have been preferable to the lingering death before me. Finally the water reached my lips, and I turned my face upward; but the respite was short. The water gathered about my ears, and a thousand torrents seemed dashing upon my brain. The roar was intense beyond conception. There was a rolling as of ten thousand thunders upon the sensitive membrane of the ear, and I grew dizzy with the sound. But when the flood reached to my lips, I started back to life. In a few moments more all would be over. I cannot tell you all the thoughts that flashed through my mind then. I can only tell the final thought. It was of one I loved with all my soul, and of the two little prattling beings who might soon be fatherless. I know that I had cried aloud in my agony—pronouncing the names of my wife and children—and that I had asked God to keep and bless them. I had pressed my hand upon my bursting heart, and was just ready to sink back into my watery grave, when there came a shock that made the solid rock tremble. I felt the ponderous mass above me in motion, and in a moment more it was swayed from its position, and I leaped up.

"The furious torrent hurled me against the rock; but this sudden diversion in my favour recalled all my scattered energies, and I cast about me for support. I found that the rock which had served me for a roof and for a prison-bar, and against which the current now held me, had been hurled over upon its side, and was there stationary. I managed to climb to the top of it, and from thence I reached the bank, and clambered up; and, as soon as I gained a place of safety, I sank down utterly exhausted.

"When I revived, the rain had ceased falling, and the dark clouds were rolling away to the eastward, but the torrent below me was roaring and dashing as madly as ever. And I was able to see now to what I must have owed my escape. When the projecting rock under which I had sought shelter lost its hold in the bank, it must have swayed down the stream so far that it was very nearly balanced upon the rocks that formed the lower wall, or barrier, of my prison. As the water reached it, which it of course did when my last breathing space was gone, one of those huge logs, which came sweeping down by hundreds, must have been hurled against it with a force sufficient to topple it over. Those who have seen large logs borne upon the bosom of our mountain torrents, know with what marvellous force they strike anything that comes in their way.

"I was lame and sore, but I was able to walk, and finally I started for the hotel. I had a hard road to travel, through the woods and wild pastures, but I reached home at length, just as the sun was going down, and found Charley, with two or three others, upon the point of starting off in search of me. He had known nothing of my danger, and aware that I could not cross the river after it began to rise, he had supposed I would walk home upon the other side at my leisure; so he felt no concern until the day began to wear away without my return. However, I was safe, and under the kind care of my good host and his estimable lady I soon regained my strength, and was able to go up Swift River after trout again."

ANCHORED.

As, after sailing over stormy seas,
A ship, full freighted from a foreign shore,
Comes pressing landward in the freshened breeze,
Where swarthy headlands breast the billows' roar;

And in its sea-sought anchorage calmly swings,
When graybeard Twilight glooms the murmuring bay,
Folting to rest its long-exerted wings,
Kissed by the cool lips of the ocean spray—

So has my soul at length its anchorage found
In the still harbour of a sweet content,
Land-locked from fears that beat with ceaseless sound
On coasts foam-flecked with surges chill and spent.

No fretting cares disturb its sheltered calm,
Or break the silence of its full repose;
The breeze blows sweetly over beds of balm,
And soothes for ever old memorial woes.

And as the sailor in the harbour dreams,
In silent watches, of his venturesome life,
And in the swells of far-off music seems
To hear the songs once wooing him to strife

So, floating safely on the sheltered sea,
Floated by the lazy ebbing of the tide,
I dream of all my life had longed to be,
In vain ambition of its restless pride.

I dream of all the bright alluring aims
That gleamed from far upon its hither way;
Yet, ever faded, as the star whose flames
Pale in the brilliance of the coming day;

The hopes that flashed athwart the western sky,
When life and love walked proudly hand in hand,
Yet ever sank before the eager eye,
Like looming castles in a mirage land.

I drink again the melody that floats,
I seem to feel the odorous breezes blow,
I hear the we come of a thousand throats—
But in fruition do not long to go.

The calm of manhood lulls the wild desires
That stirred me once a tender-hearted boy;
But cannot still the trembling of the lyres
That flood the soul with memories of joy.

In wayside harbours of life's quietude,
Each idle wave that plashes on the shore,
Thrills with old songs the tranquil thoughts that brood
On buried fancies soul endured once more.

The past is past, yet to our life belongs
The fairest hues that made its past divine,
The full-toned music of its sweetest songs,
The warm, rich splendour of its summer shine.

DOMESTIC EXPENSES.

EVERY wife knows her husband's income, or ought to know it. That knowledge should be the guide of her conduct. A clear understanding respecting domestic expenses is necessary to the peace of every dwelling. If it be little, "Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith." If it be ample, let it be enjoyed with all thankfulness. We believe that partners in privation are more to each other than partners in wealth. Those who have suffered together love more than those who have rejoiced together. Love is "the drop of honey in the draught of gall." When the wife, seeing her duty, has made up her mind to this, she will brighten her little home with smiles that will make it a region of perpetual sunshine. She will never even imply a wish for things which are the appendages of wealth. She knows they could only be purchased at a cost from which she turns shudderingly. Following with the acuteness of a quickened affection every turn of her husband's thoughts, if she should see that he leans towards the world's good things, that he gives orders to his wine-merchant beyond the bounds of their enforced temperate indulgence, that city luxuries are sent home to her, then let her bestir herself for his safety and her own, for they are indissolubly united. If he bring her home expensive boxes of sweetmeats, half-a-dozen packages of French gloves, or even a half-crown bouquet, then let her remember that these things are the beginning of evil. Let her take her woman's power into her own hands, and by all the gentle arts of love, and the powerful arguments of truth, let her win him back to contentment with the lot that Heaven has bestowed, and so forcing him to acknowledge that its best blessing is his wife.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL.

ARGYLL is a title famous in history. The memory of the heroic and unfortunate earl, who figured so conspicuously in the great civil war, is tinged with melancholy, on account of his unhappy fate. He was arraigned, after the restoration of Charles II., for having connived at the usurpation, and was deprived of the benefit of those acts of indemnity which had been issued; he was condemned on the evidence of private letters, treacherously revealed by General Monk, and was sent to the block, where he suffered with a courage and resolution worthy of his former conduct. The king was afterwards so sensible of the iniquity of this sentence, that he restored the estate to Lord Lorn, the son of the Marquis.

In the troublous times of James II., Archibald, grandson of the Earl of Argyll who suffered in the previous reign, took up arms against the arbitrary enactments of that monarch; but he met with inadequate support. The greater part of those who joined him were his own vassals, and the courage of these was but the result of that sense of clanishness which bound them to their lord. The expedition was unsuccessful. He had under his command a body of about 2,500 men, but was soon involved in inextricable difficulties. His arms and ammunition were seized, his provisions and convoys intercepted, his men deserted, he was harassed on both sides, in front and rear, his stringent efforts failed to keep the poor remnant of his army together, it diminished daily, passed away like a mist on the mountains, and Argyll fell into the hands of his enemies, was conducted to Edinburgh, where, after experiencing many indignities with a gallant spirit, he was publicly executed. He suffered upon an old sentence of attainder which had been passed against him; and as that was universally admitted to be unjust, his death was regarded as a real murder.

The spirit of the sire lived in his son. When James II. was driven from the throne, and William of Orange was welcomed on the English shores as the friend and champion of Protestant liberty, there was not a sterner foe to the Jacobite nor a firmer friend to the reigning sovereign than the Earl of Argyll. And the intrepid bravery of the Campbells, with their chief Argyll at their head, was enlisted on the royal side, and was exerted in those great continental wars which were fomented by the fourteenth Louis of France. The earl, raised to the ducal rank, distinguished himself under Marlborough in Flanders, and was appointed governor of Minorca and Gibraltar.

The dukes of Argyll (since the creation of the title there have been eight in all) have continued to occupy a distinguished and honourable position. As the events of history have produced changes in society, and new circumstances have called for new efforts, the house of Argyll has acted its part in the great work of social progress. When that work had to be accomplished with the sword, the Campbells were ready to use it or to perish by it. Political problems need no such rough solution now; but the spirit which animated them animates them still; and in the person of the present noble duke we have an example of how much good service a nobleman can render by tongue and pen.

The Duke of Argyll has entered boldly and enthusiastically into those questions most important to Scotland and to the United Kingdom. He has devoted considerable time, indefatigable labour, and consummate skill to the elucidation of that controversy which rent the church of Scotland, and threatened more disastrous results than were happily realised. It is not often that a duke becomes the exponent of differences in ecclesiastical government; that he appears before the world as a polemical student; but such is the case with the Duke of Argyll. His largest and most celebrated production is "Presbytery Examined." This was published in 1848. It clearly shows the thorough acquaintance which his

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, K.T., P.C. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

Grace has with his subject; that he has spared no pains and feared no laborious exertion to trace the history of the progress of presbytery in Scotland upwards to the days of John Knox. The style is clear, the reasoning cogent, and the text not overburdened with historical research. Whatever opinion may be formed of the object of the volume—and about a book which is so strong in its defence of presbytery against prelacy, variety of opinion is certain to exist—the great merit of the work as a literary production cannot be denied.

Public attention was first directed to the noble author, while as yet he was but nineteen years old, and bore the title of Marquis of Lorn. He then published a "Letter to the Peers, from a Peer's Son." In this letter he ably discussed the constitutional principles involved in the celebrated Auchterarder case—asserting the rights of the Presbyterian church against the patron and the government.

The ability which characterised this letter was more fully developed in his "Presbytery Examined," and has been shown in other than polemical discussion. Of enlarged mind and vigorous intellect; of keen judgment and cultivated taste; uniting the advantages of education with strong natural talent, the Duke of Argyll is distinguished both in literary and scientific circles. His easy, fluent, graceful, and pleasing style of address render him a favourite on the platform; and he has not thought it beneath his dignity to become lecturer at several mechanics' institutions, and so evidence his sincere and hearty sympathy with the sons of toil.

As a ready debater, he takes a considerable share in the business of the Upper House. He has held office under the Earl of Aberdeen, and in the late ministry of Lord Palmerston.

His Grace was born in the year 1823. In 1844 he married the Lady Elizabeth Georgiana Gower, eldest daughter of the Duke of Sutherland, and niece of the Earl of Carlisle. In 1847 he succeeded to the dukedom, on his father's decease; in 1851, was elected Chancellor of the University of St. Andrews; in 1852, he accepted office in the Cabinet as Lord Privy Seal, and, under Lord Palmerston, as Postmaster General; in 1854 he was elected Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow.

THE TYROL.

SWITZERLAND and the Tyrol are so closely connected that they appear to belong indissolubly to one another. They resemble each other in nearly every particular—the same scenery, the same habits, the same history, the same love of liberty: but the difference is generally admitted to be in favour of the Tyrolese.

And the tourist, rambling over the gray mountains, and through the green valleys, will find in the Tyrol much to interest and to gratify a love of the picturesque.

The locality represented in the accompanying engraving is a specimen of the magnificent scenery of the country.

The remarkable group of rocks which are seen beyond the bridge, lifting their craggy heads to the sky, form the chief feature of one of the principal valleys of the Tyrol. They are situated at a short distance from the inn at Landro, on the Ampezzo road, in Pusterthal, but are visible for miles and miles around. Seen from different points of view, they assume a variety of aspect, and have accordingly been called by every description of name which caprice could invent or which their appearance in some cases suggested. Here they are, three strong fortresses, wherein have been shut up for a thousand years three cruel barons of the olden times, whose villainy and treachery made them the terror of the neighbourhood, but who, by saint or soldier, were turned to stone as by the Gorgon's head. There they are, three castles, wherein sleep three beautiful princesses, under the spell of an enchanter's wand, waiting for the coming of some heroic youth to emancipate them from the power of the wizards. Ah! me, where is such a hero to be found? Here they are, three miraculous pieces of architecture, that at a given signal, namely, the lifting of a saint's white hand, are transformed into gorgeous cathedrals, with towers and spires innumerable, long echoing aisles, and fretted roofs and stained windows richly dight—all brilliantly illuminated, and reverberating to the intoning of ghostly priests. There, three gray masses, which we should commonly call needles, are wreathed with old legends—varied and beautiful as the clouds which are above them.

The whole district abounds in natural monuments, which have originated a host of legends; Hohlenstein, for instance, at the extremity of a valley surrounded by mountains, is one of them. One of the mountains, more brilliant in its appearance than the rest, is the subject of three or four different stories laid in the mythical age of "once upon a time." The valley of Pusterthal, though not so picturesque as the Innthal, the Etschthal, or the Stubai-thal, is yet so full of interest and beauty as amply to repay a visit, while it prepares for the more magnificent scenery of northern and western Tyrol. The Tyrol is traversed throughout its whole extent by the main ridge of the Alps, which here has some of the loftiest summits. Mount Orteler rises 12,823 feet; and the Gross Gluckner 12,567 feet above the sea level. Exclusive of this gigantic chain, an inferior ridge divides the country into three portions. Some of these extensive mountain-tracts are covered with immense glaciers—the accumulated snows of ages. The whole country is essentially mountainous. The valleys do not occupy a tenth part of its extent.

VIEW IN THE TYROL: THE THREE TOWERS.

Here, there, everywhere, rise up the granite mountains—their feet clothed with forests, their snow-crowned heads hidden in the clouds. But it is to this striking feature in its physical aspect to which the Tyrol is indebted for the preservation of its old manners and customs. The dress of the peasantry is peculiar. The men wear straw hats ornamented with ribbons and nosegays; the dress of the women consists of thick, short gowns, stockings with cross stripes, and a cap tapering in the shape of a sugar-loaf. Music and dancing, ride-shooting, and athletic exercises are the favourite amusements of the Tyrolese. They entertain a natural repugnance to the discipline of a military life, and all attempts to extend the Austrian conscription into their province have hitherto failed. They are not found in foreign armies, and their village inns have not yet become English hotels.

The Tyrol is the place to seek retirement from the noise and bustle of the modern Babylon. As yet, enterprising companies, with their diligent engineers and army of navvies, have not interlarded that country with broad and narrow gauge. Of course, the locomotive is inevitable—of course, stations and up and down lines, and telegraphs must come—of course, the day must come when tourists, arriving per express, shall be met on the Himalaya and in Central Africa; but, as yet, the Tyrol is a place for repose, where one may lead the life of a hermit, at a convenient distance from the mare magnum of the world.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,
SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER LXI.

Why mak'st thou it so strange?
She is a woman—therefore may be wooed,
She is a woman—therefore may be won.

SHAKESPEARE.

And should not this content you?
I am thy husband, and that must content you.
The Honeymoon.

To return to Lady Ada and her father—they were, as we have said, at breakfast in her boudoir when the morning papers and the post came in.

The earl seized on the Times, leaving it to Ada to open the letters and read to him any that were in any way important or interesting.

There was one in a well-known hand that sent a blush to Ada's cheek; and, fearing to betray her emotion, she slipped it quietly into her pocket, resolved to read it at her leisure, and prepared to go through many other epistles; some from the now happy tenant farmers and grateful cottagers at Pemberton; some, congratulations on the unexpected succession of her father to the title and estates of his cousin; some on matters connected with his taking his seat in the House of Lords, as soon as his health permitted. Begging letters in every variety increased twenty-fold since he had become an earl. Entreaties for his patronage from people of every rank—old college friends, barristers begging for judgeships, stipendiary magistracies, consulships; curates asking for livings; and young ladies, who had just published a poem or a novel, "feeling sure his lordship would befriend an humble votary of the muse;" then came humbler entreaties for small clerkships; every post that man could fill people seemed to think the new earl must have to bestow, and that before he had even taken his seat in the House of Lords.

It was some time before Lady Ada had waded through this mass of correspondence, and read to her father whatever she thought would interest or amuse him in the Times.

Ada had engaged, as Mrs. Golightly was pretty nearly recovered, to go with Ellen St. Ange to the ragged school that morning, and to call on poor Apple Blossom; and Lord Glenlonely, now that he no longer excited his brain and heated his blood with stimulants, was so gentle, kind, unselfish, and considerate, and as anxious as Ada herself for her performance of every Christian duty,—made no querulous objection when she rose to depart, but begged her to place near him the "Ragged School Magazine," that admirable essay by the Rev. B. Parsons called "Anti-Bacchus," and some other works on the same subject, which Jem Goodman had left with him.

Ada kissed him affectionately, and hurried to her dressing-room to put on her bonnet and shawl; but first she bolted the door, sat down, and took out the, as yet, unopened letter, the sight of which had so agitated her at breakfast.

She read, with a changing cheek, the following lines:—

"My dearest Ada!—I can no longer remain silent. I must tell you how much lovelier you are than ever, and how much more entirely than of yore I love—nay, adore you.

"It is not merely in beauty of feature, form, and colouring that you so far surpass the picture painted on the memory of my heart, and cherished there; but it seems to me, oh, Ada! that there is a holy, a heavenly purity, an angelic sweetness, a muse-like grace, a queenly dignity about you now, which I never noticed before.

"If I were a painter, Ada, I could transmit your face to posterity as the most perfect of Madonnas. I love even that virtuous enthusiasm (which I own I cannot share) which lights up your lovely features when you speak of the ragged schools which you adorn by your presence, and the temperance movement which you advocate with such enchanting eloquence.

"Ada, it were affectation in me to pretend that I think you do not care for me. The roses that suffused your lovely face, and the tears that stood in your dear haunting eyes when we met again, convinced me that I was forgiven, but not forgotten.

"Ada, we loved each other in childhood; we loved in youth. Let me lay my proposals before your parents.

"My brother, who admires you beyond any other woman, will enable me to make settlements that prudence will not disapprove; and, with regard to your new interests, or rather fancies—I will not call them whims, Ada,—I can only say that I will not oppose—at least, not seriously—any pursuit that interests you, although I do hope, with your mother, who, as you know, dislikes both ragged schools and this temperance movement, that, as a wife, you will have other and deeper interests, and will find no time for the occupations which, Lady Glenlonely tells me, now almost engross you.

"I love your enthusiasm, Ada; only I hope to turn it into other channels.

"At any rate, be sure I shall never oppose your wishes; and that, if you agree to be mine, your happiness will be my chief study, and that I shall devote my life to you only.

"I am, dear friend of the long ago! beautiful and beloved Ada!

"Your devoted

"GERALD ST. MAUR.

"P.S.—I have thought, as you could not leave town, that I could not serve and please you better, dearest Ada, than by devoting myself to your mother, who Dr. M'Mode thinks may safely return the day after tomorrow, when I shall have the pleasure of escorting her to Carlton-terrace. In the meantime—if you are generous, you will not keep me in suspense—how shall I pass the time till the post brings me a letter from Ada?"

"Poor Gerald!" said Ada to herself; "he has little notion what that letter will be! I will not keep him in suspense! He was once very dear to me! He is still more to me than any other; but the great work in which I am engaged is dearer far. It is not the whim of a moment, it is the object of a life; and I will put on no shackles that can impede me in running the race that is set before me!

Ada sat down to her desk and wrote—

"My dear Gerald,—Old friendship sanctions my addressing you thus, and indeed you have ever been dear to me since we were children together. You are dear to me still, and will ever be so; but I am thankful to say that other and nobler objects are much dearer to me than you.

"What you and my mother call fancies, you had almost said 'whims,' are the greatest and holiest, and, I may add, dearest objects of my life."

"I have put my hand to the plough, and I shall not look back. I have no wish to look back on those dreary wastes, rank with the weeds of selfishness, vanity, and sloth, where once I stagnated and pined. I have work to do now—strengthening, inspiring, engrossing work! the soil to till, the seed to sow, the rank weeds to root out, the golden grain to gather in.

"The soil, Gerald, is the hearts—the little hearts—of my pupils at the ragged school; the seed is the word of God, which it is my privilege to be allowed to sow; the rank weeds are the sins, the faults, the foibles that will creep in; the golden grain is the faith of which good works is the evidence; and of such faith so evidenced, I have many touching proofs in the little ones whom I love to teach—the lambs of Christ's fold. The ragged school, then, for the benefit of the children of the poor—and the temperance movement for the salvation of their parents, are now the great objects of the oncelistless, aimless, weary life of your early friend.

"I could give my hand to no man who would not be a co-worker, a zealous co-worker with me in these great and holy causes.

"I could not swear to love, honour, and obey a man whose pursuits and ambition seem to me so paltry and so mean compared to my own. Not to oppose would not suffice in my husband—he must entitle himself to my reverence by exceeding me in zeal. Judge, then, what chance you have, and turn your thoughts to some one whose tastes, pursuits, and objects are more in harmony with your own.

"I thank you for all your kindness to my mother, and I shall ever welcome you with pleasure as an early friend. Any closer union would only be productive of misery to both.

"What would be my despair were I bound to a man like you—with talents so great, position so available, eloquence so enthralling—who would not enter parliament, where he might be a champion of the poor, because he did not see what good it would do himself!—and who would lounge away at clubs and parties the time that, well-spent, might save not only his own soul, but the souls and bodies of his poorer brethren. How I should blush for him, and for myself!

"I am ever, dear Gerald,

"Your true friend,

"ADA PEMBERTON."

This letter sealed and despatched, Ada drove off in search of Ellen St. Ange, whom she found at Mrs. Golightly's apartments in Jermyn-street. The strong-minded woman was quite herself again, and was correcting the last proofs of her pamphlet, which she had got printed at her own expense, and which was to be had of herself only, at No. —, Jermyn-street, St. James's.

Mrs. Golightly was in very high spirits, and remarked to Ada that "the desire accomplished is sweet to the soul," that she was perfectly satisfied with her own work, and that she had very little doubt the public would purchase the pamphlet out of curiosity; but that as long as they did purchase it, and read it, her object was gained. Women must at least look into a pamphlet which so nearly concerned themselves, and she had very little doubt that in many a home where groaned the beaten drudge, or lolled the over-dressed doll, a sense of her rights and wrongs would kindle in the breast of many a true woman, and her social regeneration and emancipation would commence.

Mrs. Golightly much wished to read to Lady Ada and Ellen St. Ange the whole of her pamphlet in its now complete form, but Ada could not be persuaded to stay, she longed to be at the ragged school; she was pining with anxiety to hear how the wretched Ben Darrell bore his terrible sentence of fast approaching death. She wanted to see poor Apple Blossom, and hear from her how the pain she had complained of was, and what had become of Bob Blossom. But above all she longed to press sweet little Hope to her bosom, to kiss her cherub cheeks, see the soft light of her upraised blue eyes, stroke her rich locks of silky gold, hear her pretty little prattle, so wise in its simplicity, and tell her what a good child she was for her love to poor Apple Blossom.

CHAPTER LXII.

O, beware, my lord, of jealousy:
It is the green-ey'd monster, which doth make
The meat it feeds on.—SHAKESPEARE.

And to be wrath with what we love,
Doth work like madness in the brain.

COLERIDGE.

As soon as Bob Blossom came to himself, he was required to give his own address, and that of his more unfortunate companion in guilt and in misfortune, Sam Slybrute.

So far no one knew who they were. The landlord, whose cries had summoned the police to the cellars into which these wretched men had fallen, knew them only as two of the working men who occasionally squandered their hard earnings on liquid fire, or gave their money for that which is not bread (although there are some doctors who maintain that good beer is liquid bread).

It was not at his house that Bob Blossom and Sam Slybrute habitually boozed, and, therefore, he knew very little about them, nor had he any very kindly feeling towards them; for he was quite sure they squandered in strong drink a great deal more than ever crossed his itching palm, or that of his smart wife, and he grudged every sixpence that went into the till of any other publican, out of the pocket of any working man who had ever tasted his liquor.

As both Bob Blossom and Sam Slybrute were perfectly insensible when they were placed on stretchers and taken to the London Hospital, and, as the police knew nothing about them, it was impossible to apprise their unhappy wives. But both Apple Blossom and the once pretty tidy Kitty Slybrute were tolerably sure, in their own minds, that their husbands were indulging in their now habitual intemperance, and they did not endure the agonies of terror and suspense, which they would certainly have felt had these men been the kind, considerate, and sober husbands they had been before they had been hardened by habitual sin, brutalised by swinish excess, and soddened and stupefied by drink.

With regard to Slybrute, he was become so savage, so sarcastic, so grumbling, and so brutal at home, though once a pleasant fellow (a little fond of quizzing, but only pleasantly so), that Mrs. Slybrute, who had been recently confined, found his absence an inexpressible relief.

How can men expect that they can be really welcome in homes, where their brutality fills the hearts of their wives and little ones with terror. The smallest child sent supperless to bed, to cry itself to sleep knows, if reason has dawned on its mind at all, that "Dad at the public" is drinking away the money that ought to have fed itself, its famished mammy, and its little brothers and sisters.

The children of the very poor are very precocious, for they are, of course, by the smallness of the miserable tenement (called home) compelled to hear and see all that passes.

Surely the little one begins to look with inward horror, dread, and disapproval on the drunken, cruel father, and no drunken father was more cruel or more dreaded than the gigantic, savage, and malignant Sam Slybrute.

The only person who felt much anxiety about his safety, or any great wish for his re-appearance, was his wife's mother, old Mrs. Robson, herself a confirmed toper, and who had come from Shilbottle, near Alnwick, on the death of her husband (an innkeeper), to be near her only daughter.

Kitty Robson had been, as so many of the Northumberland lassies are, a perfect "rose of the north," and Sam Slybrute had won her heart when engaged on a railway near her native village.

As she had the prospect of a little money, and was so pretty, and had been at a boarding school, and, as her mother said, knew "the French and the music," her parents refused to hear of her marrying a working man, though he was making two pounds a week, and was a fine man, even among those sons of Anak, the men of Northumberland.

So silly Kitty ran away with Sam to Gretna, not far off, and there she indeed "married in haste to repent at leisure."

It was six years since she had left her home, and when her mother arrived at her wretched little home in Charlotte Street, Blackfriars, she did not know her.

Slybrute, from having been fond of a glass, had grown to be fond of nothing else. He was a brute in his cups, and was seldom out of them. When Mrs. Robson appeared in deep widow's weeds, with her scarlet face, fiery temper, and irritable manner, her large twelve dog-hampers of whisky and Scotch ale, and all her belongings, to settle near her daughter, or if possible with her, she asked the miserable, wasted Kitty herself, if Mrs. Slybrute lived there.

Even her mother could not recognise in that wan, sallow, neglected, downcast creature, with a black eye, and broken front teeth, a thin old gown, ragged hair, dirty cap, and unlaced boots (the very type of a drunkard's wife), that fair Euphrosyne—that opening rose—that bright, joyous girl with the glossy, golden hair, the starry eyes, the peach blossom and snow-drop complexion, the pearly teeth and ruby lips, the trim waist, neat ankle and dainty foot, whose bright beauty, wild grace, and merry wit used to attract to "The Black Bull" more lads than even Mrs. Robson's famous "brew," or old Job Robson's celebrated "go ahead ale." It was not till poor Kitty burst into tears, as she cried out, "Mither, dinna ye ken your ain bairn?" that Mrs. Robson recognised her Kitty.

When Sam Slybrute came home that night, thinking, as usual, to lay about him right and left, his poor wife and wretched little ones offering no resistance, he found himself suddenly collared and soundly buffeted in the face by a tall, bony, muscular woman, who, being sober (for once), had a great advantage over himself, who was more than half-seas-over, and whom he only knew to be his mother-in-law, for it was almost dark, by his wife's calling out "Mither! mither! give over, will ye? Sam'll be a sight to be seen the morn, if ye punish him that rate."

In that one sound thrashing Mrs. Robson completely established her supremacy over Slybrute; and when, the next day, he being sober, understood that old Robson had left her "comf'able, and that if he behaved himself it'd be all the better for him," he began to conciliate the old lady, and as a fellow-feeling makes us wondrous kind, so the mutual love of alcohol formed a bond between Mrs. Robson and Sam Slybrute; and the "brew," namely, a sort of very strong whisky-punch, for which she had been famous in the north, occupied their time and attention at all hours of the day.

The wretched, wasted wife, the lean, imp-like children, with large heads and puny bodies (they all had that disease so common to the children of drunkards—water on the brain), even the baby at the wasted breast sucked in this slow poison—"the brew."

However, although Mrs. Robson, who hated a lonely booze, was generally well-affected towards such a boon companion as Sam Slybrute, there was one great improvement wrought by her presence. He had been in the habit of jeering and sneering at the lean, wan, ragged, wretched rags of poor Kitty, his wife, and, in order to taunt and wound her, would laud to the skies Apple Blossom or any other fine plump, rosy, beautiful woman whose charms formed a contrast to what his brutality had made of his poor wife; although, before her marriage, she might have compared roses and lilies with Apple Blossom herself.

The first time he began this bantering in Mrs. Robson's presence, she had just made "the brew," and Kitty was sitting, looking very ragged, broken-spirited, and wretched, by her baby's cradle, when Slybrute cried—

"Drat it, wench! do bind up your hair, and mend your clothes a bit. There ain't such a trollop going. Lor, to compare now your holler yallor cheeks, and them broken snags of your'n, with Apple Blossom's bright skin, and white teeth, and her neat, tidy dress, and smooth hair, a-shining for all the world like black satin, and—"

But the speech ended in a long, loud howl, for Mrs. Robson, who had listened with ill-repressed fury till then, suddenly dashed at the brutal, jeering face of Slybrute the tumbler in which she had mixed his "brew;" its whole contents deluged his bristly, red head, and redder face, and, for the moment, blinded him. It was not enough to sting him a little, though not seriously to scald him.

He thought himself more hurt than he was. He had started to his feet intending, as he clutched hold of the first thing at hand, namely, a pewter salt-cellar, to take summary vengeance on his mother-in-law, but she too had risen, and looked so formidable, armed with the whisky bottle, that as the pain abated, he thought better of it, and sank back on his seat, the blood trickling down from a cut in his forehead, and saying, "Whatever are ye up to now, mother-in-lor, and what have I done to offend ye? If ye worn't a fe-male, and my mother-in-lor, I'd return that ere compliment, and with interest too. I loikes your 'brew' a main better inside nor out. Whatever have I done to ye, mother-in-lor, to make ye fly at a feller like that?"

"Don't mother-in-lor me," said Mrs. Robson, with a strong Northumbrian burr in her accent, "until ye can treat my daughter as a decent Christian should trate his wife, ye poor, mane, cowardly, pitiful brute—ye ruffin ye—with yer tongue that bites like a serpent's tooth. Ye'd better not let it wag in praise of any other woman's looks, and to run down my lassie's in my hearing, I can tell ye. When you talked over Kitty Robson to marry you agin my will, and her poor father's will, which he's now a angel in heaven, and hears ye, she was the glory of Shilbottle for beauty—the Rose of the North was the name she went by—and no queen's pearl necklace could beat her teeth. As for her hair, it was so much floss silk; and a neater, livelier, smarter lass, never went to church o' Sundays than Kitty Robson, till your shadow darkened her path, ye brute. Who's made her cheeks hollow, and her skin sallow? who broke her pretty teeth, and her gay spirit, and her loving heart? who's often blackened her eyes, and her lips, too? It's done, and it can't be undone; but don't let me hear you twit her with the looks of no other woman that may be aint married to a ruffin, or I'll leave you no looks to boast on, I can tell ye, Sam Slybrute; and more nor that, I've got a tidy farm at Shilbottle, and my poor, dear Job, he left me a snug bit of money, too; and if you don't change your goings on, and keep a civil tongue in your head, I'll take Kitty and the bairns, and off to the north with 'em; and ye shall rot in gaol before I'll let ye have a sixpence. So now go and beg my girl's pardon; and if she'll forgive ye, I'll make a fresh brew, and drink to your amendment. You're very proud of your strength, and your being such a great, well-grown fellow, which no one can't say but you are a fine man; but lor, an illness or a mishap would soon pull you down, Sam. You may come to be saller and holler, too; and them great, white, grinning teeth of your'n—why, if you caught a fall when you're screwed—and what's more likely?—you might have 'em all knocked out, and them great limbs of yours broke, and you a poor cripple."

"I'm sure I meant no harm, mother-in-lor," said Sam Slybrute; "Kitty, there, knows I wor reg'lar drunk when I broke them teeth of her'n. I never hit her when I'm sober, nor nothink to speak of!"

"Ye sha'n't hit her, drunk or sober, now I'm here, ye brute; I'll tear yer eyes out first!"

"I ain't a-going for to offer to, mother-in-lor," said Sam Slybrute; "and I'm sure I begs Kitty's pardon, if what I said hurted her. If I be a little proud of my six feet three and my strength, it's 'cause I can do a better day's work nor most men (leastways, when I can get it); and if I prides myself on being a well-grow'd, good-looking chap, it's all to please the ladies—meaning," he added, hastily, seeing the red ferocity of his mother-in-law's small, keen eyes—"meaning you and Kitty, mother-in-lor—I never looks after no other, bless ye!"

"You'd better not, Sam Slybrute," said Mrs. Robson, with dignity, "if you expect us to look after you!"

CHAPTER LVIII.

Know you the cause of all your careworn years,
Your days of sorrow and your nights of tears?
Love you—and are you sad? and would you know
Why tale of love is ever traced by woe?
Ask, ask, your heart; you've raised an idol there.
Yet God would reign alone. Your love, your care,
Each meek attention, earthly love may share.
But you mistake your worship while you pour
At earthly shrine your prayers.—BRIDE OF SIENA.

THE conversation recorded in the last chapter occurred on the very day of the accident. That event made Mrs. Robson's remarks assume, when recalled afterwards, something of the force of a prophecy; for the next time the wife and mother of Sam Slybrute saw him was when Bob Blossom, having, on the third day from that of the accident, recovered his consciousness, had been compelled to give his own name and address, and that of his companion. Sam Slybrute was lying, his head and face frightfully bruised and swollen, one eye dreadfully injured, all his front teeth knocked out, his right arm broken, and his right leg and thigh taken off at the hip joint. He was not quite sensible, and his tongue was so cut he could not articulate.

Mrs. Robson was a little disposed to crow over him, even while she wiped away a tear, and produced a bottle of whisky, which, being against the regulations, she was compelled to take back again.

But the wife, poor Kitty—whom no ill-usage had been able quite to estrange; who, loving as woman only loves, forgave as woman only can forgive—no sooner saw the gaunt form of her handsome, brutal ruffian of a husband, stretched on the scant hospital bed, his face and head still swollen and discoloured, his lips cut, one eye apparently destroyed, and no appearance of recognition in his battered face, than, uttering a piercing shriek, she fell on her knees by the bedside, exclaiming, "Oh, Sam! oh, dear, dear husband! speak to me; look at me; say you know your poor Kitty! If I have ever offended you, forgive me; let me stay with you and nurse you. Oh, dear, dear love, what have they done to you?"

But Sam Slybrute, although not quite unconscious, was too surly and ill-conditioned to say one word of comfort to his weeping wife. He did nothing but groan and toss his head about; and the attendants, thinking his wife's presence and lamentations agitated him, gently raised and led her into an adjoining room, where her mother and the surgeon, as kindly and cautiously as possible, informed her of the real nature of her husband's accident, and of the crushing and compound fracture of his thigh which had rendered amputation necessary to save his life.

She listened with distended eyes, pale lips, and face of ashy hue, and then faintly exclaimed—

"And they have cut off one of his legs!—cut it off at the hip; and he's a cripple for life. He that was so proud of his fine strong limbs. Oh, Sam! Sam! Sam! to go on crutches! Oh, let me go to him!—let me go to him! When he knows what they've done to him his heart will break." She rose to return to him, but with the effort a deadly faintness came over her, and, had not the surgeon supported her, she would have fallen to the ground; as it was, she swooned away in the surgeon's arms; and so weakened had she been, by years of misery, ill-health, and ill-usage, and so dreadful was the shock her feelings had sustained, that she remained a long time in a state of perfect insensibility, in spite of every restorative that science and experience could suggest.

Alas! only too soon, the wife awoke to a sense of what was before her, with such a husband as Sam Slybrute crippled for life.

CHAPTER LIX.

My lord is not my lord; nor should I know him,
Were he in favour, as in humour altered.

SHAKESPEARE.

MEANWHILE a scene not much less affecting had been going on in the ward where Bob Blossom lay, pale, miserable, and heartily ashamed of himself, but, unluckily, ashamed to own that he was so.

Directly Apple Blossom heard what had befallen Bob, and where he was, she determined to go and see him. Luckily it was a day and hour when patients were allowed to see their friends.

Apple Blossom took Larky Grigg with her, and, although very ill herself, she set out at once for the London Hospital; and her poor heart beat wildly as she was ushered through the lofty, clean, quiet wards, and at last found herself by her husband's bedside.

At one time, Apple Blossom would have thrown herself on the ground in a grief as wild, and a despair as passionate as poor Kitty's, and certainly Bob deserved much better of his wife than Slybrute did of his. But Apple Blossom, though a very fond, devoted wife, was not the blind, silly creature Kitty was.

Bob was beginning to lose his wife's respect; and a sensible woman will do her duty to the last by a man she despises, but she cannot love him.

However, it was in a very gentle voice that, leaning over him, she said—

"I'm roight sorry to foind thee here, Bob; but I'm thankful, too, it's no worsor. I've brought thee some linen and a few things to make thee comfortable in this basket, Bob. Can I do anything for thee?"

"Nothink, thankee, Betty."

He had not called her Betty since she had received the pretty name of Apple Blossom. But he was ashamed and rather sullen; and besides this his wife had not thrown her arms round his neck as she would once have done. She had shed no tears of joy at seeing him again. There was a restraint, an involuntary coldness in her manner.

Again his jealous suspicions rushed back upon his mind and heart. "She don't love me. I've lost her love, anyway, that's clear," he said to himself. "She is a good soul, and thinks a woundy lot about dooty and the ten-commandments, and all that she learns in the Bible, and at the ragged school; and all that Larky, and Hope, and Merry taches her out o' them little books; but love can't be tached. She loved me onst, and I knows the difference."

While Apple Blossom, pale, sad, and very quiet, sat by Bob's little white bed, looking, not at Bob, but in reality at vacancy, the large tears gathering in her eyes, Larky Grigg, who dearly loved his father, came forward.

"How are ye, dad?" he said, sobbing to see his father lying there, pale and helpless, on a bed in a hospital. "How are ye, dad?"

"Why, middling, my boy, considering," said Bob. "They tells me I'm doing uncommon well, and that I'll be out and about in another month or so."

"Won't 'ee be home, dad, for a whole month?" said Larky.

"Why, Larky, wouldn't you rather have my room than my company? Some people would, I'm sure!" said Bob, bitterly.

"Lor, feather, who be they? Home don't seem like home without dad, and so Hope wor saying this very morning."

"Bless her little kind, loving heart," said Bob. "Tain't every female has that feelin'." and he glanced at his wife, whose thoughts were fixed on a subject which generally engrossed them now, namely, what would become of Larky Grigg, and Merry, and Hope if her own disease proved mortal, and she had to leave them to the care of a drunken father? What if she should die under the operation which, as the only chance of saving her life, she had almost resolved to submit to? And then, what would the agony be?

For some time past this one terrible subject, in all its torturing phases, had occupied the unhappy woman's mind; and in spite of the loving and forgiving nature of her heart, a feeling of bitterness would arise in defiance of all her efforts to subdue it, as she thought that it was to a kick of his, given when in a state of sottish, swinish drunkenness, and while she was performing kindly, wife-like offices, that she owed the presence of a loathsome, deadly disease, which in all probability would send her down before her time into the dark grave, and make her children orphans (for she foresaw that Bob would give himself up to drink when she was gone—and how doubly are those orphans whose sole remaining parent is given up to strong drink). And she must leave the sunny earth, and her little once happy home, and all her pleasant duties, and die a lingering, agonising death, or live a wretched, mutilated being, because Bob would not be persuaded when it was yet time, and would not do the only thing to save him from temptation, namely, sign the pledge.

Bob—who knew nothing of what was passing in his wife's mind, for she had resolved, come what would, he should be spared (if possible) the agony of knowing the injury he had done her—felt much piqued and nettled at her sitting there so silent and so absent.

"I hope," said Larky, "thy leg ain't downright broke, is it, dad?"

"Why, yes it be, Larky, and no mistake. I caught a fall, my boy. I and Sam Slybrute wor walking along arm in arm, it wor woundy dark, and we never seed the cellars, so my foot slipped, and over we went, I fell a top o' he, and I only broke my leg, a simple fracture, the doctor calls it; but he, I hears, he's come off mortal bad. He've got his right arm broke, and his right leg and thigh wor crushed as if a injine on the rail had been over him. They hardly thought he'd live through the operation, but, as the doctor says, live or die, it's their duty to do all they can to save life. And they've saved his'n anyway, but I hear he's loike to lose an eye, and all his front teeth knocked out. Poor Sam! he wor so proud o' his strength, and his figure, and his good looks. He'll be a poor moottilated cripple now, anyway. He'd better have died on the spot, and I'm sure he'll think so when he comes to be quite himself, and sees himself on crutches, with no teeth, and only one eye."

"Ah, but dad," said Larky, "think of his soul! He'll have time to repent now, and if he'd died then, what would have become of him? 'As the tree falleth, so shall it lie.'"

"Whatever will he do when he comes out?" asked Apple Blossom.

"His wife don't bear him no malice," said Bob, red-dening, "though he have used her crule. She'd work her fingers to the bone for him, and he've got a mother-in-law well-to-do; they'll be koind to Sam, though he have done the thing as wor wrong. Kitty Slybrute don't attend no 'mothers' meetings,' nor no ragged schools, and ain't no teetotaler, but quite t'other. She loike a drop, she do; and I think it warms her heart, for she doats on Sam, and is allys ready to kiss and be friends; and she hasn't no methodies about her, to set her up in her own conceit, and make her look down on him she swore to love, honour, and obey—there ain't no go-between there. Sam told me himself, if he ever caught one a-talking over his wife, about pledges, and such loike, he'd get rid of him in no time—kick him to old Nick, and no mistake."

"That wouldn't be the way to get rid of him, Bob," said Apple Blossom, forcing a smile; "Sam'd meet him there again."

"Maybe he moight, maybe he moightn't, Betty; there be wuss than Sam going. As he says, 'he ain't no hypocrite, and never wor, and there must be some good in un, for his woife to be so fond on him. He have done crule things by she, and broke her front teeth—which it ain't every pratty wench could forgive that—but lor, she did; he tould me she did, and never cast it up to him. She had somethink to forgive, and she done it, too; that's what I calls Christin.'"

Little did he think what a much deadlier wrong he had done—what a much greater injury Apple Blossom had forgiven! and not only had never cast up to him, but—in her wife-like tenderness, loyalty, and devotion—had concealed from all the world as his deed, and even from himself!

(To be continued.)

The Matron.

NO. XXVIII.

In the present chapter I shall speak of things interesting both to town and country people; but in the first instance I revert to a subject already treated at some length, viz., supper.

It is not a very orderly proceeding to "go back to tea" after having finished supper, but a few more hints suggest themselves to my mind, and I wish young housekeepers to have the advantage of them.

In order to keep your tea-kettle free from chalk stones, let a clean oyster shell be in it. The shell attracts the chalky particles to itself, and frees your kettle from them. Another hint is about the use of a little carbonate of soda. Very likely this has been recommended to you before, but the important thing is to know the exact quantity you should use. If much of this carbonate is put into the pot, the tea becomes positively nauseous; small portions, by softening the water, make a little tea go a great way. If your party consists of four or five persons, put in with 3½ spoonfuls of tea, as much carbonate of soda as will stand on the third part of a threepenny piece. Having scalded the pot, put in tea and soda together, and proceed as usual; but we frankly own that great connoisseurs in tea consider the soda diminishes the fineness of its flavour, and where economy is not so important it may as well be left out. We mentioned dried strawberry leaves as a substitute for tea; there are other leaves that also answer the purpose if properly prepared; mint and balm mixed together, either dried or fresh, make a pleasant tea. If fresh, take a handful of the tops, place them in a tea-pot, pour over them about a quart of boiling water, and let the pot stand from five to eight minutes. If dry, one half the quantity.

Hawthorn leaves, picked and dried, make another good substitute for tea, but you should mix with the hawthorn leaves about a tenth part each of balm and green sage.

I have mentioned various things that children may have for the gathering, and there are many others I could point out that might be profitable, and turned to great account in cooking. But I must first speak on a very important subject, viz., the danger of children's gathering and eating poisons, mistaking them for wholesome herbs or berries. In national schools abroad it is part of children's education to learn to distinguish noxious from innocent plants. I wish it were so with us, but since it is not, the only thing is to forbid children to taste anything they are not certain about; and even parents should be careful how they trust to their own knowledge, if they have not had means of acquiring knowledge about plants, roots, and berries. Very great care is required in the selection of mushrooms, called, in learned language, fungi. Of these, the wholesome and eatable are to be sought in open plains, dry pastures, and waste lands. Their texture is compact, and their flesh white. The poisonous generally grow in damp places, shaded by wood, and in animal matter in a state of decomposition. The colour of the noxious fungi is either pale yellow, blood red, or greenish.

Of berries, children should be particularly careful. The berry of the wild honeysuckle is more beautiful than the currant, and that of the deadly nightshade is very pleasing to the sight; both are poisonous. The black berry, the whortleberry, and the red berry, left on the wild rose-buds after the blossom has passed away, are the only berries children should gather. Sloes, crab-apples, and nuts are easily discerned. All of these may be gathered and taken home, but only the nuts are fit to eat raw. There are various strong poisons among wild plants. Parsley and hemlock are very similar in appearance. Almost all those plants that have spotted blossoms, like the foxglove, are poisonous, as are also those with stems containing a milky juice,—the lettuce excepted, and this is unwholesome, eaten in a great quantity.

Not long ago a whole family was nearly poisoned by mistaking a deleterious root for horse-radish.

It would not come exactly within my province to enter into greater details on this subject. What I recommend is that mothers should get all the information possible concerning plants, &c., from some experienced gardener. Happily gardeners have not yet disappeared from our land, and they are generally communicative, good-natured, intelligent men, those from the "north country" especially.

All that I have said about the imprudence of tasting at random any wild plant or berry, is as applicable to town children taking a trip into the country as to those who have never left their native village. In fact, there is more danger for town-bred people than for others, for inhabitants of the country pick up a few important facts almost naturally. I must not end this chapter without another caution. Not only in lanes, on heaths, and on commons does danger lurk, but even in the cultivated field and in the crop ripe for harvest there is need of prudence. A painful death from strangling may be occasioned by the attempt to swallow the spur of rye. This grain, so beautiful when ripe, attracts the admiration of all; but the waving fibres that render its appearance peculiarly graceful are so rough that, on reaching the human throat, they have the effect of a deadly weapon.

THE LITTLE GRAY CLOAK.

THERE's a little gray cloak that goes trotting about—
Heigh ho, the little gray cloak!
There's a something beneath it, I have not a doubt—
Heigh ho, the little gray cloak!

In sunshine or rain, in pleasures or pain,
Wherever I go or whatever I do,
Like a sprite of the air, 'tis now here and now there—
I see it before me—that little gray cloak.

I have faithfully sworn—to the oath I will own—
Heigh ho, the little gray cloak!
That the little gray cloak shan't go trotting alone—
Heigh ho, the little gray cloak!

I'll step by its side, and I'll take for my guide
Whatever may be in its mysteries hid;
I shall fear not the storm—it will keep us both warm—
For broad are the folds of that little gray cloak!

THE GOTHs AND THE ROMANS.

PICTURES FROM HISTORY.

ALARIC AND THE GOTHs.

"THE next day, the gates having been beaten in (which no one now any longer defended), and our soldiers having rushed in, Cæsar sold (as slaves) the whole section of that stronghold. Those who bought the men told him the number of captives—it was fifty-three thousand."

Thus runs a passage in the second book of the Commentaries of Caius Julius Cæsar, Roman general and conqueror of the barbarians fifty years before the birth of our Saviour; and very significant are the words of the military journalist. Here are fifty-three thousand human beings sold into slavery, on the fall of a fortified city, into which, as a desperate expedient, they had thrown themselves; and in a paragraph of half-a-dozen lines, the circumstance is barely mentioned, as an everyday occurrence, and a thing of no moment. What must have been the state of society, when such outrages were looked upon as things of course.

But retribution came upon the aggressive Romans—and, in the first instance, in the shape of the Goths from Scandinavia. These powerful strangers migrated southward during the earlier years of the empire, and settled on the banks of the rushing Danube, of the Borysthenes (the Dnieper of the present day), and the Tanais or Don. Others called Visigoths, or Goths of the West, established themselves in the regions of Dacia. Tradition tells that the ancestors of these Goths sailed under the command of Berig, their king, from their ancient home in Gothland, in Sweden, and first landed at Gothiscantzia, the present Dantzig. One of the ships arrived later than the rest, whereupon the crew were hailed with a shout of "Gepidæ! Gepidæ!" gapers or idlers, by which they were long afterwards distinguished. Be this as it may, they continued their journey to the south, the horde increasing like an avalanche as it rolled on towards Italy. The Saxons, celebrated from the earliest times as one of the most warlike nations of central Europe, opposed the advancing nation to such good purpose, as to compel them to turn aside towards the East; and thus it was that their first establishment on the frontier of the Roman empire was so near the Black Sea. In the great Gothic migration the Goths were joined by many considerable tribes, among whom the most worthy of mention are the Longovardi, or Long-spears, from Denmark; the Heruli, from the Scandinavian peninsula; the Vandals, from the shores of the Baltic; the Rugii, from the island of Rügen; the Allemanni, a race composed of a number of tribes, alle mannen, signifying all men; the Marcomanni, or men of the March, and many others.

The repeated acts of cruelty and treachery perpetrated by the Romans on the new-comers, naturally brought forth reprisals; and in the commencement of the third century we find the Emperor Caracalla absolutely paying tribute to the Goths to secure their friendship. A Goth, Maximin, became at length absolutely Emperor of Rome; and A.D. 250 the Goths formally invaded the empire, gaining the great battle of Berea, and putting 100,000 men to the sword.

From this time a continual series of attacks occur; sometimes checked for a time by the measures of energetic conquerors, among whom Aurelian deserves honourable mention, but almost always resulting in great damage to the provinces attacked. Greece was particularly open to their ravages, and was several times devastated by them. On one occasion the magnificent collection of books at Athens was about to be burnt, when a Gothic commander, rising up in the council, advised his colleagues to leave the Greeks their books, pithily observing "that while the Greeks plied their pens so vigorously, they would have no time to learn the use of their swords."

The Emperor Gallienus entered into an alliance with them—a sure sign of weakness. In the renewed forays which ensued, the Goths took numberless Roman prisoners, whom they carried away into the interior of their country. Many of these Roman prisoners were Christians, able and anxious to spread the light of truth throughout barbarian Europe; and it might truly be said, in the words of Scripture, that "The nations which sat in darkness saw a great light," when the morning of the Gospel dawned upon the country of those brave barbarians, and the mighty Gothic people became converts to the Christian faith.

There rose among the Goths a descendant of the Balti, Alaric, a mighty warrior, who carried fire and sword into the territory of the Romans. Honorius, the emperor, too weak to oppose the invader personally, sent against him Stilicho, a brave Vandal, who twice succeeded in hemming Alaric in between the mountains in such a manner as to make him sue for peace. But again Alaric undertook an invasion of Italy; and was again defeated and brought to terms by Stilicho, who might yet have saved the Roman empire but for the treachery of Honorius himself. That miserable despot, jealous of the influence Stilicho had gained over the troops, accused him of carrying on a secret correspondence with Alaric, and caused him to be put to death, with the wives and children of 30,000 Germans in his service. This was signing his own death-warrant. Alaric placed himself at the head of the warriors whose wives and children had been thus ruthlessly sacrificed, and, with his success assured by the death of Rome's best general, he marched straight upon Rome, leaving Honorius helplessly shut up in Ravenna. Capitulation was the only course left open to the terror-stricken Romans. They sued for peace, which was granted by Alaric, on payment of 5,000 pounds weight of gold, 30,000 of silver, and a large proportion of the articles of commerce brought to Rome to supply the luxury of the citizens. The Romans were in despair. "What will be left to us?" they inquired, aghast at the conqueror's exactions. "Life," sternly replied Alaric. "We are still numerous," they continued, with an attempted display of a courage they were far from feeling. "Come out, then," replied the Goth; "the thicker the hay, the easier it is to mow." The Romans had no resource but submission; and the famous golden statue of Victory was melted down to meet the conqueror's demands.

Leaving Rome, Alaric marched to Lower Italy, intending to visit Africa; but a fatal illness seized him, and he died almost suddenly. For three days the Goths wept over their gallant leader; then they turned aside the river Busento from its course, and buried their king in the bed of the river with his armour, his horse, and the chief of the spoils he had taken. The river was then once more turned into its bed; the waves of the Busento rolled over the hero's corpse, and to this day no man knows the place where Alaric, the conqueror of Rome, lies buried.

Honorius himself had remained inactive at Ravenna. The following story appears almost incredible; but, as it is told by several historians, we give it for what it is worth:—

When Honorius, they say, was told at Ravenna that "Roma" was lost, he exhibited the utmost concern, believing that "Roma," a favourite bird of his, was meant. On discovering, however, that the capital of his empire was alluded to, he became at once consoled.

How deep must have been the degradation of a monarch of whom such a story, whether it be true or false, could, with any degree of probability, be repeated.

DEATH OF MARQUETTE.

To western wilds, in days of old,
A pious pilgrim journeyed on;
And many a weary league he won,
By holy faith and prayer upheld.

His was a faith that judged as loss
All thoughts which tended not above;
All love which was not Christ-like love,
Each burden which was not the cross.

And over prairie, over lake,
Adown the mighty western flood
He passed, esteeming it but good
To suffer for his Master's sake.

The dusky children of the wood
Pressed, awe-struck, round to hear his voice,
The while he bade their hearts rejoice
In language little understood:

For when he spoke of love and peace,
Related wondrous tales to them
Of Calvary and Bethlehem,
And bade their thoughts of God increase,

Their untaught spirits rather made
A god of him, whose priestly guise
Seemed marvellous unto their eyes,
With rosary and shaven head.

Long time he laboured thus and prayed:
Repenting not that he had cast
The world behind him, and at last
His life a sacrifice had made.

Alone beneath the vaulted sky,
Beside an altar rude he knelt;
And with the pains of death scarce felt,
He laid him down in peace to die.

Ah, fitting 'twas that his pure soul
Should pass thus peacefully away:
That in the light and calm of day,
The pilgrim should attain his goal!

And where to-day his ashes rest,
The Indian gazes on the lake,
Believing that its waters break,
Or calmly lie, at his behest.

MY VISIT TO THE SEA-SIDE.—No. I.

I SHALL never forget that fine summer day. Truly the spirit was stirred within me as a steady breeze along the shore curled the surface of the ocean-waters, while all was covered with dancing waves, fringing every rock, as it jutted forth, with snow-white foam; and the sea vanished in the distance and blended with the splendidly clouded sky. I gazed, too, on a stately ship, with her canvas finely spread,—the light falling gently on the surface of her sails, as "She walked the water like a thing of life;" and then on another, another, and another, all pursuing their outward-bound course. Pleasant was the thought of cargoes, fraught with the conveniences, comforts, and indulgences of life; of letters teeming, not only with the details of commerce, but with the tidings which friendship delights to waft over the ocean, and with the warm responses of fond and loving hearts; and delightful was it to imagine the crowd at some destined port assembling to catch the first glimpse of the in-coming ship, while in the midst of it were eyes eager to gaze on those long lost to sight, hands throbbing with expectation of another's cordial grasp, and tongues thrilling for the shout of "Welcome! welcome! welcome!"

I was aroused from my reverie by a hearty inquiry, "What, is that you?" Instantly a warm hand was thrust into mine, which yielded as promptly its own return; and, after a few words of a kind which had long been familiar to us, I took the arm of a school-fellow, only a few years my senior, and from whom I had now been separated for many a day. How much was there mutually to tell of occurrences during the interval; then many an hour was occupied in tracing, as far as possible, the career of our early associates, chequered by incidents of success and disaster; and, ever and anon, some story would arise of our early friendship, of the circumstances under which we first met, and of our thoughts, impressions, and feelings, when, for the first time, we looked each other in the face. Of course, we decided at once that we must now be together, and so we were till the laborious and urgent duties of life compelled us to separate.

We were one day on the sands, conversing as we sauntered along. Dry at low water, these sands are frequented, during every successive season, by multitudes of visitors. One broad ridge becomes, whenever the tide is down, a favourite resort. Here young mothers, prepared by previous knowledge and discipline to play their all-important part—mark with delight the invigorating gambols of their children. See that noble boy, an adept in digging sand and filling his barrow, teaching his art to a little group, who have been only looking on in admiration of his skill, but each of whom is now eager to begin. His sister, a little older than himself, is seated on a small mass of rock, all-absorbed in some wondrous tale; while the baby laughs and crows in high glee, conscious of a joyous feeling, though knowing not whence it comes. On each side stretches far away the stream of juvenile life; but alas! in many a little party there appears no mother; a hired servant, instead of a parent, is there, while it may be you may witness a blow, or hear some harsh words which will go to your heart.

"How strange it is," said Wilton, as we roamed along, "that when people want a simile for hardness, they generally take a rock. Why don't they say 'as hard as putty?' Rock is often found almost or quite as soft. There is a deposit of stiff blue clay, called galt, denominated also Folkestone marl, and blue-chalk marl; and so the people who vend such things, take a mass of it about the size of a saucer, press into it a few fossils, let it become hard, and then sell it to some one who knows no better, as a natural production. The term rock is properly applied to all the substances that constitute the crust of the globe, from the soft clays that lie beneath our feet, and the loose sand and gravel that yield to every step, to the granite that forms the highest Alps, or the porphyry that crowns the peaks of the Andes."

"I wonder," said I, "if you could recall that piece of one of our old lessons on the difference between stratified and unstratified rocks: I very much doubt if I could."

"Let's see!" said Tom. "Granite, porphyry, and serpentine, are among the unstratified rocks, and occur in enormous masses, only broken by irregular fissures in different directions. Stratified rocks, on the contrary, exhibit a regular structure of layers or beds, to which the Latin word strata is applied. They cover the largest part of the earth's surface; consisting essentially of one or more of three kinds of matter only—clays, limestones, and sandstones, more or less hard. The beds vary from the thickness of paper to that of many yards, and are sometimes divided by a thin layer of soft matter, called a seam; but, at other times, the surfaces of the upper and lower bed are so closely joined together that they can only be separated by a considerable force." There, old boy, is that it?"

"I have no doubt of it to a word—a letter. But then, you know, you always had such a knack at remembering things."

"Other people might have greater power of memory, if they would. Hawkins, you recollect, used to say, 'I'll make a memorandum of that;' and so, instead of storing it in his memory, as he ought to have done, he put it down on a piece of paper, only to forget that he had ever done so. Depend upon it that Memory is like a friend who loves to be trusted; and if you withdraw your confidence, is it at all wonderful that you should lose your friend? Let a person give up the exercise of this valuable power, and he may, perhaps, sink into the state of the man who was so accustomed to forget his own wife, that he asked her—save the mark!—to put a wafer on her forehead, that he might distinguish her in a party!"

"You will admit, doubtless, that there is a great difference as to memory, in original endowment?"

"Yes, but not so great as many people suppose. What would my right arm have been, if from my childhood I had kept it inactive, or strapped it up for every effort I proposed to make? Who could have prevented my being a cripple, if I had been constantly going on crutches? Exercise—due exercise is essential to the health and vigour of every mental, as well as every bodily power. And an important part of this is the habitual effort to remember things, instead of words—mere words."

"I cordially agree with you, Wilton," said I. "But, if you object to the phrase, 'hard as a rock,' that of stable as a rock is almost, if not quite, as exceptionable. Poetry only can speak of 'everlasting hills,' and 'eternal rocks.' While the mountains, valleys, and plains, and the interior of a country are undergoing a slow but constant change by the combined power of the atmosphere and running waters, its coasts and shores are exposed to destruction from the action of the waves and the encroachments of the sea. How many masses of débris have we beheld as we have paced up and down this walk by the sea-side! The sand on which we now tread is the crumbling of a sandstone rock; the clay soil, more or less tenacious, is the crumbling of a clay rock of the same quality; and a calcareous soil is the crumbling of limestone. Only let these crumbling be mixed, and there arises a soil of intermediate qualities. These, being neither sandy, clayey, nor calcareous, are the principal elements of the more open, fertile, and valuable loams, to which we are indebted for the most precious fruits of the earth."

"Just so," said Wilton. "Our old friend, Farmer Thomson, whom we used to visit, and whose hospitality was never more enjoyed than by us in our school-days, little thought to how many rocks he was indebted for his rich soil, which the plough so successfully turned up, and for the fertile meadows in which his sheep and cattle acquired such beauty and fatness."

"What a contrast," said I, "are such scenes to tracts of sand like this, where, exposed to the atmosphere, as they are, all is monotonous and desert. Their surface is too loose and uncertain, and water finds its way through them with too great facility to admit the growth of a variety of vegetables, or to yield food and shelter to many of the animal tribes. Such is the character of many extensive sand deposits under the sea, and yet the sandy sea-shore is not without its attractions."

"True," said Wilton; "if serenity is loved, where can it be enjoyed more completely than in gazing on the ocean, still and waveless? Where is a bosom so unruffled as that of the glassy sea? How can it possibly be more tranquil than in the evening of a fine summer day, when the sun has nearly descended to the western horizon, when the sea-breeze has died away in the offing, and the land-breeze has not yet begun to blow? Then a golden light irradiating the entire surface of the sea, fades into delicate tints of purplish green; and even when the sun has gone down, there is a rivalry among the hues of russet and gray, as to which of them shall give most softness to the neighbouring landscape; all is silence, absolute silence, for no pebble rolls, no ripple stirs, and no wing rustles."

"I remember," said I, "being exceedingly struck by the Ulverston Sands, that majestic barrier, as Wordsworth calls it, to the lake scenery; and assuredly those splendid mountains and noble valleys are never seen to such advantage, as after the passage of that boundary has been made. As the tide ebbs in Morecombe Bay, these sandy tracts are left perfectly dry, twice a day, to the extent of several miles, except in the channels of the rivers Kent and Leven. There the pedestrian tourists, bearing their knapsacks of indispensables, the people of the neighbouring districts, long accustomed to trudge it over hill and vale; the cart laden with fish or vegetables; the gig of the commercial traveller; and the carriages of fashionable visitors, may all be seen to pass. From Hest Bank, the point entering on the sands on the eastern shore, to Kent's Bank, is not much less than eleven miles. A small island, bearing the traces of an oratory, built by the monks of Furness, is observable midway between these shores, and on the south of the usual track. Strange is the indisposition so often apparent, to guard against peril. Many seem utterly reckless, plunging headlong into danger. No one should attempt to cross these sands without first making due inquiry at Lancaster or Ulverston. At either of these places the proper time for so doing may be easily ascertained, and the road safely traversed over a sandy level, stretching far and wide, the whole of which, a few hours after, will be covered by the sea. Yet, for want of this precaution, scarcely a year elapses but one or more persons, careless or foolhardy, are lost in this most interesting part of our country. The view of the distant mountains, and the crags and scars rising from the edge of the plain, can never be forgotten after being once witnessed."

"I have passed that way," said Wilton, "and was charmed with the prospect. But now we come on a portion of sand over which the waves have passed, and so the sand is rippled too. How deeply suggestive are the markings here! It may be that the sand-ripples of to-day will confide to men of distant ages some of those truths which the ripples of by-gone days reveal to us. For though these marks and the undulations left by the water on the surface, where regular minute ridges of sand follow each other in an orderly manner, like the furrows of a field, may appear to some so fugitive as to demand no notice; yet, in these marks on the sand, the geologist traces a resemblance which links them with time immeasurably distant in the past history of the world, and with impressions on rocks which have survived the decay of centuries, but which were, in their origin, of no more apparent stability than these foot-prints of ours on the sand. Walking with eye intent on such a margin as this, he sees that these ripples leave their mark on the sand at only small depth, while larger waves impress it more deeply. Thus, when he finds the ripple-mark on the sandstone or other rock but slightly raised, he readily infers that these deposits were formed when the shallow waters alone washed over them. Again, when, as is often the case, they are seen to be covered by deposits of hundreds of feet in thickness, he has clear evidence that on that spot the ancient sea-shore underwent a great lowering, or the level of the ocean a great rise, since those buried ripple-marks were impressed by the waves on the sand. And so, by a careful examination of these tide traces, he can infer the depth and other circumstances of the waters that made them; and learn how, by a gradual depression, the base of that sea was lowered, in relation to the ocean level, hundreds, perhaps thousands of feet, so as to admit of the successive accumulation of sand sediments, containing the remains of new races of marine animals and land plants. But, the spirit that walks abroad at noon is hunger; now, then, let us go and satisfy our physical appetites."

(To be continued.)

Small Change.

A SHARP APPRENTICE.—"William," said a carpenter to his apprentice, "as I shall be absent to-day, I wish you to grind all the tools." "Yes, sir." The carpenter came home at night. "William, have you ground all the tools?" "All but the handsaw," said Bill; "I couldn't get quite all the gaps out of that."

WASHING shirts, says an exchange paper, wears them out. When they get dirty, rub them over with chalk. "Economy is wealth."

THERE are three things women throw away—their time, their health, and money.—Madame Geoffrin.

WHOEVER educates this year's girls becomes the benefactor of last year's boys.

WHEN is an author most like a puppy?—When he carries his tale with him.

ONE of his old acquaintances went one day to see Fontenelle at his country house, and said he had come to eat a bit of dinner. "What shall we have? Do you like 'sparagus'?" said Fontenelle. "If you please, but with oil." "Oil! I prefer them with sauce." "But sauce disagrees with me," replied the guest. "Well, well, we shall eat them with oil." Fontenelle then went out to give his orders; but on his return found his poor acquaintance dead of an apoplexy. Running to the head of the stairs, he called out, "Cook! dress the 'sparagus with sauce!" The man who "saw the joke," it is said, used a spy-glass.

"My dear," said a smiling spouse to her other half, "I'm going a shopping to-day, and want a little change." "Pooh!" responded the savage, "that would be no change at all; you go a shopping every day."

CONJUGATION OF THE VERB "TO SEE."—S-a-w, did see. Sordid C., whom Esau went to sea to see, says he saw saucy Cesar saw Esau's see-saw for fire-wood to cook up an a-mal-gum for the poor old sea-saw that he saw suffering from toothache contracted while cutting through the equinoctial line during a biting gnaw-wester. Had, you see, Sawney Been in much trouble in cutting his eye-teeth, this is the eye-dent-tickle "old saw" he would have used to cut 'em with. Has Uncle Jonathan an "old hoss" to match?

A FRIEND of ours boasts that the ladies have lately sent him a dozen pairs of slippers. He must be a slippery fellow.

A WORD TO THE WEAKER VESSEL.—A lady who obstinately persists in wearing hoops ought not to complain of being ridiculed. If she will make a barrel of herself, she must expect to be treated as a butt.

TRUTH often displeases a lively soul, but it always persuades a just mind.—Madame de Riccoboni.

A HOUSE-PAINTER painted a door so exactly in imitation of oak that last year it put forth a quantity of leaves, and grew an excellent crop of acorns.

"Do you keep nails here?" asked a sleepy-looking lad, walking into a hardware shop the other day. "Yes," replied the gentlemanly proprietor; "we keep all kinds of nails. What kind will you have, sir, and how many?" "Well," said the boy, sliding towards the door, "I'll take a pound of finger nails and about a pound and a half of toe nails."

He who thinks his place below him, will certainly be below his place.

"PATRICK dear, come in and go to bed jist," said the wife of a jolly son of Erin, who had just returned from the fair in a decidedly "how come you so" state. "You must be dreadful tired, shure, wid your long walk." "Arrah! git away wid your nonsense," said Pat. "It wasn't the length of the way at all that fatigued me; 'twas the breadth of it!"

NOTICE was recently served upon Thomas Clark, of this metropolis, that the walls of a building owned by him had been condemned and would be pulled down. It was found that Mr. Clark had been in prison for more than forty years for contempt of court! Dickens's Circumlocution Office was no creature of the fancy.

WILLIE'S MUSICAL ADVENTURES.—(From the New York Punch).—"Meet me by moonlight alone," as Willie the garotter warbled to the old gent with a gold watch and five hundred dollars. "Come, oh, come with me," sang the officer, taking him to the station-house.—"Welcome, welcome home," responded the turnkey, on locking him up.—"Go where glory waits thee," sang the judge, as he sentenced William to six months on the island.—"Wait for the waggon, and we'll all take a ride," hummed the officer, whilst attending the arrival of Black Maria, the prison van.—"We meet to part no more," warbled the keeper, warmly grasping Willie by the handcuffs.—"Home, sweet home," sighed Willie, as he put on the zebra suit.

A PRACTICAL joke was once attempted to be played on Mr. Erskine, as he went one day to Westminster Hall, with his ample bag crammed full of briefs. Some waggish barristers hired a Jew's boy to go and ask him if he had "any old clo' to sell?" "No, you little Hebrew imp," exclaimed the indignant counsellor, "they are all new suits."

A MORAL writer asks how a divorced husband and wife can repair the injury done to their children. Perhaps they can in most cases best repair it by repairing themselves.

Puzzles for the Ingenious.

FOR SOLUTION.

Forty-five pounds ten shillings was the sum taken at a theatre on a certain night. The seats in the boxes were charged 2s. 10d. each; those in the pit, 1s. 9d.; and those in the gallery, 1s. 4d. There were twice as many places taken in the gallery as in the boxes, and the number of places taken in the pit were half as many as those taken in the boxes and gallery put together. Question: How many places were taken in the pit, gallery, and boxes respectively?

A PUZZLER!

Some weeks ago, the following was presented for solution:—"Given A B C to find Q." This seems to have baffled the ingenuity of all our readers; and, as we have reason to believe it will continue to baffle them, we may as well present a solution.—Given A B C, or C A B, proceed through Turnham Green to find Kew.

Answer to QUESTION I, in No. 29, p. 47.

Question:—"What is that which lives upon its own substance, and dies when it has devoured itself?"

Answer:—A candle. This answer has been returned by Geoffrey; Inquisitive Joe; Trebo; P. George; Sensible; J. R. Furneaux; L. V. O.; Gabriel; Scotswood Road; A. L. E.; R. W. Gamson.

Incorrect: J. Jenkins; C. J. Hartley; Zeminda; P. O'Malley; C. Jerdan.

Answer to QUESTION II.

Suppose $x = A$'s money and $y = B$'s "

Then $y + \frac{1}{2}x = £200$

and $x + \frac{1}{3}y = £100$

$y + \frac{1}{2}x = £200$

$\frac{1}{2}x = £200 - y$

$x = £400 - 2y$

$x = \frac{1}{3}y = £100$ by substitution.

$5y + 3 = £300$

$5y = £297$

$y = £59.40$

$x + \frac{1}{2}y = £100$

$x = £100 - 60$

$x = £40$

Answer: A had £40 and B had £180.

Correct answers have been received also from T. M. Green; E. W.; J. T. Last; J. Macintosh; J. O. H.; E. P. B.; M. Halligan; H. Ayling; A. Total Abster; J. S. Somers; J. Wright; D. R. P.; J. H. D.; Champion of England; Moulton; W. Bogle; T. W. Croker; Ambrosius; J. Davis; Raleigh; Aramis; E. J. Larkin; J. Manders; Alfred; W. S. Marshall; Perth; J. R. W. L.; H. W. Groves; Faber; R. W. Jamson; W. S. Lumb; David J.; T. H. Macpherson; B. Russell; J. Lugsdin; A. Perth Reader; G. H. Hillis; Lichfield; Jacobus; H. Spiers; Zamora; H. C. Barclay; G. J. F.; J. Taylor; A. Glasgow Dressmaker; Truth; Alexander; W. Armstrong; J. Ugarte; Zary (Dundee); H. J.; Pythias; W. Clementson; E. G. M.; J. Blatherwick; Anvil; Peter; Phaedrus; G. H. Booth; T. P. Woodburn; W. Shearer; J. Larkin; Old Hickory; T. R.; R. Clear; R. Wilker; H. Hetherington; T. Rehsa; Sensible; J. S. Unsworth; Lackland; A. Boy of 10; W. S. C.; P. George; Bristolensis; Darvell; R. Curley; W. Wakeman; W. Bade; L. V. O.; T. Y. Baker; A. S.; T. Whittington; D. F. G.; J. H. Elstob; T. Walters; A. T. A.; T. Tigmuto; Trebo; Lismahago; J. Jenkins; Gabriel; Inquisitive Joe; W. H. Taylor; J. R. Watson; W. Walker; T. Robertson; Freadamite; Nelson Lee; G. F. B.; Hal M. K.; H. R. Simons; Geoffrey; The Stranger; M. Highgate; E. Finn; W. Stewart; J. M. Miller; Colliery Jamie; C. J. Hartley; Scotswood Road; A. L. E.; J. R. Furneaux; Ocelo; Perseverance; Perio; Z.; G. Palmer; P. O'Malley; Nil; R. B. B. (Limerick); Pope; Jasper; C. Jerdan; Flaminius; S. Arnold; J. Lytleton; S. W. Elmes; F. Armstrong.

Incorrect: Faber.

Chess.

Problem No. 54 By R. B. WORMALD, Esq.
BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in four moves.

Game played between Messrs. PINDAR and WORMALD.

- | WHITE. | BLACK. |
|-----------------------|------------------------|
| Mr. Wormald. | Mr. Pindar. |
| 1. P to K 4 | 1. P to K 4 |
| 2. P to K B 4 | 2. P takes P |
| 3. B to Q B 4 | 3. P to Q Kt 4 |
| 4. B takes P | 4. P to Q B 3 |
| 5. B to Q B 4 | 5. P to Q 4 |
| 6. P takes P | 6. Q checks |
| 7. K to B sq | 7. P to K B 6 (a) |
| 8. P to Q 3 | 8. P takes Kt P (ch) |
| 9. K takes P | 9. B to K Kt 5 |
| 10. Q to K B sq | 10. B to Q B 4 (b) |
| 11. B to K B 4 | 11. K Kt to B 3 |
| 12. B to K Kt 3 | 12. Q to K R 4 |
| 13. Q to K sq (ch) | 13. K to B sq (c) |
| 14. P to K R 3 | 14. B to Q 2 |
| 15. P to Q 6 (d) | 15. Kt to Q 4 |
| 16. B takes Kt | 16. Q takes B (ch) |
| 17. Q to K 4 | 17. Q Kt to R 3 |
| 18. Q Kt to B 3 | 18. Q to K 3 |
| 19. Q R to K sq | 19. Q to K B 3 |
| 20. Q to K 7 (ch) | 20. Q takes Q |
| 21. R takes Q | 21. B to K 3 |
| 22. Q Kt to K 4 | 22. B to Q Kt 3 |
| 23. K Kt to B 3 | 23. Q R to K sq |
| 24. R takes R (ch) | 24. K takes R |
| 25. K Kt to K Kt 5 | 25. K to Q 2 |
| 26. R to K B sq | 26. P to K B 3 |
| 27. R takes K B P (e) | 27. B takes K R P (ch) |
| 28. K takes B | 28. P takes R |
| 29. Kt takes P (ch) | 29. K to Q B sq |
| 30. P to Q 7 (ch) | 30. K to Kt 2 |
| 31. Kt to K 6 | 31. Kt to Q B 4 (f) |
| 32. P Queens (ch) | 32. R takes Q |
| 33. Kt takes R | 33. B takes Kt |
| 34. Kt takes K R P | 34. B to Q Kt 3 |
| 35. B to K 5 | 35. Kt to K 3 |
| 36. K to Kt 4 | 36. P to Q R 3 |
| 37. Kt to K B 6 | |

And the game (which is in White's favour) was obliged to be left unfinished.

(a) Mr. W. informs us that he has frequently adopted this form of defence with success against strong players. It certainly seems to deserve notice. Perhaps White would have done better had he at his fifth move played his B to K 2 instead of to Q B 4.—(b) Threatening mate in two moves.—(c) Perhaps K to Q sq or Q 3 would have been preferable to this move, as it would have prevented the effectual advance of the Q P, and also have given freedom to Black's K R.—(d) This P is a thorn in Black's side for the rest of the game.—(e) Ingenious; he obtains an ample equivalent for the exchange.—(f) White now threatens Kt to K 8, and Black's best course seems to be the one adopted, giving up the exchange.

Solution of Problem No. 47.

- | WHITE. | BLACK. |
|--------------------|--------------|
| 1. R to K B 7 (ch) | 1. R takes R |
| 2. Q to K 6 (ch) | 2. K takes Q |
| 3. R to K 5 (ch) | 3. P takes R |
| 4. P mates | |

Solution of Problem No. 48.

- | WHITE. | BLACK. |
|------------------------|-------------------|
| 1. Kt to K Kt 3 | 1. Q takes Kt (a) |
| 2. Kt to K B 5 (ch) | 2. K moves |
| 3. B to K B 7 (mates) | |
| | (a) |
| 2. P to K B 4 (dis ch) | 1. P to K 5 |
| 3. Kt mates | 2. Kt takes B |

J. D. R., J. Palmer, M. A. R., E. Grant, R. B. W., H. T., Domino, and W. G., have been replied to through the post.

Our Editorial Table.

ERRATUM.—No. 28, page 29, in the anecdote respecting CYTUS, for B. C. 99, read B. C. 599.

BLUE BELL.—In reply to your question—viz., is there any truth in the saying that it rains on St. Swithin's Day, viz., the 15th of July, there will be rain for forty days afterwards? we give you the words of Mr. Howard, the meteorologist:—"The action commonly entertained on this subject, if put strictly to the test of experience at any one station in this part of the island (London), will be found fallacious. To do justice to popular observations, I may now state that in the majority of our summers, a showery period, which with some latitude as to time and circumstances, may be admitted to constitute daily rain for forty days, does come on about the time indicated by this tradition; not that any long space before is often so dry as to mark distinctly its commencement." St. Swithin was Chancellor of the Exchequer in the time of our Saxon King Ethelbert. He was also the great patron-saint of the cathedral and city of Winchester. The skull of St. Swithin is known to have been deposited in Canterbury Cathedral, but where his body was buried seems quite unknown.

JAMES RAMSDALE (Manchester).—Dr. Pusey is the Regius Professor of Hebrew in the University of Oxford. For his views on certain theological points, we refer you to his publications. Your note is not over courteous.

A TRUE SCOT.—The two small w's, under the neck of the medallion of her Majesty on the penny pieces, are the initials of the late medallist, William Wyon.

A READER OF NEWSPAPERS.—The proper orthography of the two words sanitary and sanatory has not been determined. We believe the first to be the correct form. The word is derived immediately from the French sanitaire, which is from the Latin sanitas, health, or state of health; and hence sanitary has been applied to laws and regulations which tend to promote the public or general health. Sanatory more properly means sanative or curative. The root of both words, however, is the same.

X. R. X.—The son can take which name he pleases, and the law makes the marriage, contracted under the selected name, legal. The wife, therefore, cannot legally "marry again."

A. S.—The authorship of Junius' letters is still a matter of uncertainty; the probabilities are in favour of Sir Philip Francis, but it is not easy to give "the reasons why he should have kept the secret."

C. MERCEUR (L.K.).—The word, invicta, under the crest of a certain insurance company, means unconquered. You cannot change the colour of flowers that are blown. Some florists try experiments for this purpose on the roots and buds, but they do not publish the process.

IDA DALHEIMER.—The chosen haunts of the cuckoos are warm and temperate climates. The only two species that show themselves in our quarter of the globe never appear but in warm weather, and quit it on the first approach of cold weather. Even the mild temperature of an Italian winter is not sufficient to retard their return to the sultry groves of northern Africa.

A GROWING BOY OF 12.—We think you may bathe with advantage three times a week, due regard being paid to the temperature of the body. For a person in good health, the best time for bathing is early in the morning, but avoid bathing after a full meal.

G. CALTHORP.—Soldiers may "rise from the ranks to be captains, without purchasing a commission, through merit," but the cases are rare.

TROO.—The word posy is a contraction of poesy, which is from the Latin and Greek poesis, the work of a poet, or poetry. Posy originally meant verses presented with a nosegay, or bunch of flowers, and hence the term came to be applied to the flowers themselves; it still means a motto, or a verse upon a ring: thus Shakespeare,—

"A paltry ring, whose posy was,
"Love me, and leave me not."

LARKY GRIGG.—You should apply to the "Admiralty Civil Department," office, Somerset House, Strand.

W. GARDEB.—Apply as the last.

MELIORA.—No license is required for removing goods with horse and cart, or van.

WATER-BARREL.—Belisarius was one of the commanders under the Emperor Justinian, and the greatest general of declining Rome. In the latter portion of his days he was doomed, undeservedly, to misfortune and disgrace; but the story of his deprivation of sight, and begging in the streets of Constantinople, is a fiction of later times, altogether unsupported.

MERRILLE PLACE.—The War Office is in Pall Mall (late Buckingham House).

JOHNSON.—The mixtures considered the most efficacious for destroying the vermin to which you allude, are highly poisonous; and, after all, these cannot be applied to "mattresses, bed furniture, folds of dresses," and other articles which you enumerate. Great cleanliness and incessant hunting, are the surest modes of destruction. We give one form of receipt, reminding the reader that it is a deadly poison:—corrosive sublimate and muriatic acid, of each one ounce; water, four ounces. Dissolve, then add turpentine and decoction of tobacco, of each three quarters of a pint. Mix. For the decoction of tobacco, boil two ounces of tobacco in a pint of water. This mixture must be applied with a paint brush.

M. SPIERS (Maidstone).—Spurge is the name commonly given to the different species of British plants of the genus Euphorbia; they abound with a milky juice, which is pungent and poisonous.

W. H. B. H.—Vasco de Gama was a celebrated navigator and naval commander. He was born at Sines, a maritime town in Portugal. He made important discoveries on the Eastern coasts of Africa and the seas adjacent to the East Indies. He died in Cochin China in 1525.

DOUBTFUL GEORGE.—1. The law to which you refer cannot be—is not intended to be—retrospective in its influence. The marriage, therefore, which you suppose to have taken place would be illegal. 2. An illegitimate child may possess property regularly bequeathed to him; but not in mere virtue of his natural relationship; the law says, "filius noster, nullius filius," which means that "an illegitimate son is the son of nobody."

A CLERGYMAN OF THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH is thanked for his suggestions, which shall have our best consideration. We have, there is no doubt, laboured under the disadvantages to which our clerical correspondent refers, but the experience we have had of the people at large, and of the working classes in particular, convinces us that we need not fear as to the result of our efforts. If, indeed, by our own unassisted enterprise and energy we have succeeded in surrounding ourselves with so enormous a constituency, who appreciate our labours, what might we not effect with the aid, and through the influence, to which our correspondent refers? Under all circumstances we shall persevere in the course we have marked out for ourselves, and though we may not have received that assistance and support to which we feel we are entitled, from those who wish to promote the dissemination of a pure and wholesome literature, we congratulate ourselves upon the extraordinary success we have achieved, and cherish with satisfaction the knowledge that so much good has already resulted from our efforts.

P. C. 34, X.—You will gain the information you require by writing to the secretaries of the clubs.

CORNWALLIS (Hull).—If you deduct discount from the amount of 40s. you, of course, reduce the amount below 40s. and render a stamped receipt unnecessary.

OBLIGED QUERRIST.—No "injurious effect is likely to result from the moderate use of prepared ices during this hot season."

VILLE.—The proper pronunciation of ville is veal.

GIL BLAS.—You will find advertisements respecting New Zealand vessels, &c., in all the leading daily papers.

A SUFFERER.—Bathe your eyelids every morning with rose-water.

W. F.—You ask us how you are to remove spots of grease "from the covers of books;" but you have forgotten to state of what substance the covers are made.

ENTERPRISE.—Your proposed remedy would, we think, prove far more unsightly and unpleasant than the defect of which you complain. As to "strengthening the voice," that, if the lungs be sound, may be accomplished by exercise.

QUESTOR.—Apply to the Herald's Office, Doctors' Commons, London. AN ENTERPRIZER.—Not that we know of.

MALCOLM.—No. TERRAL'S LYRE.—Consult the ability and taste of the amateur. SELF-BETROTHED had best spell his name correctly, a variation can only cause confusion. R. J. MASON does not state his qualifications. BONNY may rely on our attention. Z. A.—Yes. F. W. C.—Yes. PETER HANDLEY.—The delay must arise from post-office neglect.

S. T. P.—You will not get into the office of any respectable civil engineer without paying a handsome premium, except through private friendship.

HENRY AND TOM.—Consult the shipping lists. But we do not think it likely that linen-drappers' apprentices are likely to "obtain a living" in New Zealand.

E. S. H. (Gravesend).—The "French lessons" began in No. 23. You can obtain the numbers, by order, of any respectable bookseller or news agent in your town.

A RESPONDING ONE.—We do not think your case as serious as you do yourself, but we will consider it attentively. There is an old proverb, "All's well that ends well." We are not about to dispute the truth of this saying, all we wish to prove to you is, that things seldom end well that begin ill. Now just mark the course of the affaire de cœur that has plunged you in such deep distress. In the first place, you encouraged it, if not contrary to the authority of your parents, at least in opposition to their known wishes. They desired you to remain at home on account of the expected visit of a gentleman of great worth and high reputation, whose alliance they coveted because they thought him likely to make you happy, but you could have no peace until you had accepted an invitation to visit a friend, at whose house you knew you were to meet a gentleman, more remarkable for agreeable, than estimable, qualities. In his charming company, you were so intoxicated by his compliments and attentions, that you found a week pass like a dream, but at the ball that took place on the eve of your departure, your admirer's devotion was not proof against the attraction of new beauties, and you spent a dull evening, for though others courted, he neglected you. Cease to deceive yourself. He does not love you. Novelty has great charms for a flirt; it has none for a man truly in love. Do not hesitate for a moment; refuse the next invitation that would throw you again into his company. Determine to receive the polite attentions of your father's friend, and determine also to make yourself agreeable to him. The very effort will do you good. It will draw you from dangerous musing, and from indulging in vain wishes, and one conquest over yourself will lead to another, until you will look back and wonder how a heartless man could have exercised such power over you.

ESTHER AND ANNIE.—"Esther" and "Annie" should reflect that every earthly pleasure has its drawback. They have been "supremely happy" at the sea-side, riding over the downs, reading interesting books while the fresh breeze fanned their cheeks, walking on the pier by moonlight, and bathing in the sea before breakfast; but—and there is a but to everything—they have become so dreadfully sun-burnt and freckled, that they declare they have ceased to be fair beauties without becoming brunettes. "Esther" and "Annie" would not mind the sun-burn—it is on account of the freckles that they appeal to us for aid. We will give their case attention. We must, however, consider the cause of the freckles before we proceed to the cure. According to chemists, most combustible things have carbon for their basis, so has the skin, and if exposed to the heat it becomes spotted or charred. The iron and oxygen in the blood assist to produce this effect. Thus freckles are occasioned. Both fair and dark people are subject to them, but they show a preference for red-haired beauties, and why? because les cheveux roux result from a red coloured oil, strongly impregnated with iron. In order, then, to remove freckles, we must have recourse to such chemicals as will remove existing combinations. Freckles are situated in the second or middle membrane of the skin, therefore we should begin the cure by applying a mild balsam to the surface. For this purpose take 1oz. of bitter almonds, 1oz. of barley flour, and a table-spoonful of honey. Mix these ingredients into a paste, and anoint the face with it at night. Mind you wash it off in the morning. After using this for a few days, you may apply a lotion thus prepared:—Mix well together a drachm of muriatic acid, half a pint of rain water, and half a tea-spoonful of spirit of lavender. Apply some of this to the freckles, twice a day, with a camel's hair brush.

S. WHITFORD.—To enable you to become patient under the fear of being stung by wasps, bees, or gnats, we advise you to think of all the horrors and dangers (from venomous creatures) that the inhabitants of the torrid zone are exposed to in hot weather. Think of the mosquito, the scorpion, the deadly serpent! But to return to our minor torments, if you should unluckily be stung by a wasp or a bee, spread over the part affected a plaster of salad oil and common salt. If you cannot immediately procure oil, moisten the salt with vinegar or water. Should so alarming an accident as swallowing a wasp (in fruit or food of any kind) happen to you, or any one near you, let a tea-spoonful of salt be immediately taken, in order to kill the wasp and heal the sting, but send immediately for medical advice, that any ulterior bad effects may be averted.

MARY.—The boxes and other articles belonging to a servant cannot be legally seized for rent and taxes due from her master. For an answer to your other question you must apply to a skilful medical practitioner.

E. CORREIGN wishes us to tell her "how to make, or where to obtain, arsenic-cakes," she having heard that such cakes have the property of making the eaters "fat, rosy, &c." We caution her against the use of so deadly an ingredient. As to the mark on her sister's arm, it is doubtful whether it will ever be wholly eradicated.

A CONSTANT READER and MABEL D. both address us on the same day. The first is fifteen years old, and, considering himself much too tall, wishes to know how his growth may be checked; while "Mabel," aged seventeen, is much shorter than she wishes, and asks us for a receipt to make her grow tall! Our young correspondents should be satisfied with their stature, their complexion, the colour of their hair, &c., &c. At least, we cannot help them.

A SUBSCRIBER FROM THE FIRST.—The marriage between J. S. and C. G. is legal, notwithstanding the circumstances you have named; though the parties have exposed themselves to the charge of perjury as to the matter of their residence.

AN INVALID.—We cannot recommend the institution about which you make inquiry.

AN INQUIRER.—Apply to the Office of Inland Revenue, Somerset House, Strand.

U. W. M.—You may extract ink marks from linen by the application of salt of lemons or tartaric acid.

JACQUES.—Our reply to F. P. R. X. applied to an institution about which he made inquiry.

J. ANDREW.—Ibid, or ibidem, is a Latin adverb, signifying there, or in the same place, or from the same author.

AN IGNORANT PERSON.—Strings made of india-rubber will not answer in the construction of an Æolian harp.

E. G. M.—The word "hilarity" is from the Latin hilaritas, joyful, merry; it means mirth, merriment, gaiety, and differs from joy. Joy, excited by good news or prosperity, is an affection of the mind; hilarity is excited by social pleasure, drinking, and other things which rouse the animal spirits.

OLIVIA L. L. must obtain proper medical advice.

F. M. (Chapel-hall) can obtain the three missing numbers by post, upon sending 6d. to the office in La Belle Sauvage Yard.

NELLY must choose for herself; but she need not be in a hurry.

BOB.—The "Selah" in the Psalms is generally supposed to be a musical mark, signifying silence, or a pause in the performance of the song.

C. D. W. D.—The marks tattooed in the skin are not to be eradicated.

IGNORAMUS.—The emphasis should be laid on the second syllable, thus, "Po-lyc-ra-tes."

A RECHABITE will find a good receipt for making the black ticket inks in No. 17, page 272.

EXCELSIOR, FLORENTIA, R. O'MALLEY, AND OTHERS.—To prescribe with safety for the removal of pimples, &c., the cause of their appearance must be first ascertained. They are, for the most part, efforts of nature for the riddance of inward impurities, and to check them would prove injurious.

UN DE VOS AMIS.—The age at which it is proper for a youth to leave his country home for London, must be regulated by circumstances; we can lay down no fixed rule.

ONE DEEPLY IN LOVE.—Your taking "a walk every morning about five o'clock" would, doubtless, "benefit your health;" but how this is to "increase the warmth of your lady's attachment to you," we do not exactly perceive.

H. K. (Ledbury).—As you are so anxious to improve your handwriting, we recommend you to practice the system contained in Ward and Lock's "Model Copy Books." They are published monthly at threepence each—No. 158, Fleet-street, E. C.

HUDEBRAS.—Many exercises, in Latin, French, German, &c., are submitted to us for examination and correction. We have neither time nor space for reply. At the first glance, however, we perceive that your Latin composition is incorrect.

AN ANXIOUS SUBSCRIBER may obtain the numbers containing the tale of "The Young Pretender" (Nos. 186 to 206, old series), for 2s. 6d., or if sent by post, for 3s.

* * * We cannot guarantee the return of rejected manuscripts.

All Letters and Communications for the Editor to be addressed to JOHN CASSELL, La Belle Sauvage Yard, London, E. C.

London: Printed and Published for JOHN CASSELL by PETTER and GALPIN, at the Belle Sauvage Printing Works, Ludgate-hill, E. C.

NEW SERIES. VOL. II.—No. 34.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 24, 1858.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER LXXI.

One woe doth tread upon another's heels,
So fast they follow.—SHAKESPEARE.

THE temple of Mariatele was situated on the brow of a gently sloping hill, one of a chain intersecting a vast plain, cultivated only in patches, the rest jungle, marsh, and forest. Although not originally intended as a place of defence, it was, like most of the religious edifices in India, a structure of considerable strength, being surrounded by a square inclosure of solid masonry, with loop-holes for musketry, and lofty towers at each angle, not unlike the campanile of Italy in their general design, but far more fantastically ornamented.

From its superior elevation the temple commanded the neighbouring fort, a comparatively modern building, scarcely a mile to the westward; and so obvious were its advantages, in a strategical point of view, that it had long been the ambition of the rajah to obtain possession of it, in order to convert it into the seat of his power. But the opposition of the Brahmins and the superstition of the people, who held the shrine in peculiar reverence, had hitherto defeated his designs. It was not without reluctance that the former consented—after he had taken a solemn oath upon the Vedas not to attempt anything against their rights—to Acbar's removing some of his heavy guns and ammunition to their walls for security, so that, if driven from the fort, he might be enabled to make a second stand against their mutual enemies.

His treasures, wrung from the oppressed and enslaved tillers of the soil, were received far more willingly. The only entrance to the quadrangle was by a single gate, on either side of which the architect had placed the sacred bull, each a colossal monolith. In the interior rose the shrine, profusely decorated with sculptured monstrosities, both externally and in the interior; it contained also several ranges of low-roofed buildings which served as storehouses, and abodes of the priests and pilgrims who annually visited the temple. Such was the place to which Sir Charles Fourreau had determined to retreat with his gallant regiment, and await the arrival of the forces rapidly advancing to the siege of Delhi.

The precautions which the British commander had taken in placing a line of sentinels to prevent all communications between the fort and the inhabitants of the village, and the apparent neglect of establishing any outpost, convinced the traitorous rajah that the report of his emissary was correct, that his design of attacking them was unsuspected, and that the solitary band must fall surprised and unprepared.

Great, therefore, was his astonishment when the advancing column of his force, in emerging from the wood, which had, as they supposed, screened their approach, were received by a regular volley, which left many a saddle empty, and sent the riderless horses mad with pain and terror, galloping in confusion over the plain.

A SUCCESSFUL SALLY.

Before the rebels could recover from their panic the volley was renewed.

"Well done!" exclaimed Major Plinlimmon, delighted with the success of his plan; "steady, men; clear the village."

The troop formed three a-breast as coolly as if they had been at a review or on parade, and dashed at full speed through the long straggling street. As they proceeded, those who had been placed to fire the houses, joined them, and their retreat was masked by a line of flame.

The main body of the regiment had already penetrated a considerable distance into the jungle, when the first volley of the major's party was heard. Sir Charles, who had hitherto kept by the side of the carriage occupied by the ladies, instantly drew rein and listened.

In a few minutes the firing was repeated.

"Your place is no longer here," observed his wife, extending her hand to him.

"God protect you, Bell!" exclaimed the agitated husband, folding her in a passionate embrace. "A very short time will decide our fate."

"I am quite prepared," murmured the heroic woman, at the same time casting a glance towards Wharton, who, pale as death, rode at the opposite side of the vehicle.

Imprinting a hasty kiss upon the brow of Lillian, the gallant veteran disappeared, and placed himself at the head of his men. The tribute to human love and human weakness had been paid; his life was now his country's.

A mental prayer for his safety rose to the mercysat on high from the hearts of his wife and adopted child, as he rode off.

"How far is the temple?" inquired her ladyship of the young cornet, in a tone which she endeavoured to render firm.

"About a mile from the skirts of the jungle."

"And that?"

"Stretches two miles further."

From the nature of the ground, the advance of the party was necessarily slow, and for some time not a sound was heard, except the heavy tramp of the horses as their hoofs fell with a dull, heavy tread upon the tangled grass, or splashed in the pools of stagnant water from which the poisonous malaria exhaled.

"We are followed!" exclaimed Mrs. Burke, breaking the painful silence.

Fred Wharton reined up his horse to listen. The approach of cavalry was distinctly heard. It was either Major Plinlimmon and his men, or the victorious enemy. The doubt was too agonising to be endured. Burying his spurs into the flanks of his charger, he galloped off towards the rear-guard.

"Did you hear the firing?" he demanded of the senior captain who commanded it.

"Twice," replied the officer. "There is music in the ring."

"And a pretty lively tune it is," observed the doctor. "Trust the major for that; he is pursued. The rebels have avoided the burning village by a detour."

"And must overtake us."

"Little doubt of that."

The heart of the cornet beat wildly, as he thought of the fearful promise he had made.

"When the major comes up," continued the speaker, "we must make a stand to enable our comrades and the ladies to reach the temple."

During his ride, Wharton had noticed that the long grass, from the excessive drought, rustled dry and crisply beneath his horse's feet, and an idea, almost as desperate as their situation, struck him.

"I have it," he said: "let us fire the jungle."

There was a pause before the commander of the handful of men who formed the rear-guard replied to him.

"It is our only chance," he replied at last; the next instant he gave the word to halt.

Each soldier drew his rein and sat silently and unconcerned in his saddle, as if on the old parade-ground at Calcutta. The order was given, and the mode of executing it explained. Half the party dismounted, and began cutting, with their sabres, the long grass and reeds, which they formed into bundles, and placed at equal distances. By the time they had completed their task, their comrades rode up.

"Ride for your lives," shouted Plinlimmon, the instant he recognised them; "the rebels are at least two thousand strong."

"And how far off?" demanded the captain.

"About a mile."

"Plenty of time, major," said Dr. Burke, coolly.

In all probability the choleric Welshman would have made some not very complimentary rejoinder on finding his authority so unceremoniously treated, had not shortness of breath prevented him. Before he could recover it, Burke had explained to him the suggestion of Wharton, and the steps already taken to carry it into execution.

"Capital!" exclaimed the major; "we'll smoke the rascals."

Drawing his men into a wide gully, or ravine, which intersected the jungle for several miles, the captain gave orders to the dismounted hussars to fire the grass. The red flames rose rapidly, and dense volumes of smoke began to spread like a veil of darkness through the atmosphere.

Several of the brave fellows volunteered to ride in various directions, scattering their burning brands, in order to increase the conflagration. The slight wind fortunately proved in a favourable direction; and when the rebel rajah and his forces came up, they found an impassable barrier of fire between them and the gallant band they had looked upon as an easy prey. Vainly they tried to penetrate it; foiled in the attempt, their next endeavour was to pass beyond the limits of the sea of flame. But the flames were swifter than their steeds; the disappointed chief cursed the Christians in the impotence of his fury, and reluctantly gave orders for a retreat, consoling himself with the reflection that in a hostile country and unsupported by their countrymen, the isolated band of heroes must ultimately perish.

In his rage and mortification he had forgotten the temple, and the indomitable energies of the Saxon race, destined to be once more proved to the world by a succession of achievements unparalleled in the history of modern warfare. If the English government appears to take an insane pleasure in being always unprepared, late events have proved how nobly Englishmen can redeem their errors.

The deep regret is that the price should be so costly.

The danger which menaced the rear-guard of the gallant 01st was far from being over yet, for the fire spread with a rapidity which threatened not only the pursuers but the pursued, forcing the latter in several instances to make long and painful detours from the track to avoid it. Sometimes they were startled by a mingled herd of frightened deer and antelopes dashing madly past them, hunted by the pitiless flames, which crept stealthily along the ground, where the grass proved scant or low, then rose into fury, like a pack of hounds in full cry suddenly opening on the scent, when they came to a more luxuriant vegetation.

It was singular to notice the effect which terror had produced upon the animal creation. Leopards, especially the cheetah or hunting species, mingled with the flying herd without attempting to select a victim—fear had subdued the ferocity of their nature, and more than one royal tiger crossed the path of the retreating soldiers, the head close to the ground, and tail hanging like a torpid snake between its legs.

So passionately fond was Major Plinlimmon of the chase, that, had he been riding for less than life, nothing could have restrained him from his favourite sport.

We must now leave the retreating party for awhile, and request the attention of our readers whilst we describe what was going on in the great quadrangle of the temple, where the inhabitants of the now blazing village, by command of the Brahmins and the rajah, had conveyed not only their provisions and cattle but whatever else of value they possessed.

Al Moorad, Nadir, the chief priest, the native magistrate and collector were standing in the light gallery which ran round the principal dome of the building, watching the progress of the flames. There was an expression of intense satisfaction on the withered face of the Brahmin, who doubted not but an instalment of the debt of hatred, due by the Christian rulers of his country, had been paid. A shade of anxiety, on the contrary, rested on the features of the banker. As for their companions, they continued to gaze with that marked apathy peculiar to Asiatics. They had been forced into the rebellion; the priesthood had assured them of success, and they trusted to their promise as to the oracles of fate.

"How rapidly the flames extend," observed Al Moorad, addressing Nadir.

"The land shall be purged with fire," replied the old man—"is it not written in the Vedas?"—and prepared for the last incarnation of Vishnu.

"I may rely on Achar's promise to respect the life of Lillian?"

"As on mine."

"Should he behold her face and be fascinated by her charms?" urged the former speaker, seized with a sudden feeling of jealousy.

"He has a mistress far more beautiful," answered the Brahmin, impatiently—"ambition and the desire of avenging the wrongs of his outraged race; besides," he added, "have we not a pledge that might satisfy even a lover's doubts? Are not his treasures concealed within the temple—his heavy guns and ammunition?"

"He may require them," observed the banker, "to hold his fort."

"Not so; it is sufficiently armed already."

Here the two speakers were interrupted by the native police magistrate calling their attention to the progress of the flames, which, by this time, had spread so widely that it was evident they had extended beyond the village.

"Achar has fired the jungle!" exclaimed Nadir, in a tone of triumph. "Not a Christian will escape him."

"And Lillian—the prize for which I have risked so much," exclaimed Al Moorad.

"Doubtless is in his hands," answered the priest, calmly. "I sent a sure and faithful agent to the village, who would have returned ere this had the design of the rajah been suspected."

The speaker alluded to the pretended fakir who had fallen, as we have seen, into the hands of the colonel of the 01st.

Before emerging from the jungle, the main body of the regiment was overtaken by the major and his party. As the latter rode up, Sir Charles pressed his hand warmly, and thanked him for the skill and courage with which he had executed his instructions.

"The idea of setting fire to the long grass," he observed, "was a master-stroke; it has placed an impenetrable barrier between ourselves and the rebels."

"Little doubt of that," replied the Welshman, wiping the dust and perspiration from his brow; "but the credit of the plan belongs to another."

"To whom?"

"Wharton," answered Plinlimmon.

"Where is he?" inquired the commander.

"Riding by the carriage with Lady Bell and the ladies."

At the name of his wife the lips of the veteran slightly quivered.

"By heavens, Fourreau!" continued the speaker, "she is a noble creature. Her voice sounded as cheerfully when we came up with her as in her drawing-room at Calcutta."

"But don't you think this plan of Wharton's may be turned to account?"

"In what way?"

"By concealing our approach to the temple."

The idea was no sooner suggested than acted upon, and a number of men sent forwards with orders to fire the skirts of the jungle, which soon sent forth a vast cloud of flame and smoke, under cover of which the regiment dashed rapidly across the plain, and took possession of the gate before the crowd within the quadrangle suspected that the enemy, of whose destruction they felt so confident, were in the vicinity.

As not even a guard had been posted within the court, resistance was useless, scarcely any attempt being made to oppose their entrance, and the fugitives were masters of the place before Nadir and his companions were aware of their danger. At first the aged Brahmin mistook them for the rajah and his victorious troops. Great was his rage and disappointment when he discovered that they were the hated English.

"May the gods of India," he exclaimed, "confound them in their impious triumph. The shrine of Mariatete is profaned."

"And what is worse," added Al Moorad, "we shall be prisoners."

The native police magistrate and collector, who knew how little reason they had to expect mercy at the hands of the victors, appeared panic struck.

"Not so," replied the priest; "the goddess will preserve us."

The banker gave an inarticulate "Umph!" Probably from his long association with Europeans, his faith was not so lively as it had once been.

"There is a means of escape known only to those of my sacred order," continued the speaker; "swear by the Vedas never to reveal it, and you shall share my flight."

It is scarcely necessary to add that the required oath was readily taken: that done, Nadir descended from the gallery to the temple, and calling his brother Brahmins around him, proceeded with them to a large recess at the back of the shrine.

"Let the doors be closed," he exclaimed.

With the assistance of his companions, the heavy bronze gates were rolled upon their hinges.

"Now draw the bolts," cried Al Moorad.

"Not a bolt must be drawn," replied the chief priest, "or the Christians will suspect the path by which we escape them; there is no other means of egress visible."

At the command of the speaker, one of the younger Brahmins sprang upon the altar, surmounted by the statue of the goddess, and pressed a spring concealed in the folds of her girdle. A low rumbling noise was heard, as the idol slowly moved aside, and disclosed a narrow staircase descending through the altar, which was of solid stone.

Nadir was the last to disappear, and long before the enemy had penetrated beyond the quadrangle of the temple, the statue of the goddess Mariatele had resumed its accustomed place.

On reaching the bottom of the staircase, the fugitives found themselves in an immense hall or subterranean temple, adorned with grotesque sculptures cut in the solid rock. From this hall, passages diverged in various directions, some leading to prisons, others to those secret shrines where rites were celebrated too fearful to be described, and to which only the initiated were admitted. But what chiefly attracted the attention of the banker and collector were ten long brass guns ranged against the wall. They were evidently of European make, and had been sent by the rajah for safety, in the event of his fort falling into the hands of the English.

"Could we have foreseen this blow," observed the former, "we might have defended the temple against the accursed feringshees."

"The wisdom of the wise has been confounded," replied the chief Brahmin bitterly; "it is some consolation that we have not fallen into their hands."

"But the ammunition and treasures of Acbar have," said the magistrate.

The old man smiled: the treasures were the last things he was likely to have forgotten.

"The goddess has rebuked us for our pride and self-reliance," he made answer; "for, after all, what is the sum of human knowledge? Less than nothing. Mariatele will turn our seeming defeat into a holy triumph."

"But we shall starve here," said the collector, not much delighted at the prospect before him.

"Mariatele will feed her votaries."

"What if the British should discover the entrance from the shrine?"

"Mariatele will defend us," replied the Brahmin. "Let this assurance console you: alive, we shall never fall into their hands. There is ammunition enough in this cavern temple to rend the massive roof asunder, and involve the Christians in the same destruction with ourselves."

The Hindoo appeared anything but gratified at this intelligence. He was a heavy, oleaginous-looking man, with a sensual expression of countenance, and evidently possessed little or no ambition to obtain the honours of martyrdom.

Several of the Brahmins, having lit their torches at the brazen lamps which illuminated the hall, now led the way through one of the numerous passages, till they arrived at a row of cells, each cut in the solid rock. The doors which closed them were of iron; and Al Moorad observed that massive chains were drawn across two of them.

He glanced at his companion with an inquiring look.

"Keboda!" whispered Nadir, as he pointed to the first.

The banker shuddered. He knew the fate reserved, by the inexorable laws of the priesthood, for the unhappy Nautch girl.

"The Christian prisoner," added the speaker, pausing for an instant opposite the second door. "In ten days the moon will be at its full, and the festival of the goddess be celebrated; then shall the sacrifice be accomplished."

We scarcely need inform our readers that the captive to whom the hoary bigot referred was no other than their old acquaintance Caleb, who had fallen into his power on the night he watched the escape of the chief Brahmin and Al Moorad in the garden of the temple near Calcutta.

The cell to which Nadir conducted his guests proved to be considerably larger than the rest, and was furnished with a low divan running round three sides of it. Upon this the old man seated himself, and motioned to them to take their places beside him.

The collector muttered something about food, but his request was unheeded, for his host appeared absorbed in prayer. When he had concluded, he clasped his hands thrice, the usual mode of summoning attendants in the East, and a number of priests entered, bearing trays, on which were piled fruits and rice.

During the repast, Nadir sat apart. He was of far too high a caste to risk pollution by partaking of the same food with his confederates. When they had concluded, he commanded the vessels they had eaten from to be broken in his presence.

The collector and the police magistrate were conducted to a place of repose.

"Is this your promise, father?" said Al Moorad, in a reproachful accent, as soon as they were alone.

"What promise?"

"That Lillian should be in my power. Instead of which her accursed countrymen have made themselves masters of the temple. We are, or soon shall be, in theirs."

"Youth is impatient," observed the Brahmin, drily.

"And age deceitful," retorted the banker. "Frown as you will; I know that I am in your hands, but I also know that my services are indispensable to the success of the cause you have so much at heart. I am one of the keystones of the great confederacy—the agent of the moneyed interests, who hold the balance of success or failure."

"Am I omnipotent?" demanded the old man, without the slightest indication of passion or resentment. "Can I foretell the hour or the manner in which the goddess will execute her promise, and place the Christian maiden in your power? But that she will execute it, I feel assured: she is already within her temple."

"And her countrymen with her," replied his confederate, impatiently.

"Have we not the means of watching their proceedings?" continued Nadir. "What is to prevent our seizing some favourable occasion, and bearing her to this secure retreat?"

The anger of his guest gradually cooled at this suggestion.

"Accomplish that," he exclaimed, "and hand and brain—heart and soul—you shall find me devoted to the cause."

"I would rather the motive were a purer one," observed the priest; "but gold is seldom found without alloy—the jewel-cup of Jaseed was not a perfect gem."

"I love!" answered Al Moorad.

"A Christian!" muttered the Brahmin, with a sneer.

"Still, I love."

His host repeated the word in a tone of cold disdain.

"I have no sympathy," he added, "with the idle passion; neither can I comprehend the weakness which renders mind the slave of matter. She is a daughter of that race whose arts have uprooted the hundred thrones of India—insulted our faith, destroyed our laws; and yet, because accident has moulded her features in a pleasing form, and her skin is fairer than the daughters of the East, you worship her."

"It is my fate," replied Al Moorad, gloomily.

"Say, rather, your folly," muttered the old man, bitterly. "But I will reason with you on this theme no more. Mariatele will enable her votary to redeem the pledge he has made."

On retiring to the cell Nadir had directed to be prepared for him, the banker recognised, to his surprise and discontent, the ayce or groom formerly in the service of our hero. The superstitious reverence of the Hindoo boy for the chief Brahmin had stifled in his breast the sentiment of gratitude, at least for a while, and the old man, pleased with his devotion, had received him into the temple.

"He accuses me of madness," thought Al Moorad, alluding to his host. "His own blind confidence may yet betray us."

For many hours after the successful attempt to take possession of the temple by the 01st, both officers and men were busily occupied in expelling attendant servants and every native who had taken shelter within its walls. The victors discovered to their satisfaction, not only that the place was amply supplied with provisions, but with excellent water from several wells cut in the solid rock. Had it been equally well furnished with ammunition and guns of heavy metal, its possessors might have held out against any force the treacherous rajah could bring into the field against them.

As the numerous worshippers of the goddess were driven forth, they indulged in impotent curses against the soldiers, who either listened to them with philosophic indifference, or replied by urging their loitering steps with the flat of their sabres.

Whilst the exodus of the Hindoos was being carried out, Lady Bell and her companions remained seated in the carriage, guarded by half a dozen dismounted troopers and Fred Wharton.

The features of the young officer, though blackened by smoke and exertion, had resumed their usual self-possession; terror and mental agony no longer agitated him, and his voice sounded cheerfully as he congratulated her ladyship and Lillian upon their safety.

"It is safety," replied Lillian, looking round her with a faint smile.

"At least, for the present," observed her protectress, with a glance at the corner, which reminded him of his promise.

"The worst is past now, I trust," he said, in a low tone.

"To be sure it is," exclaimed Mrs. Burke, who during the retreat through the fiery jungle had maintained the utmost coolness and presence of mind.

"Within good stone walls I have no fear of ten times the number of rebels. Has any one seen the doctor? but I suppose he is looking after our poor, brave, wounded fellows. I wonder if he requires any assistance?"

Fearing that such might be the case, the strong-minded woman leaped lightly from the vehicle in quest of him, pushing her way through the crowd of natives, whom the soldiers were driving to the gate.

The quadrangle and buildings which it inclosed were cleared at last. Not a Hindoo except the prisoner remained. The latter was now led before Sir Charles and the group of officers, who had gathered round the carriage.

The eyes of the fakir appeared blood-shot, and his countenance haggard, with ill-suppressed rage and mortification.

"The temple is ours," observed the major, with a chuckle of satisfaction, "and your rebel rascal of a rajah is disappointed of his prey. I shall live to repay him," he added, "for the hard chase he has given me."

"Threatened men live long."

"Glad to hear it," said Dawlish, who was far from looking on his present position as a satisfactory one.

"Have I not kept faith with you?" demanded the pretended fakir, reproachfully.

"You have."

"Why, then, am I a captive?"

"You are no longer one," replied the colonel, "but at liberty to depart upon the instant. The word of a British officer, once pledged, is inviolable. All I wish to ascertain is whether you will bear a message from me to the miserable rebel Acbar."

"To the mighty prince whom the gods of India protect!" exclaimed the old man, disdainfully.

"And whom we will hang from the highest tower of this temple," added Plinlimmon, by way of commentary, "should he fall into our hands. England has but one method of dealing with traitors."

"We have already proved her tender mercies," observed the Brahmin, bitterly.

"He is but a tool," said Sir Charles, "in the hands of yet more designing villains. Tell him," he added, "to read the future, in the history of the past. The giant that slept might be taken at disadvantage, but England is now fairly roused. By timely submission he may yet hope to escape with life."

The prisoner replied only by a scornful laugh.

Finding the attempt to make any impression upon the fanatic useless, the commander of the 01st directed a sergeant and file of men to conduct him to the gate of the temple and set him at liberty. Strange to say, he showed no inclination to depart; but, on the contrary, pleaded hard for permission to remain with his captors, urging as a reason that his countrymen would scorn him for the weakness he had been guilty of.

"The shelter of a cell, and a handful of rice, are all I ask," he added.

"He must have a poor idea of the intelligence of Englishmen," observed the colonel, turning to his officers, "to imagine them weak enough to fall into so palpable a snare."

"Should I not be still your captive?" said the fakir.

"But now you were impatient to be at liberty."

"That was to try the value of the Christian's word."

"It is stronger even than his patience," exclaimed Sir Charles. "Begone, old hypocrite! tempt not my anger further: we need no spy within our walls, there are traitors enough without them."

At a sign from the commander, the sergeant and men led the Brahmin towards the gates, saw him fairly through, and then closed them behind him.

A shout rose from the soldiers as they saw the last native expelled.

The released prisoner turned and shook his clenched hands menacingly towards the temple.

"Christians!" he exclaimed, with a bitter laugh, "soon shall we meet again."

Day had dawned long before arrangements could be made even for the ladies to retire to rest. After some consultation, the shrine or recess containing the statue of the goddess was decided upon as the securest place, and Rose and the corporal proceeded at once to arrange and make it as comfortable as possible. There Lady Bell and our heroine, worn out with the fatigue and excitement they had endured, retired to snatch a few hours' repose.

The captain's wife and Mrs. Burke made their apartment in one of the adjoining cells.

For several days not the slightest attempt was made on the part of the rebels to disturb the regiment in its new position. Provisions they had in plenty, consisting of rice and meat; the colonel having directed all the cattle, which the natives, with short-sighted policy, had sent for safety to the temple, to be killed and salted.

Meanwhile the rajah was not idle. He perfectly well knew the danger he had incurred, should the British government succeed in re-establishing its former supremacy; but the die was cast, he had compromised himself by a cowardly and treacherous attack upon the Queen's forces, and decided upon following up his treason by a second attempt, which he trusted would prove more successful than the first.

To secure this, he sent out emissaries with a flaming proclamation, describing how he had driven the English from the village, and forced the remnant of the fugitives to take shelter from his victorious arms in the temple of Mariatele; and concluded by calling upon every Hindoo to take arms to avenge the insulted goddess, and fight for his faith and caste.

Many of his countrymen flocked to his standard in consequence of this appeal to their fanaticism, and he soon found himself in a position to attempt the recovery of the sacred edifice by assault; to take it by surprise he well knew to be hopeless, the garrison kept too good a look-out for that.

For more than a week such had been the position of affairs, when one morning at daybreak the sentinel who kept watch from the same lofty gallery running round the principal dome in which Nadir and Al Moorad had witnessed the conflagration of the jungle, gave an alarm by firing off his carbine—a signal that the enemy were approaching.

In a few minutes every man was at his post. "But for a single twenty-four pounder!" exclaimed Major Plinlimmon, as he stood watching the dusky columns advancing across the plain.

"It is useless wishing," answered the colonel, with a sigh; "we must depend upon our small arms; and should it come to close quarters, our good swords."

"Surely they will never venture to attack us without artillery," muttered Dawlish.

"It would seem so," said Burke, who had joined the group, and been watching the forces of the rajah with his glass. "No," he added, and there was a slight shade of disappointment in his tone; "they have two field-pieces with them. I can discern the bullock-train."

"They must be ours," replied the colonel.

"Certainly," added Plinlimmon, as if it was the easiest thing in the world to take them.

"They will take good care, I suspect, not to come within reach of our rifles. The attempt will be a dangerous one," observed Burke.

"The greater the honour if it succeeds, doctor," replied Sir Charles Fourreau. "I shall lead the party myself."

"That's hardly fair, colonel."

"Major!"

"You have a wife," whispered Plinlimmon; "now I am one of those useless things called old bachelors. My life is of no value."

The veteran thanked him warmly, but firmly refused to accept his offer, which was the more disinterested, seeing that he who made it would succeed to the command of the regiment in the event of its colonel falling.

Silently they continued to watch the enemy till they reached the open space of ground between the temple and the jungle, where they formed, with the intention of waiting till their heavy guns came up.

"Now is the time to attack them," exclaimed the colonel, who had previously given his orders.

A party of three hundred men were already mounted in the quadrangle. The gates were thrown open, and they issued forth.

"Reserve your fire," exclaimed their commander, "till within shot; then dash at the field-pieces; capture them if possible, but spike them, at all hazards."

The soldiers gave a hearty cheer as they gallantly rushed forward to meet the enemy.

CHAPTER LXXII.

Heard ye the din of battle bray,
Lance to lance, and horse to horse?—GRAY.

In his impatience to revenge his late defeat and distinguish himself in the eyes of his countrymen by some brilliant act against the English, the rajah had taken the field without waiting the arrival of a large body of sepoys, who were on their way to reinforce him. This levée consisted chiefly of undisciplined horsemen, drawn together by the artful promises of the priests or the hope of plunder, and native policemen, brave enough in action against thieves and criminals, but totally unaccustomed to act in concert.

"The Christians rush on their destruction," cried Nadir, the chief Brahmin, who occupied a conspicuous place in the group of officers near the prince.

"It might have been made more certain," observed Acbar, bitterly, "had you consented to discover to us the secret path by which you obtained egress from the temple."

"Your glory in crushing them will be the greater," replied the old man, who felt that it might be anything but politic to afford the speaker, whose ambition was well known to him, the information he sought.

As the compact body of English advanced across the plain, it became evident that their object was the capture of the guns before they could be brought into position. To prevent this, the rajah placed himself at the head of a portion of his cavalry to intercept them.

The shock of the encounter was terrific. Had the numbers of the 01st been anything like a proportion to the rebels, their superiority of weight in men and horses must have given them an easy victory; even as it was, it forced the enemy to recoil, like the waves first breaking on some isolated rock, then gradually closing round it.

In a short space of time the little band of heroes were enveloped in a cloud of assailants, who still kept at a respectful distance, receding as the former advanced, not to lessen the space between them, but pouring in volleys the while, which told fearfully on the ranks of the British.

Major Plinlimmon, Wharton, and the remaining officers of the 01st, who stood watching the struggle from the walls of the temple, became greatly excited. It was evident that their comrades were in a position of no little danger; and more than once it was debated whether the entire regiment ought not to sally forth and support them. The recollection of the ladies, and what would be their fate in the event of failure, alone restrained them.

"I can look no longer," exclaimed the major, handing the glass to one of his companions. "If the colonel's orders had not been so strict—"

"You must break through them," said a gentle voice near them.

The officers turned and recognised Lady Bell and Lillian. Neither could repress their anxiety whilst one so dear to them was exposing his life in an almost hopeless encounter with the wily enemy.

"What will become of you, should fortune turn against us?" demanded the major.

"We should know how to die," answered the heroic woman, calmly, and at the same time fixing her regards on Wharton. "Haste, gentlemen! bestow not a single thought upon us. The blood of brave men is being shed—uselessly shed; for there are odds against which human courage must succumb."

"By heavens! that was a noble charge," cried the delighted doctor, who had caught up the glass, and been steadily regarding the contest on the open plain.

The struggling band of English had suddenly wheeled round, and cut their way through the body of natives between them and the guns.

"Now," he added, with still greater excitement, "now is the time."

The major hesitated no longer, but directed his remaining men to mount. In an inconceivably brief space of time every soldier was in his saddle, eager to share in the gallant deeds of his comrades—to conquer or die with them.

An old sergeant, with a guard of twenty men, alone remained within the walls to protect the females, and hold the gates against the enemy, should any attempt be made to obtain possession of the temple.

At a terrific pace the gallant fellows dashed through the open portal to the assistance of their countrymen. There was something sublime in the stern expression of each sunburnt countenance when Plinlimmon gave the word to charge. The men fell like an avalanche upon the astonished foe. Riders and horses alike gave way. The 01st poured like a torrent through the ranks of the rebels, who this time did not close around them.

The rajah saw his danger, and, turning from the party under the command of Sir Charles, which he deemed his reserve quite strong enough to deal with, directed his followers to serry their ranks to meet the fresh attack.

To do the rebel leader justice, he showed no want of personal courage, but led them fearlessly to the encounter.

The colonel, who saw the move which had been made to support him, instead of dashing at the guns, as Acbar expected, wheeled round with the remnant of his band to attack the natives in the rear.

Acbar began to feel that his position was getting desperate, and galloping his horse at the major, who by this time appeared almost breathless with exertion, would have cut him down, had not a shot from the unerring hand of Wharton shattered his sword arm, and caused the uplifted weapon to fall from his nerveless grasp.

The English set up a shout of triumph, and made a desperate effort to capture the fallen rebel leader, in which they must have succeeded, had not his own men—excited to madness by the fanatical exhortations of the Brahmin Nadir, who, although unarmed, had exposed himself in the deadliest of the fight—closed round him, and bore him from the plain.

The contest was now virtually at an end, for the confusion caused by the fall of their chief soon became a panic, and they fled towards the fort. The only body of the enemy that now remained were those surrounding the guns, and they already began to waver.

"I owe you a life, Wharton," said the major, coolly. "I shan't forget the debt."

"You have paid it a hundred times," replied the colonel, "in your gallantry on the field."

"All right!" exclaimed the warm-hearted Welshman; "but we must have those infernal guns. By heavens! they are getting them in position."

Not an instant was to be lost. With unabated courage the 01st formed once more and reached the mound before the gunners could discharge them. In a few minutes every man was sabred, not a rebel remained capable of offering the slightest resistance: all but the wounded and dead had fled.

Then rose a cheer, such as Englishmen alone can give; a cheer which told of victory, hardly and dearly won, for many a brave fellow had purchased it with his life blood.

The dying soldiers faintly joined in, and those whose sands were too nearly run, expired with a smile of proud satisfaction on their grim, sunburnt features, conscious that they had done their duty.

As the cheering cry was repeated, a white scarf fluttered in the air from the walls of the temple.

"It was against orders, Colonel Fourreau," said the major, as his commander, covered with dust and blood, rode up to the spot where the last struggle had taken place, "but, under the circumstances, I thought—"

Sir Charles cut the speaker short by warmly thanking him for his timely aid, and added that his courage and prompt decision had saved the regiment.

"You are not wounded, I trust?" observed the gratified Plinlimmon.

"Not a scratch," replied the colonel.

"And yet you were in the thickest. Hard pounding,—never saw harder in all my experience."

It was no time to bandy compliments. The wounded had still to be removed to the temple, together with the guns so bravely captured, and the ammunition wagons.

This proved to be a task of no small danger, for the rebels, who had partially recovered from their panic, were now forming again under the protection of the fort, whose cannon began to open on the victors.

As the bullocks which dragged them had been slain, a portion of the men dismounted, and attached their own horses to the pieces. The wounded were collected, and the gallant but diminished 01st slowly withdrew from the scene of their hard-won triumph.

As they approached the temple, officers and soldiers recognised the wife of their commander and Lillian on the walls. They remembered the courageous words the former had spoken when urging them to the rescue of their comrades, and saluted them with a shout of triumph.

A brief but heartfelt prayer of gratitude to Him whose will decides the fate of battles rose from the lips of Lady Bell and our heroine, when they beheld Sir Charles advancing at the head of his men, in safety and unwounded.

"Let us descend and meet him," exclaimed Lillian. Her protectress needed no second invitation.

A hasty embrace and a few whispered words of congratulation were all that passed between them when her husband rode into the quadrangle.

"I must see to the accommodation of my brave wounded men," said the baronet, as he gently unloosed the arms of Lillian from his neck. "Burke will find his hands full, I fear."

"We will assist him!" exclaimed both the ladies.

"It is but little we can do to prove our gratitude to our brave defenders, but that little shall be done cheerfully."

"It is woman's true mission," observed Sir Charles, as he saw them depart upon their errand of mercy. "Life would be a hard struggle," he added, "did not her sweetness temper it."

Not knowing how soon the enemy might venture upon another attack, every man, except the wounded and those who were attending upon them, was speedily engaged in conveying the guns they had captured at such a fearful expense of life, to the walls, and bringing them in a position to bear upon the fort. Their commander, major, and officers, all lent their aid, and in a few hours the pieces were placed.

"I wish," said Plinlimmon, patting one of them affectionately, "that we had half a dozen more like you. Colonel," he added, "it is some years since I quitted the Artillery, but I don't think I have quite forgotten my practice. I should like to try their range."

"As soon as you please, major," replied the baronet. The largest of the two pieces, a twenty-four pounder, was carefully charged, and the gallant Welshman, having levelled it at a body of the enemy manœuvring in front of the fort, discharged it with his own hand. The ball evidently took effect, for the rebels dispersed in confusion.

"Huzzah!" shouted the major, greatly excited; "they will have tough work to take the temple yet."

The colonel sighed: he thought of the gallant fellows who had fallen.

(To be continued.)

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

EXTRAVAGANCE.

EXTRAVAGANCE is more common in youth than in age. Avarice is strange to the young, but carefulness is sometimes mistaken for it. The careful man is no miser. Let no such fear intrude itself into the generous heart of youth. Such a thought may make shipwreck of good principles by taking the helm out of the hand of Reason, and rendering the young mariner indifferent to the shoals and quicksands which obstruct the channels of extravagance.

Solomon says: "There is treasure to be desired, and oil in the dwelling of the wise; but a foolish man spendeth it up." The frugal are prosperous; but the extravagant come to ruin. They revel for awhile in enjoyment, but penniless, hungry, and barefoot, in the end, they have to quit their pleasures. This is not only the case of those of large means, who have broad acres to mortgage when cash is exhausted, and bill-discounters have grown dubious. Spendthrifts are found in all the phases of society—spendthrifts striving after that which they least need—not scrupulous as to the means by which their luxuries are purchased, never content with the pleasures so obtained, but utterly deaf to conscience and blind to consequences.

Those who rely on their own prudent exertions, and properly improve their talents, are under no necessity of suffering either penury or disgrace. On the contrary, the indolent and extravagant will soon exhaust the most ample resources, and involve themselves in the greatest contempt. The prodigal is ruined rather by what he fancifully desires than by what he really needs. He goes on buying that which he does not want, until he wants that which he cannot buy. It is possible to be rich with a small income, and poor with an ample fortune. The difference lies between spending and saving. How much money is squandered on that which is utterly useless, not only by those who have abundance for which they neither toil nor spin, but by those who work hard for their wages, and eat bread in the sweat of their face. Money melts away rapidly, but, properly taken care of, it may build a bulwark between ourselves and future poverty. Frugality and self-denial now, may save us from want and sorrow in the future, and surely we should think of worn-out self as well as of present self—not only of to-day but of to-morrow, and of the day after to-morrow, too. Admirable in this respect is the maxim—"Can I do without it? can I spend less? can I save more?"

But the extravagant man seldom adopts an honourable course of conduct when he would acquire those things which he is ambitious to display or anxious to enjoy. Moderation is the silken string that runs through the pearl chain of all the virtues; and the string once broken, the pearls are scattered. When people begin to make a show which they cannot afford, either in dress, or home, or pursuits, or anything else, virtue is threatened. We increase our own unhappiness by multiplying our wants. We attempt to dazzle our acquaintance, and to assert our equality with those above us, and we sacrifice our interest and peace of mind. The eyes of other people are the eyes that ruin us. Necessity soon compels the spendthrift to retrench or adopt dishonourable means for procuring money. It is easy to see what course he would be likely to pursue, and what consequences he will soon incur.

An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. It is easier to extinguish the first extravagant desire, than to restrain the flame of ungovernable passion. But the spendthrift practises no such prudent forethought. Prodigious of means, he is avaricious of indulgence. Frivolous pursuits, hollow amusements, expensive habits of all kinds, will soon prove that riches make themselves wings and fly away. "It is hard," says a quaint proverb, "for an empty bag to stand upright," and it is equally hard for the extravagant man to avert penury and disgrace. If integrity be sacrificed, as indeed it often is, this only aggravates the evil a thousand-fold. Criminality then joins company with poverty, and he who breakfasted with plenty, sups with infamy.

And this is no fanciful or exaggerated picture. There are thousands who, placed in positions of respectability in their youth, have, by their extravagance, their desire to vie with more wealthy companions, brought themselves to ruin and disgrace. They have gone on slowly but surely. They have first left prudence behind, then they have lost sight of moderation, then they have surrendered their integrity, and soon they become amenable to the laws of their country.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER XII.

"I SHALL give you your last exercise on the articles to-day," said George to his friend Robert. "You see there is not any great difficulty about them, but do bear in mind that our words some and any are generally rendered in French by the genitive case of the definite article, viz., by du in the masculine, de la in the feminine; by de l' for nouns beginning with a vowel, and by des for the plural of both masculine and feminine nouns beginning with either vowels or consonants. You must also remember what you have illustrated in the exercises, viz., that the French sometimes use the article where we do not do so, and that they occasionally omit it where we use it.

"Before the ordinal numbers, after the Christian names of sovereigns, no article is used in French, and before nouns of quantity and measure the definite article is used. In many instances the article is adopted or omitted in the same manner as in English.

EXERCISE.

1. All the (friends) I had have deserted me in my (amis m. que) (m'ont déserté) dans mon misfortune. 2. Everybody says that the king will declare (malheur m. tout monde dit que roi déclarera) war with England. 3. (Every one) says that you have more (guerre f. à Angleterre. chacun dit que) qualities but less brilliancy than your rival. 4. He has (qualités mais éclat m. que votre) never any money, but it is not because he has no (jamais argent m. mais ce) fortune. 5. He has many of the faults and qualities (f. plusieurs défauts m. qualités f.) which we admired in his father. 6. Give me an ell of (que admira dans son père. donnez-moi aune f.) the same ribbon which you have given to my sister. 7. (même ruban m. que donné ma sœur.)

A great number of the persons who were at the ball (grand nombre personnes f. qui bal m.) last night will sail for France to-morrow. 8. The Duke (hier soir partiront pour Duc) of Berry, the son of Charles the Tenth, was murdered by (fils Dix, fut assassiné par) Louvel. 9. Henry the Fifth, the legitimate king of France, (cinq. roi légitime) is now in England. 10. Corn (sells for) eight shillings (maintenant en Angleterre. blé m. se vend) a bushel. 11. Veal and beef cost fivepence a pound. (boisseau m. veau m. bœuf m. content livre f.) 12. This lace sells at two crowns an ell. 13. My brother (cette dentelle se vend aune f. mon) goes to France three times a year. 14. My sons and (va en fois an m. mes fils) daughters make six shillings a week. 15. The more I (mes filles gagnent semaine f. plus) see your daughter, the more I love her. 16. What a (vois votre fille f. l'aime) beautiful morning! let us go into the country. 17. Of (belle matinée f. allons à campagne f.) all the ladies who were at the ball yesterday, your (toutes dames qui bal m. vos) sisters were the most pleased. 18. Chateaubriand and (sœurs se sont amusées.)

Lamartine are the authors whom I like the best, and the (auteurs m. que aime mieux, philosophes of the eighteenth century are those whom I (philosophes dix-huitième siècle m. ceux que) like the least. 19. The small and the large house which (moins. petite grande maison f. que) we have seen to-day are equally convenient to me. 20. (vues aujourd'hui ne conviennent également.)

The first and second floor of this house please me (premier — étage m. cette maison f. me plaisent.) 21. The young and pretty lady whom we met this (jeune jolie demoiselle que avons rencontrée ce) morning is the sister of my wife. (sœur ma femme.)

CORRIGE.

1. Tous les amis que j'avais m'ont déserté dans mon malheur. 2. Tout le monde dit que le roi déclarera la guerre à l'Angleterre. 3. Chacun dit que vous avez plus de qualités mais moins d'éclat que votre rival. 4. Il n'a jamais d'argent, mais ce n'est pas parcequ'il n'a pas de fortune. 5. Il a plusieurs des défauts et des qualités que nous admirons dans son père. 6. Donnez-moi une aune du même ruban que vous avez donné à ma sœur. 7. Un grand nombre des personnes qui étaient au bal hier soir, partiront demain pour la France. 8. Le Duc de Berry, fils de Charles Dix, fut assassiné par Louvel. 9. Henri V., roi légitime de la France, est maintenant en Angleterre. 10. Le blé se vend huit shillings le boisseau. 11. Le veau et le bœuf content dix sous la livre. 12. Cette dentelle se vend deux couronnes l'aune. 13. Mon frère va en France trois fois par an. 14. Mes fils et mes filles gagnent six couronnes par semaine. 15. Plus je vois votre fille, plus je l'aime. 16. Quelle belle matinée! allons à la campagne. 17. De toutes les dames qui étaient hier au bal, vos sœurs se sont le plus amusées. 18. Chateaubriand et Lamartine sont les auteurs que j'aime le mieux, et les philosophes du dix-huitième siècle sont ceux que j'aime le moins. 19. La petite et la grande maison que nous avons vues aujourd'hui me conviennent également. 20. Le premier et le second étage de cette maison me plaisent. 21. La jeune et jolie demoiselle que nous avons rencontrée ce matin, est la sœur de ma femme.

"And now, Robert, let us talk a little," observed the instructor. "Tell me if you think you will soon be able to speak French fluently?"

"I fear not very soon, George," said Robert, "for although I must have made a good deal of progress, since I have learnt so many things, that were quite new to me, still my confidence has not increased with my acquisitions, and the more rules I find there are belonging to every part of speech, the more afraid I am of committing an error whenever I open my mouth."

"Well, I'm glad you've spoken out plainly," answered George, "because you give me the opportunity of warning you that you will never speak French until you banish your foolish timidity, a timidity that has its origin in an improper pride. Why should you expect to do a thing well that you have never done before? It is only practice that makes perfect, and how are you ever to be perfect if you do not practice? Whether with Miss Cribb or with any Frenchman you may happen to meet, let me advise you to speak 'à tort ou à travers,' a proverb we should translate 'right or wrong.' Introduce every French word you know as often as you can, and talk half English rather than not talk at all. When once you have embarked in conversation, don't puzzle yourself about rules. Be determined to do your best, and be satisfied with it. Of course, when you are studying the language, you cannot be too attentive or too particular, and the more words and sentences you learn by heart the greater stock you will have to draw upon, but for talking it is confidence must be your watchword. Besides, your remarks will direct your companion's replies, and thus you may learn 'des façons de parler' (modes of speaking), that a shy, silent youth would never have heard. And now take your pen and add to your vocabulary. You have a tolerable stock of words relating to land and water. Those you will write to-day will be about the atmosphere."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
The climate	Le climat (m)
The cold	Le froid (m)
The heat	La chaleur (f)
The dawn	L'aurore (f)
A breeze	Une brise (f)
The squall	La bourrasque (f)
Thunder	La foudre (f), le tonnerre (m)
Lightning	L'éclair (m)
A heavy shower	Une averse (f)
An avalanche	Une avalanche (f)
An aurora borealis	Une aurore boréale (f)
A storm	Un orage (m)
Frost	La gelée (f)
Snow	La neige (f)
Ice	La glace (f)
Hail	La grêle (f)
Fog	Le brouillard (m)
Mist	La brume (f)
Calm	Le calme (m)
The rain	La pluie (f)
The dew	La rosée (f)
Drought	La sécheresse (f)
The trade winds	Les vents alisés (m pl)
The wind	Le vent (m)
A waterspout	Une trombe (f).

"To-morrow, Robert," observed George, "you shall make a study apart of the manner in which the French express themselves about the weather; for, in this respect, the idioms of their language differ essentially from ours. They generally use the verb faire (to make) where we employ the verb être (to be). Suppose, now, we continue our 'Journey to Paris,'"

"With all my heart; or, rather," added Robert, smiling, "Avec tout mon cœur."
 "Bravo!" said George. "I see you have taken my advice in good part, and that you are determined to speak out boldly; for, although your sentence was not quite correct, it did very well, and your remark is the means of gaining for you a knowledge of the correct phrase—viz., 'De tout mon cœur.'"

CONTINUATION OF

LE VOYAGE À PARIS.

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
Here we are again in the carriage, and somewhat refreshed.	Nous voici encore en voiture (f), et un peu recomfortés.
I hope we shall have no more tunnels; I never could become accustomed to them.	J'espère que nous n'aurons plus de tunnels (m pl); je ne pourrais jamais m'y habituer.
I believe in a little while you would not care about them. They are lighted, and not very long.	Jé crois qu'en peu de temps (m) je n'y ferais pas attention. Pourvu qu'ils fussent éclairés, et pas trop longs.
I am happy to say we are out of this dismal cavern. You are rather nervous.	Moi je suis charmé d'être sorti de cet abîme (m). Vous êtes un peu timide.
I do not quite agree with you; you must own that tunnels are dismal caverns, and that all those who are not accustomed to them enter them with a shudder.	Pardonnez-moi; il faut convenir que les tunnels (m) sont des gouffres (m pl) noirs, et que ceux qui n'y sont pas habitués n'y entrent qu'en tremblant.
If I were a smoker I would now light a cigar.	Si j'étais fumeur j'allumerais un cigare (m).
You would not dare; smoking is forbidden in the carriages.	Vous n'oseriez pas; il est défendu de fumer dans les voitures (f pl).
I can assure you one of my friends told me he smoked all the way from Mulhausen to Bâle.	Jé vous assure qu'un de mes amis m'a dit qu'il a fumé en allant de Mülhausen à Bâle.
Yes, but that was in France, where they have carriages on purpose for smokers.	C'est qu'il y a en France des voitures réservées pour les fumeurs.
That's quite a different thing. I wish I could procure a good description of a locomotive.	C'est autre chose (f). Que je voudrais avoir une idée succincte d'une locomotive.
I will tell you all I know about it.	Jé vous en dirai tout ce que j'en sais.
You are very kind. May I take the liberty of begging you to avoid scientific terms?	Vous êtes bien aimable. Est-ce que j'ose vous prier d'éviter les termes scientifiques?
I will explain the scientific words of which I make use.	J'expliquerai tous les mots difficiles dont je me sers.

FRENCH PRONUNCIATION—continued.

[It is in compliance with the earnest request of numerous correspondents that we have returned to our explanations of the difficulties of French pronunciation. The system we are now pursuing must prove successful if our readers will only devote a little of their time and energy to the careful study of these lessons, which require much patient attention. It is not without very sufficient reasons for so doing that we have repeated in this and the former lesson some of the information we have already given. The first few lessons are the key to the whole system, and it is therefore necessary to learn them thoroughly, and keep them constantly in view.]

OF VOWELS.—THE SOUND a.

This letter, without an accent, sounds as the same letter in the English word at. The same sound is the result of the combination of the two letters ea, and is marked thus in all the words in which the consonant g, placed before them, should be sounded soft, as will be explained in speaking of this letter; as in the words il engagea, il partagea. Therefore, a and ea, having the same sound, will be marked by the same number, a, ea.

The grave accent, which is placed over the a to show that this word à is a preposition, and not the third person singular of the verb to have, in the present of the indicative, having no influence over the sound of that letter, à with a grave accent will receive the number (1) also. This sound is also produced by the letter e before mm, as in the word femme, woman; and also by the letters em, in the word ennoblir (to make a person noble), which is pronounced en-no-blir; in solennel, which is pronounced so-len-nel. Thus the sound à, in the word at, &c.—

which is represented in French by a, ea, à, e, en—will be recognised by the number (1) placed over these five signs; as, a, ea, à, e, en.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY: LESSON XI.

MECHANICS OF FLUIDS.

TRANSMISSION OF PRESSURE BY LIQUIDS.

305. WHAT is the characteristic property of a fluid?—That its particles yield to the slightest force, and move freely among themselves.

306. Water and the air are both fluids, but we call one a liquid and the other a gas—how does a gas differ from a liquid?—Its particles are wider asunder, and instead of being held together by a mutual attraction, repel each other, and are confined by an external pressure.

307. If a force of pressure be applied at an orifice in the cover of a vessel full of water, what will be the effect?—The pressure will be transmitted through the entire mass of water confined in the vessel, and take effect, without diminution, against the bottom, sides, and top of the vessel.

308. Would the result be the same if the pressure were applied at an opening made in either side or in the bottom of the vessel?—It would.

309. If the hole be of the size of a square inch, and the pressure ten pounds, what will the pressure be against each square inch of the containing vessel?—Ten pounds.

310. What is the important principle just stated called?—The principle of equal pressure.

311. In what powerful machine is this principle applied?—In the Hydraulic Press.

312. What is its construction?—It consists of two metallic cylindrical vessels, of very unequal size, communicating with each other by a small pipe; each vessel is provided with a water-tight piston.

313. How does it act?—A pressure is applied to the small piston, by forcing down the lever, and this is transmitted and takes effect upward against the large piston.

314. Explain further.—The water that is forced into the large vessel is prevented from coming back by a valve set in the pipe.

315. How is its place supplied?—By more water flowing into the small vessel, from a reservoir near at hand, when its piston is raised again.

316. Suppose the small piston to be of the size of one square inch, and the large one of 1,000 square inches, a pressure of one pound upon the small piston will be attended with how great a pressure against the large piston?—1,000 pounds.

317. Suppose, now, the lever to increase the power 20 times, and that a man presses on the end of the lever with his whole weight (150 lbs.), how great a pressure would take effect?—3,000,000 lbs., or 1,339 tons.

318. To realise this enormous pressure, and raise the large piston one foot, through what space would the end of the lever have to be worked?—3½ miles.

319. How does the hydraulic press compare with other machines in power?—It is the most powerful of all machines.

320. What are some of the purposes to which it has been applied?—To press paper, cloth, hay, &c., and to uproot trees.

321. Mention other applications.—To test the strength of ropes, chains, and building materials; also to raise ships in docks.

322. Does any pressure that may be applied to a confined mass of water, take effect against the surface of any solid that is immersed in the water?—It does.

323. If no pressure were to be applied to water confined in a vessel, by means of a piston fitted to an opening in the cover, would there not still be a certain pressure in action at the opening?—The pressure of the atmosphere, 15 pounds to the square inch, would be exerted upon the exposed surface of the water.

324. Are fishes, in their liquid element, exposed to the pressure of the atmosphere?—They are; the atmosphere presses on the level surface of every body of water, and its pressure is transmitted through the whole mass of the water.

325. Will a body of air confined in a close vessel transmit any external pressure that may be applied to it, after the same manner that water does?—It will; the only difference is that the air is compressed by an external pressure into a smaller space.

PRESSURE OF HEAVY FLUIDS.

326. Suppose we have three open vessels, having bottoms of the same size, and filled with water to the same height—will the water press, by its own weight, with more force on the bottom of the large vessel than upon that of the small one?—It will not; the amount of pressure will be the same on the bottom of each of the three vessels, and will be equal to the weight of the column of water in the other vessel.

227. What is this remarkable principle called?—The Hydrostatic Paradox.

328. What is the height at which the water stands above the surface pressed, and upon which alone the pressure per square inch depends, called?—The Head of Water.

329. If the depth, or head of water, be increased, how will the pressure be affected?—If the depth becomes twice as great, the pressure will also be twice as great, and so on.

330. Does the pressure increase in the same manner in descending to different depths in the same vessel?—It does. In either of the three vessels mentioned, the pressure on a square inch is only half as great at half the depth as at the bottom.

331. In deep reservoirs, lakes, rivers, &c., what is the pressure at the depth of 34 feet?—Very nearly 15 pounds on a square inch, and 2,125 pounds, or a little less than one ton on a square foot.

332. For every additional 34 feet of depth, how much greater is the pressure?—Fifteen pounds on a square inch.

333. Does the downward pressure on any layer take effect laterally throughout the layer, and against the sides of the vessel?—It does; it is transmitted in every direction through the layer, in accordance with the principle of equal pressure.

334. Suppose a body were immersed in water at a certain depth, would the pressure of the water take effect against its sides?—It would; every square inch would experience a pressure increasing with the depth of immersion.

335. Suppose an empty bottle, tightly closed by a glass stopper, were let down into the sea, what would be the tendency of the pressures against all sides of it?—To crush it in.

336. Have bottles actually thus been crushed in?—The common square bottles have, at the depth of 60 feet or so.

337. When an iron pipe is used to convey water into a city from a large reservoir, what is the head of water upon which the pressure against the whole interior of the pipe depends?—The depth of the pipe below the level of the water in the reservoir.

338. What would the pressure be if the head were 100 feet?—43½ pounds on each square inch.

339. Suppose a small orifice were made in the top of the pipe, how high would the water spout?—Nearly up to the level of the water in the reservoir.

340. If two vessels, containing the same liquid, communicate with each other, will the liquid stand at the same height in each?—It will.

341. Give an example of the operation of this principle.—Water is conveyed into cities by large iron pipes, and rises in small pipes in the houses to the level, or nearly so, of the water in the distant reservoir.

LIFE'S DISTRUST.

My footsteps ne'er again shall press
 The earth aside of thine;
 Nor shall we roam together, where
 The golden sunbeams shine;
 And never shall we flowers pluck
 From out the forest glade,
 To worship in our "heart of hearts"
 All things that God has made.
 For on our path a shadow is
 That chills us to the soul,
 And causes waves of dark distrust
 Between our hearts to roll.
 Oh, ne'er again shall love's own wings
 Be round us as of yore!
 Nor thou with me see through the gates
 Which lead to pleasure's shore.
 For that unsightly shadow rests
 Upon thy path and mine,
 And doubts and fears have mingled with
 Our feelings, once divine.
 Then fare thee well! the golden bowl
 Of friendship now is shattered;
 And 'midst the wreck of happiness
 Our joys and hopes are scattered.

LAWFUL STRUGGLES.—When we feel any pressure of distress we are not to conclude that we can only obey the will of heaven by languishing under it, any more than when we perceive the pain of thirst we are to imagine that water is prohibited. Of misfortune it never can be certainly known whether, as proceeding from the hand of God, it is an act of favour or of punishment; but since all the ordinary dispensations of Providence are to be interpreted according to the general analogy of things, we may conclude that we have a right to remove one inconvenience as well as another; that we are only to take care that we purchase not ease with guilt; and that our Maker's purpose, whether of reward or severity, may be answered by the labours which he lays us under the necessity of performing.

ASCENT AND DESCENT OF MOUNT VESUVIUS.

THE ascent of Mount Vesuvius is a most inspiring excursion. You leave Naples, after breakfast, at nine o'clock, climb to the volcano, examine the crater at your leisure, and at five or six o'clock in the afternoon are on your way back to dinner in the city. Neapolitan hospitality has so levelled the way, modified the slopes, anticipated all the traveller's desires, that unless you choose to make difficulties, you need not undergo any extraordinary fatigue. The Neapolitans like only easy pleasures. Compared to Vesuvius, the most inconsiderable Swiss mountain exacts more patience and strength. There are many ways of contemplating the ascent of Vesuvius. Each one, according to his character, cherishes different associations: one will bring back the ennui he carried thither; another will see only poetry, and yet another only amusement in the undertaking. Rich and blasés travellers go in their carriages to the Hermitage, which is about two-thirds of the way up. But if you wish to travel truly, you must go on foot, alone or with one companion. You leave all care at the base of the mountain, and abandon eyes, heart, and soul to the spectacle before you. At each turn of the path, you halt and gaze, enjoying all the changes of the perspective, surrender yourself to the enchantment of a splendid sky, and that azure sea to which waves of blackened lava seem sweeping between banks of fruits and flowers; you enjoy the intoxication of all the fermentations ascending from the bosom of nature; you are moved at the remembrance of cities buried under cinders and subterranean fires. A soft and distant melancholy elevates the sentiment of admiration. Thus you arrive, moved and palpitating, at the summit, raised above yourself, so to speak. Then, when from the midst of sulphurous exhalations, from the height of this calined foam, this soil, blackened, desolated, burning and quaking with the growlings of the yawning furnace, you gaze down at distant Naples, beautiful and white as marble, its glittering gulf sowed with gem-like islands, and reflecting all the fires of the sun, what contemplative soul does not feel, in all its profundity, the unparalleled contrast which inspired Chateaubriand with this exclamation, "It is Paradise seen from Hades!" For another, and the more numerous class of travellers, the ascent of Vesuvius differs very little from a donkey-ride at Montmorency. They find out a few days beforehand, at the different hotels, what strangers are disposed to join the party. One fine morning, after a breakfast of Fusaro oysters, washed down with white wine of Ischia, the joyous band hurries in carriages to Portici. From the first houses they come to, a dusty crowd of guides and animals, shouting, neighing, and braying, pouring into the streets, surround the carriages, and block up access to the house of Salvador. This is the name of an old and famous guide. He has left several sons; some have inherited his profession, and own a large and fine farm, situated almost at the foot of Vesuvius. Prices are discussed, donkeys and horses examined, and the air rings with merry peals of laughter. He who is most ridiculously fitted out is most jovial. The procession issues noisily from the houses, and begins to crowd the fine road which winds through the vineyards. While singing, storytelling, discussing, shouting, and laughing, they arrive at the Hermitage. This interlude ended, the hacks are remounted, and they gallop on. But, finally, the verdure ceases; the lava lies under foot, and the peak ascends abruptly. Now is the time to dismount. The most delicate lady might walk without assistance by stepping from one block of lava to another, as you cross a brook on stepping stones. But this would be too simple an operation. The arm of a cavalier is scarcely more so, but the rude jolts of a litter borne by two muscular Neapolitans are more amusing. At least there is some "local colour" in hanging gently by one hand to a rope the guide pulls after him. The least false step is a new source of shouts and laughter. On the way up, instructive experiments are made. At the first indication of heat in the soil, at the first vapours of sulphur, a stick and some bits of paper are introduced into the fissure. The smoke rises, the stick blackens, the paper burns—great applause! But it is near the crater that nerve and wit are rekindled. Let a puff of smoke and a few stones rise and fall, what exclamations, boasts, flights, and rallies! Neapolitan coins are handed to the guides, who place them on the fiery scoria issuing from the volcano, and immerse them with the end of a stick. The lava cools round the cent, and the coins are cherished as indisputable proofs of a perilous ascent of Vesuvius. As for the descent, the guide lead you to a slope covered with ashes. You take care to strike your heels in deeply and bend backward, and go down at a run. In five minutes you traverse a space it took you more than half an hour to climb. Some, from awkwardness, stumble and slide down, but all meet safely at the base.

MICHAEL FARADAY, LL.D.

THE poet says—

"Lives of great men all remind us,
We may make our lives sublime."

And, indeed, this is the grand lesson of biography. Men of giant souls but of dwarf-like circumstances, rich in wisdom but poor in wealth, have emerged from their inconspicuous positions, have resolved to do something, and have never been turned aside from their purpose. They have worked on through good report and through evil report. With a bold front and piercing eye, they have been daunted by no danger, nor repelled by any obstacle—but have persevered without the slightest doubt of a final triumph. Days and nights, their fortune, their health, and everything dear in existence, they have consecrated to the success of their particular enterprise. They have grappled with, and have overcome, the most stubborn difficulties, and have never relaxed either hand or foot so long as vitality remained. Ability for arduous undertakings is lodged in every human breast—a grand gift from God; but only the persevering worker knows how much this latent power can achieve, and he can only tell when his efforts have been crowned with success. The aspiring competitor in this race of life must early fix his eye in a specific direction, then, with unflinching step, must he press toward the mark. The doubtful, the hesitating never succeed.

The subject of our sketch is another illustration, added to the many which already exist, of the great things to be accomplished by persevering industry. In Faraday we have an example of the triumphs of self-reliance. He is a self-made man. He has come forth from obscurity and risen to a lofty and noble eminence. He has fought a hard battle and has conquered. To his scientific inventions England, nay, the world, is deeply indebted. And yet Faraday is not one of those who have been devoted from their youth to the profession of which he is so bright an ornament. He was not born great, nor has greatness been thrust upon him. He has achieved it by the force of his strong intellect, his ardent temperament, his determined will.

Michael Faraday is the son of a working blacksmith. He was born at Newington, Surrey, September 22, 1791. He received but a scanty education, at an ordinary day-school in the neighbourhood, and was early apprenticed to a bookbinder in London. The pursuit was not congenial to him. He panted for better things. Science allured him with her charms; but it seemed that her brilliant domains were never to be trodden by him: he must stand afar off and admire what he could never hope to enjoy—applauding triumphs he could never hope to achieve. But Michael Faraday did not grow sick at heart. He did not forsake his business nor sigh over his humble occupation. He steadily worked on in his vocation, filling up his leisure time with such scientific instruction as he could obtain. The few improving works which fell into his hands he read with avidity. Among these were Mrs. Marcet's "Conversations on Chemistry," and a treatise on "Electricity." He manufactured philosophical apparatus, toiled, and studied, and perseveringly, industriously collected information. He was a prodigy in the shop. His master was proud of him, and one day called the attention of a customer to an electrical machine which his young man had made.

This gentleman was delighted with the intelligence and skill of the young student, and took him to the Royal Institution to hear Davy lecture. In a letter to a friend, Faraday himself thus relates the circumstance:—

"My dear sir,—You asked me to give you an account of my first introduction to Sir H. Davy, which I am very happy to do, and think the circumstance will bear testimony to the goodness of his heart. When I was a bookseller's apprentice, I was very fond of experiment and very averse to trade. It happened that a gentleman, a member of the Royal Institution, took me to hear some of Sir H. Davy's last lectures in Albemarle-street. I took notes, and afterwards wrote them out more fairly in a quarto volume. My desire to escape from trade, which I thought vicious and selfish, and to enter into the service of science, which I imagined made its pursuers amiable and liberal, induced me at last to take the bold and simple step of writing to Sir H. Davy expressing my wishes, and a hope that if an opportunity came in his way he would favour my views; at the same time I sent the notes I had taken at his lectures. The answer, which makes all the point of my communication, I send you in the original, requesting you to take great care of it, and to let me have it back, for you may imagine how much I value it. You will observe that this took place at the end of the year 1812, and early in 1813 he requested to see me, and told me of the situation of assistant in the laboratory of the Royal Institution, then just vacant. At the same time that he thus gratified my desire as to scientific employment he still advised me not to give up the prospects I had before me, telling me that science was a harsh mistress, and, in a pecuniary point of view, but poorly remunerated those who devoted themselves to her service. He smiled at my notions of the superior moral feelings of philosophic men, and said he would leave me to the experience of a few years to set me right on the matter. Finally, through his good efforts, I went to the Royal Institution early in March, 1813, as assistant in the laboratory; and in October of the same year went with him abroad as his assistant in experiments and in writing. I returned with him in April, 1815, resumed my station in the Royal Institution, and have, as you know, ever since remained there. I am, dear sir, very truly yours, M. FARADAY."

The reply of Sir H. Davy to Faraday's first letter, was as follows:—"Sir,—I am far from displeased with the proof you have given me of your confidence, and which displays your zeal, power of memory, and attention. I am obliged to go out of town, and shall not be settled in town till the end of January; I will then see you at any time you wish. It would gratify me to be of any service to you. I wish it may be in my power. I am, sir, your obedient humble servant, H. DAVY."

Sir Humphry Davy had known what it was to aspire. He had experienced the difficulties which beset the path of the young and inexperienced student—no wonder he should feel an interest in Faraday. And once engaged in his favourite occupation, such a man as Faraday was certain to succeed. What else is there to tell but the story of his success? In 1820, after laborious investigation, he discovered the chloride of carbon. In 1821 he ascertained the mutual rotation of a magnetic pole and an electric current. Steadily pursuing the subject of electric phenomena, for the results of his experiments he received, in 1846, the Royal and the Romford medals. His researches were almost exclusively conducted in the Royal Institution. He has now risen to the highest rank among European philosophers. He has conscientiously devoted all his powers to the elucidation of the most important theories of science. He has rendered good practical service in every department of scientific investigation; he has succeeded in extending the boundaries of the scientific world, and by the simplicity of his lectures and publications, has familiarised the popular mind with scientific truth. In the words of a recent writer we may say:—"Faraday combines in a rare extent great boldness in speculating with great caution in concluding. His patience and perseverance as a worker are as remarkable as his originality as a thinker, and his skill as an expositor; and with an ingenuity in devising experiments and a manipulative skill and dexterity in performing them, never, we believe, surpassed, he combines an accuracy and fidelity in working such as brilliant experimentalists and dextrous manipulators often fail to exhibit. Half truths with him are hateful things, and he grudges neither thought, nor time, nor labour, not to speak of expense, provided they will bring him certainty of information. His aim is a decided Yes, or a decided No, or the attainment of the certainty that the problem is one which man cannot answer either way. The cheerful acknowledgement of the labours of others, the patient study of all reasonable objections to his own most cherished views, the frank confession of changes of opinion, where that has occurred, the lowly estimate of himself, and the lofty, nay, solemn estimate of the dignity of his vocation as an unfold of the works of God, make us love as much as we honour our great electrician, and should prompt our young men to imitate his spirit, which they may all do, as well as rival him in his discoveries, in which they may be less successful."

Dr. Faraday's reputation is universal. His ability is recognised by the learned societies of every country in Europe. In 1823 he was elected Corresponding Member of the Academy of Sciences, Paris. Two years later he became a Member of the Royal Society—in 1832. He is a Knight of the Prussian Order of Merit, and a Commander of the Legion of Honour. In 1835 Mr. Faraday received from the Government—then under the leadership of Melbourne—a well-deserved pension of three hundred a year; and received the honorary degree of LL.D. from the University of Oxford. One of Mr. Faraday's most popular works is that on "Chemical Manipulations;" but his great work, in which he has ably investigated the reciprocal relations of light, heat, magnetism, and electricity, is entitled "Researches in Electricity."

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

MICHAEL FARADAY, ESQ., LL.D., F.R.S., ETC. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

THE SAHARA.

THE sandy plains of Africa are characteristic of that quarter of the globe. Travellers who have crossed those dreary wastes retain a vivid impression of their journey. Stay-at-homes, who never saw, and never will see, the desert, are familiar with its dread solitudes, its transparent atmosphere, its intense sunshine, its scorching heat, its parched sands, its deadly simooms. Everybody knows something or other of the desert. We picture to ourselves those terrible plains, picture vividly, even though we have never beheld them. We notice the high mounds of sand, shifting with every change of wind; on the right hand, sand—on the left hand, sand—behind us, sand—before us, sand—over us, a flaming sun that darts its beams upon us as through a burning-lens, and threatens to destroy our caravan. Here are the men of the plains, leading our camels—the ships of the desert—and we grow sick and weary, and there settles over us a gloom we cannot dispel.

The desert is a sepulchre. Death stares us in the face. We stumble over his victims. Bleached bones serve us for mile-stones. The caravan is hushed. We urge our camels forward. There is the fear of the deadly simoom—the dread of the deceitful mirage. Pomegranates and citrons we have none. Cold pebbles are at a premium. The drainings of the water-skins are as nectar. There is dust in every pore, and fever in every vein. Why does our camel sniff the air and jog on with a quicker but more irksome motion? Why do our guides bow down their heads, and cry "Il Allah!" What is it we see?—Water, clear as crystal; palm-trees, bright as emeralds, their fan-leaves waving like banners against the sapphire sky. It is an oasis. Here is a sweet asylum, a pleasant haven—a leafy canopy above, cool, refreshing water at our feet; date-clusters over our heads, while we, at our ease, are stretched on odoriferous grass.

But it often happens, and it is so in this case, that the Imagination is a better artist than Experience. The desert is not all that it is represented to be—its wastes are neither so terrible, nor its oases so beautiful, as we have been taught to believe.

Most people are aware that Sahara is the name given to that immense tract of African territory which extends for a thousand miles between the Atlantic and the Red Sea, and from the Atlas Chain to the Soudan. It covers nine-tenths of the whole extent of the great plain of Africa. It is divided into two parts by a tract of stony country, by which it is traversed from north to south. That portion of the desert which extends between this tract and the Atlantic Ocean is almost entirely covered with a fine sand, which being agitated by the wind, rises in sand-spouts. In the division of the desert which extends from the above-named stony tract on the one side, and Egypt and Nubia on the other, the surface is covered with gravel rather than sand, and in many places with hard clay. The desert is not, as is commonly believed, a wide plain, but an undulating country clothed with a scanty vegetation and dotted with verdant and well-watered oases. The Arabs, struck by the aspect of the desert, to which the strong easterly winds communicate an extraordinary appearance, have bestowed on it the poetical title of Bahr bela Ma—dry ocean, or, sea without water. Geologists, in fact, regard the Sahara as a locality formerly covered by the sea, and the peculiarities of its physical geography bear out this theory.

Lakes and rivers are numerous, though but little known; many of the latter are dried up, and their beds, which are broad and deep, are in every sense hamadah, or desert. Among those which are in some degree navigable may be noticed the Draa, which is about the width of the Seine, at Paris. The valley watered by this stream is exceedingly fertile, and bears comparison with the tropical regions of America. Of the lakes there are two descriptions—the salt lakes, which are dried up during the summer, and those whose waters fertilise and enrich the oases of the Sahara.

Indeed, all the western parts of the Sahara would be totally impassable were it not that it is here and there interspersed with these oases, compared by the ancients to the spots on a leopard's skin. These insulated spots,

"Tufted isles,

That verdant rise amid the Libyan wilds," are often the seat of a numerous population. Some of them, particularly those on the east side of the Great Desert, are very extensive. The country of Fezzan is, for example, nothing but an oasis. These oases are usually depressions below the level of the plain. The water which appears in them seems to be derived from more elevated regions, and to be conveyed through the substratum of clay beneath the land surface of limestone, and to owe its rise to the removal in those places of the superficial stratum which enables it to reach the surface.

THE OASIS IN THE DESERT.

There are several peopled oases which serve as the chief dwelling places of a tribe. The French conquests in Algeria, and the explorations of indefatigable travellers in the unknown regions of the African continent, have brought to light many of these places with which we have been hitherto unacquainted. About three days' journey to the west of El Aghoat, is an oasis called El Maia (little water), the appearance of which is accurately given in the accompanying illustration. An old draw-well and some Arab structures, though of no great account, render El Maia a somewhat important place; while its soft grassy carpet, luxuriant foliage, magnificent dates, and refreshing water make it as agreeable as it is important.

The extreme beauty and fertility, which nearly all travellers agree in attributing to the "oasis of the desert," undoubtedly owe much of their renown to the contrast which they offer to the surrounding sterility. Those only who have toiled for days amid a pathless, burning sand can form an idea of the delight experienced at falling in with one of these cities of refuge—islands of the blessed in the ocean of desolation. In Italy, or England, or France, they would excite no attention, but in Sahara they are as a paradise. The graceful palm-tree, with its taper stem, its long, narrow leaves, and its abundant crop of dates, indicates not only a secure resting place from a toilsome journey, but a sure relief from want. It is no matter of surprise, under these circumstances, that these oases should excite so much delight, or that their praises should be so enthusiastically sung.

The inhabitants of the Sahara belong almost exclusively to the white race. The most numerous, and, in fact, the real masters of the territory, are the Tonareg, a race of bandits who live on the pillage of the caravans and on the contributions which they levy on all travellers. Their favourite proverb is, "The night is good for the poor and brave." The Tonareg, true descendants of the ancient Libyans, call themselves Imoschars. The Azgars, Hoggars, Kalouls, and others, are different branches of the same great family, leading the same wandering life, and engaged in the same depredations.

To the west of the country of the Tonaregs, the desert is occupied by Arab tribes of blood more or less pure, but all nomadic in their habits. The Arabs have a reputation as bad as that of their neighbours. One of their tribes, the Faris, are characterised by a very significant proverb:—"When thou meetest a Fari and a Faai (a viper of the desert), kill the Fari and let the viper escape."

Besides these there are several mixed tribes about whom but little is known, and even that is not to their credit. They preserve, however, a sort of caste, the chief distinctions of which are the Hassanes, the Marabouts, the Zenagues, the Laratines. The Hassanes are warriors of the Arab race; their vassals are the Zenagues, a race indigenous to the desert. The Marabouts are of an inferior class, but are esteemed on account of their religious character; while the Laratines are the lowest of all—the common negro slaves.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,
SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER LX.

The moral lesson would be invaluable, no doubt—to the little children, who played at "hanging" for a week afterwards; to the professional gentlemen, who had been picking pockets at the gallows-foot; to the mothers, who promised their children that if they were good they should see the next man hung; and to the mass of readers of the narrative in the newspapers.—CHARLES DICKENS.

"FEATHER," said Larky, after reflecting for some time on what he should say to give an agreeable turn to the conversation, "Ben Darrell be found guilty. He's to be hanged next Monday."

Bob turned pale.

"It's a wondrous shame," he said; "he never meant to kill his wife, any more than I moine."

Apple Blossom started. What if Bob, too, in the end, should have killed his wife? If she died of a cancer caused by his kick, or expired under the operation, in the eye of the law it might be manslaughter, but it was slow murder, for all that!

"Stunning Steenie, and Prigging Peter, and the Fox, and a sight more of 'em, are a-going to see him hanged, dad," said Larky, "and so is Potato Heels, and all I can say won't put her off going; and she wanted to get me to go, and Merry. She had half a-ticed Merry to go on the sly; but I've told her if she offers for to git Merry to do such a crule, black-guardly think, I'll wallop her well—and as for Merry, mother's spoked to her about it. If Potato Heels goes, I've told her I'll never be friends with her no more, and she sha'n't come to our house, nor spake to Merry nor Hope. But she's set up by Stunning Steenie and Prigging Peter, and she've sold a sight o' loocifers, and got a haul another way—one the Fox put her up to—and she's going to give 'em all a fine trate of roast taters and butter, and maybe some gin."

"What was the other way she got a haul?" asked Bob.

"Why, she took a mess o' cold gruel and grits, that she found in an old tin can, and seeing a elderly lady—or, as they calls 'em, a 'doll'—dressed wery foine in figured silk, stuck out wery wide, and walking wery stately, she got up close, and spilled it over her dress, behind; and then she went up, sidling and curtseying, and said, 'I begs your parding, lady, but there's a sight o' summat on your dress. I see a gal come behind you, and then run away for her life.' 'Oh, lor! whatever shall I do?' says the lady, who'd nothink but a bit of a pocket-handkerchief, all lace and work, in her hand. 'I'll wipe it off with my apron, my lady,' says Meg; 'if I does it at onst it won't be none the wuss, and it don't matter for the likes of me, but it do for you, my lady,' says Meg, with another curtsey, 'for I'm sure you're as bootiful as wax-work, and fit to be a queen, or to be married to the Lord Mayor. I said, when first I seed you a-coming along, 'Well, she be stunning, she be.' So she set to and wiped it all off, the lady a-praising and a-thanking her all the time; and when she'd done, she axed her her name, and where she went to school, and what she'd learnt, and praised her up sky-high; and asked her if she'd like to be cleaned and tidied up, and wait on a lady, and whether her schoolmistress would speak up for her, and a deal more;—and give her a two-shilling piece: and the Fox says he ought to go snacks for putting her up to the dodge, but she won't agree, noways, to that; but is a-going to treat 'em all to gin, and roast taters, and butter, when they goes to see Ben Darrell hanged."

"Which they sha'n't do," said Apple Blossom. "They're hardened enough, without no such brutal soights as that 'ere. I'll tell Mr. Stephen what they're up to, and I hopes he'll lock 'em all up, and Meg, too, on Monday morning. It's sickening to think of their going to see the poor feller's agonies, ain't it, Bob?"

"Oh! I ain't for no such soights," said Bob. "I never seed but one man hanged, and that wor Tawell; and I didn't see much o' that; for, jest as he wor put under the noose, I turned sick and giddy, and fainted away as dead as if I had been a gal."

"That showed the kindness of thy heart, Bob," said Apple Blossom. "Thee wor allys soft-hearted."

"And soft-headed, too," said Bob, "or I'd not be in this plight, lass."

"Poor Bob!" said Apple Blossom, taking his hand, and bending over him to kiss him. "Jem's tooked up a'most entirely just now with poor Ben Darrell; but, when all's over, maybe you'd like me to bring Jem, that he may talk matters over, and give ye a little comfort."

"Maybe I wouldn't loike no such thing," said Bob, red as fire, and his eyes flashing. "And moind, woife, and you, Larky, moind, I don't want nor choose to have no tittle abstinence chaps a comeng galliwanting here along of my woife, nor a darkening my doors at home while I'm away."

"Oh! but, feather," said Larky Grigg, "Jem Goodman don't darken no doors, and don't galliwant. He brightens every home he wists, he do."

"Well, he sha'n't brighten moine, then," said Bob; "so moind that."

Apple Blossom was about to speak, but the time allotted to visitors had expired, and merely saying, "Good bye, Bob; I wish thee better, in more ways nor one," she left the ward, Larky Grigg following, after having knelt down for a minute by his father's bed to pray God to bless and restore him, and having kissed Bob's now pale hand and dropped upon it that gem in the sight of heaven—the tear of filial piety.

Apple Blossom and Larky Grigg then left the hospital, and returned to their humble home, having seen Kitty Slybrute, pale as death, half carried into a cab, and driven off, in company with her mother, Mrs. Robson.

CHAPTER LXI.

I feel ashamed and degraded at the brutal curiosity which took me to that brutal sight, and I pray Almighty God to cause this disgraceful sin to pass from among us, and to cleanse our land of blood.—THACKERAY.

The fatal Monday has dawned at length.

The rays of a lovely spring morning stream through the small, deeply embossed, grated windows of the condemned cell at Newgate.

Ben Darrell—who has spent the previous day, and the greater part of the night, in fervent prayer, in listening to the earnest exhortations of the reverend the ordinary, and in conversation with Jem Goodman about his soul, his mother, and his children—had dropped asleep at last, fairly exhausted. Even while he sat upon his hard and narrow bed, a change, a great change had come over Ben Darrell. And, oh, how had Jem Goodman toiled and prayed night and day to effect that change! Ben Darrell—who had so long lived without God in the world, and had never realised to himself his Saviour, his soul, or his sins—was now a firm believer.

Repentance and faith now sat, like two angels, among the ruins of his broken heart. He was no longer either taving like a madman, or sobbing like a child, or stupid like an idiot; he was calm, brave, patient, now. He thought of the Son of God—the sinless—on the cross, and then it did not seem much that he—the sinful—should die on the scaffold.

The change in the outward man was as great as that in the inward one; but that change had been wrought at first, and while terror maddened, and shame bowed him, and while the future loomed dark as the present and the past.

In that ghastly, that terrible time his crisp and clustering black locks had turned white, he had wasted away almost to a skeleton, despair had traced deep lines on his brow, and painted dark circles round his eyes; his form was bowed and shrunk; his skin dry and livid. In a few weeks Ben Darrell seemed to have aged more than twenty years.

That change in his outward appearance, and which was caused by the agony of his remorse, his terror, and his shame, was not done away with when earthly tortures gave way to heavenly hopes. The evil was wrought, and even a respite would not repair the harm already done; he must always be a gray, bent, silver-haired, shattered man, old before his time.

His poor old mother lived to know that he who, as a boy, had been her pride—her joy—her comfort—her all! had been found guilty. That terrible journey to London, and the agony of that interview with her son, poor Ben, in Newgate, had shaken her, poor frail old creature, almost into her grave.

She crept back to the union, went to bed very ill, and all but died in the night. But she was spared, and sent her blessing to her son. It was all she had to send, and Jem Goodman took care to convey it to him.

Ben wept when he heard his fond, kind old mother was so ill. A mother's death always seems to uproot the strongest ties—all feel as if a part of their own being dies with their mother, and is buried with her. It would have been a great blow to Ben Darrell if his mother had died.

When a parent dies it is as if the tree were uprooted, and the branches must droop. But Ben Darrell, who seemed to have given up his heart, mind, thoughts, feelings, and opinions, to the guidance of Jem Goodman, took comfort when Jem bade him do so, and when he pointed out that even had she died, it would have been a mercy and a Providence for her to be spared the agony of knowing that he had been doomed on earth—till she welcomed him, washed in the blood of the Lamb, in the courts of heaven. That she had sent him her blessing; and that as her years had already far exceeded the allotted age of man, so was her strength nothing but labour and sorrow. Ben, hearing this, dried his tears; resolved to bear his fate, whatever it might be, without repining; and looked forward to meeting her and his Esther in a better world, even if she never rallied enough to bid him adieu on earth.

On the preceding Sunday, the Rev. Mr. Davis (the ordinary of the gaol at Newgate) had preached what is called "the condemned sermon" in the chapel of the prison.

Ben Darrell listened with earnest and devout attention, and fervently joined in the responses.

When, in the litany, the prayer was offered up against sudden death, a loud groan escaped him, and he involuntarily clasped his throat, pressing it so tightly for a moment or so that the veins of his forehead filled, his face grew purple, and two turnkeys, who were closely watching him, were about to seize his hands, thinking he meditated strangling himself.

But he had no such intention, it was almost unconsciously he clutched his throat; in his despair and terror he had often done it before, as if to realise to himself what the agony would be, and in the hope of accustoming his mind to the terrible contact with the rope.

He joined fervently in the prayers, and with that fine natural tenor and good ear, to which his poor mother had attributed his ruin, he joined in the fourth and fifth verses of the 39th Psalm:—

"Lord, let me know my term of days;
How soon my life will end."

When in the communion service the words, "Thou shalt do no murder" struck like a knell on his ear and on his heart, and every eye in that crowded chapel was turned almost instinctively on the prisoner, a deep flush rose like a cloud over his pale face, and then left it white as marble.

Often during the sermon his eyes filled with tears.

The text was from the 6th verse of the 9th chapter of Genesis:—"Whosoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God made he man." It was, as such discourses always are, preached for the condemned, and at him; but the preacher was rather "a son of consolation" than of thunder. He did not dwell so much on the terrors of the law, as on the hopes—the consolations—the blessings of the Gospel! He pointed out that the prisoner's time was short, but, he added, that of the penitent thief on the cross was shorter still—and yet our blessed Lord said to him "To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise." "There is no crime so black," he added, "that it cannot be washed out in tears of penitence and the blood of the Lamb; to-morrow you will see the sun for the last time."

earth—oh, may you so employ the few hours that remain to you, that you may see the Sun of Glory when you wake from the sleep of death. Oh, may God have mercy on your soul." So deeply was Ben Darrell affected by this discourse, that he could not have reached his cell without the aid of the turnkey specially appointed to take charge of him. When he reached the condemned cell he threw himself on his knees by his bed, and wept and prayed till Jem Goodman arrived, bringing little Nussy and baby Ben for him to take his last farewell of them.

He was much struck with the wonderful improvement in the appearance of the children. They had been, when he had seen them last, solely owing to drink and him, so lean, ragged, dirty, wretched, and wan! and now they were plump, rosy, so very clean, and in their best mourning; and little Hope had combed, and brushed, and arranged little Nussy's hair so nicely, having washed and oiled it, and tied it with black ribbon; and made so much of a few flaxen rings, that seemed borrowed from the silk-worm, and which peeped out from under baby Ben's pretty cap, which Hope had got a teacher at the Ragged School to quilt up for this sad occasion, and to adorn with a black cockade. Baby Ben, that wasted, pinched, wolf-eyed baby, whom his father remembered all head, and legs, and arms, was now, for rosy chubbiness and dimpled gladness, a cherub worthy of Giorgione's pencil.

Jem brought him in on one arm, leading little Nussy by the hand.

Baby Ben looked round, but not liking what he saw, hid his face on Jem's shoulder; little Nussy scarcely knew her father again, he was so altered; but had he not been so, she had no fond or pleasant recollections of him, and she clung to Jem Goodman and hung back. She was a dry-eyed child, and seldom shed a tear. Baby Ben, when his father would kiss him, roared lustily, and as poor Ben explained to little Nussy, that he should never see her more, but that he hoped she would be a good girl, and grow up like her mother in heaven, she thought of her mother, and did what the sight of her father (even though she knew he was going to be hanged) had failed to do,—she cried bitterly.

Ben then blessed them both, embraced them once more, and allowed Jem Goodman to take them away, making him promise to return as soon as possible. Poor wretch! he felt a sort of safety and comfort in Jem's presence, and Jem had obtained permission to be with him to the last!

CHAPTER LXII.

"That's he! that's he!" you hear the people say, as the devoted man came up.—THACKERAY.

WHAT an awful night was that for Ben Darrell!

We generally read in accounts of nights preceding executions that the miserable victims of their own sins—of a great and fatal mistake in government—sleep soundly and breakfast heartily! That, to the thinking mind, is more awful at such a time than the night of prayer and the morning of fasting which, with Ben Darrell, preceded the dreaded hour.

It is terrible to fall over a precipice with your eyes open, and with your mind prepared; but to roll over in a fit, or in one's sleep, seems more terrible still.

Nature, however, sank into a fitful repose at about two in the morning, and the turnkeys (two of whom watched him constantly) said that his dreams were pleasant dreams, that he smiled and talked of stars, and angels, and flowers, and of his mother, and Esther. At four o'clock, in fulfilment of his promise, permission having been granted by the authorities, Jem Goodman arrived, looking paler and more wretched than the wretched Ben Darrell himself. He had laid down for a few hours, that he might have strength to support the poor wretch to the last by words of faith and love, but he was too excited to sleep. Jem Goodman was, in truth, very ill, but he would not own it to himself or give way in the least, while there was yet anything to be done for Ben Darrell.

Ben Darrell was so afraid of losing in sleep and unconsciousness any of the few precious moments that remained to him for penitence and prayer, that he had made Jem Goodman promise, should he have dropped asleep and be slumbering when he arrived, to wake him.

It was a dreadful office to exact of friendship; but Jem was, in his own quiet way, a hero; he had given his word and he kept it!

The turnkeys, who liked and pitied poor Ben Darrell, who since the change Jem had made in his inward feelings had been most gentle, meek, and amiable, thought it cruel to rouse the poor fellow from such a sweet sleep, and such happy dreams, to all the ghastly realities of his last morning on earth; but Jem's view of the matter was not theirs—besides, he had given his word! He never broke his word!

But he stood for a moment, summoning all his energies for the painful duty he had to perform, for he had seen a sight that had unnerved him, and a deadly faintness had crept over him as he gazed upon it.

This was nothing less than the hideous black stage containing the drop. Just as Jem reached Newgate it was being wheeled out of a shed in the press-yard; and there it stood—oh! how horrible an object in that lovely morning light!—opposite the Debtors'-gate.

Carpenters were busily at work, fitting up the posts and the beams that formed the gibbet; and every sound of their hammers seemed to fall on Jem's heart!

Poor, wretched Ben Darrell! Jem had become quite attached to him; almost as he might have done to a child. And no wonder! He so clung to Jem—so loved—so believed in him!

Early as it was (scarcely four!) crowds of people were assembled to watch the ghastly preparations; and, among the foremost and the most eager, Jem Goodman, with a shudder, recognised Natt Stone, the murdered woman's brother!

He seemed never to rest, to take no food—to require none; but to live on his revenge, or rather his hopes of it. And certainly, to look on him, you would not have said that it was wholesome food.

